THE

BENGAL

CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One Body and one Spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

VOLUME XX.

Calcutta:

PRINTED AT THE BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHAN PRESS.

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL.

	Page.
Akyab,...	326
Allocution of our Most Holy Lord Pius IX. By Divine Providence, Pope, delivered in the Secrect Consistory, held on the 17th day of Feb. A. D. 1851. Rome 1851, (The) ...	211
Answer of our Most Holy Lord Pius IX. Pope, to Joseph Archbishop of Palmyra, ...	218
Appendix to the Letter of a Catholic on the moral condition of Protestant Sweden, ...	174
Asylum for the Poor to be attached to the Convent and Female Orphanage, Intally, ...	309
Bengal Catholic Orphanage, .. 45,	228
Book Worm, (The)	284
Borghi, (The Right Rev. Bishop) ...	327
Calcutta Catholic Schools, and Institutions—Visit of the Hon. Sir W. W. Burton, (one of the Judges of H. M. Supreme Court, Madras) to the above named Establishments, ...	43
Cape of Good Hope, ...	327
Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, and the Restoration of the Catholic Hierarchy in England, (The) ...	20
Case of the Brahmin Convert at Madras and of his Non-Convert Wife, Lutchmee Ummaul, (The)	351
Catholic Educational Institutions in Calcutta, ...	8
Catholic Cathedral, ...	144
Catholic Mission at Assam, ...	186
Catholic Male Orphanage and Day-Schools, Calcutta, ...	203
Catholic Clergy of the Diocese of Limerick.	253
Catholic Schools, Calcutta, ... 257,	327
Catholicity at Kisbnaghur, ...	23
Ceylon Catholic Statistics, ...	327
College, (St. John's,) 170, 188, 202, 227, 285, 302,	325
Conversion to the Catholic Faith of another Clergyman of the English Protestant Church, ...	281
Conversions, 11, 23, 34, 91, 109, 123. ... ... 312, 327,	356
Church of the Sacred Heart, Durrumtollah, ... 327,	358
Discourse on the Mission and Influence of the Popes, by the Right Rev. Bishop Gillis, (A) ... 257, 273,	286
District Charitable Society, 324, 340,	354
Dublin Review.—Art. XI.—The Manual of Devotion. By Ambrose Lisle Phillips, Esq. Derby. 1843. ... 2, 16, ... 29, 48, 63, 73,	90
Epistola Josephi Archiepiscopi Palmyrensis ad SS. D. N. Pium PP. IX....	217
Epistola SS. D. N. PII Papae IX. Ad Josephum Archiepiscopum Palmyrensem, ...	218
Eurasians or East Indians, ...	282
Execution in Sweden, ...	174
Extraordinary Progress of Catholicity in New South Wales, and in New Zealand, ... 7, 33,	45
Flowers of Heaven—Connection between Religion and Morality, 5, 17, ... 49, 90, 106, 133, 180. 231, 274,	307
Grand Distinctive Characteristics of the true Church—By Thos. W. Allies, M. A.—P. 356, late Rector of Launton and now a Convert to the Catholic Faith, ... 301,	335
History of the Life, Writings and Doctrines of Martin Luther—By J. M. V. Audin, .. 2, 17, 74, 105, 121, 149,	222
History and Fate of Sacrilege—By Sir H. Spelman, a Protestant, and continued by two Priests of the Church of England, to the present time, 75, 91,	307
Holy Week, Calcutta, ...	257
Hyderabad, ...	46
Important to intending Emigrants to Adelaide, ...	10
Important Letter addressed by his Eminence the Cardinal Prefect of the Sacred Congregation to His Grace, the Archbishop of Edessa, Vicar Apostolic of Western Bengal.	197
Indulgentia Plenaria ad Instar Jubilæi, A. D. 1850 and 1851, ...	295
Institute of the Christian Brothers, 71,	85
Intally Convent Boarding and Day-School, and Female Orphanage, 8,	228
Langlois, (Very Rev. Dr.)	16
Lecture on certain difficulties felt by Anglicans in submitting to the Catholic Church, by John Henry Newman, Priest of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri. Lecture 3, grace in the movement of 1833, not from the National Church 1850, ... 47, 62, 78,	88

Page.

Lenten Pastoral of the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe, ... 143
Letters from J. B. Richards, Esq., of Culna,... 115
Letter of Joseph the Archbishop of Palmyra to the Most Holy Father PP. IX. 217
Loretto Institution, St. Thomas' Church, 57
Loss and Gain—By Rev. Mr. Newman. —The result of Private Judgment, 30
Macao, ... 323
Manner of Administering Oaths to Catholics, ... 100
Miracle at Avignon, ... 114
Miss Talbot and the Taunton Convent, 269
——. Talbot's Letter, ... 271
—— Martineau an avowed Atheist, ... 327
Moulmein, ... 10
Notice to the Catholics residing at Bow-Bazar and the Circular-Road, ... 326
Obituary, ... 358
Olliffe's (Bishop) Letter to His Grace the most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop V. A W. B, ... 61
Parliamentary, ... 158
Pastoral Instruction for Lent, A. D. 1851, ... 127
Pastoral Instruction on the Plenary Indulgence, in the form of a Jubilee, A. D. 1850 & 1851, ... 297
Pentecost Sunday, Catholic Cathedral, 327
Plenary Indulgence in the form of a Jubilee,... 295
Private interpretation of the Bible, its Pernicious Results with respect to Civil Society, ...22, 31
Protest of the Roman Catholic Bar of Ireland against the ecclesiastical titles Assumption Bill, ... 254
Rangoon, ... 61
Recent miracles at Rimini and in the Vicinity of Avignon, ... 113
Refusal of a Catholic to make use of the Protestant Bible when making oath before a Magistrate... 99
Regulations for the Jubilee, ... 299
Restoration of the Catholic Hierarchy in England, ... 8, 255, 267
Rome, ... 180
Rome and Portugal, ... 285
Russell Agitation 253
Sermon delivered in St. George's Catholic Church, Southwark, on Sunday Morning, August 11th, 1850. By the Right Rev. N. Wiseman, D. D. Bishop of Melipotamus, V. A. L., (A) 104, 116, 130, 145, 159
Singapore, ... 201
Statement of the reasons of my conversion to the Catholic Church. By a late Clergyman of the Anglican Communion, in letters to a Friend. 117, 130, 146, 161, 177, ... 188, 203, 221, 228, 242
State of Morality in Protestant Countries, ... 171
St. Thomas' Church—Lent, 1851, A. D. 1st Week—1st Wednesday, ... 141
——————St. Patrick's Day, 155
——Wednesday—2nd Week, 169
—3rd Week—Wednesday, 183
—4th Week—4th Wednesday, ... 199, 225, 239
St. Thomas' Church, ... 341, 358
St. John's College Museum, ... 341
Thoughts upon the present Romeward movement in England, in connexion with the Papal Supremacy, .. 72, 87; 102
Tram Railway—Bombay, ... 327
Trinity Sunday, Church of the Sacred Heart, Durumtollah, ... 340
Vienna and the Austrians by Mrs. Trollope, ... 5, 18
Voltaire an Apologist for Religion, ... 256. 271, 299, 342
Unfair Dealing of a Portion, of the Press in what regards Catholics and their Religion, ... 282
Unjust Conduct of the Protestant Press towards Catholic and Catholicity. ... 337
Whites Confutation of Church of Englandism, ... 4, 17, 49, 274, 287
Wuzeerabad, ... 103

Selections.

Address of the Catholics of England to Her Majesty, ... 28
Aleppian Persecution, (The) 112
Aleppo, ... 111
American Ladies and their Rights, ... 40
Rat-Trap, 84
Animal Magnetism or Mesmerism. ... 264
Apprenticeship, ... 279
Archbishop of Turin and the Catholics at Lyons, (The) 56
Archdeacon Wilberforce, ... 70
Be not Self-Deceivers, ... 153
Bible! The Bible! The Bible! (The) 126
Bishops' address to the Clergy, (The)... 333
Bombay, ... 111
Captivity of Mary of Scots, ... 13
Cardinal Wiseman on the Papal Hierarchy, ... 106
Wiseman's Manifesto, ... 23
Wiseman's Appeal to the People of England, 69

Page.

Cardinal Wiseman on the Catholic Hierarchy, ... 76
——— Wiseman on the Press, ... 123
——— Wiseman and the Congregated Trades of Limerick, ... 238
——— Wiseman, (Enthronisation of) 64
Catholic Hierarchy, (The) 224
Catholics of Birmingham, (The) .. 80
Confessions under Torture, ... 126
Confusion of Sects in the Revolution of 1640 and afterwards, ... 363
Conversion to the Church of Rome, ... 140
Conversions, 28, 76, 109, 151, 210, 275, 302
Converts to the Catholic Faith, ... 202
Creed of the Universalists, ... 331
Crusade for England, (The) 278
Cursive Writing of the Romans, ... 14
Changes of Colour in Plants,.. ... 14
China, ... 306
Church Question Still, (The) 128
——— and State, (The) 247
——— Dissensions, ... 82
Danger within its Gates, ... 70
Declaration of the Protestant Bishop and Clergy of the Diocese of Cape Town, ... 251
Discovery of third Ring round Saturn —further particulars, ... 70
Dublin City to Dublin's Son, ... 359
East India Association, (The)... .. 305
Education, ... 259
Education in India, ... 303
Emigration Group Societies. (The) .. 306
Encroachments of Romanism, (The)... 112
English Intolerants, (The) 53
Extraordinary Scene in an English Protestant Cathedral, ... 196
Fatal Explosion, ... 236
First Fruits of the "Papal Aggression, 291
Gibraltar,..... 154
Go 50
Her Majesty's Clergy,... 110
How to feed the People. Substitutes for the Potato, ... 204
Hume, (M. P.) on the Russell Agitation, 82
Ireland, ... 83
Italy, ... 36, 224
King Dahoman's Army of Amazons, .. 236
Lady Arundel's defence of Nunneries, 362
Letters of Charles Waterton Esq., ... 84
——— from the Rev. Mr. Bennett, to Lord John Russell, ... 91
——— addressed to the Right Hon. Lord John Russell, on the Papal Aggression, By the Reverend Heber Playfair, D. D. (A)... 164
——— to the Right Hon. the Earl of Shrewsbury, Waterford and Wexford, on the re-establishment of the Hierarchy of the English Catholic Chu and the present posture of Catholic affairs in Great Britain by Ambrose.. Lisle Phillipps, Esq., of grace dieu manor, (A) 192
Letter of Father Ignatius (the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Spencer.) To the Primate, recommending Prayers for the conversion of England, ... 263
Loretto Institution, (The) 11, 35
Loretto Convent, ... 207
Lord John Russell's Letter.—The No-Popery outcry, ... 208
Lord John Russell and the English Roman Catholics, ... 210
Manifesto, (The) 67
Meath-Street Schools—Rev. Dr. Cahill, 333
Missions of Thibet, ... 232, 246, 275, ... 288, 303, 334
M'Hale, Dr. 238
Model of a Cathedral, (A) 252
New Police Force—Spies on the Clergy, 140
No Popery Hubbub, (The) 96
Nunnery at Clapham, (The) 339
Nunneries Visitation Bill—Petition of the Hon. C. Langdale, (The) 346
Opinions of the Press on Papal Aggression, ... 136
Papal Question—Address to the Crown, (The) 152
Papal Aggression—Audi Alterem Partem, ... 243
Paris, ... 252
——— Interesting Religious Ceremony, 248
Pastoral Letter of Cardinal Wiseman.... 134
Pastoral from the Roman Catholic Primate, ... 135
Pastor Philpotts and the twenty-four Prelates, ... 361
Penal Law and Parliamentary Division, (The) 262
Peter's Anna Collection, (The).. ... 330
Pius the Ninth, ... 330
Political Intelligence, ... 182
Prayer in Spain for England's Conversion, ... 237, 249
Privileges of Wealth, ... 28
Progress of the Catholic Religion in England, ... 12
Protestant Commotion.—The Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, ... 42
Protestant Mission in Ceylon—Extract from Sir James Emerson Tennent's, K. C. S. LL. D. recent work on Ceylon—with illustrations, Murray, ... 139
Provincial, Letter of Father Ignatius, ... 151
Protestant Clergyman's reasons against the "Aggression" Movement, ... 223
Protestantism compared with Catholicity, ... 348

Page.

Poetry, ... 181
Queen's replies to the Protestant Addresses, ... 109
Queen's Most Excellent Majesty." ("To the) 28
Review—A Letter to the Rev. Dr. Pusey, on his practice of receiving persons in auricular Confession. By W. Maskell, M.A. 37, 292
Recent Conversions, (The) 328
Rochfort Clarke and Cordinal Wiseman, 233
Roebuck to Lord John Russell, (Mr.) ... 51
Roman Catholics and Lord J. Russell, (The) 50
Roman Catholic Measures, (The) ... 236
Saint John Gaulberto, ... 125
Scene in a Puseyte Church, ... 137
Secessions, ... 364
Sensible Petition, (A) 98
Singapore, ... 235, 265
Slavery in America, ... 252
Spencer, (Hon. and Rev. Mr.)—The Crusade of Prayers for England's Conversion, ... 250
Temperate Zeal: The Romish Controversy, ... 54
Verapoly, ... 140

Page.

Vicars-Apostolic and the New Hierarchy, (The) 195
Week Abroad and at Rome, (The) ... 139
Whig Apostle of Bedlam Broke Loose, (The) 54

POETRY.

Thoughts suggested by the present Romeward movement in England—by Thos. P. Manuel of Patna, ... 223
Easter Sunday—An Ode by Thos. P. Manuel of Patna, ... 231
Ascension, (on the) 301
Quis Sicut Deus: Who is like to God, Id.
A Soul's amorous address to her Beloved Lord,... 313
The Morning Sanctus—(the Matin Hour), ... Id.
Vigils, ... 328
Whit Sunday, ... Id.
The Church, ... 343
Further Thoughts on the Romeward Movement,.. 358

SOCIETY FOR PUBLIC LIBRARY 1850

THE BENGAL

CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 1] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1851. [VOL. XX.

LECTURES ON CERTAIN DIFFICULTIES FELT BY ANGLICANS IN SUBMITTING TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, PRIEST OF THE ORATORY OF ST PHILIP NERI. LECTURE 3, GRACE IN THE MOVEMENT OF 1833, NOT FROM THE NATIONAL CHURCH. LONDON BURNS AND LAMBERT.—1850.

(Continued from our last.)

But this is not all my dear brethren I must allow to others what I allow to you. If I let you plead the sensible effects of supernatural grace, as exemplified in yourselves, in proof that your religion is true, I must allow the plea to others to whom by your theory you are bound to deny it. Are you willing to place yourselves on the same footing with Wesleyans? yet what is the difference? or rather, have they not more remarkable phenomena in their history, symptomatic of the presence of grace among them, than you can show in yours? Which then is the right explanation of your feelings and your experience, mine, which I have extracted from received Catholic teaching, or yours, which is an expedient for the occasion, and cannot be made to tell for your own Apostolical authority without telling for those who are rebels against it? Survey the rise of Methodism, and say candidly whether those who made light of your own ordinances, abandoned them or at least disbelieved their virtue, have not had among them evidences of that very same grace which you claim for yourselves, and think a proof of your acceptance with God Really I am obliged in candour to allow, whatever part the evil spirit had in the work, whatever gross admixture of earth polluted it whatever extravagance there was to excite ridicule or disgust, whether it was Christian virtue, or the excellence of unaided man, whatever was the spiritual state of the subjects of it, whatever their end and their final account, yet there were higher and nobler vestiges or semblances of grace and truth in Methodism than there have been among you. I give you credit for what you are, grave, serious, earnest, modest, steady, self denying, consistent, you have the praise of such virtues; and you have a clear perception of many of the truths, or of portions of the truths, of revelation In these points you surpass the Wesleyans; but if I wished to find what was striking, extraordinary, suggestive of Catholic heroism, of St. Martin, St Francis, or St. Ignatius, I should betake myself far sooner to them than to you. "In our own times," says a writer in a popular review, speaking of the last mentioned Saint and his companions, "in our own times much indignation and much alarm are thrown away on innovators of a very different stamp. From the ascetics of the common room, from men whose courage rises high enough only to hint at their unpopular opinions, and whose belligerent paternoster soar at nothing more daring than to worry some unfortunate professor, it is almost ludicrous to fear any great movement on the theatre of human affairs When we see these dainty gentlemen in rags, and hear of them from the snows of the Himalaya, we may begin to tremble." Now such a diversion from the course of his remarks upon St Ignatius and his companions, I must say was most uncalled for, in this writer, and not a little ill-natured; for we had never pretended to be heroes at all, and should have been the first to laugh at any one who fancied us such; but they will serve to suggest the fact, which is undeniable, that, even when Anglicans approach in doctrine nearest to the Catholic Church, still heroism is not the line of their excellence. The Established Church may have preserved in the country the idea of sacramental grace, and the movement of 1833 have spread it; but if you wish to find the shadow and the suggestion of the supernatural qualities which make up the notion of a Catholic Saint, to Wesley you must go, and such as him. Personally, I do not like him, if it were merely for his deep self-reliance and self conceit; still I am bound, in justice to him, to ask, and you in consistency to answer, what historical personage in the Establishment, during its whole three centuries, has approximated in force and splendour of conduct and achievements to one who began by innovating on your rules, and ended by contemning your authorities? He and his companions, starting amid ridicule at Oxford, with fasting and praying, in the cold night air, then going about preaching, reviled by the rich and educated, and pelted and dragged to prison by the populace, and converting their thousands from sin to God's service—were it not for their pride and eccentricity, and fanatical doctrine and untranquil devotion, they startle us, as if the times of St. Vincent Ferrer or St. Francis Xavier were come again in a Protestant land.

(To be continued.)

DUBLIN REVIEW.

Art. XI.—The Manual of Devotion. By Ambrose Lisle Phillips, Esq. Derby: 1843.

(Continued from our last.)

But even if it be not in our power as yet to establish this beautiful devotion amongst us, which we will not easily believe, we cannot give too much encouragement to what in part attains the same object, and is common to all the Church—THE BENEDICTION. Of all the minor rites in the Catholic Church, there is none more esteemed and loved by devout persons,—none more calculated to inspire true piety, and to draw down blessings. We know places where several conversions are attributable to its solemn celebration; and others where not a little has been effected towards exciting a thoroughly Catholic spirit, and keeping fervour alive. About its hour usually varies with the season. It is made to close the day: when its labours are over, and when the time generally given to exercise and recreation is ending, there are few towns in which the bell of some church or other does not invite those who are returning home, to join in the concluding hours of the day. Nay, so great a favourite is this devotion, that if several churches concur in performing it the same evening, they will arrange so as to satisfy the piety of the people, by enabling them to attend at more than one. And so great is the concourse, and so eager the devotion, that nothing is more common than to see the church full to literal overflowing, and the breadth of the street opposite the open door occupied by a kneeling crowd, who thus receive the evening blessing of the Lord of glory, and form an echo without to the pealing hymn within. What a soothing, delightful end to a day of toil or of anxiety! How reconciled to its pains does one feel through it; and how prepared for the duties of home does one hasten from it! With us, this service is generally joined to vespers or afternoon prayers; and whether from the inconvenience of the hour, or from some other cause, is often comparatively scantily attended. Perhaps we have not as yet made our people feel sufficiently the beauty and advantage of the service; perhaps it is not always conducted with sufficient dignity and solemnity to impress them with its importance. But this matter belongs not to us: all that we wish, or have a right to do, is to direct attention to the fact, that equal interest is not felt amongst us for this most beautiful act of worship, as we find elsewhere. And our desire, here, as in everything else Catholic, is to excite and keep alive a holy rivalry, that will not allow itself to be outdone,—to make us look without foolish national pride upon the advantages which others have, determined to copy, and so to gain, them. We must assume the decided attitude of Catholics; we have no longer the plea of persecution; we cannot shelter ourselves under the imaginary rights of a national establishment. We belong to the Church Catholic, the Orbis terrarum Church,—unfettered and uncompromised; and our aim should be to assimilate, to harmonize, to be of one spirit as of one faith—of equal fervour and piety, as of equal profession and creed.

(To be continued.)

HISTORY OF THE LIFE, WRITINGS AND DOCTRINES OF MARTIN LUTHER.

By J. M. V. Audin.

THE TWO BULLS. 1520.

LEO X.—1521.

(Continued from our last.)

Paul Jovius, another visitant of the Elysium of Ruccelai, conceived the project of writing the history of his time. When he had finished some fragments of it, he set out for Rome, and asked for an audience with the pope. On the following day, he was introduced into the Vatican, where Leo received him in the midst of his Cardinals. Paul read his historical performance; and the pontiff gave him the title of the Italian Livy;* an award, by the way, which posterity has not confirmed. Moreover, he named him Chevalier, and assigned him a considerable pension, payable out of the public treasury. Somewhat later, Adrian VI. made him Canon of Cano; and still later, Clement VII. gave him apartments in the Vatican, assigned him a princely train of attendants, and finally promoted him to the bishopric of Nocera. All this was fine,—too fine, perhaps, for Paul Jovius, who died, it is said, of vexation, because Paul III did not raise him to the cardinalate. Valerianus whom we have lately cited, was a universal genius: he was theologian, jurist, professor of eloquence, archaiology, and was called the rival of Horace, by Arsilli in his poem De poetis Urbanis. Poverty attached him to the service of a Venetian gentleman. John Lascaris and Marc Antonio Sabellicus were his first masters. At the age of twenty, he quitted his country, which the imperial troops had invaded, and sought a refuge where he might devote himself in quiet to study. Rome presented itself to his imagination; his first protector was a cardinal, and his friend and flatterer, a pope, —Leo X. While this pontiff was excavating the Roman soil, Valerianus, who was an adept in oriental literature, applied himself to the study of Egypt,—that mysterious land of which scarcely any thing was then known.

Some obeliska, recently disinterred, were a book in which he essayed to read the language of the most ancient people of the world. The symbolical language, doubtless, eluded his researches, and he was necessarily mistaken on the force of the phonetic or idiographic signs. The veil which has fallen from these mysterious allegories, since the discovery of the triple inscription of Rosetta, concealed them from his view † Whatever may be thought of the system of Valerianus, his great work on hieroglyphics is a lasting monument of his genius. If he erred in interpreting the monuments of Egypt, it was because that country was then unknown to other nations; and because he had only granite columns, disinterred from the ruins of Rome, to enable him to construct an alphabet. The science of inscriptions was but in its infancy. The liberality of Leo X. enabled him, however, to collect a vast library of Arabic and Chaldaic manuscripts.

There was a literato who celebrated the munificence of Leo X. in Greek and Latin; who read not only Homer, but Isaiah and the other prophets in their original languages; and was an ardent admirer of St. Thomas, St. Augustin, and the other fathers, with whose writings he was familiar. Such was Calcagnini, who complimented Erasmus on his passing through Ferrara in a style "so pure and so flowing, that the philosopher remained mute with admiration."* He was one of Luther's adversaries. The reformer treated him, as he had treated Prierias and Eck; that is, he represented him as a stupid and idiotic monk. Erasmus was more just; when he received Calcagnini's manuscript, De libero arbitrio, in which Luther's doctrine is combated with a great force of logic, he was so enchanted with it, that he would have got it printed,—"for the glory of your name," says he, "but for a wicked passage, in which you affect to believe that I am pleased with these religious dissensions, and that I remain silent and inactive, in the presence of this boar, who desolates the vineyard of the Lord."†

"Yes, my dear Erasmus," answered Calcagnini.—"you are accused of favouring both parties;—of stretching out bread with one hand, while a stone lies concealed in the other;—of remaining always on the same beam, inclining, occasionally, to either side. This is what the envious say of you. Do you know what more generous souls think? That you carelessly regard the vast conflagration, which you could easily extinguish; that you laugh at every thing that happens; that you regard this whole affair as a veritable comedy, and are unmoved while the flame envelops the altar of God. This is what is laid to your charge. But I have confidence in your zeal, your piety, and your sincerity. If, then, my dear Erasmus, you find any thing in the work I address to you, that offends your ear, or confirms the imaginings of the evil-minded, erase it; blot it out, change and correct it, so that no blemish may remain."‡

(To be continued.)

---

* Tiraboschi, Storia della Letteratura Italiana, 7 vol. part 2. p. 260.

† It is notorious that M. Broussard, in 1799, in excavations made near Rosatta, found a stone on which were cut three series of different characters,—one in Greek, the other in characters of the country, the third in hieroglyphics. The learned Englishman, Young, was the first to give a phonetic value to the hieroglyphics, but it was M. Champollion, who, subsequently, formed the Egyptian alphabet, and composed a grammar of these mysterious

* Salutavit me summa quidam humanitate, sed oratione tam diserta tamque fluenta, ut ego prorsus viderer elinguis. Erasmi epist. lib. xxviii. ep. 25.

† Erasmi epistolae lib. xx. ep. 53.

‡ Calcag. Epist. ad Erasmum Epistolae lib. xx. Ep. 54.

WHITE'S CONFUTATION OF CHURCH OF ENGLANDISM.

(Translated from the Original Latin, by E. W. O'Mahoney, Esq., of the Middle Temple London)

CHAPTER XXIX.

The thirtieth Article examined.

In this Article, entitled "Of both kinds," the Church of England teaches:—"The Cup of the Lord is not to be denied to the lay people: for both the parts of the Lord's Sacrament, by Christ's ordinance and commandment, ought to be ministered to all Christian men alike."

EXAMINATION.

In the New Testament, Christ instituted the Eucharist under both kinds, as is related by the three Evangelists, and by Paul the Apostle.* This institution, delivered to her by the Apostles, the Catholic Church has always faithfully guarded, and still continues to guard, in whatever respects the substance of the institution. In like manner, the following commandment of Christ—'Do this for a commemoration of me'†—which commandment was given, with regard to the institution of the Eucharist, by Christ to his Apostles, and through them to the Church—has been carefully preserved even to the present day by the Church of Christ, which received her instruction from the Apostles, according to their mind—and theirs is the mind of Christ‡ But that the church ought according to the commandment and ordinance of Christ, to minister the Sacrament of the Eucharist under both kinds to all Christians alike, is the leaven of innovators, not the doctrine of the Apostles: and therefore this interpretation of the ordinance and commandment is justly defined to be heretical by the Church in her General Councils,§ wherein she speaks with supreme authority, and where she is directed by the Spirit of truth, that abides with her for ever‖

But in order to explain the genuine meaning of the words of the institution, and of the commandment which accompanies it, it is to be observed—that the Eucharist, of its nature, includes within itself two things: the one whereby it is a Sacrifice; the other, whereby it is a Sacrament. As the Eucharist is a Sacrifice, the nature of the institution requires that it be celebrated under both kinds: for, as the unbloody sacrifice, according to the nature of its institution, commemorates and represents the bloody sacrifice once offered on the altar of the cross; so, in order perfectly and expressly to accomplish this end, among others, the successors of the Apostles in the priesthood, the ministers of the unbloody sacrifice, to whom Christ said, 'Do this for a commemoration of me,'* must, according to the institution of the Sacrifice, consecrate, offer, and receive the Eucharist under both kinds. And the necessity of their so doing is fully demonstrated by the perpetual practice of the Church, with which the sense of the institution coincides: and is distinctly declared by the custom of the Church—which is the best interpreter of the commandment. But although, in the sacrament of the Eucharist, commemoration is also made of the death of Christ; yet, as no express representation of his death is required by the institution of the sacrament:† consequently, the institution of the sacrament of the Eucharist, does not, so far as regards its substance, require that it be ministered under both species.

Moreover, as the entire Christ is contained under either species, whether we consider the nature of the Eucharistic Sacrament, or the fruit of it, we must confess, with the Fathers of the Council of Trent,—"That the whole and entire Christ, and the true Sacrament, are taken under either kind singly; and therefore that, as to the fruit, they who receive one kind only, are deprived of no grace necessary to salvation."‡ Wherefore, as the administering of the Sacrament, whether under both kinds, or whether under one kind only, regards the mode of administering and receiving the Eucharist, but not the substance of the Sacrament administered and received; and since it is certain, as the Synod of Trent declares—"That there has always existed in the Church the power of decreeing or changing such things as, according to the variety of circumstances, times and places, it should judge most expedient for the advantage of those who receive them, or for the veneration of the Sacraments themselves"§—therefore the Catholic Church, using this its power i

---

* Matthew xxvi.; Mark xiv.; Luke xxii.; and 1 Cor. xi.—Vide Concil. Tridentin. sess. 21., doctrina de communione sub utraque specie, et parvulorum, c. 1, 3.

† Luke xxii. 19.

‡ 'But we have the mind of Christ.' 1. Cor. ii. 16

§ Tom. 2, Conciliorum, Concil. Constant. Generale, sess. 13.; et Concil. Trident, sess. 21, can. 1, 2.—Vide Concil. Basil. sess. 36.

‖ Joan. xiv. 16, 17.

* Luke xxii. 19.

† 1 Cor. xi. 25, 26.

‡ Concil. Tridentin. sess. 21. Doctrina de commun. sub utraque specie, c. 3.—Vide sess. 13. Decretum de sanctissimo Eucharistiæ Sacramento, c. 3. et can. 3.

§ Concil. Tridentin. sess. 21, c. 2.—Vide 1 Cor. et August. tom. 2, epist. 118, ad Januarium, c. 6 the administration of the Eucharist, sometimes administered it under both kinds, sometimes under one, and sometimes again under the other; but always in accordance with reason, as will appear from the following testimonies.

(To be continued.)

FLOWERS OF HEAVEN.

Connexion between Religion and Morality.

CHAPTER XIII.

MODERATION.

Continued from our last.

As man degrades himself, physically and morally, by intemperance, so the contrary virtue adds to his interior dignity, and even to his corporal beauty. The Persians live almost entirely on rice, dates, and other light food, which they take in moderate quantity; they accompany this frugal repast with a cup of pure water, in which the rich sometimes let fall a few drops of rose-essence; and yet they are a noble race of men. Their frugality is of an old date, as the ancient Greek historians tell us that the Persian youth, under Cyrus and his successors, fed only on bread and cresses. They love this kind of life, which they prefer to ours; and they saturically compare us to carnivorous animals. "You need only look at our complexion," said they to Chardin, "to be convinced how preferable our diet is to yours."

"In fact," remarks this traveller, "the complexion of the Persians is smooth; their skin is beautiful, fine and glossy; and their features are remarkably expressive: whereas the complexion of the Armenians, their subjects, who live like the Europeans, is gross, and their bodies are heavy and sluggish."

This is, however, local sobriety, originating in great measure from the climate: for the nearer we approach the equator, the less voracious are our appetites. But when Greeks and Romans, overcoming their opposite propensities, embrace a more frugal regimen, like the hermits of Mount Libanus and the solitaries of Scétés, there was virtue, because there was effort. St. John Chrysostom has left us an admirable picture of these fervent Christians, who sought to reform their lives by abstinence and solitude.

"They have banished from their table," says he, "all kinds of luxury and delicacies; their food is always simple and frugal, always worthy of the ministers of Jesus Christ. You do not see there, as in our cities, rivers of blood, flowing in the market-place, and animals cut up into a hundred pieces. Their food is ordinarily bread and water. They draw this latter from a neighbouring well, and procure the other by labour. When they wish to make a great feast, they add to this some dates, gathered from the palm trees which grow in their solitudes; and this fruit of the desert appears sweeter to them, than the luxuries which are found at the banquets of kings. Their table is like that of angels,—far removed from all tumult, and ever enjoying a perpetual peace. The green grass serves them as a seat; and to see them you might imagine that you were present at the miraculous feast, which Christ gave an entire people in a similar situation. Some of them have not even a cell; these have no other roof but the starry heaven, nor any other lamp during night than the moon which enlightens them."

This might appear sobriety carried to the greatest possible extent; and yet the successors of these holy men, added to its austerity. St. Macarius of Egypt ate only once in the week. Evagrius, his disciple, was suffering one day from a burning thirst, in the heat of a summer's sun, and asked him leave to drink a little water. "Be satisfied with remaining in the shade," answered the austere anchoret.

(To be continued.)

VIENNA AND THE AUSTRIANS BY MRS. TROLLOPE. VOL. II. P. 383.

SISTERS OF CHARITY IN VIENNA, CATHOLIC ARMENIAN MONASTERY IN VIENNA.

The Princess O * * *, in addition to many amiable acts of the same kind, has taken us with her to an establishment of Sœurs Grises, for the purpose of witnessing the profession of three young women, who were about to devote themselves to this divinely charitable vocation. The convent is situated about a mile from the town, and at nine o'clock in the morning we were at its gate.

In front of the altar of the little convent chapel in which the ceremony was performed, but outside the altar-rail, was placed a prie-Dieu of sufficient extent to accommodate three kneelers; and to a seat immediately behind this the princess, my daughter, and myself, were led by the mother of the convent, so that we had an uninterrupted view of the ceremonies. Nothing could be more simple and less mystical than the manner in which these were performed. The profession is not of necessity for life, though it rarely, or rather never, happens that those who have chosen this path of life abandon it; nevertheless, the knowledge that, should their courage fail them at any period, the continuance of their severe self-imposed duties will be enforced by no authority save that of their own righteous spirits, removes from the act of profession much of that gloomy hopelessness which seems, at least to heretic eyes, to cling to the eternal veil that falls over them.

The inestimable value to their fellow-creatures, too, of the painful offices to which these young girls were about to devote themselves, and which can be as deeply felt and valued by Protestants as Catholics, produced a feeling of interest for the devotees very unlike anything inspired by the vague exaltation of spirit which leads an animated creature, redolent of all the emotions created by young existence, to crush every human affection, and throw herself into the arms of a living death.

The Sœurs Grises form one of the orders of the Sisters of Charity, whose vocation is known and honoured throughout the world; and no difference of doctrine, no varieties of creed, are strong enough to lessen the admiration inspired by the devotedness with which they are seen to fulfil their vows in every land happy enough to have them within its precincts. It was, therefore, with interest unmixed with pain, but having much of reverence, that we saw the three young girls dressed in white, and with wreaths of flowers on their heads, approach and take their places on the prie-Dieu before us. The venerable, mild-featured prelate of the establishment, having assumed his episcopal robes before the altar, performed mass. The black habits of the novices were placed beside him, and I presume, therefore, that they were consecrated by some of the prayers which made part of the service. The mother retired as soon as this was over, accompanied by the three novices, and followed by three sisters carrying their dresses. During their absence, which was not long, a hymn was sung; and, when the party returned, the three modest-looking heroines of the day were clad in the neat close uniform of the order. They then placed themselves in chairs prepared for them in front of the prelate, who was also seated before the altar; and he addressed them in an extemporary harangue, in which he most earnestly exhorted them to fulfil worthily the holy duties to which they had vowed themselves. His manner, which was equally affectionate and solemn, drew tears from many. After this, the newly-professed devotees communicated; in which solemnity they were joined by many relatives and friends, who came forward from among the congregation for the purpose. Many tears were shed, but none by the young girls themselves.

As we left the chapel, the prelate, who had preceded us, and already divested himself of his episcopal dress, welcomed the princess with great cordiality, and at her request proceeded to show us every part of the establishment. Chiefly for the purpose of instructing the young members in the duties to be performed by nurses in a sick chamber, a small hospital, receiving, if I mistake not, about twenty patients, makes part of the convent. It appears that the sisters are instructed in the nature, preparation, and use of drugs, and in all that essential portion of the healing art that chiefly depends upon the gentle, patient, watchful care of ministering females for its efficacy.

In passing through one of the neat dormitories occupied by the sisters, I observed to the prelate that they had the air of great comfort. "When not employed in the duties of their profession," he replied, "the sisters have no great severity of discipline to endure; but . . . . the profession itself is a very arduous one, and often exposes those devoted to it to a greater degree of fatigue, danger, and suffering, than any one can guess who does not witness it. In truth," he added, "there is but one source for the strength that enables them to endure it . . . . our faith teaches us to believe that those who die in performance of the duties required by attendance upon the sick are exempted from the pains of purgatory and pass to heaven from the bed of death. Without this conviction, which is ever present with them, it would be impossible for them to sustain, as they do, the suffering both of body and mind to which they are exposed. Their firmness and resolution are often very extraordinary."

* * * * * *

29th.

Introduced by Baron Hammer Pungstall, I have just paid a visit to the Armenian convent, or rather what is to be the Armenian convent, for at present masons "possess it wholly." It will, however, when completed, be a very splendid establishment, and has some features in its arrangements which distinguish it from all other convents. Monks have often been called drones, and perhaps not unaptly, but in the Armenian establishment at Vienna no appellation could be less à-propos to their mode of life. Within the walls of the convent is already carried on, unfinished as are the rest of the buildings, a very considerable printing concern, in which works in all languages, but particularly the Eastern and Latin are put out of hand in very superior style.

"I have seen convents before, and I have seen printing-presses, but the union was new and interesting. The superb-looking archbishop—six feet some inches in height, and with a beard reaching very nearly to the "skirts of his clothing,"—accompanied us over the whole edifice, finished and unfinished. He is a noble and most distinguished-looking personage, speaking a little French and more Italian, but conversing freely in all sorts of Oriental dialects with the accomplished friend who introduced us. The history of this Armenian society is singular. They have, for some years, had a convent at Closter Neuberg not far from the well-known Benedictine monastery that looks so finely down upon the Danube there; but they were very poor, and the spirit of industry among them, which now seems to be kept up from taste, was long a matter of necessity. Recently, however, the condition of their finances has undergone a great change. A religionist of their sect having acquired a vast fortune in the East Indies, bequeathed the whole of it to the Armenian convent here; and it is upon these funds that they are now converting what was a very humble dwelling into a very stately convent. The spirit of enterprise, the active industry, and the great learning of the venerable archbishop, gives an extraordinary degree of interest to such a visit as I have just paid; and, should I ever have the happiness of revisiting Vienna, I hope to repeat it.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, January 4, 1851.

EXTRAORDINARY PROGRESS OF CATHOLICITY IN NEW SOUTH WALES, AND IN NEW ZEALAND.

(Continued from our last.)

The result of the arrival of so many zealous Ecclesiastics and Religieuses in New South Wales, chiefly from Ireland, was most favourable to the diffusion of the Catholic Faith in that important Colony.

A Convent of the Sisters of Mercy, an affiliation from the Parent House in Dublin, established about the same period at Sydney afforded both the blessings of education to the Female portion of the Catholics of that locality, and in time of sickness, much temporal and religious consolation to all classes of the community, who desired to profit of Charitable ministry of these Heroic and devoted Religieuses. Intelligence of this auspicious state of things soon reached Rome, the seat and centre of Catholic Unity, and the glad tidings afforded such joy to the late Saintly Pontiff Gregory XVI. that, His Holiness, without delay, in token of his high approval of Bishop Polding's apostolic labours, erected Sydney into an Archiepiscopal See and appointed its late chief Pastor, its First Archbishop. In a very short interval afterwards, Hobart Town was made a suffragan See of Sydney, and the Right Rev. Dr. Wilson appointed Bishop of the newly erected Diocese Adelaide and Melbourne were next successively exalted to the same rank, and Bishops Murphy and Davis invested respectfully with the title of their Diocesans. At the period of Bishop Murphy's appointment to Adelaide there were in that District not more than four hundred Catholics. About a year since they numbered two thousand, so that at the present, in consequence of numerous recent accessions, they may be fairly estimated to amount to three thousand. In Port Philip, which is about to be erected into the fifth suffragan See of Sydney, (we have omitted to note the lately erected Diocese of Perth in Western Australia), a corresponding increase has taken place, whilst in all the other Districts, of which we have made mention, a result more or less similar, according to local circumstances, has followed. Thus in the space of about twenty years has Catholicity like the grain of Mustard Seed grown from a lowly humble beginning in Australia into a mighty tree, under the protecting shade of which, not only thousands of our poor Brethren, but even not a few of the more favoured classes of Society have found a peaceful and happy Asylum. At this moment an Archbishop together with four or five Suffragans, aided both by an efficient class of Clergymen of the second order exceeding one hundred in number, and also by a prosperous Religious Community minister to the Spiritual wants of a population, for the moral welfare of which, not a quarter of a century ago, the bigotted Government of England supplied only two Irish Catholic Missionaries. We ourselves have heard the Right Rev. Dr. Ullathorne, lately a Missionary in Australia, and now the Catholic Bishop of Birmingham, say, that more than once, he has, when a Missionary, been obliged to journey three hundred miles into the interior of New South Wales, amidst unspeakable hardships, to administer the last Sacraments to a dying Catholic.

(To be continued.)

CATHOLIC EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS IN CALCUTTA.

CHRISTMAS EXAMINATIONS.

We have much pleasure in publishing Mr. Daly's letter to the Superioress of the Intally Institutions, respecting the late Examinations of the Pupils of those establishments. There are in the Intally Boarding and Day School about twenty-two Pupils and about seventy two others in the Female Orphanage, situated in the adjoining compound. Having been ourselves present at the Examinations in both Institutions, we are enabled to confirm to the fullest extent the accuracy of all Mr. Daly's statements. Among the Spectators on the occasion just referred to, besides Catholics, there were several respectable Protestants with some of whom we entered into conversation, and it will, doubtless, be gratifying to our Readers to learn, that all present, without distinction of creed, were unanimous in their admiration and approval, as well of the educational, as of the other departments of these Seminaries. We may profit of this opportunity to add, that in all the other Catholic Institutions, viz. the Cathedral and Bow-Bazar Male and Female Schools, the Loretto House, and St. John's College, the result of the late examinations was equally creditable both to the Teachers and the Pupils. For the perfect fidelity of this assertion, we can appeal with confidence to the testimony of all who favoured with their presence, the recent literary exhibitions in the several institutions of which we now treat. In conclusion we beg to add, that at St. John's College, we listened with particular pleasure to the interesting examination of the Pupils in Chemistry, conducted by Doctor McClelland, as well as to the useful practical Questions in Book-keeping proposed by Mr. C. R. Lackersteen. The Examinations in the Greek and Latin Classics were conducted chiefly by the Archbishop whilst those in Logic and Mathematics were carried on respectively by Rev. Mr. Formosa and Mr. O'Donovan.

INTALLY CONVENT BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL, AND FEMALE ORPHANAGE.

Letter of Mr. P. Daly to the Lady Superioress of the Intally Convent.

[illegible] after thi[illegible] communicated [illegible]ECTED MADAM,—Having on the 20th [illegible]oined by m[illegible] with some of my family, witnessed [illegible]ame forward [illegible] Examination of the Schools under [illegible]e this purpose, [illegible]upervision, I cannot refrain from [illegible]ent by the you[illegible]u, and stating the gratification [illegible]e to behold the general proficiency of the pupils of your Boarding and Day-School in the various branches of liberal, useful education, in which the young Ladies were examined. But what attracted my particular attention most, (and I am sure that of all present on the occasion) was, the neat becoming dress of the wards, their very healthy and cheerful demeanour, fully manifesting that they did not feel as in the house of a stranger, but in a home rendered happy to them by the benevolent solicitude and judicious care of yourself and your pious colleagues.

The Examinations of your Orphanage in its divers departments were no less satisfactory to those who take an interest in the welfare of your laudable exertions in the cause of religion and morality, than that of your Boarding and Day Schools. The cleanliness and regularity of the arrangements in the Kitchen, Refectory, and Dormitory, were as pleasing as the intelligence and industry, of which the large display of fancy needle-work, exhibited on the occasion, must be the result.

In short, I feel, and I have reason to know it from experience, how much the Catholic Community of this country are indebted to you and to your charitable and pious Sisters generally, for your zealous and successful efforts in promoting the virtuous education of the Catholic Females of India.

Wishing you and Sisters many many happy returns of this Holy season.

I remain, respected Madam,
With great esteem
Your most obedt. humble servant,
P. DALY.

Calcutta, House of Correction,
Christmas-Day, 1850.

P. S. I herewith send a trifle for the Orphanage, which I regret I cannot make more, owing to the many demands on me at present.

P. D.

RESTORATION OF THE CATHOLIC HIERARCHY IN ENGLAND.

THE CARDINAL ARCHBISHOP OF WESTMINSTER.

To the Editor of the B. C. Herald.

"And now therefore I say to you, refrain from these men, and let them alone: for if this Counsel or this Work be of Men, it will come to nought. But if it be of God, you cannot overthrow it, lest perhaps you be found even to fight against God." ACTS CAP. 5.

SIR,—In my letter of the 27th ult. I pointed out the obvious inconsistency of censuring His Holiness Pius IX. for doing that, in the 19th century, for which in the 7th century, Pope Gregory the Great was applauded by all Christendom, and honoured by his yet cherished appellation of "the Apostle of England." In my letter, I called your attention to the remarkable facts, that even the bigotted compilers or Purloiners* of the Book of Common Prayer, notwithstanding their undoubted anxiety, to get rid of every memorial of Catholicity, nevertheless, found themselves reluctantly compelled by circumstances, to retain in its Calendar of Saints, the names both of St. Gregory, Pope, and also of St. Augustine, whom Gregory had created the first Archbishop of Canterbury.

In the same letter, I noticed moreover, that the much prized title of "Defender of the Faith," so tenaciously and so inconsistently retained by the British Sovereign, was conferred by a Predecessor in the Apostolic See of His present Holiness. Lastly, I remindedyou, that, after an obstinate and unmeaning opposition for 170 years, the British Legislature was at length shamed into the adoption of the Calendar, which bears the name of Pope Gregory the thirteenth.

I now proceed to show you, that in all the social and religious departments of England, countless memorials present themselves on every side, which, though still cherished and universally adopted by her people, derive their origin from Catholicity, and have only in Catholicity their full and adequate significancy. I advert to this circumstance, in order to prove, that England, in spite of her long continued efforts to extirpate every vestige of Catholicity, until restored to Catholic communion, must continue to exhibit in her relations, whether civil or spiritual, to every reflecting mind, an immense unmeaning mass of inconsistencies, and incongruities, all bespeaking the violence done to her moral constitution, by the grievous wound inflicted upon her, when forcibly separated in the 16 h century from the centre of religious unity.

Thus to take a rapid glance at the incongruities just alluded to, let me ask, in the name of common sense, what full or adequate meaning can the well known names of certain feasts, such as Shrove-tide, Candlemas, Michaelmas, Christmas, Palm-Sunday, Ember-Weeks, Ash-Wednesday, all Saints day, Rogation days have in Protestant England? Unquestionably none.

In relation to the Sovereign and the officials of the Court, what adequate significancy has the title of Confessor to the Sovereign, a title borne by one of these functionaries—Passing over the Common Prayer Book its exhortation to the sick to have recourse to particular confession—its form of absolution, its Catechetical doctrine on the Eucharistic sacrament, which it teaches to contain inwardly, verily and indeed, the body and blood of Christ, &c. &c. if we but glance at the names, by which the chief terms or Sessions of the Supreme Courts of Law are designated, we shall find all of them denominated by an appellation, borrowed from some Saint, or from some sacred season, consecrated in the Catholic Ritual.

Remarking on the fragments of Catholic doctrine, which the leaders of the several sects of the Reformation retained in their respective confessions, the Illustrious Bossuet traces this occurrence to the exercise of an interposing providence, which, whilst it permitted the storm of the Reformation partially to darken the splendor and beauty of the Catholic Church, took care, that isolated resplendent particles of its faith should sparkle everywhere in the regions of heresy, so that, as in the order of Nature, the Element of Fire, seeks always to ascend, it was ordained also, in the order of Religion, that the brilliant particles separated from the Sun of Catholic truth, and scattered throughout Protestantism, should in their isolation show, that they had been violently sundered from the parent luminary, and that whilst they might send forth in this unnatural state fitful coruscations, they could shine with a serene and steady refulgence, only when restored to the centre, from which they had been recklessly torn.

Every thing then in the Religious and Social State of England, the language and usages of its Ritual, and of its Courts of Law, its Festivals Civil and Sacred, together with the Nomenclature by which they are familiarly known, all silently but strongly call aloud, proclaiming the state of violence in which they exist under Protestantism, and demanding the restoration of the state of things which existed, when they were first introduced into, and engrafted upon the constitution of the English Nation. The restotation of the Catholic Church alone can appease this yearning, and impart together with religious peace, their full meaning and significancy to language, and usages, bound up with the very existence of the English People It is to effect this blessed result, and not to gratify the unworthy aspirings of temporal ambition, that the Illustrious Chief Pastor of the Catholic Church has restored to England, the Hierarchy which She had lost by schism. When Gamaliel reasoned with the

* The prescribed service of the book Common of Prayer was Purloined in so blundering a manner from the Catholic Missal, that King James 1st familiarly called it "a badly said Mass."

Jewish Senate, in the words adduced by me, in the preface to this letter, that tribunal acknowledged and consented to the justness of his argumentation. Adopting the sentiments of that Doctor of the Law, in reference to the religious movement which has lately taken place in England, allow me now to say in conclusion, that if that movement be of Men it will come to nought; but if it be of God, it cannot be overthrown. The Sanhedrim approved of this criterion of Religious truth. Let Protestant England regulate its conduct by the same standard, and the cause of truth must eventually triumph.

I remain Sir, your's obediently,

A CATHOLIC.

Calcutta, Jany. 2d, 1851.

IMPORTANT TO INTENDING EMIGRANTS TO ADELAIDE.

Letter from the Catholic Bishop of Adelaide to the Archbishop of Edessa, V. A. W. B.

MY DEAR LORD ARCHBISHOP,—I have received your kind favor, in which you request of me to interest myself in promoting the welfare of the Friends of ——— who are about to make this province the land of their adoption.

Any request from you, my dear Lord, shall be considered by me on every occasion as tantamount almost to a command. You may therefore assure him, that I shall take the same pains in the affair which he has at heart, as if my own interests were at stake. I have received two letters from him inclosing two series of Bills drawn upon the Bank of London amount £165. I have discounted these Bills in the Union Bank at 2½ per cent before I received the second letter and second series of Drafts; in order that I might immediately invest that portion of the money which ——— wished me to do. I shall be enabled to invest it on good security of landed property, at from ten to fifteen per Cent. I shall immediately purchase a good section of land for eighty pounds; the fencing will cost about forty or fifty pounds, a plain slab-house must be erected and the cultivators of the soil will have to support themselves, until a crop is reaped. A plough, and bullocks must be purchased, which will cost twenty pounds; however I shall manage every thing with economy and to advantage. As to the amount remaining in my hands after handing over to ———'s relations, the sum of forty pounds and paying eighty pounds for a section of land, I should wish to know how I am to dispose it.

I shall now invest at least three hundred pounds of it, or perhaps less, if I should deem it necessary to advance something more to ———'s relations; in order to set them right to work. You perceive that after paying eighty pounds for a section; nearly eighty pounds more will be necessary for the purchase of bullocks, plough, building of a house fencing, &c.

The section will be useless, unless fenced, unless therefore the families which are coming here have some considerable sum of money with them, the sum of 120£ allowed at present by ——— would not start them fairly in the world. If I understand ——'s letter correctly; he wishes, that I should in the first place purchase one section of land for them and then out of the money which I have received, give every moderate and absolutely necessary assistance, by which they would be enabled to make a livelihood from the produce of the Farm. The colony is still advancing rapidly in prosperity. I have five Churches and am building three more. You must have much to suffer from the heat of an Indian climate, the reward promised in the next life is, that the sun shall not fall upon us or any heat. I am sure you must be desirous of speedily obtaining this reward.

I am, my dear Lord Archbishop
Your sincerely attached
Brother in Christ,

✠ F. MURPHY, of Adelaide

Adelaide, Oct. 24, 1850.

MOULMEIN.

Extract from a letter addressed by Bishop Balma (V. Ap. of Ava and Pegu) to His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop, V. A. W. B.

MY DEAR LORD ARCHBISHOP,—'I take the liberty of enclosing herewith the Statistics of our Mission, and beg the favour of your handing it over to Mr. Serrao, for insertion in the Directory. Your Grace will perceive by those Statistics, that we had of late a good number of Conversions. They are for the most part of Karens in the District of Myoamia, and Bassein. But we have to lament the loss of a zealous Missionary, the Rev. Mr. Pegolotti, who died at Bassein on the 5th September last of fever contracted at Kiepanyus, where he had gone two months previously to erect a new station, and had already succeeded with the blessing of God, in drawing around him twelve families of Karens, whom he was preparing for Baptism at the time he fell sick.

Trusting your Grace is in the enjoyment of perfect health, and begging you to remember me kindly to the Clergy and Friends, with deep sentiments of gratitude,'

I remain, my dear Lord Archbishop,
Your Grace's most obedt. and grateful servt.
✠ J. BALMA.'

Moulmein, 23rd, Nov. 1850.

CONVERSIONS.

We have much pleasure to announce, that Rev. John McCabe received three Heathens into the bosom of the Catholic Church, after having been duly instructed in the doctrines of our Holy Faith. In the course of last week the same excellent clergyman received three other Heathens also.

Selections.

THE LORETTO INSTITUTION.

To the Editor of the Englishman.

SIR,—Having frequently heard it asserted that the Loretto Institution was the first in India for imparting a sound liberal education to all young ladies commencing their course of studies, I resolved to test the truth of the assertion by being an eye-witness of their mode of instruction. For this purpose I proceeded then on Saturday last, the 21st, with a few friends who were very desirous to be present at the examinations that were to be held there on that day. On entering the large and spacious hall where the young pupils were to be examined, I found it densely crowded with a gay fashionable circle of young ladies and gentlemen, the elite of Calcutta. The examination hall itself was tastefully fitted out in such a manner as to reflect the greatest credit on the inmates of the institution. Here and there might be seen beautiful and rare specimens of fancy needle-work, both plain and ornamental, whilst the occasional pieces of music that were played on the piano as each of the examining ladies retired from her office to make way for another, lent a graceful charm to the entire scene. Though I had often heard much, very much indeed of the great superiority and excellence of the Loretto Convent Institution beyond all others in Calcutta, yet I must candidly confess that until I witnessed the entire proceedings of the examinations on Saturday last, I was somewhat sceptical. But having myself heard the queries proposed and the answers, I must frankly own that the fame of the establishment was far short of the reality. So much so indeed, that what I have asserted will be fully borne out by the testimony of every person present, be he Protestant, Catholic, or Dissenter. Nay, I have heard it frequently repeated by persons of unquestionable veracity that the Protestant ladies and gentlemen of Calcutta, who usually attend the public examinations of Loretto House, are quite amazed at the cleverness and the abilities displayed by the young pupils in their respective answers. An undoubted proof, if proof were wanting, of what care and attention must have been paid to them during the course of the year, in order to enable them to answer so well on the day of trial. Though the examinations on the day in question were nearly over before I arrived, yet what I heard and saw were sufficient to give me a general idea of the great proficiency of the young ladies, in the several subjects on which they were questioned. The assistant lady,—superioress, examined them in history ancient and modern, sacred and profane biography, astronomy, geography, and in a portion of chemistry. (It may not be generally known that the assistant lady-superioress stands first in India for her varied literary acquirements.) The answering in the several departments just enumerated, was truly admirable, and occasionally elicited the approbation of the auditors. In English History, commencing from the reign of Henry the 2nd until that of our Most Gracious Queen Victoria, they gave a masterly sketch of it without ever faultering in the least. They gave a very correct account of the principal or leading events in each succeeding reign; described in glowing language the crusades, and showed the origin and rise of the Reformation in England, who were its chief abettors, and dwelt with much interest, as it were, on the severe treatment experienced by Mary, Queen of Scots from her cousin Elizabeth.

In geography, the young ladies displayed an admirable acquaintance with the several countries on which they were interrogated, pointing them out with precision on the map, and subsequently giving an account of their manners, customs and institutions; whilst in chemistry, to hear them answering the abstruse questions that were proposed, would lead you to imagine, that they were perfectly conversant in the theory of our most celebrated chemists. The answering in French and in the use of the globes was perfectly on a par with the preceding. Nay, some of the young ladies, spoke French so fluently that, had you not previously known them to be of English extraction, you would have supposed them to be French from their accent. And now, Mr. Editor, having given you a brief outline and a faint sketch of all that I witnessed at the Loretto examinations on Saturday last, allow me to draw your favourable notice to so praiseworthy an institution. Your predecessor in the editorial chair of the Englishman ever befriended the Revd. Dr. Carew in his mighty and unceasing efforts to give a sound liberal education to all, irrespective of their opinions on religion. For, referring back to a file of the Englishman, I find in an editorial article inserted on the 24th of March 1842, the following words—"We confess ourselves admirers of Dr. Carew, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Calcutta. We have seldom known a pastor more careful of his flock, more zealous for their temporal and spiritual welfare, more indifferent to personal considerations, more liberal and tolerant towards men of all creeds and denominations. He has done much to elevate the condition of the Roman Catholics in this quarter of India, by encouraging the formation of educational institutions; and he has infused into them a spirit of charity of which the poorer classes are now enjoying the benefit." Yes, Mr. Editor, Dr. Carew's philanthropy is as unbounded as the mighty expanse of firmanent over our heads, though his means are so limited, that with the apostles he might exclaim, 'silver and gold I have none' Yet notwithstanding these circumscribed limits, he has succeeded in rearing three splendid Catholic institutions in Calcutta, viz., the Loretto and Intally Conventual Establishments, and St. John's College in Park Street. He has also another establishment in the precincts of Moorgyhatta, conducted by that excellent order of men, the Christian Brothers, where one hundred and fifty boys receive every day a liberal, enlightened and gratuitous education Nay, not content with this, I hear that he is endeavouring to establish another school now at Howrah, for the educating of the poor Catholics in that locality. And when such is the case, will it be said, Mr. Editor, that you will not befriend him in his heavenly efforts to diffuse education amongst the poor benighted inhabitants of this Pagan and Idolatrous country. You throw open the columns of your influential journal to every Native report on education sent you, will you close them against those of Catholics who are generally firm supporters of your highly talented paper. No Mr. Editor, your great anxiety to see education based on sound principles overspread the country, will make you indifferent to sect or party, and hoping your columns will be perfectly open to all without distinction.

I remain, Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
PUBLICOLA.

[Englishman 28th Dec. 1850.]

PROGRESS OF THE CATHOLIC RELIGION IN ENGLAND.

The following extracts are from a Roman Catholic newspaper, published at York, called The Lamp:—'Truly are we commencing a new era in the history of the English Catholic Church. What a series of great and stirring events will the future historian of this portion of God's Church have to chronicle between the dates of 1820 and 1850! * * * Rome, old glorious Rome, still the mistress of the world, has presumed in her imperial pride to confer the dignity of Cardinal upon a British subject. Nay, more, has created a new dignity to do further honour to that Cardinal; and 'name it not in the office of the Herald or the Post, publish it not in the purlieus of Printing house square,' that dignity is nothing less than an archbishopric—the Archbishopric of Westminster! Poor Anglicanism! What she suffers may be gathered from the insolent ravings of the blatant bullies, whose fierce denunciations of Romanism disgrace the leading journals of London, and all others accustomed to catch their tone. We will not however, encourage feelings of gratification, which naturally arise at beholding the mortification and alarm of our foes. We will only point out to every Catholic that the spirit of persecution, which once converted his forefathers into burning faggots, still breathes around us and is ever ready to burst forth under our feet. In the present state of public opinion, with a reform parliament, and the great principle of religious toleration no longer a question in abeyance, but a positive agent alive and alert in the very bosom of the Cabinet itself, it is impossible that any ministry, formed upon whatever conditions it may be, can hold together for any length of time, unless it act in accordance with these popular and acknowledged data in politics. If we consider that one third, at least, of her Majesty's subjects are Catholics, and that Catholics possess the same faith, are united under one head, and agree in one communion, we may calculate what a mighty engine is at work, against which no ministry can shut their eyes, or turn a deaf ear to, or pretend to ignore, the more especially when it is viewed in contrast with the remaining two-thirds at variance among themselves, disunited, jealous, and unsettled. A bill for diplomatic relations with Rome, and on Rome's terms, must be passed by the British legislature. Britain must yield, as the younger state should; Rome cannot bend. Her Legate must be received at St. James's, and that Legate must be a Cardinal. Verily, too (it is our impression), the Cardinal's hat will be quite as attractive, and as comely an object in a court cavalcade, as the jewelled turban of an infidel, or even the variegated caftan of a Persian ambassador. But there is one point on which these men who rail at Rome and the Archbishop of Westminster must surely be ignorant, and of which we would gladly make them cognisant. Are they aware that he may be accountable even for their salvation? If they be baptised, they are certainly his spiritual subjects and owe him obedience; we will be bound he will treat them as his children in Christ; at the same times we confess we should hesitate before we became surety for their submission to authority. Our reason is, they have been so long wandering in the desert of private opinion, without cloud by day or pillar of fire by night to direct their way-ward footsteps, that we very much doubt whether any influence less than a special grace from heaven could bow their stiff necks. Now we are satisfied that these railers pride themselves upon being Bible readers. We hope they have studied the Scriptures with effect, and if so they cannot be ignorant of the malediction attached to the crime of railing at the Lord's anointed. With all their bluster, such hints as we have just given are neither new nor foreign to their minds. We know with what readiness they could come into collision with one of their own dignitaries; we know with what little reverence and respect they could treat his opinion if different from their own private judgment, because they feel he is possessed of no spiritual authority. But yet these very men, who denounce Rome and her priests at public meetings and in public prints, would hesitate before they would personally insult the humblest man who has been dignified by receiving her orders. There is an admitted sanctity about her anointed servants that chills the audacity of the loudest brawler, and where is the vituperator among them who would not shrink into his original nothingness beneath the glance of his eminence the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster. Previous to 1820, there were but three Catholic Colleges or seminaries for the education of the clergy in England besides which there were a few houses of Benedictines, Dominicans, and Jesuits, which were the only orders of men then in this country. An increase in the districts of course demanded additional seminaries, which were founded; so that in 1850 we have six ecclesiastical or diocesan colleges. But subjects were wanting, the secular priesthood were insufficient for the harvest, and the aid of religious bodies was called in; and foreign countries eagerly sent members to found a branch of their order in England. Hither came the Passionists, Fathers of Charity, Redemptorists, Fathers of the Conception, and others, who, with the former ancient orders in the country, and the Oratorians, of whom we shall have to speak later, have now about fifteen large religious houses, to many of which [illegible] are attached. Very few convents for women—about ten, of which four were devoted to the education of youth existed in England previous to 1829. Since that period an immense increase of convents has taken place. And many of these contain inmates who carry comfort and consolation to the bedsides of the poor and sick, as the Angelic Sisters of Charity and Mercy; and most of the others are devoted to the religious training of females of all states of life. Within the last twenty years, 14 new congregations of religious women have been established in England. These possess 35 houses. The Brothers of the Christian schools have one large establishment, and about twelve small ones devoted to the religious instruction of boys. We must not omit to mention the progress of Catholic literature, which has certainly made great strides within the last 20 years. One leading feature has been the production, at the Derby press, of cheap standard Catholic works. A Missal which could not have been obtained in 1829 for less than 6s. 6d., may be now had for 1s. 4d, and other works in proportion. 'Within the last few years,' said Bishop Wiseman, in 1844, 'the press of Derby has issued between one and a half million and two million volumes of Catholic publications.—York Herald.

CAPTIVITY OF MARY OF SCOTS.

HER LAST HOURS BY W. JOS. WALTER, LATE OF ST. EDMUND'S COLLEGE.

(Continued from page 313.)

At the conclusion of her prayer, Mary held up the crucifix, and exclaimed; "As thy arms, O my Saviour, were extended on the cross, in like manner receive me into the outstretched arms of thy mercy, and pardon all my sins!" The puritanism of the Earl of Kent was shocked. "Madame," said he, "you had better leave such popish trumperies; have Christ in your heart, and not in your hand." She replied, "I cannot hold in my hand the representation of his sufferings, but I must at the same time bear him in my heart. It represents to my eyes the Saviour suffering upon the cross by the hands of wicked men; and it enables me to meet my sufferings with patience."

When her prayer was finished, her maids bathed in tears, helped her to rise, and began to disrobe their mistress. But the executioners, fearing to lose their usual perquisites, hastily interfered. The Queen remonstrated; observing to the Earls with a smile, that she was not accustomed to such grooms, nor used to undress in the presence of so numerous a company. When one of the executioners took from her neck a gold cross and the chain to which was suspended the Agnus Dei, she took it from his hands, and giving it to one of her women, told him that it should be answered for with money. When disrobed to her kirtle, she replaced with her own hands, a pair of sleeves which they had pulled off; it was remarked that "she did it in haste, as if she had longed to be gone." Her attendants, at the sight of their Sovereign in this destitute and forlorn condition, could not suppress their feelings; but Mary turning to them, placed her finger on her lip, and said in French; Ne criez pas; j'ai promis pour vous,—do not cry; I am under a promise for you. Then giving them her blessing and embracing them, she bade them pray for her, and not to weep, but to rejoice at seeing the end of all their mistress' troubles. Without the railing stood Melville and the rest of her men servants, sometimes weeping aloud, and continually crossing themselves. She gave them also her last blessing, and begged them not to cease praying for her till her last moment. She then seated herself again. Mrs. Kennedy took a Corpus-Christi cloth, lapped it three-corner wise, kissed it, and placing it over the Queen's face, pinned it fast to her head-dress. One of the executioners took her by the arm and led her to the block; and the Queen kneeling down, said repeatedly with a firm voice, "Into thy hands, O Lord I commend my spirit." At this moment sobs and groans burst from the spectators, and disconcerted the headsmen. He trembled * The axe descended, and missing its aim, inflicted a deep wound in the lower part of the skull.* The Queen remained motionless, and at the third stroke her head was severed from the body. When the executioner held it up convulsed and streaming with blood, he cried as usual, "God save Queen Elizabeth."

"So perish all the Queen's enemies!" subjoined the Dean of Peterborough. The fanatical Earl of Kent, approaching the dead body and standing over it, exclaimed in a still louder tone; "Such be the end of all the Queen's and the Gospel's enemies!"

Not a voice was heard to cry amen. The spectators continued silent, and drowned in tears. Party feeling was absorbed in admiration and pity!

When the head-dress of her who was once a Queen was disturbed, it disclosed a head of hair, white "with other snows than those of age" The cares and the sorrows of twenty years of captivity had done the work of eighty winters.*

(To be continued.)

CURSIVE WRITING OF THE ROMANS.

The Quarterly Review gives the following interesting account of the discovery of the cursive handwriting of the Romans, mentioned, it will be remembered, by Quintilian and Cicero:—

Joseph Scaliger asserted that the Romans had a cursive handwriting. Some doubted, but on the whole such continued to be the creed of the learned down to our own time Behold some fourteen or fifteen years ago the Austrians set about improving the channel of the Danube to suit it for steam-boats, and the first point was to re-open Trajan's towing path, which often became a gallery cut out of the cliff, and all but obliterated by the accidents of war and weather. One day, in hewing at this gallery the workmen revealed the mouth of a cavern, probably natural, but widened by Roman skill, and which had seventeen centuries ago been the head-quarters of a clerk of the works, or contracting engineer. In this subterraneous office were found the original day-books of Trajan's servant—namely, specimens—the first that modern eye ever saw—of the familiar Roman tables—boards of wood with hinges, inclosing each set two or four pages of quarrymen's names and calculations of wages inscribed on wax; and lo! the names were not only in capitals, but they were in running hand, actually identical with our own; though Trajan's clerk had been no elegant penman—and accordingly the Vienna doctors have ever since (except when occupied with sedition) been at daggers drawn among themselves about the decypherment of the great Emperor's masons and navies. The moral is modesty. We are not done with discoveries. Not a fifth part of Pompeii has as yet been dispasted—probably not a twentieth of Herculaneum. If ever Nicolas gets to Constantinople, we expect revelations enow. The tradition of some vast deposit of ancient literature among the vaults of the Seraglio is coeval with the fall of the city. Mahomed II. was an unlikely as any prince then or since to approve of destroying the private library of the Palæologi.—Britannia.

* In the official account of the execution by the Earls of Kent and Shrewsbury, is a little trait, quite in accordance with their character. "Her servants were immediately removed, and orders taken that none should approach the corpse, but that it should be embalmed by the surgeon appointed. And further, her cross, apparel, and other things, are retained here, and not yielded to the executioner, for inconveniences that might follow; but he is to be rewarded by such as sent him hither."

CHANGES OF COLOUR IN PLANTS.

The following is the scientific explanation of the cause of leaves changing their colour in autumn:—"The colour of plants generally depends on the presence of a substance called chromule, which is deposited in minute granules in the vesicles of the cellular tissue. This substance consists of pure carbon, which has been fixed by the decomposition of the carbonic acid gas absorbed by the plant; the oxygen escaping again into the atmosphere, while the carbon is permanently assimilated. Both the absorption and decomposition of carbonic acid gas take place most effectively under the influence of solar light; hence, plants grown in darkness become etiolated, or blanched. The chromule in all plants being the same, it is difficult to explain why leaves should be green and flowers of so many varied hues; indeed, the cause is as yet but very imperfectly understood. It is found, however, that when the leaves expand and are of the brightest green, the grains of chromule are always surrounded by a thin film of gluten, the principal ingredient in which is nitrogen. In autumn the gluten and the carbon generally have both disappeared, particularly in plants which contain a notable amount of acid, the basis of which is oxygen. In proportion as the oxygen predominates, the leaves become red; hence, the beautiful tints of red and crimson taken by some leaves in autumn. It has been observed that the leaves of plants always turn yellow, red, crimson, or violet, and never blue; and this corresponds with the above theory, as the carbon, which is dark, is carried out of the leaves by the descending sap, and its place partially supplied by oxygen. Thus red, which is the colour produced by oxygen, predominates in decaying leaves; and violet, which implies a mixture of carbon, is only found in the dying leaves of the American white oak. The lime and other trees which abound in mucilage, or gluten, further corroborate this theory, in having their decayed leaves yellow."—Brighton Herald.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 2.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1851. [VOL. XX.

LECTURES ON CERTAIN DIFFICULTIES FELT BY ANGLICANS IN SUBMITTING TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, PRIEST OF THE ORATORY OF ST. PHILIP NERI. LECTURE 3, GRACE IN THE MOVEMENT OF 1833, NOT FROM THE NATIONAL CHURCH. LONDON: BURNS AND LAMBERT.—1850.

(Concluded from our last.)

Or, to turn to other communions, whom have you with the capabilities of greatness in them, which show themselves in the benevolent zeal of Howard the philanthropist, or Elizabeth Fry? Or consider the almost miraculous conversion and subsequent life of Col. Gardiner. Why, even old Bunyan, with his vivid dreams when a child, his conversion, his conflicts with Satan, his preachings and imprisonments, however inferior to you in discipline of mind and knowledge of the truth, is, in the outline of his history, more Apostolical than you. "Weep not for me," were his last words, as if he had been a saint, "but for yourselves. I go to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who doubtless, through the mediation of His Son, will receive me, though a sinner, when we shall, ere long, meet, to sing the new song, and be happy for ever." Consider the death-beds of the thousands of those, in and out of the Establishment, who, with scarcely one sentiment of religion in common with you, die in confidence of the truth of their doctrine, and of their personal safety. Does the peace of their deaths testify to the divinity of their creed or of their communion? Does the extreme earnestness and reality of religious feeling, exhibited in the sudden seizure and death of one, who was as stern in his hatred of your opinions, as in that earnestness of feeling, who one evening protested against the sacramental principle, and next morning died with the words of Holy Scripture in his mouth—does it give any sanction to that hatred and that protest*? And there is another, a Calvinist, one of whose special and continual prayers in his last illness was for perseverance in grace, who cried, "O Lord, abhor me not, though I be abhorrible, and abhor myself!" And who, five minutes before his death, by the expression of his countenance, changing from prayer to admiration and calm peace, impressed upon the bystanders, that the veil had been removed from his eyes, and that, like Stephen, he saw things invisible to sense;—did he, by the circumstances of his death-bed, bear evidence to the truth of what you, as well as I, hold to be an odious heresy†? "Mr. Harvey resigned his meek soul into the hands of his Redeemer, saying, 'Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace.'" "Mr. Walker, before he expired, spoke nearly these words: 'I have been on the wings of the cherubim; heaven has in a manner been opened to me, I shall be there soon.'" "Mr. Whitfield rose at four o'clock on the sabbath day, went to his closet, and was unusually long in private; laid himself on his bed for about ten minutes; then went on his knees and prayed most fervently he might that day finish his Master's work." Then he sent for a clergyman, "and before he could reach him, closed his eyes on this world without a sigh or groan, and commenced a sabbath of everlasting rest‡." Alas! there was another, who for three months "lingered," as he said, "in the face of death." "O my God," he cried, "I know Thou dost not overlook any of Thy creatures. Thou dost not overlook me. So much torture to kill a worm! have mercy on me! I cry to Thee, knowing I cannot alter Thy ways. I cannot, if I would, and I would not if I could. If a word would remove these sufferings, I would not utter it." "Just life enough to suffer," he continued, "but I submit, and not only submit but rejoice." One morning he woke up, "and with firm voice and great sobriety of manner, spoke only these words: Now I die!" He sat as one in the attitude of expectation, and about two hours afterwards, it was as he had said." And he was a professed infidel, and worse than an infidel,—an apostate priest!

* Dr. Arnold. † Mr. Scott. ‡ Sidney's Life of Hill.

No, my dear brethren, these things are beyond us. Nature can do so much, and go so far, can form such rational notices of God and of duty, without grace or merit, or a future hope; good sense has such an instinctive apprehension of what is fitting; intellect, imagination, and feeling can so take up, develope, and illuminate what nature has originated; education and the communication of ideas can so insinuate into the mind what really does not belong to it; grace, not effectual, but inchoate, can so plead, and its pleadings look so like its fruits; and its mere visitations may so easily be mistaken for its indwelling presence; and its vestiges, when it has departed, may gleam so beautifully on the dead soul; that it is quite impossible for us to conclude, with any fairness of argument, that a certain opinion is true, or a religious position safe, on account of the confidence or apparent excellence of those who adopt it. Of course we think as tenderly of them as we can; and may fairly hope that what we see, is in some instances the work of grace, wrought on those who are in invincible ignorance; but the claim is unreasonable and exorbitant, if they expect their state of mind is to be taken in evidence, not only of promise in the individual, but of truth in his creed.

And should this view of the subject unsettle and depress you, as if it left you no means at all of ascertaining whether God loves you, or whether any thing is true, or any thing to be trusted, then let this feeling answer the purpose for which I have impressed it on you. I wish to deprive you of your undue confidence in self: I wish to dislodge you from that centre in which you sit so self-possessed and self-satisfied. Your fault has been to be satisfied with but a half evidence of your security; you have been too well contented with remaining where you found yourselves, not to catch at a line of argument, so indulgent, yet so plausible. You have thought that position impregnable; and growing confident, as time went on, you have presumed to pronounce it blasphemy against the Holy Ghost to doubt of your Church and of its ordinances. Learn, my dear brethren, a more sober, a more cautious tone of thought. Learn to fear for your souls. It is something indeed to be peaceful within, but it is not every thing. It may be the stillness of death. The Catholic, and he alone, has within him that union of external, with internal notes of God's favour, which sheds the light of conviction over his soul, and makes him both fearless in his faith, and calm and thankful in his hope.

DUBLIN REVIEW.

ART. XI.—The Manual of Devotion. By Ambrose Lisle Phillips, Esq. Derby: 1843.

(Continued from our last.)

As another illustration of the beauties which the Church presents to our admiration in her minor offices, we may take the subject of the work before us, which has led us to the consideration of this topic. Its purpose is to recommend the devotion so little understood, nay often so much slighted even by good people in our country—THE ROSARY. It is intended as a manual, or guide, for those principally who adopt it in the modified form which the Church has lately approved, of the Living Rosary, in which the various mysteries are distributed among different persons, who thus collectively weave together that flowery crown of exquisite devotion, the chaplet (sweet of name, which we would gladly see revived! that crowns at once the divine Son, and the Virgin-Mother. For a full explanation of this holy exercise, and for an account of its origin, its advantages, and prerogatives, we will simply refer our readers to the work itself. It will amply repay them; and they will find in the meditations proposed to facilitate the practice of contemplation (which forms an essential portion of the Rosary), much tenderness of feeling and liveliness of thought that will be at once edifying and improving to them.

(To be continued.)

HISTORY OF THE LIFE, WRITINGS AND DOCTRINES OF MARTIN LUTHER.

By J. M. V. Audin.

THE TWO BULLS. 1520.

LEO X.—1521.

(Continued from our last.)

In the sixteenth century, Italy was a real land of promise, which every man of genius wished to visit before death. Then the Alps were crossed, not by another Hannibal, but by a few obscure men, who came to study the advance of intellect,—to interrogate ancient ruins, or examine recently discovered manuscripts,—to admire the paintings of Giotto,—to enter under one of the domes which a Brunelesco or an Arnolfo had raised,—to imbibe inspiration from the contemplation of the wonders which each city exhibited to view,—and to hear the melodious strains of poetry, when the lyre elsewhere was mute. All felt the renovating influences of the spot;—priests, philosophers, nobles, princes and people. While Germany admired nothing but scholastic disputation, the people of Florence walked with uncovered heads, bearing olive branches in their hands, in procession before a Madonna of Cimabue, which had recently been discovered. At Ferrara the porters repeated whole stanzas of Orlando, and the brigands of the Appenines bowed with respect at the sound of Ariosto's verses. At the very time that Luther, gave the signal for revolt, Bandinelli formed the group of the high altar of Santa Maria del Fiore;—Angelo Politian, and John Picus, of Mirandola, descended in triumph to their tombs in the church of St. Mark; and Buonarotti produced his Day and Night, the Pensiero, and the colossal statue of David. Venice, Ferrara, Milan, Bologna, Parma, Ravenna, Florence and Rome, in a word, all the Italian cities, were so many focuses of art, of light, and of science, whence they were to be diffused throughout the world.

(To be continued.)

WHITE'S CONFUTATION OF CHURCH OF ENGLANDISM.

(Translated from the Original Latin, by E. W. O'Mahoney, Esq., of the Middle Temple London.)

CHAPTER XXIX.

The thirtieth Article examined.

(Continued from our last.)

That the Church sometimes administered the Eucharist under both kinds, it is now needless to prove, as you, my brethren, agree with Catholics on this point; but the question at issue is, with respect to the administration of it under either kind only,—and that it was so administered, it lieth upon us, who make the assertion, now to prove. This is proved, in the first place, by the custom which subsisted in the ancient Church of giving the Eucharist to the faithful under the species of bread only, in order that they may carry it home with them, and there take it at a fitting time. Tertullian, in writing to his wife, mentions this custom. "Shall not your husband know," saith he, "what you taste in secret before all other food? And if he know it, he does not believe it to be, what it is called—bread."* This custom existed in the Roman church in the time of St. Jerom also, as he himself relates:—"I know," says St. Jerom, "that it is the custom at Rome, for the faithful invariably to receive the body of Christ. This custom I neither censure, nor approve: for each abounds in its own sense. But I am at issue with the religious views of those, who receive the communion, on the very day after they have had conjugal intercourse; and who remind us of the passage in Persius, where he represents persons cleansing their nightly impurites by the morning bath. Why do not such persons undertake to visit the tombs of the Martyrs? Why have they any scruple to enter the churches? Or is Christ one in the public temple, and another in their private houses? That which is not lawful in the church, is not lawful at home."† These are the words of Jerom.

(To be continued.)

FLOWERS OF HEAVEN.

Connexion between Religion and Morality.

CHAPTER XIII.

MODERATION.

Continued from our last.

If abstinence is the highest point that sobriety can reach, fasting is the extreme degree of abstinence. Moses found this practice established among the Egyptian priests: it formed part of that sanitary system, which they had, not without reason, confounded with their religion. Fasting, especially at the vernal equinox, is very useful to the health of the body: at all times it serves that of the soul?

* Tertul., lib. 2, ad uxor. cap. 5.—Vide Cyprian hac re serm. de lapsis, et inter opera ejus authorem de spectaculis, sub finem.

† Hieronym. tom. 3, apolog. pro libris adversus Jovinian. Euseb. Histor. Eccles. lib. 6. c. 36.

"Fasting," says St. John Chrysostom, "has a peculiar virtue; it makes us excel in all virtues; it changes men into angels, and renders them capable of contending in frail flesh, with the infernal demons. He who fasts has always his spirit fervent, and his mind elevated to heaven. He prays with attention; he eradicates bad desires from his heart; he reflects the image of God in his soul, and appeases the Divine indignation: he humbles his soul and represses its pride."

But some St. Simonians,* the scattered remnants of whose wreck are still floating on the surface of society, will here exclaim—O catholics! catholics! have you not sufficiently crucified the flesh? To gain heaven, must you live on wild herbs—endure perpetual fasts—and, through a spirit of penance, imitate St. Jerom, who carried loads of sand ignited by a burning sun?

Such virtues were, however, then rendered necessary, by the opposite system of luxurious indulgence that prevailed; and one of their own party—for the St. Simonians and Pantheists have always fraternized—has acknowledged that this spirit of mortification was a salutary and useful reaction against the terrible and colossal materialism, which had manifested itself in the Roman empire, and which threatened to destroy all the intellectual greatness of man. "The flesh," says Henry Herine,† "had become so unrestrained in the Roman empire, that it required all the incitements of Christian mortification to repress it. A repast like that of Trimalcoin, was appropriately succeeded by the rigorous fasts of Christianity." "This temperate life," says Villemain, "of which neither the reality, nor sincerity can be denied, must have given to the mental powers what was denied to the passions and wickedness of nature. This reflection naturally presents itself to the mind at this epoch; whenever we see strangers suddenly appear, and exercise, both on the people and with the prince, an astonishing influence, we almost invariably find that these men came from the desert."‡

Protestants ought to comprehend our principles better than the modern German and French infidels, who seek to exclude God from all his works, that they may not be able to find him anywhere; and yet they make us similar reproaches. "The road that leads to life," say they, "is a narrow way, and we ought to seek it in tribulations. This we are aware of, as the Saviour himself has told us; but this is no reason to render the road impracticable, and to strew thorns and briers under our naked and weary feet, as catholics do."

(To be continued.)

* The name of modern French sect.
† De l'Allemagne.
‡ Nouveaux Mélanges historiques et literaires, t. ii.

VIENNA AND THE AUSTRIANS BY MRS. TROLLOPE. VOL. II. P. 324.

THE HOLY WEEK IN VIENNA.

Nothing can be less alike than the style in which the services of this season are performed in the churches of Paris, and in those of Vienna. In Paris I remembered listening to a glorious concert on Good Friday in the church of St. Roch, wherein a full and brilliant orchestra performed the solemn office of the day in a manner that enchanted the ear, and captivated the imagination. At the little court-chapel of Vienna not a note of music was to be heard except that breathed from human lips, in the utterance of the most touching eloquence that inspiration ever employed to reach the heart of man. I have no power to describe the effect produced by the awful solemnity of the words, or by the sweet sadness of those which soon followed,

"Memento mei, Domine, dum veneris in regnum tuum;"

"Pater, in manus tuas commendo spiritum meum;"

breathed, as they were, in slow low trembling accents.

The great ones of the earth stood there to listen to them hushed into breathless silence; and that small half-lighted chapel, with its Emperor, Empress, archdukes and archduchesses, all seemingly prostrate in heart before the dim cross that hung suspended above the altar, produced an impression on us which I doubt if all the splendours of Rome will ever efface.

On Holy Thursday the Fusswaschung by the Emperor and Empress was performed in the grand salle of the palace. It is a singular and striking ceremony. We were kindly furnished with tickets which admitted us to seats in a tribune raised a few feet from the ground at the upper end of the room, and commanding an excellent view of all that

A long narrow table was spread down each side of the room, raised on an estrade covered with carpet; on the inner side of each table were twelve arm-chairs, and, about an hour after the spectators who lined the walls had taken their places, twelve old men and as many old women were led in, each by two supporters, and placed in them. They were neatly and warmly clothed for the occasion, but the form of their garments looked as if they were coeval with the institution. After they had been some time seated, the usual three announcing taps were heard upon the floor, the throng of officers and high officials of the court fell back, and the Emperor and all the archdukes at present in Vienna, all in military uniforms, walked up the room. Immediately afterwards the Empress, Archduchess Sophia, and a dozen attendant ladies followed. They mounted the estrades on which the tables were placed: the Emperor and his suite on the side allotted to the men, and the Empress, archduchess, and their ladies, on the other.

The graceful Empress placed herself opposite a tidy little old woman, whose superiority of age (she only wanted one year of a hundred) gave her the first place, the archduchess stood next, and they had both a grande maîtresse behind them; while ten noble ladies in attendance stationed themselves each one opposite an old woman, all of whom were placed in order, from the venerable ninety-nine, down to the cadette aged eighty-four.

On the other side of the room the Emperor, the archdukes, and gentlemen in waiting, did the same.

As soon as the court had thus placed themselves, and each old pensioner received a kind word or two, which in more than one instance called up a blush of pleasure and agitation on the faded furrowed cheek of age, a double file of servants in state liveries marched up the room, each bearing a tray laden with what appeared to be very dainty viands, but of which meat of course made no part.

The top of the female table was immediately before the place we occupied, and the Empress being stationed at that end of it, our attention was naturally fixed upon her, and certainly no one ever went through a ceremony with greater perfection of demeanour in every way. The first part of the humble Christian office she had lent herself to perform, consisted in placing with her own hands the various dishes provided for the venerable senior upon whom she waited; and this was done with a quiet, gentle sweetness that made us almost forget the Empress in admiration for the woman. Her august sister-in-law, and each fair dame in order, followed the edifying example, and the table was speedily covered. Nothing, however, was eaten by the guests but soup; it having been ascertained for some years past, that sending home untouched the portion served to each, for their private enjoyment and that of their friends, gave them more pleasure than eating a nervous meal in the imperial presence, and having the remnants sent after them. Three entrées, and a dessert comprehending I imagine as much food as would serve a family for a week's feasting, were successively placed on the table, and removed by royal and noble hands with all the zeal and activity of careful attendants.

I suppose one of the old women looked wistfully at the passing dishes, as if she were hungry; for the Archduchess Sophia bent across the table, spoke a few words to her, and then proceeded to cut off a slice of bread from a loaf that flanked her plate, and gave it to her. It was eaten with much apparent appetite, aided perhaps by the draught of what I presume was wine which the poor soul drank with evident and hearty good will from a goblet that stood before her. This draught was, I think, taken by all, and was in every way well timed, as it served to drink to the health of their imperial hosts, to recruit strength and spirits that must undoubtedly have been somewhat tried by the whole scene, and to have fortified them against the effects of the severe cold without.

The dinner having been thus placed and removed, the tables were withdrawn with great celerity, and the most remarkable part of the ceremony began. Pages approached with gold basin, ewer, and napkins; the beautiful Empress drew off her gloves, and tied a white linen apron round her waist, while every lady on the estrade knelt down before the poor old woman opposite to her, and pulled off her shoe and stocking. When this was completed, they drew back, and a long line of white linen cloth was placed by some af the attendants over the row of naked feet to prevent their being unnecessarily exposed. Meanwhile a priest placed himself at a desk prepared for him; exactly, by the way, in front of the Nuncio, and the Turkish ambassador, who sate side by side on the same bench we occupied,—(the former having performed the prescribed ablutions for twelve poor men at an early hour of the morning, that he might be present at this imperial ceremony). The gospel, from whence the necessity of performing this act of humiliation is drawn by Roman Catholics, was read; and it was then that one might perceive how truly the Empress of Austria submitted herself to the performance of this lowly office from genuine religious feeling. She had hitherto performed the part she had taken upon her with an air of smiling kindness, but her countenance, which is one of great feeling, is rather grave than joyous, and even her smile expresses more of goodness than of gaiety; but, while she placed the dainty dishes that were to be their portion before the poor people seated at the board, her look and manner spoke, without the slightest shade of affectation, a well-pleased gracious hospitality that had no mixture of penance in it. But no sooner did the priest begin to pronounce the words of the gospel, then her soul seemed to retire into itself, her lips moved in prayer, and though neither her hands nor eyes were raised to heaven, nor gesticulations of any kind used to produce the external appearance of devotion, there was something in her whole person that might have helped a painter at need who wished to represent, not the martyrdom, but the holy self-devotion of a saint.

When the preparations were completed, she drew near the first woman in the line, and kneeling down, dipped the corner of a napkin in water, and touched the foot, which having wiped, she bent low her fair imperial head, and kissed it.

The performance of such an office as this must affect the spectators entirely according to the manner in which it is executed. Protestant princes do not believe themselves called upon by the gospel to perform this act of humility, and Protestant subjects are content to give them credit for a due proportion of the great Christian virtue which it exemplifies without their making any public display of it; but, however well we may all of us be satisfied by our own arrangements, I think it impossible that any real Christian, let the form of his Christianity be as simple and undemonstrative as it may, to see this gracious creature drag herself along upon her knees in the performance of this painful ceremony, without feeling that she had humbled her heart before God.

On rising from her knees she was very pale, and I saw tears in her fine dark eyes; but she presently resumed her usual tranquil air, laid aside her apron, drew on her gloves, and concluded the business of the morning by throwing over the neck of each poor old soul a ribbon, from which depended a little purse containing forty pieces of silver, adding, what really from the manner of its reception seemed more precious still, the favour of her extended hand to kiss. Even this, however, was not enough to satisfy the feeling she inspired, for, after she had passed by, I saw one of the old women stretch out a palsied hand to seize her dress, which she pressed fervently to her lips, and I almost envied the good soul her opportunity, for I should have well liked to kiss the hem of her garment myself.

We were in the front row of the tribune, which was so placed that the gentlemen who were walking about the room were able to converse with those placed in it, and I overheard a young scape-grace say as he passed,

"N'est-ce pas jouer la comedie?"

"Au moins la pièce est fort belle," was the answer.

The kind-hearted Emperor appeared to perform his part of the ceremony in serving the table, with great activity and good-nature; but we were too far from his estrade to see very well what was done upon it.

The twenty four poor people were all dressed in new uniforms for the occasion: the women in gowns of grey cloth, with large round black hats; over which, though they were flexible enough, the ribbon that sustained the purse was not passed without some little difficulty. The caps, pinners, and aprons, were all most delicately white. The dress of the men was of the same material as the gowns of the women, and their hats very nearly similar; the greatest singularity of the male attire was a sort of white muslin tippet round their necks, such as we often see in the pictures of Holbein. Their grey beards, which had been permitted to grow in honour of the ceremony added greatly to their venerable and picturesque appearance. The ages of the men varied from ninety-nine to eighty-three,—those of the women, from ninety-nine to eighty-four; the aggregate of age among the females surpassing, by eight years, that of the males: the old ladies, too, appeared considerably the most active and robust. They are twenty-four of the oldest poor people to be found in the city, capable of being brought to the palace.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, January 11, 1851.

THE CARDINAL ARCHBISHOP OF WESTMINSTER, AND THE RESTORATION OF THE CATHOLIC HIERARCHY IN ENGLAND.

When the Wise men from the East came to Jerusalem, and inquired, where is He that is born King of the Jews, Herod and all Jerusalem with him were alarmed at the proceeding, regarding it, as one, which was the Harbinger of a revolution, by which the subversion of the authority of the Sovereign and the existing order of temporal property and prerogatives were to be destroyed.

These men, wise in their own conceit and abounding in the prudence of this world, united in counsel, accordingly, in order to defeat the imagined menaced invasion of their secular rights. Little did they dream, that the grand and only end for which the new born King came into the world was, as he himself testified before Pilate, to bear testimony to the truth, for that his kingdom was not of this world. It was in vain that the Saviour explained to his enemies the wholly, the purely spiritual nature of his Divine Mission. It was to no purpose, that he inculcated, that what belonged to Caesar, was to be given to Caesar, but that what belonged to God was also to be given to God. Blinded by the violence of their own passions and prejudices, the Jewish people were incapable of comprehending the reasonableness of the Saviour's defence, and the wisdom of his answers, instead of soothing, only provoked and aggravated their sanguinary vindictiveness. A very great analogy would seem to exist between the state of things, which we have just described, and that which Protestant England now exhibits, in consequence of the restoration of the Catholic Hierarchy in that country. In language of every description, often abounding with coarse scurvilous invective, that proceeding is denounced, as an invasion of the authority of the Sovereign and of the rights of the established Prelacy. In vain, do the Catholic Clergy and Laity reply that the kingdom of the New Hierarchy is not of this world; that for the future, they, as they did in times past, will faithfully render to the Sovereign what belongs to Caesar, but that duty compels them to render to God what belongs to God. Heedless and reckless of the justness of this reasoning, English Protestant bigotry replies to it, chiefly by burning in effigy the New Cardinal, the Pope, and other personages of exalted worth and rank, and by similar demonstrations, worthy of the spirit of Lord G. Gordon and his rebellious co-operators. We think it impossible, that conduct so disgusting as that which we have just alluded to, must not, upon a little reflection, estrange from those capable of such outrages, every man who values his own character or that of his fellow-countrymen. We copy from one of the beautiful discourses delivered by Bishop Wiseman at St. George's in London, some time before his elevation to the Cardinalate, the following opposite extract, which will serve as a conclusion to the preceding observations:—

'It is too true, my brethren, and we see it every day, that whatever brings with it the character of worldliness, carried to an extreme, in some way attracts towards itself the admiration, almost the affections, and certainly the desires and jealousies of men, while what has merely a moral or religious interest, is considered scarcely worthy of notice. It has been decreed in the course of the last very few years, by the sovereign voice of this nation, that if the Head of the Catholic religion,—he who is like Melchisedech, at once the priest and the king;—he whose priestly character is recognised necessarily by the very established church of these realms;—he whom the learned divines of that establishment, those who have at all earnestly studied history, or the constitution of the church, recognise as the first christian pontiff, as possessing the very highest place in the hierarchy of the church;—it has been decreed, I repeat, by the voice of the legislature of this nation, that if he, for any high and great purpose, were to send into this country a representative of himself, and naturally for that purpose seek one invested with the same sacred character which forms his true greatness upon earth; one who, by training and education, might be the most able to enter into his views, and to represent him here;—that he, though he were the most distinguished man that the imperial city had bred and produced, would be rejected;—would not be allowed to see the face of our sovereign;—would not be allowed to speak a message of peace and kindness to our people. And why? Because he would represent a Catholic interest; because that great sovereign Pontiff holds that religion which is the religion of millions in this land, but which, still, still is an object of disdain and obloquy. No! if he was an ecclesiastic like himself, if a priest, he must not be admitted!

There comes, then, from a distant part of the earth, a heathen man, one who disbelieves the mystery of the Trinity, of the Incarnation, of the Redemption, of the Messiah, whom this nation professes to revere; and one who labours under the imputation of the deepest guilt. He comes amongst you as the representative of a heathen master; he comes among you as a scorner of your race; his religious principles will not allow him to eat in your presence! Oh! he, that heathen, comes with bold aspect and with noble train before your christian queen, and is recognised. Ah! but his garments were braided with gold, and he had vast sums here at his disposal, by which he could purchase wonderful products of our commerce; and he could scatter riches, and have them well filched from him by the better ingenuity of well civilised men; and to this heathen the first ladies of the land, the noblest dames, think it an honour to open their house, and they receive him as if he were a demi-god come from above, bringing some wonderful knowledge, or some extraordinary lesson of virtue. Oh! but his head-dress was composed of diamonds and emeralds! it was magnificent to behold; it was a thing to worship. So much wealth, so much grandeur around any man! Oh, age! Oh, country in which we live! The day will come when this will be spoken of in scorn. You, Time, that boasted of a higher morality standard! You, Land, that has always claimed that you possess a scriptural, and a biblical, and a pure and spotless religion! thus yeworship gold upon the heathen, while you scorn the Christian Pontiff.

My Brethren, for a religion like ours, which demands self-denial,—the embracing of which destroys human prospects, and, in almost every instance, is attended or followed by the utter destruction of human hopes,—for such a religion, which teaches men to give up all and take the Cross instead, to have made progress in an age like this; not to have fought, but to have calmly worked its way, amidst all the pushing efforts of the thousands who are bent entirely upon wordly interests, and who scorn every man who has not his God upon this earth! Oh! it has been the work of the one Lord of Hosts, of the one Saviour—the meek Saviour triumphant, who came into the worldly Jerusalem mounted upon an ass; it has been the work of God, not of man. Oh! not our right hand hath done this, but the Almighty, the Unconquerable, and He who brought forth His Israel from Egypt.' Dr. Wiseman's sermon, delivered in St. George's Catholic Church, Southwark, on Sunday evening, Aug. 11, 1850.

PRIVATE INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE, ITS PERNICIOUS RESULTS WITH RESPECT TO CIVIL SOCIETY.

In our columns, to-day, mention is made of two events, both of which may be traced to the pernicious influence of the great fundamental principle of the so-called reformation. The first of these has reference to a trial, which took place lately in Dublin, of certain persons, for a robbery committed by them in the establishment of the sect of Protestants, called 'White Quakers,' situated near Dublin. As many of our Readers may be unacquainted with the origin of this sect, we shall furnish for their satisfaction a brief outline of its history. The sect dates its being as recently as about the 1842 or 1843. At least previously, it had not attracted the notice of any of the public journals. Its first founders, as far as we can learn, were certain respectable Male and Female Members of the Society, generally known by the name of Quakers. The chief of these resided in Waterford, in the South of Ireland. We happen to know personally, the high character for propriety, and in short for general, public and private worth, which the families, to which the Male and Female originators of the sect of 'White Quakers,' justly held among all classes of the community, and we can conscientiously say, that a few years since, we would have treated that man as a foul Calumniator, who would have ascribed, especially to any one of the female portion of those families, the shocking public eccentricities, not to speak more harshly, into which some of them have been since betrayed, in a great measure, if not wholly, by the dangerous principle of private Interpretation. At the period we refer to, the Ladies in question were distinguished both for their amiable, modest, and decorous manners, and also for their kind, charitable attention, in ministering to the wants and infirmities of the poor. But, alas! their faith and their morality rested on a precarious, and unsteady foundation. To-day, their religion recognised as a sacred truth, that which to-morrow it rejected as a superstition. Hitherto, their dress was distinguished beyond that of Catholic, or Protestant Ladies, by its almost conventual form and its pre-eminent neatness. But now, they discovered that they had not the sanction of Scripture for the use of such apparel. To Scripture therefore they recurred, and they soon persuaded themselves, that it was their duty literally to conform in their vesture to the pattern of that of Adam and Eve, as that model had been dictated and supplied by God himself. Without hesitation, they began to put in practice publicly, what they had previously resolved upon in their own consciences, as suggested by the Spirit of God—The Police of course promptly interfered to abate so disgusting a nuisance. Two of the Lady Members were sent to jail, in punishment of the public violations of decency, which was proved against them. In this state of things, some modification of the system became indispensable, unless indeed all the Members of the new sect resolved either to quit the realm, or to die in prison, martyrs to a mistaken sense of duty. To meet the difficulty, a species of compromise was adopted in, and the singular garb, described in the narrative of the late trial in Dublin, was assumed, as sufficiently in accordance with the teaching of Scripture. A reference to the same narrative will suggest to the most unbiased Reader, grave suspicions, as to the moral consequences, which appear to result from the system of the sect of 'White Quakers,' a system based wholly on an imaginary internal illumination, by which each individual is to be regulated in the interpretation of Scripture, in all that relates to Faith and Morality. We pass over in silence other consectaries deduced by the White Quakers from similar premises, those namely which forbid as unchristian the payment of all sorts of taxes especially of such as relate to war, of Church establishments, &c. as matters at least relatively of minor importance. In our next we shall treat of the second topic, to which allusion was made in the opening of this article.

CATHOLICITY AT KISHNAGHUR.

A few weeks since, a poor Native Infant was inhumanly abandoned by its unnatural Parents, and left exposed a prey to the Jackalls in the jungle, in the vicinity of Kishnaghur. A pious Catholic Family of that Neighbourhood having heard of the occurrence, with true Christian charity, rescued the destitute Child from certain destruction, and received it affectionately, into its own domestic circle.

Having had occasion lately to come to Calcutta, the same good Family brought with them the rescued Infant, and had it baptised in St. Thomas' Church, by Rev. Mr. Kennedy. This is the second instance, in which within a brief interval, the same pious Family we refer to, have been, under Divine Providence, the happy instrument, of rescuing a fellow creature from temporal and spiritual misery. To others we say. "Go and do likewise."

CONVERSION.

During the course of last week, Rev. Mr. Prendergast baptised and received a Protestant Child, at the Dum-Dum Catholic Chapel, into the bosom of the Catholic Church.

Selections.

CARDINAL WISEMAN'S MANIFESTO.

The following is an extracted summary of Cardinal Wiseman's manifesto:—

Introduction.

The Catholics had been governed in England by vicars-apostolic, since 1623; that is, by bishops with foreign titles, named by the Pope, and having jurisdiction as his vicars or delegates. In 1688 their number was increased from one to four; in 1840 from four to eight.

A strong wish had begun to prevail, on the part of the English Catholics, to change this temporary form of government for the ordinary form, by bishops with local titles, that is, by an ecclesiastical hierarchy. Petitions had been sent for this purpose to the Holy See. The first, I believe, was in 1834.

In 1847 the vicars-apostolic assembled in London came to the resolution to depute two of their number to Rome, to petition earnestly in their names for his long-desired boon. The writer of the present appeal was one; and drew up the memorial on the subject, addressed to the Holy See.

The Catholic Church in England had so much expanded and consolidated itself, since the Emancipation Act, and its parts had so matured their mutual relations, that it could not be carried off without a full and explicit code.

Thoughts of aggression never entered the heads of the petitioners or of the petitioned; nor were the bishops moved by stupid ideas of rivalry with the Established Church in what forms its weakness, nor any absurd defiance of national prejudices.

The Holy See kindly listened to the petition; and referred it to the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda. After a full discussion, and further reply to objections, the boon was granted. The vicars-apostolic were desired to suggest the best divisions for new divisions for new dioceses, and the best places for the titles. These were adjusted, the brief was drawn up, and even printed.

Some difficulties arose about the practical point, and publication was delayed. In 1848, another bishop, Dr. Ullathorne, was deputed to Rome, to remove them, and the measure was again prepared, when the Roman revolution suspended its final conclusion till now.

All this time there was no concealment, no attempt to take people by surprise. All Catholics knew of the intended measure; the papers announced it; so notorious was it, that the Dean and Chapter of Westminster petitioned Parliament against it; and a friend of the writer's heard the Dean of Westminster say, most openly, "Well, he may call himself what he pleases, but at least he can never be Dean of Westminster." In Battersby's Irish Directory for 1848, the writer was named "Most Rev. N. Wiseman, Archbishop of Westminster." He can add, that many letters came to him so addressed.

Then why is this very act. which was openly spoken of, and hardly attracted attention, three years ago, now denounced so furiously, and characterized so foully? This is not the place to answer this question; it is only wished here to state simple facts, and leave others to reason on them.

AN APPEAL, &c.

An agitation perhaps unparalleled in our times, has been raised by the constitution of a Catholic hierarchy in this island. Its violence has been that of a whirlwind, during which it would have been almost folly to claim a hearing. After the news reached England of the measure being completed, a pause of a few days ensued, as if the elements were brewing for the storm. Then it burst out with absolute fury. Sarcasm, ridicule, satire of the broadest character, theological and legal reasonings of the most refined nature, bold and reckless declamation, earnest and artful argument—nothing seemed to come amiss; and every invocable agency, from the Attorney-General to Guy Fawkes, from Præmunire to a hustling, was summoned forth to aid the cry, and administer to the vengeance of those who raised it.

A few years ago, an excitement somewhat similar was caused by the proposed augmentation of the grant to Maynooth College. Political and religious feelings brought parties, otherwise generally discordant, into harmonious opposition to the increase. But the great statesmen who then presided over her Majesty's councils, and whose loss the country has lately so sincerely deplored, nobly stemmed the tide, carried his increase with calm dignity through the legislature, and yielded nought to public outcry. At the present crisis, the Catholics of England had no right to expect any co-operation from the government of the country—they asked for none; but they had the right of every citizen to impartiality. They naturally might have expected that he, to whom was entrusted the helm of the state, would keep himself above those influences of party feeling which disqualify the mind for grave and generous counsels; would preserve himself uncommitted by any hasty or unofficial expression of opinion; would remain on the neutral ground of his public responsibility, to check excess on every side, and moderate dangerous tendencies in any party. Instead of this, the head of her Majesty's Government has astonished, not this country alone, but all Europe, by a letter which leaves us but little hope that any appeal to the high authority which rules over the empire would be received, to say the least, with favour.

But another and a still graver power in the state has allowed itself to be swayed, by the passing blast, from the upright and inflexible position which Englishmen have ever considered natural to it. Whatever the agitation and storm that raged around, we have been accustomed to feel sure that the fountains of justice would retain their surface calm and unruffled, and their waters cool and pure. The highest secular dignity in the land has been wisely adjudged to him, who, either seated at the head of the noblest assembly in the world, holds with unswerving hand the balance of constitutional justice, and utters, in venerated accents, decisions on the most delicate topics of public and royal rights, which pass into very aphorisms of legislation; or, enthroned in the innermost sanctuary of justice, decides, almost without appeal, upon causes of vast magnitude, and enters the records of his decisions upon the law tables of the empire. But on the present occasion the storm has been strong enough to disturb the very spring of equity. Instead of waiting till, from the woolsack or the bench, he might have been called upon to speak with impartial solemnity on what may be thought a momentous question, the Lord High Chancellor of England has preferred to deliver his award against us from behind the tables of a Mansion House banquet, and so elicit the anti-popish cheers of his civic companions, rather than the honoured approbation of the peerage or the bar. His compeer in high judicial duties sat by and listened; was indignant and justly censured: should he survive to be his biographer, let him, for the honour of More's erudite, suppress the undignified and un-English phrases which he heard; for no one here, however raised up, has a right to talk of placing his heel upon even the covering of another's head, who, however, humble, is as much a British subject and a free man as himself, and claims equal protection from, as he pays equal deference to, the law of this country.

SEC. I.—THE ROYAL SUPREMACY AND BISHOPS NAMED BY THE CROWN.

Down to the year 1829 Catholics were excluded from both Houses of Parliament, and from many offices and dignities. Or it may be more correct to say they were only enabled to attain these distinctions by taking an oath, entitled the Oath of Supremacy.

The acknowledgment of, and subjection to, this spiritual supremacy incompatible with the doctrine and belief of Catholics all over the world. The Catholic, who believed in this doctrine, could not, without giving the lic to his faith, swear or admit that the temporal sovereign is head of the church.

At an earlier period Catholics used to be put to death for their denial of the kingly ecclesiastical supremacy. The greatest and best of English judges, the Chancellor Sir Thomas More, was beheaded for denying that supremacy, and maintaining the Pope's.

In the year above mentioned (1829) an act was passed, and became law, which we familiarly known as the Catholic Emancipation Act. By this Catholics are freed from all obligation of swearing to, and consequently of acknowledging, the royal ecclesiastical supremacy; and an oath of allegiance was formed peculiarly for them, which excluded all declaration of belief in that principle.

A Catholic, therefore, before 1829, in an eye of the law, was a person who did not admit the royal supremacy, and therefore was excluded from full enjoyment of civil privileges. A Catholic after 1829, and therefore in 1850, is a person who still continues not to admit the royal supremacy, and nevertheless is admitted to full enjoyment of those privileges.

The royal supremacy is no more admitted by the Scotch Kirk, by Baptists, Methodists, Quakers, Independents, Presbyterians, Unitarians, and other dissenters, than by the Catholics. None of these recognise in the Queen any authority to interfere in their religious concerns, to appoint their ministers for them, or to mark the limits of their separate districts in which authority has to be exercised.

Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst, in the House of Lords, May 11, 1846, spoke to the following effect:—"The right reverend prelate (the Bishop of Exeter) had asked his opinion and that of the learned judges as to the right of the Roman Catholics to maintain and defend the supremacy of the Pope in spiritual matters. He said, that it was no offence at common law for them to do so; but, on the other hand, if any person, improperly, wantonly, or seditiously, called in question, the Crown or England—and that, it was to be observed, included the temporal as well the spiritual power of the Crown—if any, from any improper motive or purpose, or in any improper manner, questioned that supremacy, then the person would be liable to a prosecution at the common law; and there could be no doubt, if the learned judges were consulted, they would so determine."

SEC. II.—WHAT WAS THE EXTENT OF RELIGIOUS TOLERATION GRANTED TO CATHOLICS? HAVE THEY RIGHT TO POSSESS BISHOPS OR A HIERARCHY?

The act of Catholic Emancipation was considered, not only by those whom it benefited, but by all who consented to it as an act of justice, rather than of favour. "If the law," observed Lord Lyndhurst, "allowed the doctrines and discipline of the Roman Church, it should be allowed to be carried on perfectly and properly."

Now, holy orders require bishops to administer them, consequently a succession of persons in orders. Hence the Catholic Church is essentially episcopal: and to say, "You Catholics shall have complete religious toleration, but you shall not have bishops among you to govern you," would have been a complete contradiction in terms: it would have amounted to a total denial of religious toleration. When, therefore, Emancipation was granted to Catholics, full power was given them to have an episcopate—that is, a body of bishops to rule them, in communion with the Pope, the avowed head of their church. Now, government by bishops in the Catholic Church may be of two kinds.—1st. The regular, ordinary, proper, and perfect form of episcopal government consists of a local hierarchy—that is, a body of bishops having their sees in the country, with an archbishop similarly holding his see. Such is the episcopacy where constituted in its ordinary form.—2ndly. Where this proper form is not attainable, a temporary and less perfect mode of providing bishops for a country is adopted. The Pope names bishops to ancient sees, situated now in infidel countries, as Turkey or Barbary, and gives them jurisdiction in the country to be provided for, as his own immediate vicars. Hence such bishops are called vicars apostolic.

When Emancipation or full religious freedom was granted to Catholics, if in this was included full liberty to be governed by bishops, according to the constitution and ordinances of their own Church, it follows that they were at perfect liberty to have it governed according to the regular and ordinary form of their constitution, as much as by the temporary and irregular; and that is by a hierarchy of local bishops.

When I read the frequent boasting of the papers, and the exulting replies of bishops, that this movement in the Catholic Church, instead of weakening has strengthened the Established Church, by rousing the national Protestantism, and awakening dormant sympathies for its ecclesiastical organisation, I cannot but wonder at the alarm which is expressed. The late measure is ridiculed as powerless, as effete, as tending only to the overthrow of popery in England. Then act on this conviction; show that you believe in it; give us the little odds of a title, which bestows no power, rank, wealth, or influence, on him that bears it, and keep undisturbed those other realities, and let the issue be tried on these terms, so much in your favour. Let it be a fair contention, with theological weapons and fair arguments. If you prevail, and Catholicity is extinguished in the island, it will be a victory without remorse. It will have been achieved by the power of the Spirit, and not by the arm of flesh; it will prove your cause to be divine. But if, in spite of all your present advantage, our religion does advance, does win over to it the learned, the devout, and the charitable—does spread itself widely among the poor and simple—then you will not check its progress by forbidding a Catholic bishop to take the title of Hexham or of Clifton.

Sec. III.—How could Catholics obtain their Hierarchy?

We have seen that Catholics are allowed by law to maintain the Pope's supremacy in ecclesiastical and religious matters; and one point of that supremacy is, that he alone can constitute a hierarchy, or appoint bishops. Throughout the Catholic world this is the same.

If, therefore, the Catholics of this country were ever to have a hierarchy at all, it could only be through the Pope. He alone could grant it. This is no new or unknown doctrine: it has long been familiar to our statesmen, as well as to every one who has studied Catholic principles.

Lord John Russell, in his speech in the House of Commons, August 6, 1846, thus sensibly speaks upon the subject:—'There is another offence of introducing a Bull of the Pope into the country. The question is, whether it is desirable to keep up that, or any other penalty for such an offence. It does not appear to me, that we can possibly attempt to prevent the introduction of the Pope's bulls into this country. There are certain bulls of the Pope which are absolutely necessary for the appointment of bishops and pastors belonging to the Roman Catholic Church. It would be quite impossible to prevent the introduction of such bulls."

These quotations prove that in both Houses of Parliament the principle has been clearly laid down, that if Catholics are to have bishops at all, the Pope, and the Pope alone, can make them for them. Then it enters as completely into the principles of religious liberty that the Pope should name the hierarchy, as that Catholics should have the right to possess one—a right as necessary for them as it is for the Wesleyans that of having conferences with superintendents. But it may be said, what induced the Pope to appoint this hierarchy now, and in so sudden a manner? For an answer to this question I must refer you to my introduction, in which you will find, I trust, a satisfactory one. You will see that the Pope has finally granted now to this Catholic children in England what they had petitioned for and obtained three years ago.

Let me then sum up briefly what I have proved thus far. 1. Catholics are not bound to obey, or to consider as their bishops, those appointed by the crown, under the royal ecclesiastical supremacy, which legally they are not bound to hold. 2. Catholics belong to a religion fully tolerated, and enjoying perfect liberty of conscience, which is episcopal, and requires bishops for its government. 3. There is no law that forbids them to have such bishops according to their proper and ordinary form. 4. That form is, with ordinary jurisdiction, local sees, and titles derived from them—that is, a hierarchy. 5. They were fully justified in employing the only means in their power to obtain this form of ecclesiastical government; that is, by applying to the holy see. 6. And they have not acted contrary to any law, by accepting the gracious concession of what they asked. But it will be said, that though we, the Catholics, may have kept within the bounds of law, the act of the Pope is derogatory from, and contrary to, the royal prerogative. Let us see.

Sec. IV.—Does the Appointment of a Catholic Hierarchy trench on the Prerogative of the Crown?

In the Premier's letter, the Pope's acts are spoken of as real, and taking effect. The Pope has "assumed a right;" he "has parcelled out the land;" he "has named archbishops and bishops." If, according to the oath taken by non-Catholics, the Pope not only ought not to have, but really "has" not power of jurisdiction "spiritual or ecclesiastical" in these realms, it follows that, according to them, the Pope's ecclesiastical acts with regard to England are mere nullities.

I am confirmed in this view by Lord John Russell's explanation of the Protestant oath. "The oaths now taken are not altered. We shall continue to take the oath, that 'the Pope has not,' &c.; though at the same time there is no doubt, in point of fact, that he exercises a spiritual authority in these realms. I have always interpreted the oath to be, that in the opinion of the person taking it, the Pope has not any jurisdiction which can be enforced by law, or ought not to have." Now, no one for a moment imagines that the Pope or the Catholics of England, or their bishops, dream that the appointment of the hierarchy can be "enforced by law."

Has this assumption of titles been within the terms of the law? Is there any law forbidding the assumption of the title of bishop? A certain Dr. Dillon assumed it, and ordained what he called presbyters, and no one thought of prosecuting him. The Moravians have bishops all over England; and so have the Irvingites, or Apostolicals; and no one taxes them with illegality. Then our taking the title of bishops merely, constitutes no illegality. Is there any law that forbids our taking the title from any place not being a see of an Anglican bishop? No one can say that there is.

Then I ask those more learned in the law than myself, can an act of a subject of her Most Gracious Majesty, which by law he is perfectly competent to do, be an infringement of her royal prerogative? If not, then I trust we may conclude that by this new creation of Catholic bishops that prerogative has not been violated. No one doubts that the bishops so appointed are Roman Catholic bishops, to rule over Roman Catholic flocks. Does the crown claim the right, under its prorogative, of naming such bishops?

Sec. V.—Has the Mode of Establishing the Hierarchy been "Insolent and Insidious?"

The words in this title are extracted from the too memorable letter of the First Lord of the Treasury. I am willing to consider that production as a private act, and not as the manifesto of the intentions of her Majesty's Government. I will leave it to others, therefore, to dwell upon many portions of that letter, upon the abusing paragraph in particular, which pronounces a sentence as awfully unjust as it was uncalled for, on the religion of many millions of her Majesty's subjects, nearly all Ireland, and some of our most flourishing colonies. The charge, uttered in the ear of that island, in which all guarantees for genuine and pure Catholic education will of necessity be considered in future, as guarantees for "refining the intellect and enslaving the soul," all securities of the Catholic religion as security for the "nummeries of superstition," in the mind of their giver—guarantees and securities which can hardly be believed to be heard or offered—the charge thus made, in a voice that has been applauded by the Protestantism of England, produces in a Catholic heart a feeling too sickly and too deadening for indignation; a dismal despair at finding that, where we had honoured, and supported, and following for years, we may be spurned and cast off the first moment that popularity commands us as its price, or bigotry as its victim.

In 1841, or 1842, when, for the first time, the Holy See thought of erecting a hierarchy in North America, I was commissioned to sound the feelings of Government on the subject. I came to London for the purpose, and saw the Under Secretary for the Colonies, of which Lord Stanley was the Secretary. I shall not easily forget the urbanity of my reception, or the interesting conversation that took place, in which much was spoken to me which has since come literally true. But on the subject of my mission, the answer given was something to this effect:—"What does it matter to us what you call yourselves, whether vicars apostolic, or bishops, or muftis, or imaums, so that you do not ask us to do anything for you. We have no right to prevent your taking any title among yourselves. This, however, the distinguished gentleman alluded to observed, was his private opinion, and he desired me to call in a few days after. I did so, and he assured me that, having laid the matter before the head of the department, his answer was the same as he had before given me. I wrote to Rome, and it served, no doubt, as the basis of the nomination of bishops in ordinary in North America. I have no doubt the documents referring to this transaction will be found in the Colonial-office.

I have already alluded to Lord Minto's being shown the brief for the hierarchy, printed about two years ago. The circumstance may have escaped his memory, or he may not at the time have attended to it, having more important matters in his mind. But as to the fact that his attention was called to it, and he made no reply. I have no doubt."

Sec. VI.—The Title of Westminster.

The selection of this title for the metropolitan see of the new hierarchy has, I understand, gives great offence. I am sorry for it.

The diocese of Westminster embraces a large district, but Westminster proper consists of two very different parts. One comprises the stately abbey, with its adjacent palaces and its royal parks. To this portion the duties and occupation of the dean and chapter are mainly confined; and they shall range there undisturbed. To the venerable old church I may repair, as I have been wont to do. But perhaps the dean and chapter are not aware that, were I disposed to claim more than the right to tread the Catholic pavement of that noble building, and breathe its air of ancient consecration, another might step in with a prior claim. For successive generations there has existed ever, in the Benedictine order, an abbot of Westminster, the representative, in religious dignity, of those who erected and beautified and governed that church and cloister. Have they ever been disturbed by this "titular?" Have they heard any claim or protest on his part touching their temporalities? Then let them fear no greater aggression now. Like him, I may visit, as I have said, the old abbey, and say a prayer by the shrine of good St. Edward, and meditate on the olden times, when the church filled without a coronation, and multitudes hourly worshipped without a service.

But in their temporal rights, or their quiet possession of any dignity and title, they will not suffer. Whenever I go in, I will pay my entrance-fee, like other liege subjects, and resign myself meekly to the guidance of the beadle, and listen, without rebuke, when he points out to my admiration detestable monuments, or shows me a hole in the wall for a confessional. Yet this splendid monument, its treasures of art, and its fitting endowments, form not the part of Westminster which will concern me. For there is another part which stands in frightful contrast, though in immediate contact, with this magnificence. In ancient times, the existence of an abbey on any spot, with a large staff of clergy and ample revenues, would have sufficed to create around it a little paradise of comfort, cheerfulness, and ease. This, however is not now the case. Close under the Abbey of Westminster there lie concealed labyrinths of lanes and courts, and alleys and slums, nests of ignorance, vice, depravity, and crime, as well as of squalor, wretchedness and disease; whose atmosphere is typhus, whose ventilation is cholera; in which swarms a huge and almost countless population, in great measure, nominally at least, Catholic; haunts of filth, which no sewage committee can reach—dark corners which no lighting board can brighten. This is the part of Westminster which alone I covet, and which I shall be glad to claim and to visit as a blessed pasture in which sheep of holy Church are to be tended, in which a bishop's godly work has to be done, of consoling, converting and preserving.

ADDRESS OF THE CATHOLICS OF ENGLAND TO HER MAJESTY.

An address, which is understood to be from the pen of Cardinal Wiseman—a fact which gives additional importance to it—will lie at the various Catholic churches and chapels to-morrow, and will be otherwise circulated, with the view of obtaining signatures to it, to testify to the loyalty of the Catholics of England to "Her Majesty's Royal person, crown, and dignity:"—

"To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty."

"May it please your Majesty,—We, the undersigned subjects of your Majesty, residing in England, and professing the Roman Catholic religion, beg to approach your Majesty's throne, there to express our sentiments of unimpaired and unalterable fidelity to your Majesty's Royal person, crown and dignity.

"..... In whatever, therefore, our Church has at any time done for establishing its regular system of government amongst its members in this island, we beg most fervently and most sincerely to assure your Majesty that the organization granted to us is entirely ecclesiastical, and its authority purely spiritual. But it leaves untouched every title of your Majesty's rights, authority, power, jurisdiction, and prerogative, as our Sovereign, and as Sovereign over these realms, and does not in the leastwise diminish or impair our profound reverence, our loyalty, fidelity, and attachment to your Majesty's august person and throne; and we humbly assure your Majesty that among your Majesty's subjects there exists no class who more solemnly, more continually, or more fervently pray for the stability of your Majesty's throne, for the preservation of your Majesty's life, and for the prosperity of your Majesty's empire, than the Catholics of England, in whose religion loyalty is a sacred duty, and obedience a Christian virtue.—Atlas for India.

PRIVILEGES OF WEALTH.

(From the London Morning Chronicle, Oct. 24.)

We have been wont to think that the English law of divorce presented the strongest possible example of the superior privileges conferred by wealth in this country. The average cost of dissolving the marriage tie (which can only be effected by statute) ranges from £1,500; and the consequence is, that the rich are in the exclusive enjoyment of a right which should either be denied altogether or placed within the reach of all classes alike. It seems, however, that there is another anomaly in our institutions, of an equally startling and still more mischievous character. At a meeting of "The Inventors' Patent Law Reform League," held at Anderton's Hotel on Tuesday last, Mr J. Ellis, the chairman, asked, "While the capitalist had ample security for his money, and for the interest which it would bear, was it not monstrous that a poor man could not call his invention his own unless he could expend £400 on a patent?" Mr Ellis must mean, not that the ordinary cost of a patent is £400 but that the expenses might be run up to that sum in case of a determined opposition. The process was fully described in the Parliamentary Report of 1829, and it has remained substantially unaltered to this hour.

THE BEGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 3.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1851. [VOL. XX.

DUBLIN REVIEW

ART. XI—The Manual of Devotion By Ambrose Lisle Phillips, Esq. Derby: 1843.

(Continued from our last.)

Ours is perhaps a drier task, more barren and didactic—to explain the theory of the devotion itself, and so remove some prejudices which we know exist against it. And perhaps the season at which we publish this may not be inappropriate for the purpose.

We have already observed, that a great principle of Catholic devotion is the endeavouring to feel, as we should have done amidst the scenes which excite it. The Church in her public offices suggests this idea; she takes us successively to all the great events in the history of our redemption, puts us vividly into them, presents us to the actors, and instils into us their feelings. We need not enter further into this view, because it is probably not new to any of our readers, and it belongs rather to another subject. But we may observe, that the grand charm, nay, the essential power of St. Ignatius's Spiritual Exercises, —that treasure of spirituality, that storehouse of devotion, that none can rival,—consists in the vivid apprehension of the mysteries of God, which the very senses are made, in some sort, to serve. We are told that Goethe trained himself to look at objects with the eye of the great artists; so that in a group he could discern what characteristics Raffaelle, or Guercino, or Michelangelo, would respectively have seized; and a landscape he would contemplate accordingly as Claude, or Salvator Rosa, or Poussin would have done, each drawing from it a different picture, though all true representations. And so surely, if one wished to contemplate the tender scene of our Lord's nativity, one could gaze upon it through the eyes of those poor, but happy shepherds who witnessed it, and try to feel and adore, humbly and lovingly, as they must have done, or one may approach it in the train of the eastern kings, and, with more distant veneration, offer up such gifts as God has granted us. Again, if we go up, in devotion to Calvary, we may place ourselves in many different positions and aspects: we may look upon THE Cross from the gibbet of the penitent thief, and take comfort from words spoken towards it; or we may think of Magdalene, and gaze through her tearful eyes, and feel love, not unmixed with remorse, and perhaps with indignation too, against the authors of all this woe (alas! ourselves); or we may stand with John, love predominating over every passion, noting diligently, with the evangelical eagle's ken, every minute detail of sorrow, and every marvellous mystery of charity. And after the glad third day, when HE is risen again, we may find many ways of taking part in so joyful an event: it may be shame and sorrow-stricken, like poor Peter, or with spouse-like eagerness, as Mary addressed the supposed gardener. But surely there is One, who had a share in these and all other such scenes, through whose eyes we should all be glad to view them, in whose heart we should long to feel them. If in the reflection upon another's soul we wish to view the occurrences—joyful, dolorous, or triumphant—through which mercy and glory were purchased for us, there is one "Mirror of Justice," bright, spotless, untarnished, which reflects them in their full clearness and truth. Shall we not strive to look upon it? If these events called up feelings in every spectator, in one breast alone they had depth, and breadth, and strength enough to do them full justice. Shall we not watch and study its heavings and powerful throes? The maternal heart alone could contain the ocean of bitterness, or the heaven of joy, which these various mysteries were fitted to create. And hence the natural desire of loving souls, to be its associate, and to stand with its venerable possessor in sight of all that She saw, in hearing of all that She heard in observance of all that She laid up in her heart.

Juxta { stamen / Crucem } tecum-stare
Et me tibi sociare
In { fæno / planctu } desidero.*

Now this is, to our minds, exactly the object and practice of the Rosary. The history of our divine Saviour's life may justly be divided into four periods. The first comprises His blessed birth and childhood,—bright and joyful days, no doubt, in spite of the sorrows and trials that mingled with them. The second includes the three years of His public mission. The third is short indeed, but full of mighty events, and crowded with awful, yet most affectionate recollections: it occupies but one day,—a day of sadness and gloom, but a day in which more was done for man, than had been accomplished in four thousand preceding years; the day for which those thousands had run,—of renovation of all nature, more wonderful than that of its first creation. Finally, the fourth is the glorious period which commenced at the Resurrection, and is continuing now, and will continue without end. Of these four periods, unquestionably, there is not one, which is not overflowing both with instruction and with appeals to our affection. But it is clear that the second is more especially devoted to the first, the other three mainly to the last. A triple plea of love is addressed to us by them, a plea which no heart that meditates on them can resist. Now, it is during these especially that we ever have a witness present, who can, better than any one, convey to us the becoming feelings, wherewith we should arrive to contemplate them;—perhaps of our Lord's public life an apostle is the best evidence, on whose mind the wonderful teaching of the Mount, opened gradually, unfolding mysteries never before heard, or whose amazed senses saw the first awakening to consciousness of the rising dead, and the glad bound of the released cripple, and the kindling glow of the cured blind man's countenance. Or we may go into the hearts of those so benefitted, and spiritually applying their case to our own, try to imitate their sentiments. But while a Mother watches over the birthplace of Jesus, or follows His patient footstep through torments to death, or exults in the triumphs which ensue, no inferior companionship, no smaller measure of feeling, no lower standard of appreciation will be preferred.

(To be continued.)

* Stabat Mater gaudiosa," and "Stabat Mater dolorosa."

LOSS AND GAIN.

By Rev. Mr. Newman.—The Result of Private Judgment.

CHAPTER IX.

(Continued from page 349.)

At the time of our narrative, Father Dominico de Matre Dei had become familiar with England; he had had many anxieties here, first from want of friends, then still more from want of men. Year past after year, and, whether fear of the severity of the rule—though that was groundless, for it had been mitigated for England—or the claims of other religious bodies was the cause, his community did not increase, and he was tempted to despond. But every work has its season; and now for some time past that difficulty had been gradually lessening; various zealous men, some of noble birth, others of extensive acquirements, had entered the Congregation; and our friend Willis, who at this time had received the priesthood, was not the last of these accessions, though domiciled at a distance from London. And now the reader knows much more about the Passionists than did Reding at the time that he made his way to their monastery.

The church-door came first, and, as it was open, he entered it. It apparently was filling for service. When he got inside, the person who immediately preceded him dipped his finger into a vessel of water which stood at the entrance, and offered it to Charles. Charles, ignorant what it meant, and awkward from his consciousness of it, did nothing but slink aside, and look for some place of refuge; but the whole space was open, and there seemed no corner to retreat into. Every one, however, seemed about his own business; no one minded him, and so far he felt at his ease. He stood near the door, and began to look about him. A profusion of candles were lighting at the High Altar, which stood in the centre of a semicircular apse. There were side-altars—perhaps half-a-dozen; most of them without lights, but, even here, solitary worshippers might be seen. Over one was a large old Crucifix with a lamp, and this had a succession of visitors. They came each for five minutes, saying some prayers which were attached in a glazed frame to the rail, and passed away. At another, which was in a chapel at the further end of one of the aisles, six long candles were burning, and over it was an image. On looking attentively, Charles made out at last that it was an image of Our Lady, and the Child held out a rosary. Here a congregation had already assembled, or rather was in the middle of some service, to him unknown. It was rapid, alternate, and monotonous; and, as it seemed, interminable. Reding turned his eyes elsewhere. They fell first on one, then on another confessional, round each of which was a little crowd, kneeling, waiting every one his own turn for presenting himself for the sacrament—the men at the one, the women at the other. At the lower end of the church were about three ranges of movable benches with backs and kneelers; the rest of the large space was open, and filled with chairs. The growing object of attention at present was the High Altar; and each person, as he entered, took a chair, and kneeling down behind it, began his prayers. At length the church got very full; rich and poor were mixed together—artisans, well-drest youths, Irish labourers, mothers with two or three children—the only division being that of men from women. A set of boys and children, mixed with some old crones, had got possession of the altar-rail, and were hugging it with restless motions, as if in expectation.

Had Reding continued standing, no one would have noticed him; but he saw the time was come for him to kneel, and accordingly he moved into a corner-seat on the bench nearest him. He had hardly done so, when a procession with lights passed from the sacristy to the altar; something went on which he did not understand, and then suddenly began what, by the Miserere and Ora pro nobis, he perceived to be a litany; a hymn followed. Reding thought he never had been present at worship before, so absorbed was the attention, so intense was the devotion of the congregation. What particularly struck him was, that whereas in the Church of England the clergyman or the organ was every thing and the people nothing, except so far as the clerk is their representative, here it was just reversed. The priest hardly spoke, or at least audibly; but the whole congregation was as though one vast Instrument or Panharmonicon, moving all together, and, what was most remarkable, as if self-moved. They did not seem to require any one to prompt or direct them, though in the Litany the choir took the alternate parts. The words were Latin, but every one seemed to understand them thoroughly, and to be offering up his prayers to the Blessed Trinity, and the Incarnate Saviour, and the great Mother of God, and the glorified Saints, with hearts full in proportion to the energy of the sounds they uttered. There was a little boy by him, and a poor woman, singing at the pitch of their voices. There was no mistaking it, Reding said to himself, "This is a popular religion." He looked around at the building; it was, as we have said, very plain, and bore the marks of being unfinished; but the Living Temple which was manifested in it needed not curious carving or rich marble to complete it, "for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb was the light thereof." "How wonderful," said Charles to himself, "that people call this worship formal and external; it seems to possess all classes, young and old, polished and vulgar, men and women indiscriminately; it is the working of one Spirit in all, making many one."

(To be continued)

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, January 18, 1851

PRIVATE INTERPRETATION OR JUDGMENT; ITS PERNICIOUS EFFECTS UPON CIVIL SOCIETY.

CONVENTION FOR THE RIGHTS OF WOMEN.

In our preceding number, we noticed the Protestant Sect called "White Quakers" and the unhappy results of their assertion of the maxim of private judgment, the grand fundamental principle of the so-called Reformation. It is to no purpose, to reply to our argumentation on this momentous subject, that the best blessings of Religion and of Nature are liable to be abused, and that if we are bound to appreciate duly these benefits, notwithstanding the perverse consequences to which they sometimes give occasion, it is not less our duty, to hold in esteem the principle of private judgment, despite of the aberrations and eccentricities, to which it is liable to conduct its abettors, and to which, in point of fact, has often led even its well meaning upholders

swer to those remarks, we are most willing to admit, that it would be erroneous to censure or undervalue the natural or supernatural gifts of God, merely because through human perversity or infirmity, they happened accidentally and contingently, to give occasion, in some particular instances to abuse. The reason is, that even in the exceptional cases where abuse may occur, Divine Providence always annexes to his institutions in the order of grace or of nature, certain controlling safe guards and guiding axioms, which enable the most simple, to distinguish between the blessing which emanates from God, and the perversity occasioned by man's abuse of that blessing. Thus in the order of Nature, the passions and appetites implanted in the human breast, so long as they are subordinate to the checks imposed upon them, conduce to man's welfare and perfection. Now to induce man to restrain them under a salutary control, not only his own reason, but his knowledge moreover of the terrible consequences, which must result both to himself individually, and oftentimes also to the Community to which he belongs from their unbridled indulgence, must powerfully contribute, to deter him from giving way to such a deordination. When to the salutary check thus imposed, are added the denunciations of revealed Religion against the libertine and the sensualist, it becomes evident, that Providence, when he infused into man the appetites, and passions, which are bound up with his nature, took care at the same time, to affix to them those restraints, which were necessary to render them ancillary to the important end he had in view in annexing them to our Nature.

By a similar mode of reasoning, it may be readily shown in every other department, natural or supernatural, that, whatever abuses may happen, they occur not only, not as a necessary consequence of a Divine ordinance; but in opposition and contradiction to the rules and principles established by God, in order to render that ordinance salutary to mankind.

Not so with the principle of private judgment. For, once, that that principle is recognised in each individual, as the ultimate Supreme Standard of religious truth, whatever be the perverse conclusions to which it may conduct the person who adopts it, these conclusions are, in his regard, the just natural and necessary consequences of the premises, from which they have been deduced by him. Nor does there exist in his regard any extrinsic controlling influence, to save him from being plunged unconsciously and in good faith, into the abyss of the wildest fanaticism and extravagance, so long as the principle we speak of, is for him the sole "ultima ratio," the only "regula regulans regulas," by which his judgment is to be determined. It is doubtless, nevertheless, true, that in some singular instances, a person by means of the precarious and unsafe principle, we treat of, may perchance be guided to a just conclusion on certain questions in religion. But, assuredly, the worth of any standard maxim is to be decided, not by a reference to its rare and contingent results, but to those which arise from it ordinarily and as it were naturally.

Having premised these remarks on the principle of private judgment and on the pernicious effects, its adoption has exercised even upon Civil Society, we beg to direct the notice of our Readers, to the narrative of a late public meeting held in America, for the assertion of the rights of women. We would perhaps have not noticed the strange assemblage now alluded to, were it not, that we were struck with surprise, at the number of Protestant Clergymen who took an active part in the proceedings, and gave weight and importance to a meeting, which would otherwise have appeared simply ridiculous. Doubtless these Reverend Gentlemen assisted on the occasion, because, they conscientiously believed, in virtue of the principle of private judgment, that religion demanded the redress of the alleged grievances, under which the Female sex labour. To effect this redress, the Meeting unanimously resolved, that the existing order of things was a gross violation of the rights of women, who are as fully entitled as men to share with them, in the exercise of all the functions of the state, whether legislative or executive. What then? Is the result of three centuries of Protestantism to be, that its ministers should stand forth unblushingly, in an assembly like that here referred to, for the purpose of abetting an attempt at a revolution in the state of Society, which if effected, would do more towards barbarising and demoralising Christendom, than all the other errors and heresies, that have disturbed order and religion, since the foundation of Christianity. We do not speak thus, because of any fear on our part, that there is any danger, that the change contemplated by the Meeting in question can be accomplished. No, there are too many impediments arising from the present constitution of Society and from the common sense of mankind, to allow such a scheme, to be deemed feasible even for a moment. But impracticable as the general revolution we speak of may be, there may be notwithstanding great injury done in particular localities, both to domestic peace and virtue, by the very agitation of so monstrous a project, and the evil must be greatly aggravated among the congregations of those Protestant Clergymen, who are not ashamed to lend the influence of their talents and ministry to the promotion of so anomalous an enterprise.

Before we dismiss this subject, we desire to lay before our readers an interesting extract from English history, in order to illustrate the versatile nature of the Protestant principle of private judgment. The characters connected with the subjoined narrative are William, Prince of Orange, His wife Mary, Daughter of James the Second, and the time serving, unprincipled Protestant Bishop Burnet. The perusal of the following passage will suffice to show to what very different and opposite purposes and doctrines, the Protestant principle may be made to subserve, according as expediency may demand We shall merely add, that had Burnet been alive, when our present Gracious Sovereign married Prince Albert, and had he dared obtrude on Victoria the doctrinal advice by which he swindled Mary out of her just rights, his fate would have been that of a Traitor. But as Burnet had no ambition for Martyrdom, the probability is, that his doctrine would have accommodated itself to the change of circumstances, and that if it suited his interests he would have been as active in upholding the rights of Queen Victoria, as he was insidious and dishonest in upsetting those of Mary.—

"From Italy he came back to Holland, where he was invited to the court of the prince, and soon acquired a high degree of favour and confidence His knowledge of men and parties rendered his information most valuable; and his character as a theologian enabled him to do to his patron a most acceptable service, by persuading the feeble mind of the princess that the law of England, which, in the event of her succession to the crown, would give her the superiority over her husband, was contrary to the law of God, which made her at all times subject to his authority; and that she was therefore bound in conscience to transfer to the hands of the prince the sovereign power which she might subsequently inherit as her birth right. Under this impression, sending for William, she made to him in the presence of her instructor, a solemn promise, that, whatever authority might subsequently devolve on her, should be possessed and exercised by him: he should bear the sway, she would demean herself as a loving and dutiful wife; nor did she ask any other return for the proof of affection than that, as she practised obedient command, Wives, be obedient to your husbands in all things, so he would practise the other Husbands love your wives By these words she alluded to his amour with Mrs. Villiers, afterwards lady Orkney; but William, though he exacted from her the benefit of the promise, was careful to absolve himself from the obligation of complying with the condition".*—Lingard's History of England.

EXTRAORDINARY PROGRESS OF CATHOLICITY IN NEW SOUTH WALES, AND IN NEW ZEALAND

(Continued from page 7.)

Since the publication of our preceding notice of the subject designated by the heading of this article, we have learned with pleasure from the Rev Mr. Vincent, the Chaplain of Her Catholic Majesty's Corvette the Ferrolana, that that Ship had recently visited Perth in Western Australia, for the purpose of disembarking there, five Spanish Clergymen, destined to serve on the Missions established not far from Perth at Serra and Porto Victoria These Missions have been lately erected by his Holiness into distinct Dioceses to be governed by two Spanish Prelates One of these Prelates journeyed, as a simple Missionary to Spain, a short time ago, and the account he gave of his Mission excited such interest amongst all classes, that liberal donations poured in, liberally from persons of every rank and condition, in support of his Apostolic undertaking This generous co-operation afforded means, to establish the Missions at Serra and Porto Victoria, on a greatly enlarged and more permanent foundation, until at length they reached that maturity, which, in the judgment of the venerable Successor of St. Peter, made it expedient, that they should be raised to the rank of Dioceses, with Bishops who derived their respective titles from each of the above named localities. We have already alluded to the distinguished zeal evinced by the Spanish Government in sending out in H. C. Majesty's Corvette, Ferrolana, five priests, to the aid of the Clergy, who were already labouring to cultivate that remote portion of the Christian vineyard. We are moreover informed, that under the auspices of Her Catholic Majesty of Spain arrangements are being made to provide for the education of the Male and Female Youth of the Districts in question, by sending out qualified Monks and Nuns to establish schools for all classes of the population.

Besides providing thus for the literary instruction of the youth of both sexes, it is we believe, in contemplation to send out also Monks skilled both in the useful trades and in agriculture, in order that together with

* Burnet, iii. 133, 131. "Ever after that, he seemed to trust me entirely" Burnet describes the suggestion as originating with himself, but Dartmouth infers from the next narrative, that he was employed by the prince, 132, note the blessings of knowledge, those not less valuable of industry, may be likewise disseminated among the rising generation. We have often lamented over the disadvantage under which our Catholic Youth in Bengal labour, for want of some such stimulant to labour, as is about to be supplied to those of Western Australia. It is impossible to attach too much importance to the providing of an adequate remedy for the defect. At the present day, when such competition exists among those who have to depend on their own exertions for support, a mere literary education, however excellent unaccompanied by the knowledge of some trade or handicraft, by no means suffices to enable the great majority of our youth to earn a decent competent livelihood.

CONVERSIONS.

To the Editor of the B. C. Herald.

Dear Sir,—As an humble follower, but ardent admirer of that holy Church to whose service your praiseworthy efforts are devoted, I feel much, very much pleasure indeed, in sending you the following Extract from the Ceylon Times of a recent date. It will be found to contain intelligence, at once deeply interesting and highly satisfactory to all Lovers of Truth. Despite of the animosity of our enemies, the idle inventions of the worldly—and the sneers of those in power—the Catholic Church, the Pillar and the ground of Truth, is, we find, maintaining its ancient proud pre-eminence. It is a truly gratifying sight, in times like the present when party zeal, and bigotry under the guise of patriotism, are against us, when infidelity stalks rampant through the Land and an ardour for the weal of the Church is construed into a traitorous intention to subvert the State, to find that some have boldly stepped forward, even from the mid ranks of our adversaries, and hesitate not to acknowledge that they have walked in darkness, and gladly embrace the opportunity of entering into the way of life.

I subscribe myself, dear sir, with heartfelt sympathy and zeal for the good cause.

Yours faithfully,

An Observer.

Calcutta,
14th Jany. 1851.

(Extract from the Ceylon Times.)

Recent Converts from Protestantism to Catholicism:—'We mentioned on Friday our intention of presenting our readers with the most extraordinary and deeply interesting list, and we now venture to redeem our promise;—premising, however, that our readers will find it a most imperfect compilation for neither our limits, the time at our disposal, or the imperfect sources whence we derive our information, namely the Church and State Gazette and the Oxford Herald, are sufficient to exhibit even the most distant approach to anything like completeness, still "the list is full to repletion; and if we take it, as we must for a sign of the times and of the giant strides" of Catholicity among classes whom we vainly thought were steeled, so as to speak, by superior education to the fascinations of that Church, and impervious to its advances.

At a time like the present, when the antagonistic powers of the Christian Churches are likely to be deeply involved on points arising from the interesting Gorham Case, a list like the one we give will be perused with the most vital interest, by all who are aware that the Church is in danger either from the lukewarmness of its Clergy, or the division of its Doctrines. It is beyond all doubt that very many of the most eminent Divines are preparing for a change, the result of which will tend to strengthen enormously the dissenting ranks of the Protestant Church by the withdrawal of hosts who already tremble at the tenets now propounded by many who yet nominally belong to the ranks of the Protestant Clergy.

Rev. W. Ward, M. A. Oxford, Prebendary of Litchfield.

Do, A. Robertson, J. D. Dalgairns, Esq, M. A. Exeter College.

J. King, Esq., Commoner, Exeter College.

Do., F. S. Bowles, M. A., do.

Do. W. Lockhart, Esq., Commoner do.

Do., E Estcourt, M. A, do.

Do., G. Talbot, M. A., Balial College.

Do., M. Cates, M. A., do.

Do., W. G. Ward, M. A., Fellow do.

Do., Tickell, Esq., M A, do.

Do, S. Murray, Esq., B. A., late M. P. for Bucks, of Christ Church College.

Do., G. Penny, M. A., do.

Do, J. Douglas, Commoner do.

Do., A. St. John, M. A., do.

Do., D. Parsons, M. A., Oriel College.

Do., B. Bridges, M. A, do.

Do., J. H. Newman, M, A., do.

Do., A. J. Christie, Esq., M. A., Fellow, do.

Do., W. Sibthorp, M. A., Fellow, Magdalene.

Do., B. Smith, M. A., Fellow do.

Do., W. H. Staunton, B. A., Brazennose College.

Do., John Walker, M. A., do.
Do., J. C. Robertson.
Do., A. Senget, M. A., Hebrew Lecturer of Worcester College.
Do., P. Renouf, Esq., Bible Clerk, Pembroke College.
Do., J. Grant, Esq., Commoner St. John's College.
Do., J. Reeve, Aston Keyes, Cirencester.
Mr. and Mrs. Woodmason and family, Littlemore.
Rev. R. Neame, M. A., Oriel College.
Do., T. Meyrick, M. A., Corpus Christe College.
Do., J. Montgomery, Trinity College, Dublin.
Do., C. Smith, Cambridge.
Do., J. Barton, do.
Do., J. Badden.
Do., J. Wackerbath.
Do., W. F. Wingfield, M. A., Christ's College.
Do., C. H. Celleyres, M. A., do., and Lecturer Curate St. Mary Mag Oxford.
Do., F. Oakely, M. A., Fellow Balicol College.
The Ladies Acheson, daughters of the Earl of Gosford.
The Family of Ruscomb Pole, Esq., of Bridgewater.
Rev. W. Copeland, B. D., Trinity College.
Miss Gladstone.
Do., Fanny Bowles.
G. Tickell, Esq.
F. Bridges, Esq.
M. Brown, Esq.
Miss Harriet Beech.
Mrs. W. Wingfield.
Do., W. G. Ward.
Do., Caleroft.
Rev. Austin Caffin, M. A.
Do., C. H. Collinger.
Do., E. G. Brown, Curate of Baisdaley, Suffolk.
T. H[illegible], Esq., Barrister at Law.
Rev. Glennie.
Do., Marshall.
Do., Coop.
—— Wells, Esq., Trinity College, Cambridge.
The Chaplain of the Bishop of London.
Do., Capes, Esq.
Mrs. England.
Rev. W. Faber, University College.
Do., W. U. Richards, M. A., Exeter College.
Do., J. Calman, B. A., Worcester College.
F. Earl Welby, M. A., Fellow, Magdalen College.
The Misses Poell, Bridgewater.
Rev. J. S. Northcote and Lady.
Robert Beverly Tillotsen, Esq.
Mrs S Selena Cavendish, relative of the Duke of Devonshire at Rome.
Rev. Edward Ballard, M. A., of Wodham College, Oxford.
Mr. Geo. F. Balland, of Worchester College, Oxford.
Do. Charles, B. Garside, M. A. Curate of Margaret street Chapel, London.
Do. G. Carendish, Rector of little Caleraton, Rutland.
The Hon. Capt. Ch. Pakenham of Guards.
Miss Peel, niece of Hon. Sir R. Peel, M. A.
Viscount Fielding.
Lady Fielding.
—— Wilberforce, Esq.

In the Apostolic Vicariate of Colombo (Southern of Ceylon) the adults received into the Catholic Church from Aug. 1849, to 1850, are,—from Idolatry 282.—from the reformed Religions 1247. Total 1529, during the year.

Selections.

THE LORETTO INSTITUTION, CALCUTTA.

Non meus est sermo. I tell the tale merely as I heard it told.

To the Editor of the Englishman.

Sir,—Your correspondent, No Puffer, seems much dissatisfied with my letter of the 23d ult., on the Loretto Institution. His displeasure appears to arise, chiefly from that institution being described as, beyond comparison, the first or best Female School in Calcutta. I can sincerely state, that whilst I proposed to pay to the Loretto Seminary what I deemed the just tribute of my approval, I had not the most remote intention of disparaging the other Female Schools of this city. If, in offering my humble meed of praise to so praiseworthy an establishment, I made use of a phrase which would appear to imply such disparagement, I merely did so because such language seemed to be perfectly warranted by the sentiments expressed in a late number of the Calcutta Review, a publication every one knows not disposed to advocate the cause of Catholicity in any of its relations, either religious or educational. But, Mr. Editor, the Calcutta Review is not the only Protestant authority on the great excellence of the Loretto Seminary. Hear the sentiments of a distinguished individual, no less a personage than Lord Elphinstone, on the merits of the religious Ladies of Loretto House. "I cannot conclude (observes His Lordship in his reply to an address presented to him by a deputation of Catholic gentlemen) without expressing my high admiration of the many works of charity and religion which have been established in this great city under the auspices of the most Rev.

the Vicar Apostolic. The same good order, and regularity, and propriety was visible in all the Institutions I visited, whether intended for the education of the affluent, or the succour of the poor and needy. The exertions of the excellent Ladies of the Loretto Institution are beyond my praise, and the good they have effected is most gratifying to me."

Again, hear the testimony of the Right Honourable Lord Ellenborough, in a visit he paid to Loretto Convent in the year 1843. An address was then presented to him by the Lady Superioress on the part of the community and young pupils of the establishment, of which the following is a part:—"We humbly hope that the course of instruction in our Seminary, and the arrangements adopted in it, will be found to deserve your Lordship's high approbation; and with the earnest prayer that your Lordship's administration may augment the glory of the British Empire, and the lustre of your fame, we beg with profound respect to remain your most obedient servants" &c. &c.—I say, in reply to the foregoing address, His Lordship was pleased to remark "that it would ever afford him sincere pleasure indeed to co-operate by every means in his power, towards the rising welfare of so laudable an Institution; for that its arrangements were so excellent as not to be surpassed in Calcutta." Fearing, Mr. Editor, to trespass any longer on your valuable time and space, and hoping that in justice you will give this letter early insertion in your highly talented journal.

I remain, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

PUBLICOLA.

ITALY.

ALLOCUTION.

OF OUR MOST HOLY LORD, PIUS IX., BY DIVINE PROVIDENCE POPE, HELD IN THE SECRET CONSISTORY, NOV 1. MDCCCL.

Venerable Brothers—In the consistorial allocution which we addressed to you on the 13th day of the kalends of June in this year, we did not neglect to mention in a few words, and to deplore the things recently done and decreed against the rights of the Church in the state of our very dear son in Christ, the King of Sardinia. We at the same time declared our intention of discoursing further to you on this subject at a more favourable opportunity. We were in hopes that in the interval some remedy would be brought forward for the harm done to the Church in that country, and that we might have announced it to you. But because the event is very far from having answered our expectation, we have thought it at last our duty, whilst calling to mind, in summary terms, the principles of the conduct which we have followed in this affair from its commencement, to express our complaints and serious reclamations against all the things which, whether on the continent or in the maritime possessions of the above mentioned power, have been resolved or done to the great damage of the Church.

You know, venerable brothers, the solemn convention negociated on the 27th of March, 1841, between the commissioners of the Holy See and the King; a convention which was ratified and confirmed without delay by Gregory XVI., of venerable memory, our predecessor, and Charles Albert, of happy memory, King of Sardina; you are aware that the object of that convention was to confine within narrower limits the ecclesiastical immunities in force from time immemorial in the kingdom by the authority of the Sacred Canons, the which immunities had been already in some part diminished by treaties consented to at more recent periods by the condescension of the Sovereign Pontiffs. Many people in the Subalpine provinces were not a little astonished at the facility with which our predecessors made what they called too great concessions in this affair; and the Royal Government itself abstained for several years to enforce the clauses of this agreement. However, in 1848, the same Government asked us for a new convention, and on the 14th September of that year the Royal Commissioner gave to our Envoy the letters in which a project of convention was set forth in certain clauses which were to be preceded by a preamble of no mean importance. Our commissioner easily saw that the demand could in nowise be acceded to, either in its extent or its terms; nay, that there was no question made in the demand about negociating any mutual concession, inasmuch as the Sardinian Government did not propose anything in which the shadow of an obligation to the Church was contracted. That is the reason why our commissioner proposed a new set of articles, as much as possible in accord with those of the Sardinian Government, but on a better basis. To these articles he added others to the effect that the Church should, at a time when it was about to lose every civil immunity, receive as compensation the faculty of exercising more freely its authority over what it preserved. The Royal Commissioner then declared that he would refer to his Government for fresh instructions, in order that he might more fully reply to the proposals that were made to him. We are unaware whether instructions of the nature stated have ever been sent to Rome, but we may be allowed to conjecture that the Royal Government adjourned the question on account of the well-known calamities which fell in the meanwhile upon all Italy, and which forced us to retire for a time from all the land subject to our temporal powers. Peace having re-appeared whilst we were awaiting near Naples an opportunity to return to Rome, we receive there a new extraordinary envoy, who was charged among other things with resuming the negociations on the subject of the convention. However, after concluding other business, he informed us that he had been recalled by the Royal Government, and retired without having touched the principal question. Consequently, it was but natural for us to hope that the Ministers of the King had judged it opportune to postpone the negociation to a more favourable period—such, for instance, as our return to Rome.

A few months later, however, we learned that the royal ministry had presented to the Chambers of the kingdom a new law for the total abolition of all immunities belonging to the Priests and churches, for the attribution to secular tribunals of causes concerning the nomination to Ecclesiastical benefices, and other points to be decided either then or later, but all against the rights of the Church, and to the prejudice of religious interests.

As soon as we had cognizance of this law, we ordered a protest to be entered against it either by our Cardinal pro-Secretary of State, or our Apostolic nuncio residing at the Court of Turin. Their protest remaining unattended to, it has been necessary to protest against the above-mentioned innovations, approved by the Chambers, and immediately sanctioned by royal authority. The most deplorable portion of this affair is not only the violation of the holiest rights of the Church, consecrated by the canons, and in vigour for centuries past; but that people had the misfortune to hear several of the deputies and senators of the kingdom, who took part in the deliberations of their Chambers, and whose sentiment has triumphed, arrogate to themselves and to the lay power the faculty of dissolving the conventions made with the Apostolic See without the consent of the latter, or rather in defiance of its complaints, and to declare them of no effect.

You, venerable brothers, will be able to comprehend the importance of these acts; you will see what would become of holy things if the rights of the Church and the canons should come to be despised, if no account were to be taken of long possessions, and if no force were recognised in agreement legally made between the civil power and the Holy See. You are well aware that it is of great importance not only to religion, but also to civil order, and to public and private interests, that Ecclesiastical conventions should be maintained sacred and inviolable, for their worth and validity once disowned, the obligation of public and private pacts would vanish also.

To the outrages offered to the Church and the Holy See by the new laws many others have been added. The civil judges and the royal functionaries have brought our two venerable brothers, the Archbishops of Sassari and of Turin, into judgment. The first they retained a prisoner in his house; the second they carried by armed force into the citadel of the town, and finally, solely because they remained faithful to their pastoral duty—because they had given to their Curés instructions on the manner of discharging their duty before God in the presence of the new law, were condemned to civil punishment. It is thus that the civil authority has arrogated to itself the right of pronouncing upon the measures which the Pastors of the Church have been bound to take for the direction of consciences.

These outrages were soon after succeeded by one still more grave, when a noble personage, known to all as having been one of the promoters of that very unjust law above mentioned, and who had refused to acknowledge his fault therein, was judged by the authority of the Archbishop of Turin unworthy to partake of the Holy Sacrament. On that occasion the Archbishop himself was dragged from his Church by the military force, and thrown into a fortress. The Curé of the religious congregation of Servites, of the Blessed Holy Virgin Mary, who had obeyed him, according to his duty, was, with all his religious brethren, violently expelled from the convent of Turin, and transported elsewhere, as if it belonged to the lay power to decide concerning the administration of the divine sacraments, and the dispensations necessary to receive them!

But this was not all. This same question of the administration of the Sacraments, and another concerning the new instructions for the direction of consciences given by the said Archbishop, and in consequence of our orders, have been referred to the tribunal of appeal at Turin, which decreed on the 25th of September the exile of the Archbishop from the royal State, and the sequestration of all his goods. On the 21st of the same month the Court of Appeal passed a similar sentence on our venerable brother the Archbishop of Cagliari. It was made a crime that he declared in general terms, and without naming any one, that Ecclesiastical censures had been incurred ipso facto by those who had violated the immunity of the Episcopal dwelling, and dared to force their way to the Episcopal archives. In virtue of these decrees, those Prelates were deprived of the possession and administration of the temporal resources and property of their dioceses, and one has been compelled to take refuge in France, the other in our city.

(To be continued.)

REVIEW.

A Letter to the Rev. Dr. Pusey, on his practice of receiving persons in auricular Confession. By W. Maskell, M.A. London: Pickering.

We owe an apology to our readers for not having introduced this important pamphlet earlier before their notice. It is one of those extremely interesting fragments of the history of the Puseyite controversy which are from time to time coming to the light, and which, we must confess, do not heighten our opinion of either Dr. Pusey's position, his goodness, or his plain-dealing. It appears that Mr. Maskell, Mr. Allies, and Mr. Dodsworth had become worn out with the shuffling, the solemn "reserve" observed on certain very important questions by the self constituted prophet, who, from the cloisters of Christ Church, claims jurisdiction over every diocese of England. They wished, once for all, to get him, if possible, to make a plain answer to a plain question. Here was their difficulty, very simply stated, and, we may be allowed to add, with a clearness that showed their conscientiousness in great contrast to the well-known style of their then master:—

Ascension Day, 1850.

Dear Dr. Pusey—We wish to put to you a question on a point nearly concerning our own peace of mind, and that of others. It is this—What authority is there for supposing that the acts of a Priest are valid who hears confessions and gives absolutions, in mere virtue of his orders, without ordinary or delegated jurisdiction from his Bishop?

We believe it to be the undisputed law of the Church that acts flowing through order, though done wrongly and illicitly, are yet, when done, valid; the reason of which is, that the power of order, being given by consecration and indelible, cannot be taken away; but that acts flowing from jurisdiction, if done upon those over whom the doer has no jurisdiction, are absolutely invalid and null; the reason of which is, that jurisdiction being a relation of command between a superior and a subject, one who has no subject can have no jurisdiction, and accordingly cannot exercise a power which he has not received.

But the act of remitting sin, upon confession, is an act not only of order, but of jurisdiction. That it is an act of order, nobody doubts, and therefore proof is needless; that it is likewise an act of jurisdiction is proved by two considerations—first, it is a judicial power, and all judgment, to be valid, requires jurisdiction; and, secondly, it is not only a power of remitting, but also of binding, and none can bind one who is not his subject.—(Pp. 8. 9.)

* * * *

It would certainly follow from all this, as it seems to us, that the authority which for some time past has been exercised by some among us, and especially by yourself, not only in our own dioceses, but in other dioceses—often without the knowledge, and probably (were it known) it would be against the consent, of both the Parish Priest and Bishop—has not been based upon true and sufficient foundation: nay, more, has been (however ignorantly) in opposition to Catholic rules from the first ages to the present time.

And further—a point to which we allude with reluctance and sorrow—it would follow likewise that the vast majority of those persons, to whom you and others have given absolution in this manner, are still, so far as the effect of any such absolution is concerned, under the chain of their sins, because they have not made confessions to Priests who had duly received power to absolve them.

Mr. Maskell indignantly repeats the inquiry, after the correspondence had terminated:—

Whence and from whom did you, claiming to be an ordained Priest, derive your power and authority to receive in confession all who might come to you? in other words who gave you faculties to receive confessions anywhere and everywhere? If Ecclesiastical discipline be not a thing of words; if the Church's unchanging interpretation of the power which she gives her Priests be not vanity and error; if the valid exercise of the power of the keys by inferior ministers flows from and is limited by the higher authority, in its various ranks, of the Episcopate; then, I repeat this question, "Who gave you faculties?" is very carefully to be considered, not only by the unlearned, who, in simple confidence, are led to come to you, but by yourself, who have not feared, upon your own sole responsibility, to occupy the awful tribunal of penance.—(P. 17.)

Doctor Pusey, so far as we can gather from the pamphlet (for Mr. Maskell evidently spares him), absolutely resented this interrogation as a sort of interference with him personally, as if the inquirers had been guilty of a great piece of presumption in daring to ask him such questions, any more than any body else. It is only since the conversion of two of the gentlemen in question that he has been driven to explain himself, or pretend to explain himself, in the pamphlet to which the present is a reply.

He first quarrels with Mr. Dodsworth for having said that he (Dr. Pusey) had "enjoined" auricular "confession." What will the reader think of the following disclosure?—

Mr. Dodsworth knew also, as I know, that to say merely that you have encouraged it, would fall as far short of what your actual practice is, as the word enjoin, in the sense of compelling, would exceed it. He knew that you have done more than encouraged confession in very many cases: that you have warned people of the danger of deferring it, have insisted on it as the only remedy, have pointed out the inevitable dangers of neglect of it, and have promised the highest blessings in the observance, until you had brought penitents in fear and trembling upon their knees before you.—(P. 18.)

Or of the following?—

Do you really mean to say, that you know any one single Bishop of the English Church who would not strongly disapprove of it? Have you ever ventured to ask the Bishop of London? or your own Bishop, the Bishop of Oxford? or, again, the Bishop of Exeter? and if you did speak or write upon this subject to a Bishop, was it in the guarded language of your pamphlet?

With respect to the last of these, I do not see why I should hesitate to speak; and to you there are especial reasons why I should speak, of what the Bishop of Exeter thinks should be the rule in such matters in his diocese. I do not see (I say) why I should hesitate to tell you that, very lately, in a somewhat public and judicial way, the Bishop of Exeter has condemned, even by Curates licensed in his own diocese, the practice of receiving persons in auricular confession, except in order to quiet their consciences before admission to Communion. Even in this exceptional case, the Bishop of Exeter would repudiate (I think) with horror, the system of particular and detailed inquiry into every circumstance of sin, which, in correct imitation of the Roman Catholic rules, you do not fail to press. Of such a system, before giving absolution, "God forbid," are his Lordship's words, "that we do so!"

What, then, let me ask, do you conceive that the Bishop of Exeter would say, of persons secretly received against the known will of their parents, of confessions heard in the houses of common friends, or of clandestine correspondence to arrange meetings, under initials, or in envelopes addressed to other persons? and, more than this, when such confessions are recommended and urged as a part of the spiritual life, and among other religious duties; not in order to quiet the conscience before receiving the Communion.

Think not that I write all this to give you unnecessary pain: think not that I write it without a feeling of deep pain and sorrow in my own heart. But there is something which tells me that, on behalf of thousands, this matter should now be brought before the world plainly, honestly, and fully.

I know how heavily the enforced mystery and secret correspondence regarding confessions, in your Communion, has weighed down the minds of many to whom you and others have "ministered:" I know how bitterly it has eaten, even as a canker, into their very souls: I know how utterly the specious arguments which you have urged, have failed to remove their burning sense of shame and of deceitfulness. And, for their sakes, forgetting both myself and you, I speak so plainly as I have.—(Pp. 20, 21.)

Most distressing, surely, is such a revelation of blinded delusion, or grievous simplicity, on the part of the poor souls who have fallen into the hands of such a guide, and still more distressing the quiet, unanswerable self-deceit with which Dr. Pusey assumes to himself this authority. He rests it all on a single passage in the Communion Service of the Common Prayer-Book, that, namely, where the Minister directs any persons disturbed in mind to come "to me, or to some other discreet and learned Minister of God's Word, and open his grief." He assumes, and repeats over and over, as if repetition constituted a formula of arguments, that when the Church of England established this Rubric, she meant the people to understand they might go to anybody they pleased, whether they had faculties or not to hear confession, and that, consequently, it makes no matter whether he has authority from his Bishop to hear confessions or not. But he avows his belief that he ought to take this permission for granted. He, Dr. Pusey, maintains the Church cannot mean anything else but what he says she does; therefore the Bishops ought to think with him; therefore they do think with him; therefore he "doubts not" that this was the reason why those who have set up confessionals in the Anglican Church never applied to the Bishops for permission. For himself, he knows of no reason, in any case where he has heard confessions, that the Parish Priest of the penitent would have objected to it! A man in this position will be found out at last. Even the most weak-minded of his followers will at last see that a view is not necessarily true merely because Dr. Pusey says it, or that he has a right to exercise the office of a Confessor when he is totally destitute of jurisdiction, and dare not say that he has the formal permission of his so-called Bishop to hear confessions. He disguises the whole question by words, such as never, or scarcely ever, using the words "auricular confession," but always "opening their griefs," or some such ambages, of a kind that makes his the most uncomfortable and worthless reasoning of any writer we know. Dr. Pusey has, however, met in Mr. Maskell with a reasoner who has had the honesty to see through and through such treachery, and to stare it calmly. The mere statement is enough, and will do its work, we have no doubt, very rapidly. We earnestly recommend the whole pamphlet to the attention of our readers, as one, to a certain extent, unique in the controversy.

[Tablet.]

Lights and Shades of Ireland. In Three Parts. By Asenath Nicholson, of New York. London: Gilpin; Dublin: Gilpin.

Consider, too, the following specimens of charity on the part of a set of men whom the strong arm of the law supports in their assumed position of heaven-sent guides to the people of Ireland:—

Those full-fed, Government paid Clergymen, who had learned the law of love through her own bread and wine exclusively, and whose jaundiced eyes saw dark and foul spots on all surplices but her own, would be quick to discern that the "curse causeless does not come;" and that as the Roman Catholics embodied the majority of the sufferers in Ireland, and the Roman Catholics were mostly fed on potatoes, and as God had blasted these potatoes, therefore they ought in humble acquiescence to say, "Amen!" while the smoke of this torment was ascending, if not be willing co-workers with God in the infliction of the punishment. When such did give what was entrusted to their hands, it was not always given "with cheerfulness," or without what they thought a merited rebuke. "Don't you see now," said a pert wife of a Curate of this class, "don't you see what your idolatry has brought upon you," handing a starving woman tauntingly a little food; "you've been told that something dreadful would come upon you long before, but you would not believe; now are you ready to come out of that Church? "How?" said a bystander, "could you speak so unkindly to that poor supplicant at your door; should you like the same treatment under the same circumstances?" "I should deserve it: and beside, how could I see her die under those awful delusions?" Would it not be better to show her Christ, and try to direct her to Him?" "Christ! how can she understand anything of Him, while in that Church?"

This is not a fac-simile of all in the Government Church, neither is it an insolated case. Another instance only shall be named, and it is named as an illustration of the spirit that was too much in exercise there, and how it acted upon the sufferers:—

A poor man, with a numerous family, applied to a Rector of the Established Church for a portion of the donations committed to his care for the parish. "Where do you go to church?" was the question. "I am a Catholic," the man answered. "Ah, yes, give your soul to the Priest, and come here for me to feed your body; go back, and get your bread where you get your teaching." "This will learn 'em," said the exulting sexton of the church, who related the incident, "this will learn 'em where they are." The poor man went away without relief, though he belonged to the parish, and had a claim. Turning them over to the Priests was the worst part of the spirit; for the Priests, in the first place, were not a Government-paid people, and in the next, they had at that time no donations entrusted to them; and to tantalise a hungry man with that retort, was like hanging him in gibbets, and then telling him to eat bread.

Such treatment was calculated not only to drive the poor to all sorts of intrigue, but to make them hate still more a religion that they always supposed to be false. The question which the Quaker put to the Rector could well apply here, when he remarked that no good would be done to the Papists in Ireland while they rejected the Bible—"What good, friend, has thy Bible done thee?"—(Pp. 408, 409.)

And, to conclude the whole, we give the following from "the general summing up, and last look at Ireland":—

The old hackneyed story of Popery in Ireland has been so turned and twisted, that every side has been seen—nothing new can be said about it. There it stands, its principles are well known, its superstitions and persecuting character, its idolatries, and all its trimmings and trappings are the same in essence as when Queen Elizabeth put her anathemas forth against its creeds and practices; and with all her errors she maintains a few principles and practices which would be well for her more Bible neighbours to imitate. Her great ones are more accessible; the poor of their own class, or of any other, are not kept at such an awful distance; the stranger is seldom frowned coolly from their door; to them there appears to be a sacredness in the very word, with which they would not trifle; the question is not, is he or she "respectable," but a stranger; if so, then hospitality must be used without grudging. In the mountains, and sea coast parts, it has ever been the custom to set the cabin door open at night, and keep up a fire on the hearth, that the way-faring man, and the lone stranger, should he be benighted, could see by the light that there is a welcome for him, and if they have but one bed, the family get up and give it to the stranger, sitting up, and having the fire kept bright through the night. This has been done for me, without knowing or asking whether I was Turk or Christians; and were I again to walk over that country and be out at nightfall in storm and peril, as has been my lot, and come in sight of two castle-towers, one a Roman and the other a Protestant owner; and were the former a mile beyond, my difficult way would be made to that, knowing that when the porter should tell the master a stranger was at the gate, he would say: "Welcome the stranger in for the night, or from the storm." The Protestant might do the same, but there would be a doubt. His answer would probably be: "A stranger!—How comes a stranger, here at this late hour? Tell him we do not admit persons into our house unless we know them." Christian reader, this is one strong reason why you should admit them, because you do not know them. The Catholics are much more humble in their demeanour, and certainly much more hospitable and obliging in all respects, as a people. They are more self-denying, will sacrifice their own comforts for the afflicted more readily, they will attend their places of worship, clothed or unclothed, and beggars take as high a place often in the chapel as the rich man; the "gold ring and costly apparel" is not honoured here, as in the Protestant and Dissenting Churches," and it is remarked that when any turn to the Protestant Faith, they never lose that condescension, nor put on those pretences of worldly respectability, as their Protestant brethren do.—(Pp. 437, 438.)—Tablet.

AMERICAN LADIES AND THEIR "RIGHTS."

(From the Weekly News, Nov. 16.)

The New York Tribune of the 29th ult has a serious and approving report, extending over ten closely-printed columns, of a "Woman's Rights Convention," which has just been held at Worcester, Massachusetts. The proceedings are such as would have made the heart of Mary Wollstonecraft leap with joy, and obtained a dignified nod of approbation from Aspasia herself. The sittings were attended by upwards of a thousand persons, of whom the great majority were women, but not even the presence of such men as Mr. W. Lloyd Garrison, Frederick Douglass, Wendel Phillips, and the nephew and biographer of Dr. Channing, can turn aside the shafts of ridicule. The whole affair appears ridiculous to an English reader, and he congratulates himself that, in this country, there are none who will consent thus—

"To leap the rotten pales of prejudice,
Disyoke their necks from custom, and assert
None Lordlier than themselves but that which made Woman and man."

The chair was taken by Mrs. Paulina Wright Davis, whose opening address was of considerable length. Though indignant at the "Wrongs" to which her sex are subject, she could not conceal the fact that she possesses a heart of pity. "Let us not complain," she said, "that the hardier sex overvalue the force which heretofore has figured most in the world's affairs. 'They know not what they do,' is the apology that crucified womanhood must concede in justice and pity to the wrong doers."

Mrs. Ernestine Rose, of New York, "spoke with great eloquence." "Why," she asked "in the name of common sense, is woman not equal before the law? during her minority she is the property of her parent, and when she attains her majority, and enters the relation of marriage, she is transferred from the parent to the husband. When a father and mother have a son born to them, what do they ask themselves? They sit down and consult together about his education; how he shall be trained and fitted for usefulness in life. If they have a daughter what do they ask? nothing. Girls are educated with one single aim, she felt ashamed to say it. And what is that aim? It is to catch a husband." This unkind cut was, we are sorry to perceive, greatly approved of by the Convention. The same lady made another hit which gave general delight. She alluded to the Pilgrim Fathers, and the pride and reverence with which they were often referred to. "But," said she, "who has heard of the Pilgrim Mothers? Did they not endure as many perils, and encounter as many hardships, and do as much to form and fashion the institutions of New England, as the Pilgrim Fathers? Yet they are hardly remembered."

The Rev. W. Channing inquired why there should not be "an order of women, composed of those who do not choose to encumber themselves with the ties of marriage? and why might they not plant themselves on a domain, invest their property, and engage in such industrial operations as might suit their capacities and tastes; and here would be a place, where women, driven from the family circle, by the tyranny of a husband, a brother, son, might find a home, and a place for the employment of her powers." This is a direct plagiary from Tenyson's "Princess." The suggestion originated with the imperious Lady Blanche, and not Mr. Channing.

Mrs. Lucretia Mott (a Quakeress) made some remarks upon an old grievance, viz., the promise of the woman, in the marriage ceremony, to love, honour, and obey. She said these words were put into the woman's mouth by the priest, or rather repeated by the priest, and not the woman, though she reluctantly answers "Yes." A slight hubbub was caused by some pertinent suggestions of a Mrs. Ball. The unequal compensation of woman for her labour, compared with man, had been referred to. It had been said, that a washerwoman was entitled to as much compensation for her day's work as a wood-sawyer. Mrs. Ball supposed the case of a wood-sawyer's wife unable by sickness, or the care of children to do her work. It would cost her husband all his wages to procure a woman to do her work. How would the husband buy bread for his children? A gentleman was left to answer this, which he did by simply substituting another supposition. "Suppose the wood sawyer is taking sick, and the wife's earnings are only a half or a third as much as a man's, how is the family to be supported?" This was in common parlance a "poser" and Mrs. Ball offered no more suggestions. Mrs. Lucy Stone revealed quite a new iniquity for which men have to answer. How patient and enduring must the dear creatures have been to have concealed the indignation it excites, for so long a time! "We want," she said, "to be something more than the appendages of society. We want that woman should attain the development of her nature and womanhood? we want that when she dies, it may not be written on her grave-stone that she was the 'relict' of somebody"—(great applause). Of all the speakers, Mrs. Mott was the most severe on the tyranny of men, with her evidently,—

"Knaves are men,
That lute and flute of fantastic tenderness,
And dress the victim to the offering up,
And paint the gates of hell with Paradise,
And play the slave to gain the tyranny."

She said "They must mourn over the admitted inferiority of woman; over her slavish subjection to the evil customs and prejudices of society. It was not strange, after so long a period of degradation, she should be enervated and contented with her inferior position." She added, with unpleasant significance, that she "desired that we might speak with the earnestness and severity of truth with an earnestness and severity that should make the ears of man tingle for the degraded position in which he has kept woman during so many ages."

The object which the members of the Convention are pledged to obtain are expressed in the following resolutions:—

"1. Education, in Primary and High Schools Universities, Medical, Legal, and Theological Institutions, as comprehensive and exact as their abilities prompt them to seek and their capabilities fit them to receive. 2. Partnership in the labours and gains risks and remunerations, of productive industry, with which such limits as are assigned by taste, intuitive judgment, or their measure of spiritual and physical vigour, as tested by requirement. 3. A coequal share in the formation and administration of laws—Municipal, State and National, through Legislative Assemblies Courts and executive offices. 4. Such Social and Spiritual Union as will enable them to be the Guardians of pure and honourable manners—a high Court of Appeal, in cases of outrage, which cannot be, and are not touched by Civil and Ecclesiastical organisations, as at present existing, and a medium of expressing the highest moral and spiritual views of Justice, dictated by Human Conscience and sanctioned by Holy Inspirations."

The appointment of Committees, &c., closed the business of the Convention.

We ought not to omit the fact, that the President during one of the sittings, read a poem from "a woman of the nineteenth century, whose heart had been stirred by the Convention." We must unfortunately be content with quoting but two of the verses:—

"A Woman's Right Convention!
Deny if every man!
Then right the evil done her,
That instant if ye can.

"A Woman's Right convention!
'Is not laid low in dust,
A better time is coming,
Because it will and must!'!!

THE PROTESTANT COMMOTION.—THE CARDINAL ARCHBISHOP OF WESTMINSTER.

The whole Protestant press, English and Irish, is in commotion about two acts with which they have no more to do than they have with the contents of any honest gentleman's private closet, strong-box, pantry, or cellar—we mean, of course, the new Archbishobric of Westminster, and the projected Catholic University. We wish we had time to analyse all the absurd things that have been said on these two subjects, because such an analysis might really give a good deal of amusement to any reader who chanced to be 'hipped,' and required some extravagant absurdity to make him laugh; but, unhappily, on the one subject almost our whole available space is occupied by the solemn Encyclical which announces the entire Ecclesiastical arrangement of which the Archbishopric of Westminster forms a part; and, on the other, we think it more profitable to fix the attention of our readers on the business of the University, than on the infinite variety of nonsense that has been written about it. We pity those writers who have been racking their brains for precedents by which to try and condemn or acquit the Supreme Pontiff of presumption, impertinence, spite, insanity, and we know not how many more delicate accusations, so freely brought against his Holiness on the score of Cardinal Wiseman's promotion to the See of Westminster. If it were worth while to argue the question seriously, in order to prove that what has been done is nothing more than in the ordinary course of business, we would content ourselves with one instance from the primitive Church, and a handful from the present century. In our own colonies, and within a very few years, the Holy See has erected Dioceses in Upper Canada, at Kingston and Toronto; in Australia, at Sydney, Hobarton, Adelaide, Perth, and Port Philip. In the Anglo-Saxon Republic of America, the Holy See has erected, within sixty years, no less than twenty-eight dioceses, and has inflicted on New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Charleston, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Buffalo, the very honour with which he now crowns the riper maturity of Westminster and Birmingham. Archbishop Polding really and truly takes his ecclesiastical title from the good city of Sydney; Bishop Wilson from that of Hobarton; Bishop Hughes from that of New York. It is now, we believe, two and forty years since that bishopric was inaugurated—no previous dispute with the Foreign Office of the United States having led the way. Four years ago two other bishoprics were founded in the same state, there being at that time profound peace in the international relations between Rome and Washington; and, for our parts, we should not be at all surprised if—the same peace prevailing—we were to see the Bishop of New York an archbishop, and seven or eight suffragan bishops exercising episcopal jurisdiction under him in that extensive territory. So that contemporary precedents of a most innocent character are to be had in abundance. The elder instance to which we referred is one which, from the similarity of some of the circumstance, the Holy Father, perhaps, had in his mind in projecting the present arrangement. We think it not improbable the Pope reflected that, as his own glorious predecessor, St. Peter, had not waited for the leave of Caligula or Claudius to establish an archbishopric and something more in Rome, so it was not—as far as precedents go—absolutely necessary for him to wait for the leave of Palmerston or Russell to found an archbishopric in Westminster. As to the facts, it is a matter of newspaper notoriety that, long before Lord Minto's mission was dreamed of—namely, in the autumn of 1847—the precise arrangement now in the course of completion was publicly announced, Archbishopric of Westminster and all; was all but completed and was delayed only by one of those trifling accidents which will disarrange the best concerted schemes. We have not at hand the number of the Tablet in which the formal announcement was made; but before us lies Battersby's Directory for 1848, in which Dr. Wiseman is duly (and erroneously) entered as 'Most Reverend N. Wiseman, D. D. Archbishop of Westminster, London.' But enough of this silly controversy.—Tablet.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 4.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE
BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, Jany. 25, 1851.

CALCUTTA CATHOLIC SCHOOLS, AND INSTITUTIONS.

Visit of the Hon. Sir W. W. Burton (one of the Judges of H. M. Supreme Court, Madras) to the above named Establishments.

On Thursday the 16th Inst, the Honorable and Learned Judge Burton, of Madras, favoured with a visit the several Catholic Institutions of Calcutta. The object of the Learned Gentleman's visit having been, not to gratify an idle curiosity, but to ascertain by, personal inspection and examination, the state of these Establishments, as well in all that regards the literary and useful education of their Pupils, as also in what relates to the attention paid to the comfortable subsistence of their inmates; the visit of the Institutions began at eleven o'Clock, A. M. and did not terminate until after 3 o'Clock, P. M thus allowing an interval of more than four hours, for a full enquiry into all the particulars, on which Sir W. W. Burton wished to be informed.

The Cathedral Male and Female Schools together with the Boy's Orphanage and the Printing Press annexed to it, were the Institutions first inspected. In the Printing Press the Orphans are engaged for some hours on each day; the other portion of the day, they employ in the School in their educational improvement. The pupils in attendance at the Male School under the Christian Brothers number about 169. Those of the Cathedral Female School under the Loretto Nuns, amount ordinarily to about 40. The Christian Brothers' Male School at Bow-Bazar has 65 Day-Scholars, and the Loretto Female School in the same adjoining locality, about 100 Girls. The system of these Schools being uniform, it will suffice to say, that the Pupils of both the Schools of the Christian Brothers, on being examined in Arithmetic combined with Grammar, in Reading and the explanation of the words and sentences in each paragraph; in Writing, Geography and the use of the Globes, evinced much intelligence, great emulation, and remarkable promptitude in their answering. Of the Pupils attached to the Cathedral Male School, 46 are boarded in the Orphanage. From the Schools Sir W. W. Burton passed to the inspection of the Apartments of the Christian Brothers,—of the Library, which contains a large assortment of approved Works both for sale and for circulation among the poor who cannot afford to buy them, and lastly to that of the New Dormitory for the Orphans. In every department the Hon. and Learned Gentleman evinced his unqualified satisfaction at the arrangements adopted, to provide for the moral, temporal, and educational welfare of the Children.

In the Cathedral and Bow-Bazar Female Schools, the Girls presented a very pleasing appearance of neatness and order. The specimens of plain and fancy Needle-work were numerous, and creditable both to the good taste of the Religious Ladies in charge of these Institutions, and to the industry, and ingenuity of the Pupils.

The Intally Female Schools, Orphanage, and Widows' Asylum were next visited. In the Boarding and Day-School, there are twenty-two pupils. In the Orphanage, in the adjoining compound, eighty-four, whilst 7 or 8 Widows are provided for, from the Donations made to the Asylum intended for their relief. The inspection of the spacious and well kept premises set apart for the Boarding and Day-Pupils obtained for them Sir W. W. Burton's cordial approval. But the benevolent interest, he took in the welfare of the numerous Wards of the Female Orphanage, caused him to direct his chief attention to all that concerned the management of that invaluable Institution. In its ample School-hall he beheld drawn up for the present occasion, some, Infants a few weeks old, others aged four, five or six years, whilst the age of the majority ranged between 6 and 18 years, of the latter class the number was about five or six. A few of the Pupils from among the youngest and the more advanced Classes selected for Examination in Reading, Grammar, &c. afforded satisfactory proof, of the care given to their literary proficiency. One of the grown Girls rehearsed the theoretical instruction she had received on the duties of a Laundress, and the washing Machinery lately imported from England, and erected in a neighbouring apartment, showed, that not only the theory, but the practice also, of domestic duties was illustrated in the Institution. Two of the more advanced children were found actively engaged in the Kitchen, and the order and cleanliness of the cooking room, as well as the becoming appropriate dress of the Girls in charge of it, satisfied the spectators, that the system of the Institution was admirably adapted to the condition in life of the Pupils for whom it was designed, and that by means of this system, a useful, intelligent and virtuous class of Female Servants, would, in a short time, be available, for the respectable Families of Calcutta. The impression made by the inspection of the Laundry and Kitchen was fully sustained by that of the Dormitory, all the arrangements of which being admirably adapted for the promotion of habits of regularity, and cleanliness, must, of course, greatly conduce to the health of the Pupils. It was particularly gratifying to Sir W. W. Burton to learn, that neither in the Female Orphanage, nor in any other of the Catholic Female Institutions of Calcutta, were any Native Servants employed, or allowed to have any communication with the Children. In the Female Orphanage and the other Institutions at Intally, all the Domestic duties are discharged in turn by the adult Pupils, assisted by Children of less mature years, who are thus gradually prepared, when of sufficient age, to take the places of their seniors, whenever these may leave the Institution. The large and varied assortment of beautiful fancy Needle-work, which was exhibited was justly entitled to admiration. But considering the condition in life of the Pupils, and the duties which are likely to devolve on them as Wives, and Mothers, it was still more satisfactory to find, that they were carefully taught to make and repair their own Clothes, and also to prepare dresses for the Infant Children of the Male Orphanage.

From the Orphanage, Sir W. W. Burton proceeded to visit St. John's College, and the Loretto House, Chowringhee. At the College, the Learned Gentleman was afforded an opportunity of judging of the attention paid to the instruction of the Pupils, in Mathematics, Recitation, Music, &c. Indeed, more than once, Judge Burton expressed himself much gratified, at the great care taken in our Institutions, to encourage and cultivate a taste for Music, among the Pupils of all classes. But the gratification thus afforded him in other Institutions, was hardly worthy of commemoration, when contrasted with the unfeigned delight and admiration, he experienced on listening to the exquisite Choir of the Loretto House, which, on leaving St. John's College he next honored with his presence. With unwearied attention, the Hon'ble and Learned Gentleman inspected the Halls, Dormitory, &c. &c. of the Loretto Institution, and we are happy to add, that nothing could surpass the kind earnest language employed by him in commendation of all its arrangements. At the close of this tour of inspection, Judge Burton again and again warmly thanked the Archbishop for the truly delightful treat afforded to him by the inspection of the several Catholic Institutions of Calcutta, and kindly added, that of the agreeable days he had passed since his arrival in Calcutta, not one, could be compared to that, on which he had the pleasure of witnessing the Blessings bestowed by these Schools, on so many hundred of the rising Youth of this great Metropolis. We have great pleasure in subjoining the annexed recorded testimonials (given at the Intally Orphanage) of Judge Burton, and of the Rev. Mr. Long, who accompanied the Hon'ble and Learned Judge in his visit to the Catholic Institutions of Calcutta. To these testimonials, we subjoin a letter from the same Learned Gentleman, in which he expresses the gratification he derived from his visit, and also kindly presents to the Male Orphans some play things, as a memorial of his visit.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

Testimonials of Hon. Sir W. W. Burton, (one of H. M. Chief Justices in Madras), and Rev. J. Long, on occasion of their recent visit to the Bengal Catholic Male and Female Orphanages.

I have had the most lively satisfaction in witnessing the Charitable and Christian efforts of the conductors of this excellent Establishment, and I heartily wish them success in their good work: through our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

(Signed), W. W. BURTON, Judge
H. M. Supreme Court, Madras.

Calcutta, Jan. 16, 1851.

I have seen with the greatest interest the mode of training adopted in the Catholic Orphanage, and hope the example set here of industrial training may be adopted in other Institutions.

J. LONG, Clergyman of the English Church.

Calcutta, Jan. 16, 1851.

Judge Burton's letter to His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop of Edessa, and Vicar Apostolic of Western Bengal.

MY DEAR SIR,—I beg leave to have the pleasure of presenting to your boys, at the Cathedral School, a set of bats and balls, which I would wish to be under the charge of one of your reverend Christian Brothers, and their impartial use allotted to the Scholars: I take this opportunity of again thanking you for the agreeable and Christian treat you afforded me the other morning in the inspection of your Establishments. To the Ladies and Gentlemen whom I had the pleasure of seeing on that occasion I shall be much obliged if you will be good enough to make my best acknowledgments for their kind reception of me.

I remain, my dear Sir,
Very faithfully yours,
W. W. BURTON, Judge
H. M. Supreme Court, Madras.

Calcutta, 22d, Jan. 1851.

EXTRAORDINARY PROGRESS OF CATHOLICITY IN NEW SOUTH WALES, AND IN NEW ZEALAND.

(Continued from our last.)

Hitherto, we have confined our attention to the progress of Catholicity in New South Wales. Let us now briefly resume what we have advanced on that subject, in order to keep clearly before the mind of the reader, the extraordinary circumstances, which indicate the special interposition of Divine Providence, for the purpose of exalting and diffusing the true faith in immense regions, which had been previously seated in the darkness of error and in the shadow of death.

Even so recently as the year 1829, there were to be found in the Countries we speak of, only two Irish Priests, to preserve alive, or rather save from total extinction the sacred fire of Religion. Within then the short interval of about twenty years, an Archbishop, six or seven Bishops (a Bishop has been appointed at Hobart-Town in Van Dieman's land for some years) and a numerous body of Clergy have been diffused throughout the length, and breadth of the land, and the rising Church linked to and cemented with the eternal Rock of Peter, by the massive and splendid Chain, formed by the establishment there of a regular and perfect Apostolical Hierarchy.

But great and glorious as is the triumph of Catholicity in the regions here referred to, it cannot be compared with the yet incomparably more arduous and therefore more splendid trophies, which it has achieved in New Zealand, and in many of the South Sea Islands.

In New South Wales and the Countries immediately connected with it, the Catholic Missionary had, for the most part, to do with emigrants, from one or other portion of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland. Many, if not the greater number of the Colonists, were, it is true, almost wholly estranged from Religion either by error or by vice. But still, despite of these evils, there existed many strong sympathies between them and their Catholic Pastors. If their character were tainted with the corruptions of civilisation, it, notwithstanding, was not wholly devoid of those kindly and courteous feelings, which in a remote land, are generally reciprocated between the subjects of the same Sovereign, who, born almost in the same locality of the Parent Empire, find that their lot is cast together in a region, separated by a boundless Ocean from the land of their nativity. In these circumstances, the innate benevolence of the human heart triumphs over all the little petty jealousies and bickerings of party politics, and man, embracing man as his fellow, and his friend, is astonished and humbled at the recollection of the miserable flimsy causes, which, formerly, when at home, kindled strife and hatred between him and the now-cherished friend and partner of his exile.

(To be continued)

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

Rome, Parent of our Religion, whom the Wide
Nations have knelt to for the keys of heaven,
Europe repentant of her parricide,
Shall yet——sue to be forgiven.

Byron's Childe Harolde.

Sir,—At a time like the present when England is agitated by theological strife, arising from his present Holiness, Pius the Ninth, having increased the number of Catholic Bishops in that Country—When that Country is on the eve of fulfilling the almost prophetic words of her highly gifted, but erratic poet, by becoming again united to the Centre of Unity, from which she was so unhappily severed, in the great National outbreak of the Sixteenth Century—When, from one extremity of the land, to the other, Romewards is the general tendency, and the universal theme of conversation—Some wishing like the prodigal child, to throw themselves repentant on her outstreched arms of mercy, and sue once more for pardon and forgiveness, others remaining apathetic, not knowing what to do, or where to steer their course, whilst the great majority seem inclined to spurn the hour of their Salvation, and continue enslaved to all their errors—When notwithstanding this wilful perversity on their part, many an ardent prayer is daily offered before the throne of Grace, and many a fond sigh is heaved for their speedy conversion unto the faith of their forefathers—When, this great event so much to be desired by all, who wish to see the Kingdom of Christ propagated here upon earth—So ardently to be wished for, by all who long for the reuniting of all classes of Christians, in the One Fold, under the pastoral guidance of the One Shepherd, at a time when, I say when the conversion of England to the Catholic faith, has engrossed the attention of all, both in the East, in the West, and North, and South, does it not behove every good Catholic to step forward and aid either by his pen, or prayers, the speedy consummation of so desirable an object, and so laudable a work. In England the great outcry against his present Holiness Pius the Ninth, seems to arise from his exercising Jurisdiction in a country, which his opponents say, does not lie within his sphere, and where his Supremacy in Spiritual matters ought not to be recognised. Now as this erroneous impression may exist also in this Country, I intend to prove in a series of letters in the columns of the Herald, that this supremacy of the Pope in Spiritual matters has been acknowledged in every age of the Church, from its commencement until the present momentous period.

Wishing every success to your truly Catholic Journal.

I remain Sir,
Your most obdt. servant,
C. C.

Calcutta,
Jan. 23d, 1851.

HYDERABAD.

Extract from a letter addressed by Bishop Murphy, to His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop, V. A. W. B.

My Dear Lord,—'Thank God, my priests are quite at home at their work, knowing their flocks and their flocks knowing them. The Cathedral which has passed through a sea of difficulties is now all but completed. It is a splendid structure and would be an ornament even to the city of Palaces.

Our Persian and Hindoostanee Moonshee who is a respectable and intelligent Mahomedan, received the Sacrament of Baptism on New Year's day; after eighteen months' probation and instruction. Begging your Grace's prayers.'

I remain my dear Lord,
Your's ever affectionately,
✠ Daniel Murphy.

Hyderabad,
Jany. 7th, 1851.

LECTURES ON CERTAIN DIFFICULTIES FELT BY ANGLICANS IN SUBMITTING TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH. BY JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, PRIEST OF THE ORATORY OF ST. PHILIP NERI LECTURE IV. THE PROVIDENTIAL DIRECTION OF THE MOVEMENT OF 2833, NOT TOWARDS THE NATIONAL CHURCH. LONDON: BURNS AND LAMBERT.—1850.

It is scarcely possible to fancy that an event so distinctive in its character as the rise of the so-called Anglo Catholic party in the course of the last twenty years, should have no scope in the designs of Divine Providence. From beginnings so small, from elements of thought so fortuitous, with prospects so unpromising, that in its germ it was looked upon with contempt, if it was ever thought of at all, it suddenly became a power in the National Church, and an object of alarm to her rulers and friends. Its originators would have found it difficult to say what they aimed at of a practical kind; rather they put forth views and principles, for their own sake, because they were true, as if they were obliged to say them; and though their object certainly was to strengthen the Establishment, yet it would have been very difficult for them to state precisely the intermediate process, or practical application, by which, in matter of fact, their preaching was to arrive at that result. And as they might be themselves surprised at their earnestness in uttering, they had as great cause to be surprised at their success in propagating, the doctrines which have characterized their school. And, in fact, they could only say that those doctrines were in the air; that to assert was to prove, and that to explain was to persuade; and that the movement in which they were taking part was the birth of a crisis rather than of a place. I do not mean to say, that they did not use arguments on the one hand, or attempt to coalesce with things as they were on the other, but that, after all, their doctrine went forth rather than was sent, and spoke rather than was spoken,—that it was a message rather than an argument,—that it was the master not the creature of its proclaimers, and seemed to be said at random, because uttered with so indistinct an aim; and so, with no advantage except that of position, which of course is not to be undervalued, it spread and was taken up no one knew how. In a very few years a school of opinion was formed, fixed in its principles, indefinite and progressive in their range; and it extended into every part of the country. If, turning from the contemplation of it from within, we inquire what the world thought of it, we have still more to raise our wonder; for, not to mention the excitement it caused in England, the movement and its party-names were known to the police of Italy and the back-woodsmen of America. So it proceeded, getting stronger and stronger every year, till it has come into collision with the Nation and that Church of the Nation which it began by professing especially to serve; and now its upholders and disciples have to look about, and ask themselves where they are, and which way they are to go, and whither they are bound.

God does nothing in vain; so much earnestness, zeal, toil, thought, religious principle, success, as has been expended or exhibited in the history of that movement, must surely have a place in His scheme, and in His dealings towards His Church in this country, if we would discern what it was. He has excited aspirations, matured good thoughts, and prospered pious undertakings arising out of them; not for nothing, surely,—then for what. Wherefore?

The movement certainly is one and the same to all who have been influenced by it; the principles and circumstances, which have made them what they are, are one and the same; the history of one of you, my brethren, is pretty much the history of another—the history of all. Is it meant that you should each of you, and in his own way, if your beginnings have been the same? The duty of one, is it not the duty of another? Are you not to act together? In other words, may I not look at the movement as one thing, and thus contemplate what is its bearing and its legitimate issue; and may not, in consequence that direction and scope of the movement, if such can be found, be taken as a suggestion to you how you should act, distinct from and in addition to the intimations of God's will, which come home to you personally and individually? The movement has affected us in a certain way; at one time we have felt urged perhaps, with some of those who took part in it, to go forward; at another, to remain where we are: then, to retire into lay-communion, if we were in the established ministry; then to collapse into a sect external to its pale. We have tried to have faith in the sacraments of the National Church; for a time we have succeeded, and then we have failed; we have felt ourselves drawn, we have felt ourselves repelled by the Catholic Church—we have felt difficulties in her faith, counter-difficulties in rejecting it, complications of difficulty on difficulty, concurrent or antagonist, till we could ascertain neither their mutual relation nor their combined issue, and could neither change nor remain where we were without scruple. Under such a trial it would be some guidance, a sort of token or note of the course destined for us by Providence, if the movement itself, whose principles we have drunk in, with which we are so intimately one, had, from the nature of the case, its own natural and necessary termination. Before now, when a Protestant, I have said, more or less to others who were in anxiety, "Watch the movement: it is made up of individuals, but it has an objective being proceeds on principles, is governed by laws, and is swayed and directed by external facts. We are apt to be attracted or driven this way or that; each thinks for himself and judges differently from others; each fears to decide: but may we not ascertain and follow the legitimate and divinely intended course of that, whose children we are?" A great Saint was accustomed to command his sons, when they had to determine some point relatively to themselves and their Society, in their imagination, to throw themselves out of themselves, and to look at the question externally, as if it were not personal to them, and they were deciding for a stranger. In like manner, it has been sometimes recommended in the solution of public questions, to look at them as they will show in history, and as they will be judged of by posterity. Now in some such way should I wish, at this moment, to regard the movement of 1833, and to discover what is its proper, suitable, legitimate termination. This, then, is the question I shall consider in the present Lecture;—here is a great existing fact before our eyes, the movement and its party. What is to become of it? what ought to become of it? Is it to melt away as if it had not been? Is it merely to subserve the purpose of the liberal party, in breaking up establishments by weakening them, and in making dogmatism ridiculous by multiplying sects? or is it of too positive a character, both in its principles and its members, to anticipate for it so disappointing an issue?

I say, it has been definite in its principles, though vague in their application and their scope. It has been formed on one idea, which has developed into a body of teaching, logical in the arrangement of its portions, and consistent with the principles on which it originally started. That idea, or first principle, was ecclesiastical liberty; the doctrine it especially opposed was, in ecclesiastical language the heresy of Erastus, and, in political, the Royal Supremacy. The object of its attack was the Establishment, considered as such.

(To be continued.)

DUBLIN REVIEW.

ART. XI.—The Manual of Devotion. By Ambrose Lisle Phillips, Esq. Derby: 1843.

(Continued from our last.)

This is, then, the devotion which the Church of God proposes to us in the Rosary; the contemplation of the mysteries of this three-fold portion of our Redeemer's life, in connexion and sympathy with His loving Mother's feelings, in each. It is essentially directed to Him, being, in fact, the noblest and perfectest mode of meditating on Him. There is still another view of it, which, it strikes us, will facilitate and endear its practice to many; and therefore we will venture to unfold it.

The Church realizes to the utmost the communion of saints: by making the intercourse between earth and heaven as vivid as possible. The exclamations of the old Christians at the martyr's tombs were as bold and direct, as, though they had been addressing the confessors in prison. And the Fathers represent them to their hearers, as though present to them, defending their cities from visible enemies, and actively interesting themselves in their welfare. It is only doing in their regard, what she wishes to make us do, towards their Head and Lord,—give the greatest possible reality to her belief concerning them. She existed in the small apostolic college, and the handful of disciples who enjoyed our Lord's society on earth; the pious women from Galilee, and the few like Joseph of Arimathea, formed her laity, as the others did her clergy. She increased in multitudes, but she strove to alter not in feeling. What the apostles felt towards their Master, they continued, no doubt, to feel after He was ascended—the same veneration, the same love, the same trustfulness, the same desire to imitate Him. And these feelings they would leave as a legacy to their successors; who, in their turn, would continue to them, after they had sealed their testimony, similar attachment, similar respect. Could Polycarp fail, to the end of his days, communing spiritually with the beloved disciple John, by passing again and again, in holy meditation, over the many happy hours, during which he had heard him recount every incident witnessed by him in his Saviour's life, and listened to the fervent accents of charity in which they were related? The same kind of communion, only more exalted and more deeply respectful, we may easily suppose to have been kept up, by those who enjoyed in life the familiarity of our blessed Lady.

(To be continued.)

WHITE'S CONFUTATION OF CHURCH OF ENGLANDISM.

(Translated from the Original Latin, by E. W. O'Mahoney, Esq., of the Middle Temple London.)

CHAPTER XXIX.

The thirtieth Article examined,

(Continued from our last.)

Secondly, it was customary in the early ages of the Catholic Church, to administer the Eucharist as a viaticum to the sick, sometimes under one, sometimes under the other species. It was administered under the species of bread to Serapio, as Eusebius relates from the Epistle of Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, to Fabius * Saint Ambrose also received the viaticum under the species of bread only, as his biographer, Paulinus, mentions towards the end of his life—"The honoured priest of the church of Versailles," saith Paulinus, "when settled to rest in an upper apartment of his house, thrice heard the voice of one calling on, and saying to him—'Arise, make haste: for thou art now about to depart.' And stooping down, he gave to the holy man (Ambrose) the body of the Lord. Which when Ambrose received, he breathed forth his spirit, carrying with him the good viaticum—in order that his soul, refreshed by the heavenly food, may now enjoy the fellowship of the Angels, whose life he lived on earth, and may rejoice in the company of Elias. For as Elias never dreaded to speak to kings or potentates, so neither did he, filled as he was with a holy and reverential fear of God."† Such is the testimony of Paulinus, the biographer of St. Ambrose. On the other hand it was given under the species of wine only, to such as, by reason of their infirmity, could not swallow it under that of bread. This is evident from the fourth council of Carthage, the Fathers of which define as follows: "If it so happen that he who in sickness is desirous of penance shall be overpowered by his disorder, and have become speechless or delirious at the time when the priest is called in; let those who heard him express such desire, bear testimony of it, and thereupon let the sick man receive penance. And if he be thought likely to die forthwith, let him be reconciled by the imposition of hands, and let the Eucharist be poured into his mouth."‡ Compare this Canon with the eleventh Council of Toledo.* In the early ages, the Church gave communion to infants also, but under the species of wine only, as may be proved from St. Cyprian's sermon on the fallen,† and as reason itself dictates: for infants cannot swallow any kind of solid food.

* Euseb. Histor. Eccles, lib. 6. c. 36.

† Paulin in vita Ambros. ad August. conscripta, prope finem, in tom. 1. operum Ambrosii.—Vide de hac re Bedam Hist. Ecclesiast. lib. 4. c. 14, et lib. 2. c. 5.

‡ Tom. 1. Concilliorum, Concil. Carthag. 4, can. 76.*

(To be continued)

FLOWERS OF HEAVEN

Connexion between Religion and Morality.

CHAPTER XIII.

MODERATION.

(Continued from page 18.)

Those who know how much we have degenerated from our fathers, in regard to fasting and abstinence, will naturally be astonished that heresy should so far honour us, as to suppose us capable of carrying these holy practices to extremes. Would to God that this reproach was, in some measure, merited! Would to God that we had indeed crucified the flesh and the world!—for we Christians do not adore the absurd and sensual divinities of Olympus: our Christ had indeed a crown, —not of roses, but thorns; he did not laugh, but weep; and those whom he came to save, made him drink vinegar and gall. He has gone before us in the narrow way, which he has traced out for us in his blood, bending under the weight of his cross; and it must be allowed that the soldier who refuses to follow his captain, deserves the reproach of cowardice! But wherefore speak of duties so generally unknown! The glorious days of Christianity have passed away—like a flower, like a cloud, like a shadow! The brave ones of Israel have fallen, and the mocking-bird makes its nest of moss and straw in the bucklers of the valiant! It is not of austerity, but of relaxation, that we must accuse our brethren; and at this reproach, unfortunately but too well founded, we can make no other defence, than to hang down our heads in conscious shame!

"But you do not clean the inside of the cup, and you are satisfied if the outside be pure and brilliant," say the protestants. "We have seen many of your members, who partially observe the Lenten fast, and nevertheless, return to the vanities of the world and the works of Satan, at the termination of that holy season. And have we not also seen spiritual pride inscribe its name on the holy wall, and your devotees, on the strength of their fasts, fall into uncharitable and public indignation against their less fervent brethren?"

* Tom. 2. Concilliorum, Concil, Tolet, 11, can. 11.

† Cyprian, serm. de lapsis.

Does it hence follow that we teach, that fasting will avail unto salvation without charity and mortal integrity? You do not seriously believe this: our fathers have not so taught us.

"I do not blame fasting," says St. John Chrysostom: "on the contrary, I praise it and esteem it with all my heart. But be not deceived: it is not enough to fast, if you wish to be saved; fasting itself is not one of the most necessary virtues. The principal and essential virtues are—humility, charity, mildness, and love of the poor."

(To be continued.)

Selections.

THE ROMAN CATHOLICS AND LORD J. RUSSELL.

We insert a letter to Lord John Russell from Mr. Charles Langdale, on the Principle of 'Audi alteram partem,' and in consideration of the writer's social position amongst the English Roman Catholic Laity. If the Bishops of Rome had always confined themselves—if the Bishop of Rome did now confine himself—to the exercise of a jurisdiction as distinct from, as Mr. Langdale affirms it to be unaccountable to, human power, we should admit his apology for it. But it would not have needed to be written.

TO LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

My Lord,—The prominent part which it has seemed good to your lordship to adopt on the occasion of the present outcry against the Roman Catholics of England and the head of their Church, and the not unnatural effect which this has produced in exasperating religious excitement throughout the country, must be deemed, I think, sufficient to justify a few words from one involved in your lordship's denunciation. Your lordship terms what you are pleased to call the Pope's aggression upon Protestants as 'insolent' and 'insidious.' If the Pope, as the sovereign of a comparatively petty kingdom in Italy, had, as such, either in word or deed, committed an aggression on the mighty and colossal power of Great Britain, or on the gracious Sovereign who holds undisputed sway over the temporal destinies of this mighty empire, then, indeed your lordship's epithet would not have been misapplied. But, my lord, the act of his Holiness bears nothing of this character. The power which he claims is not of this world—affects no temporal sovereignty. As successor of St. Peter, and invested as such with his commission from the Divine Founder of our religion, the authority which the Pope claims is wholly of a spiritual character. As such he inherits a jurisdiction as distinct from, as it is unaccountable to, human power. It prevailed in spite of the mighty power of the Roman Empire; it extended its sway over the many kingdoms into which that empire was divided; it was recognized, undisputed, for centuries in this country by our Catholic ancestors, until that bad and despotic monarch whose will no laws, human or divine, could control, consummated his claim to supremacy at the expense of the noblest and best blood of his subjects. Still, my lord, through three centuries of persecution, a remnant—small, indeed, but faithful—of the inhabitants of Great Britain has retained that spiritual allegiance to the see of Rome which is recognized by the vast majority of the Christian world, and which is as distinct from the temporal allegiance due to our Sovereign as human affairs are distinct from spiritual—temporal from eternal. Your lordship must be well aware that this distinction between the temporal and spiritual jurisdiction of their Sovereign and the head of their religion was the sole bar which excluded our Catholic ancestors, and many of ourselves, for several years, from the political rights and privileges of our fellow-subjects. Your lordship may probably remember that concise but clear reply of a Roman Catholic at the table of the House of Commons, when presented with the then unamended oath of allegiance: —'I cannot take this oath, because it contains one assertion which I know to be false, and another which I believe to be so.' Catholic emancipation followed and recognised, if not by word at least by implication, that the spiritual jurisdiction of the Pope was acknowledged by a large body of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom. Such then, my lord, is the spiritual jurisdiction, claiming institution from God himself, the exercise of which through eighteen centuries your lordship is now pleased to designate 'insolent.' Your lordship also adds 'insidious.' How far this epithet, too, is inconsistent with the charge of detailed and explicit boldness of a document which in the eyes of many forms its chief offence, I must leave to your lordship to explain. The real question, then, now at issue is whether virtually, as regards British Roman Catholics (for an exception seems to be drawn between us and all other Roman Catholic subjects of her Majesty), the Emancipation Act, regarding the spiritual jurisdiction of the Pope, is to be admitted or not—whether it can be, by being 'carefully examined,' to use your lordship's words, set aside? And what is the special ground of this threat of renewed penal laws? Why, the exercise of a power of appointing bishops is as old as the see of Rome itself; it is, and must be, inherent in our religion; and though as a temporary expedient, the Pope may and has appointed his own vicars, dependent upon and removable at his pleasure, as was lately the case in this country, yet such is neither the ordinary course of the discipline of the Church, nor consistent with the exercise of rights enjoyed by all other honorable bodies of its members. Surely the distinction is sufficiently clear between our bishops and clergy in communion with the see of Rome, and the bishops and clergy of the Established Church, as appointed by the Queen, for no mistake to arise either on the subject of the source of their power, or on the mode of its exercise. There can be no doubt that whilst we as Roman Catholics pay all due deference to the law, in acknowledging the temporal claims and rights of the latter, we do and must repudiate their spiritual authority, or we must renounce our religion; nor can I see how, or why these latter should fear any spiritual infringement or any rival jurisdiction from bishops, nominees of a Pontiff whom they have denounced as Antichrist, and members of a Church which they have solemnly called God to witness they believed to be involved in blasphemous idolatry. No my lord, there cannot be, nor ought there to be, any mistake here. God forbid, indeed, that so awful a denunciation should be made by me against any body of Christians, however much I may and do differ from their religious opinions, which I hope and believe many conscientiously entertain as truth; but surely the precaution which the law has provided against retaining similar titles, and by which the Pope in his late nomination carefully abided, ought to prove sufficiently that the respective claimants to episcopal jurisdiction are as distinct and recognisable as the religions which they profess. I cannot conclude, my lord, without an expression of my surprise and regret that your lordship's name should be identified with a renewal of a cry against the rights of conscience. Those who saw with regret the repeal of the penal laws which had so long oppressed your Catholic fellow countrymen will indeed rejoice to have the Prime Minister of England re-echoing their long-cherished but almost forgotten cry, and that that Minister be Lord John Russell. Still I cannot but think well enough of the great majority of those who welcomed the great measure carried by that eminent man, now, alas! lost to his country and to us, to feel convinced that the simple fulfilment of a sacred duty by the head of the Roman Catholic Church, in the restoration in this country of our ordinary ecclesiastical superiors, will be considered, as it ought to be, only the fulfilment of a sacred duty, to which he is bound by the position in which it has pleased Providence to place him, and to which we, the Roman Catholics of England, have as just and as unobjectionable a claim as our fellow-subjects in Ireland in the colonies, or as other equally numerous bodies of Roman Catholics in every quarter of the globe. One word, my lord, more on the use which you would make of a name dear to the affections of every Englishman. I will not believe that your lordship has ventured to traduce the loyalty of British Catholics to their Queen, or that our gracious Sovereign would consider otherwise than an abuse of confidence a whisper that would breathe a suspicion against the devoted attachment of her English Roman Catholic subjects. Such things have indeed occurred when ministers of state have allowed religious feelings to embitter the administration of affairs committed to their charge. I will not, however, stop to reply to what I cannot but believe our gracious Sovereign would consider an insult to herself. No, happen what may from your Lordship's 'careful examination of the present state of the law,' or from 'your deliberate consideration of the propriety of adopting any proceedings, the English Catholics will never believe their Queen is a willing party to the violation of the rights of conscience. Her Majesty may, indeed—as she has done upon one, to her, we believe, most painful occasion—under the right enactment of the law, in the presence and under the example of the assembled nobles of the land, at the exhortation and presentation of the archbishops and bishops of her Church, give a constitutional assent to what is most foreign to her heart; but; be the result what it may—proscription of property or loss of life—the English Catholic will, I trust, know how, in imitation of his ancestors, to meet whatever may occur in support of his religion. That religion will enjoin him a duty, equally just in itself as it is grateful to his feelings—undeviating attachment to the amiable and virtuous lady in whom it has pleased Providence to bless the inhabitants of the British empire.—I have the honor, &c., [Globe.] CHARLES LANGDALE.

MR. ROEBUCK TO LORD JOHN RUSSELL

My Lord,—Were Parliament sitting the present letter would not be written, as I should then be able in your lordship's presence to speak what I now feel compelled to write. The extraordinary circumstances of the present time indube me not to wait until the meeting of Parliament, but at once to give expression to my opinions concerning the mischiefs which now threaten the peace of this empire; and I now address myself to your lordship, because I believe that great principles are in danger, and that to you is attributable the imminent risk to which they are exposed.

The great principles which are thus imperilled are those which your party and the great leaders of your party have for above half a century resolutely supported and to which the chiefs of every party have, during the present century, rendered singular and honourable homage—which Mr. Pitt recognised and acted upon when he resigned and broke up his Government in 1801; which Lord Grenville and the Whigs of Cabinet obeyed when, in 1807, they left office rather than yield to the unconstitutional demand of the King that they should pledge themselves never again, as a Ministry, to agitate that question of the Catholic claims; which governed the conduct of Lord Wellesley Mr. Canning, Mr. Gratton, Lord Grey, and a host beside, during the long and wearisome contest that followed upon the great question of justice to be done to the Roman Catholic subjects of the Crown; and which, at length, my lord, induced the chiefs of your party, in 1829, and yourself, as one of their followers, to forego all considerations of personal ambition and party aggrandisement, and give a hearty assistance to the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel when they, under compulsion, consummated, as we believed, the victory of common sense and justice, and, as we hoped, forever laid the foul demon of religious intolerance, by passing the celebrated measure for the relief of our Catholic fellow-subjects from all civil disabilities. These, my lord, are the great principles which I believe now to be in danger, and which you, in my opinion, have put in peril.

But still you may ask, 'What are these principles?' And you may say, 'Though you approve the acts you mention, it by no means follows that you understand the motives which led to them, or the principles which governed the conduct you praise.'

I will answer the question which I suppose thus put.

I believe, then, that the great men, whose names I have cited, and whose deeds on the occasions referred to I have presumed to praise, thought that, in an empire like ours, in which are united under one Government people professing every description of religious belief, and who by law are permitted to exercise the right of private judgment, and to support by argument both in writing and spoken discourse, the truth and wisdom of their own opinions, any attempt to degrade by law, and by the imposition of civil disabilities, any one class of believers, was not merely unjust, but in the highest degree impolitic also, and that while any deprivation of civil rights for such a cause was a gross injustice and cruel injury—the affixing on them badges social inferiority, because of the peculiarity of their faith, would be an insult more galling still than injury—and therefore it was that they said, make all men, whether Catholics or Dissenters, equal before the law; and let us, under the inspiration of a generous philosophy, and in accordance with the teaching of experience, be wise in time; and forgetting those mournful days when the friends of freedom thought themselves compelled, for safety's sake, to be intolerant, erase from our laws those cruel and impolitic enactments which have made religion a curse instead of a blessing—a course of hate, and strife, and weakness, in place of being a bond of peace, of unity, and strength.

In accordance with this dictate of justice and policy was the conduct of the Whig party when they, with great honour to themselves, aided their opponents in passing the Emancipation Act in 1829. They then gloriously belied the oft-repeated imputation upon one who was once a great Whig, and they did not.

'Give up to party what was meant for mankind.'

The Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel I acknowledge, acted on this occasion upon considerations much narrower than those which were supposed to have moved the Whigs. He and his right hon. friend thought peace and the continuance of Roman Catholic disabilities impossible, and, simply because Ireland was turbulent, the Duke of Wellington was content to be just. He was just, however, only by accident. What he thought expedient happened to coincide with what justice demanded. Had his views of policy been different—had his iron will still resisted, he would have risked the chance of civil war, and scouted the Catholics and their claims.

But to you, my Lord, I address myself as one of those who laid their superstructure of policy upon the broad foundations of a wise and generous morality. I may be wrong; but I will suppose you clearly to have understood the principles which you and your party enunciated. I will even believe that you really foresaw, and with a calm mind contemplated, the legitimate consequences of the act which you advised and supported. Remember, that your party drove the Duke of Wellington into concession,—most unwillingly he yielded; still more unwilling was Sir Robert Peel. By your support the Catholics of Ireland were made to gather courage and organise a resistance, which at length rendered civil war inevitable, if their claims had been any longer denied. During the long discussions which preceded the passing of the Emancipation Act, every possible consequence of the measure was described and threatened. In spite, nevertheless, of every suggestion of danger, the whigs insisted upon concession, and cannot now assert that they were not told and could not foresee what has since occurred. Neither party rage, nor love of office, nor of praise, could so have blinded you as to make the events of the last few weeks a surprise. If, indeed, they were not foreseen, then must you confess yourself a short-sighted politician. If, however, you did believe that such things might happen, your present indignation must be feigned, and put on to serve a purpose, or your past confidence was falsely assumed and equally intended to deceive.

When we remember that hate—religious bigotry—is at the bottom of it all—when we remember that every Protestant priest has, by religious antipathy, been roused into action—when we also bear in mind that every Catholic priest in England and Ireland has now been challenged to the combat—is it not clear, my Lord, that your most unwise and unstatesmanlike letter has served as a trumpet to call into action the worst, and fiercest, and most dangerous passions that darken human reason, and harden the human heart? The work of years has in a moment been destroyed, and all the weary labour of eradicating those now vigorous weeds in our fair gardens—religious hate and ecclesiastical intolerance, has again to be encountered. When you were a labourer at this work, you had to aid you many Protestant sects then suffering under legal disabilities. These you helped to remove, and now that assistance will no longer be afforded to the friends of religious freedom, for every Protestant sect will bind together on the one hand, and range themselves in fierce hostility to all the Catholics on the other. And now, my Lord, I put to you the question which you, as a statesman, ought long since to have asked yourself, How is Catholic Ireland to be governed? The immense majority of the people of Ireland are Catholics; will they not now be excited to the same frantic pitch in support of their religion as that which now agitates England against it? and upon the same principles upon which Protestants in England determine to keep down the Catholics, will not Catholics in Ireland assert their own pre-eminence in that country, and insist upon equality, at least, in the baneful right of persecution? And here, possibly, I shall have the Pope brought forward, and I shall be insulted by being asked if I believe the people of Ireland bear allegiance to Queen Victoria? Let me answer this question by another. If, in fact, Catholics bear a divided allegiance—if, by their religion, as we hear, they really give one-half of their obedience to the Pope—if this be a tenet to their faith, how, I ask, is their allegiance affected or diminished by the nominal distribution of England into Catholic Sees? Let us, if we will, fulminate an Act of Parliament against the Catholics—does any one suppose that their faith will be in the slightest affected thereby? We cannot make people loyal by Act of Parliament; we cannot, by excluding certain names, keep out the doctrines of the Catholic religion. But what we can do is to keep up religious dissension; we may make the empire a divided empire; we may band Protestant against Catholic, England against Ireland, and to you, my Lord, posterity will refer as the man who, just when the real difficulties were conquered—when, by the united and continuous labours of our greatest statesmen, the law had become just, and peace and good will were about to be established, took advantage of your great position to rouse up the spirit of strife and hate among us to quicken into active life the demon of persecution, and to rend asunder a great empire, which, but for your fatal interference, would soon have become firmly united, peaceful, and prosperous. A melancholy distinction this, my Lord, for one who all his life has styled himself the friend of religious as well as civil freedom! Your common sense must long since have been shocked at the wretched fanaticism you have evoked, and which, unfortunately, you will find a spirit beyond your power to lay.

I remain, my Lord, your obedient servant,

J. A. Rosaces.

Milton, Dec. 2.

[Home News.]

THE ENGLISH INTOLERANTS.

The following letter, from the well-known naturalist, Mr. Waterton, on the storm now raised in England by the appointment of Cardinal Wiseman, is a well-administered rebuke. It is dated from Walton Hall, the seat of the able and vigorous writer:—

'Blow wind, and crack your cheeks! rage! blow!
You cataracts and hurricanes about'

By the dismal yells and howings of the press, we might fancy that the successor of St. Peter has just emptied the whole contents of Pandora's box, and those of half-a-dozen stink-pots to boot, on the heads of the astonished multitude. Say, gentle reader, what has our venerable Pontiff really done to cause these angry howlings? Why, he has committed an unpardonable offence, by appointing to the See of Westminster one of the best and most enlightened men of our day. 'Tis a good appointment, no doubt, and full of prog and luscious marrow! No such thing. There is nothing now at Westminster left for us poor Catholics, that smells of either loaf or fish, No: not a black pudding, not a dumpling, not a gizzard, not even a half-boiled sheep's trotter, from the wild and barren moor. Alas all these good and dainty morsels have passed away long ago, by Act of Parliament into Protestant hands; and they have been guarded by penal laws of the most horrible and revolting nature. For many centuries previous to the Reformation, so called, there had necessarily been temporalities of justice and flavour in the orthodox sees; but Queen Bess, the virago (see her life, by Miss Strickland) seized on them all, and gave them to apostates whom she constituted Bishops by Act of Parliament, and who are no more really ordained than I myself am. This unholy hierarchy has continued to fatten on the plunder ever since; taking precious good care, by the way, not to perform any one of those duties and conditions which the Church had strictly enforced on the Catholic Bishops time immemorial. Thus, for instance, our Parliamentary Prelates never say Mass, or hear confessions, or give absolution, or fast (according to our rules of fasting), or abstain, or refrain from matrimony. Nay, what's more, their head Archbishop, to the horror and scandal of astonished Christendom, repudiates the necessity of infant baptism. This is sapping the sandy foundation of the Law Church with a vengeance. 'Ruit alto a culmine.' In Ireland, poor weeping, starving miserable Ireland, the voracity of the intrusive hierarchy would be utterly incredible, if we had not authentic documents to prove it. Thus, we read in the Probate Will, office, that eleven of these Parliamentary Prelates bequeathed to their already fattened families the enormous sum of one million eight hundred and seventy five thousand pounds sterling! Gracious Heavens! in the face of the most unchristian mal-usage of Ecclesiastical property, can there be found a man so weak, so unjust, and so bigoted withal, as to denounce a Cardinal who has never had his hand in any Protestant breeches pocket; and to rave against the Catholic Church, which for nine long centuries gave succour to the old and the infirm to the widow and the orphan, and always sheltered the benighted traveller from the four rude winds of heaven? Yes, indeed.—the sworn enemies of our holy, and ancient universal, uncorrupted creed, are, at this moment, pouring their wrathful denunciations on its head; and are absolutely frightening to death our timid old grandmothers, by assuring them that 'the Devil, the Pope, and the Pretender, have just set sail from Italy and have got all ready to singe the inhabitants of this most happy, and most Protestant land.

CHARLES WATERTON.

[Tablet.]

TEMPERATE ZEAL: THE ROMISH CONTROVERSY.

It is a hopeful omen of the temper with which the pending ecclesiastical contest will be carried on, that two of the newly appointed Romanist Prelates have issued pastoral letters remarkable for their calmness and moderation.* In commenting last week upon the Bishop of London's charge, we drew especial attention to the freedom from rancour and exaggeration in his allusions to the great topic of the day. On the other side, Dr. Wareing has addressed to the clergy and laity of his so-called diocese of Northampton a circular epistle, which has the rare merit in such compositions of being short and keeping closely to the point at issue. It may be, that in the case of the Protestant Bishop the violence of animosity may be curbed by an official position, which would make railing singularly unbecoming; and Doctors Ullathorne and Wareing may be only veiling the arrogance of their pretensions, and the bitterness of their theological hatred with that serpentine guile and smoothness of speech which have always, when necessary, accompanied the most despotic acts and the most intrusive encroachments of their Church. But, whatever be the cause, we are bound to acknowledge the fact; and we would fain hope that, be the course and fortune of the battle what they may, the same decency of language and demeanour may be observed throughout. It is almost needless to remark, that deep conviction and resolute purpose do not, except in the coarsest natures, clothe themselves of necessity with intemperate speech and unmeasured abuse of opponents; and as these are proverbially the poor resource of those who doubt themselves or suspect that others doubt them, we trust that on the present occasion they will be left to such as distrust their own Protestant principle, or have given their neighbours strong reasons for putting but little faith in it. Especially it is to be hoped that all who value religious liberty will see the absolute necessity of confiding themselves, as Dr. Wareing has done, to the political and legal bearing of the question, and of not mixing up with these the relative truth of the doctrines taught or the usages sanctioned by the respective Churches of Rome and England. Most cordially therefore do we concur with Dr. Wareing in deprecating "the violent declamation, the furious onslaught, and unscrupulous misrepresentation," which he characterizes "as something little short of insanity." For our own sakes, as well as for the sake of justice we would have the dispute conducted with fairness and scrupulous adherence to the facts of the case. The rights of a minority are the safeguard and standard of social progress.—Spectator Nov. 16.

* Written before the appearance of Dr. Brigg's letter—a still calmer production.

THE WHIG APOSTLE OF BEDLAM BROKE LOOSE.

The sound, sober, practical, serious, hard-working, prosaic, sensible English people, when run mad form a comical spectacle enough. They are so proud of their sense, seriousness, and sobriety, their exclusively practical character, their addiction to hard unrelenting work, and their freedom from any but prosaic thoughts or imaginations—and yet, it rarely happens that a decade of years passes over without this phlegmatic nation running absolutely mad. In animals of the bovine species, madness generally follows or accompanies overwork. A mad bull is a bull overdriven; and John Bull, up to his ears in the cares of this life, and slaving day and night, awake and in his dreams, to make himself richer, more pursy, and more respectable; periodically overdrives himself along these misty ways, and thus, of necessity, the overstraining of his faculties in one direction renders necessary, by way of counterpoise, the excitement of periodical madness to make all things straight.

In these fits John Bull is as like a mad bull as a river in Macedon is to a river in Monmouth, or "as my fingers are to my fingers;" and if the animal in his state of fury be still further irritated by shaking in his eyes a piece of red or scarlet cloth, no human prescience can foresee what he will toss, whom he will gore, or what he will run at and trample in the dust. When a mad bull runs down the street, the prudent course, unless you have some more special duty, is not exactly to meet him in front, and take him by the horns; but to stand a little on one side, let him pass by, and content yourself with watching his proceedings until his rage expires in mere exhaustion and collapse. Long before next February, the present English frenzy will have died away in a general sense of shame; and though everything is to be anticipated from the bad intentions and intolerance of the Cabinet, we cannot bring ourselves to believe that English public opinion will allow them to propose, in the next session, any new penal law, or to enforce any old penal law, if any such be in existence.

While the frenzy lasts, indeed, it is possible there may be outrage; and if the mob were not wiser than the Ministers, we should expect to see or hear of the gutters of Moorfields flowing with blood. Our hope is, that the sagacity of the Costermongers will save us from the idiotcy of the Cabinet, and that even the incentives to violence which have proceeded from the guardians of the peace, will be rendered powerless by the good sense and good temper of the thieves, prostitutes, burglars, and reprobates, who form the forlorn hope of all civic outrages, but on whom, on the present occasion, her Majesty's Government seems to have relied in vain for inflicting civic vengeance upon the Catholics of Great Britain. In this comfortable expectation, we propose to employ the present week in commentaries on the General Epistle of the Whig Apostle of Bedlam-broke-loose.

The pretended cause of the Guy-Fawkes-and-John-Russel-mania is the Brief of his Holiness Pope Pius the Ninth—we may call him so for the present—"re-establishing the Episcopal Hierarchy in England." The Prime Minister expressly attributes all his assumed indignation to this document. The division of England into Districts, in itself would be nothing—the Wesleyan Conference, in flat rebellion against the majesty of the Law Church and the statutory religion, has done that long ago. The division of England into Episcopal Dioceses would be nothing—the Episcopal Dissenters have done a like thing long ago in Scotland, in late rebellion against the supremacy of John Knox. But what separates the present "innovation" from these precedents is not the fact, but the manner; the tone of the Pope's Brief.

The Premier admits that he has as yet found nothing to complain of in the acts done; but he proclaims that he is employed in looking out for penal statutes, on account of words written. The Pope breaks no law. The Archbishop of Westminster is as lawful as the Bishop of London. The creation of the Dioceses, and the selection of the Ecclesiastic to preside over it, are transactions with which neither statute nor precedent can quarrel. All this is unexceptionable. But the Prime Minister of England publishes in a newspaper an abusive letter against a foreign Bishop, because that foreign Bishop claims more spiritual authority than the said Prime Minister is disposed to allow him. If this is the real ground of Lord John Russell's pretended "indignation," his Lordship is a greater blockhead than we take him to be. However, these are his words:—

It is impossible to confound the recent measures of the Pope with the division of Scotland into dioceses by the Episcopal Church, or the arrangement of districts in England by the Wesleyan Conference.

There is an assumption of power in all the documents which have come Rome...a pretension to supremacy over the realm of England, and a claim to sole and undivided sway, which is inconsistent with the Queen's supremacy, with the rights of our Bishops and Clergy, and with the spiritual independence of the nation, as asserted even in Roman Catholic times.

What can we make of this? "There is an as assumption of power," "a pretension to supremacy," a claim to sole and undivided sway," which are at variance...with what? With the law? Not at all; but with certain spiritual pretensions which, by the law, every subject of the Queen is at liberty to deny.

Lord John Russell complains that the language of the Pope's Brief is "inconsistent with the Queen's supremacy." Of course it is. By law, not merely the Pope, but every Catholic in every corner of the world, every Presbyterian, and every Dissenter, not only denies, but laughs at the pretended supremacy of King or Queen over the Church of God, or any branch or portion of the same. We deny it, have always denied it, and shall deny it, as we deny the supremacy of Mahomet or the sacred function of Mokanna. Does Lord John Russell mean that the Catholics of the Empire being relieved from the persecuting oath of supremacy, the Pope's Briefs are henceforth to be couched in language which shall seem to recognise that article of the Anglican heresy? Is this the new Whig doctrine?

The Pope's Brief is also "inconsistent with the rights of our Bishops." What rights and what Bishops? Is it supposed that the Pope will recognise such a thing as Charles James for a Bishop? will admit that he has any spiritual jurisdiction? will acknowledge his power to rule over any portion of the flock of Christ? No, by the rood, not so. Upon that point the Pope will be as stubborn as any follower of John Knox. It is the very function of the Pope and his Clergy—as of John Knox and his Clergy—to preach, teach, and exhort all reasonable men against the unwarrantable spiritual usurpations of the said Charles James and his fellow-perverters of the Faith of Christ.

The Pope's Brief is also inconsistent "with the spiritual independence of the nation, as asserted even in Roman Catholic times." The "spiritual" independence of the nation, mind. Not the temporal independence; not a word about temporal usurpation; or interference with the power of the nation to make its own laws and rule its own territory; but the "spiritual independence." The Pope's Brief is at variance with that.

MR. DISRAELIS' LETTER.

To the Editor of the Times.

SIR.—Mr. Disraeli has published a letter addressed to the Lord-Lieutenant of his country (in reference to what is called "Papal aggression") containing the following passages:—"I have always understood that, when the present Lord-Lieutenant arrived in his Viceroyalty, he gathered together the Romish Bishops of Ireland, addressed them as nobles, sought their counsel, and courted their favour. On the visit of Her Majesty to that kingdom, the same prelates were presented to the Queen, as if they were nobles, and precedence was given them over the nobility and dignitaries of the National Church."

"The fact is, that the whole question has been surrendered and decided in favour of the Pope by the present Government, and the Ministers who recognised the pseudo-Archbishop of Turin as a peer and a prelate, cannot object to the appointment of a pseudo-Archbishop of Westminster though he be a Cardinal." This is not the first time that ignorance or unscrupulous political hostility has attacked Lord Clarendon for taking upon himself to treat the Roman Catholic prelates of Ireland with undue distinction, and auctoritate sua recognising their precedence over "the nobility and dignitaries of the National Church;" but I am surprised that such reproaches should be repeated by a man so well informed as Mr. Disraeli, and so conversant with that recent political history in which he has himself acted such a conspicuous part. Whether the recognition of the status and precedence of the Irish Roman Catholic prelates was right or wrong, wise or unwise, it was an accomplished fact before the present Government came into office, and therefore before Lord Clarendon went to Ireland. He found the thing done, and had only to conform himself to it. It was done (no doubt after mature deliberation) by the Government of Sir Robert Peel before the schism, and the recognition came forth in the shape of a formal instrument of the highest authority, bearing date the 13th of January, 1845. A warrant or Royal Commision, approved by Her Majesty in Council on that day to carry out the Charitable Bequests Act runs as follows:—"Know ye that we, reposing especial trust and confidence in your knowledge, discretion, and ability, do hereby, &c., by and with the advice of our Privy Counsel, appoint you, the said John George Archbishop of Armagh Richard, Archbishop of Dublin Archbishop William Crolly, Archbishop David Murray, John Hely, Earl of Donoughmore, Bishop Cornelius Denver, Henry Pakenham, &c., to be Commissioners, &c." This was and was so deemed a Royal recognition of the spiritual rank of the Irish prelates, and a concession of precedence corresponding with that of the prelates of the same degrees of the Established Church. Such rank and precedence it was not in the power of the Lord Lieutenant either to confer or withhold: whether he were a Whig or an Orangeman, it was his duty to treat them according to the dignity which it had pleased the Sovereign to recognise in their persons. And this is what Lord Clarendon did. He did not recognise them as peers, he neither sought their counsel, nor courted their favour, but he received them all with becoming courtesy and respect, and those prelates who were distinguished by their loyalty to the Crown, their attachment to the Union, and their personal virtues, he treated with peculiar marks of regard and confidence. As I happen to have been officially cognisant of the acts and instruments to which I have referred, and I think that truth and justice alike demand that the praise or the blame which ever they may deserve should be appropriated to those who were, and still ought to be, held responsible for what was done, I have taken upon me to correct a misrepresentation often repeated, and which derives some importance from the peculiar circumstances of the present time.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Bruton street, Nov. 10. C. C. GREVILLE.

[From the Economist, Nov. 16.].

THE ARCHBISHOP OF TURIN AND THE CATHOLICS AT LYONS.

The testimonies of veneration which the Archbishop of Turin received at Lyons, are constantly renewed. The Gazette at Lyons informs us that a great number of workmen of La croix-Rousse went to the Illustrious Exile. One of them read an address to which His grace responded in a few words regretting his inability, to express in French, the sentiments with which his heart was penetrated. The good trades-men withdrew, delighted with the flattering reception they had met with.

These demonstrations honor the Catholic Population and we are happy we have it in our power to prove to our Brethren at Lyons that their sentiments are fully appreciated in the Eternal City. The brother of the Noble Exile, His Eminence the Cardinal Prefect of the Congregation of the Propaganda, was greatly affected by the touching manifestations of respect evinced towards the Archbishop, his brother. We quote below a passage in the Cardinal's letter, for which we are indebted to the kindness of a distinguished Catholic, which gives an idea of the consolations the eminent Prelate has experienced.

"My brother, the Archbishop of Turin, is no longer at Fenestrelles, but at Lyons, that hospitable city, which has ever been distinguished by devotedness to the Holy See, and attachment to those who defend it's rights and prerogatives. I shall not inform you of his reception, as you must be better informed than myself, I shall only speak of his boundless gratitude towards the Bishops, the Clergy and the immense crowd of people who hastened to him; in order to testify their devotion and the respect which they entertain for him as a Confessor of the faith. I shall conclude assuring you that his reception in France, is a triumph over the enemies of our Holy Religion.

GOA.

EXTRACT from a private Correspondence from Goa:—

"Here the Priests are exasperated by the rumoured coming of the Archbishop. Should it prove true, they intend to quite Goa, and seek for protection under the Vicars Apostolic. It is positively affirmed that his return has not the sanction of the Pope. If so, he is no doubt a schismatic.—Bombay Catholic Examiner.

An accredited Journal called the Economist referring to the ancient doctrine of England, writes:—The Roman Catholics must be allowed to organize their worship as are the methodists and Jews. If the laws grant revenues and privileges to the Anglican Church, they do not establish any distinction amongst all other sects of Christendom, and they must be equally protected.—L'Ami de la Religion.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 5.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, Feb. 1, 1851.

LORETTO INSTITUTION.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

On Wednesday the 29th inst. the Feast of St. Francis of Sales, two Postulantes, lay Sisters, and one Postulante, choir Sister, received the religious habit, at St. Thomas' Church, from His Grace the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, and were admitted respectively into the Novitiate of the Loretto Institute.

For the information of such of our readers, as may not be acquainted with the wise discipline of the Catholic Church, in what regards the admission of Candidates into the religious or conventual state of life, we may remark, that, in order to afford due time and opportunity, for calm deliberate reflection, to the Aspirants to Christian perfection in the cloister, it is an established usage, that even before the Candidate is allowed to assume the religious habit, (a ceremony which subjects the party to no obligation whatever) a previous strict probation of some months is premised. During that probation, the dispositions and qualifications of the Aspirant are carefully noted by the Senior professed Members of the community, which the Candidate wishes to join. If, at the expiration of the appointed term of this first probation, they conscientiously declare, that the proposed Candidate has satisfactorily evinced, that she is possessed of the health, talents, and pious dispositions, which will fit her for the useful fulfilment of the duties she will have to discharge, she is then admitted to the second probation in the Novitiate, for a period of not less than two years. At the close of this second probation, the more experienced of the professed Sisters are again required, to give their unbiassed suffrages on the subject of the admission of the Novice, to contract the three perpetual religious vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience. If the suffrages be favourable, the Bishop on being duly satisfied, that the decision of the Novice to enter into religion has been freely and prudently come to, ratifies the suffrages and receives the vows of the Candidate.

From this brief but faithful narrative, it becomes at once evident, that whilst the Catholic Church, like her Divine Founder encourages those of her Children who would be perfect, to leave all things and follow Christ, She, at the same time, employs all the rules of a well regulated prudence, to prevent the awful obligations of the Religious State, from being hastily or rashly contracted by any of her Communion.

If among the Children of the World, in the formation especially of matrimonial alliances, one hundreth part of the precautionary care were adopted, which the Church makes use of, when there is question of engaging permanently in the Religious State of life, from how many dreadful evils and scandals would not Society be happily exempted? But, No! on every day, in every country of Christendom, thousands rush headlong into the state of Matrimony, reckless of the sacred and solemn responsibilities annexed to it for life, and wholly unprepared for the fulfilment of them. Yet, the constant recurrence of this frightful and almost universal evil is everywhere witnessed, it may be said, without concern or rather with utter indifference, even by those who often indulge in flippant declamation upon the Religious state of life, and the wise, and salutary discipline, by which the Church excludes from that state, all who have not by a competent probation, proved themselves qualified to bring to perfection, by the aid of Divine Grace, the great work which they began, when they first entered into the Novitiate.

The following extract from the Ritual employed in the reception or admission to the Novitiate of a Candidate for the Loretto Institute, will suffice to show the kind Maternal anxiety of the Church, to admonish her of the difficulties of the Religious life; in order, that she may betimes ponder well upon them, before she engage irrevocably in that Vocation:—

"My child, what do you demand?

The Postulante answers, kneeling, in an audible tone of voice:—

My Lord, I ardently desire, and humbly entreat of God, through the intercession of the Blessed Virgin Mary, St. Joseph, and all the Saints, to be clothed with the Spirit of Jesus Christ, to die to the world, and to receive the Habit of the Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary, with the view of being exercised during the Novitiate in a spiritual life, and the instruction of youth, for which I most humbly crave your Grace's prayers, and those of all here present."

The Bishop says:—

"As many trials and difficulties which may not be foreseen in speculation are to be encountered in the practice of what you propose, you have need, my dear child of powerful graces, and supernatural assistance, to render the yoke of the Lord sweet, and his burthen light, for which reason the Church endeavours to sanctify by its blessing every step of your entrance into the service of God, and implores the Father of Mercies to bestow on you the graces of which you stand in need. The special graces which are necessary for you, are, in the first place, perseverance, lest resembling those who having put their hand to the plough, look back, you should thus deserve that our Lord should reject you, as being unworthy to partake of his kingdom. It is only perseverance that shall receive the crown of immortality. We beseech the Lord to bestow it on you, while in his name we impart to you his Blessing.

The Bishop at the opening of the Solemnity thus addresses the Postulante:

In the same spirit, at the conclusion of the Ceremonial, the Bishop again admonishes her in the following brief but affecting language:—

"I can now, my dear child, address you, as St. Paul did the primitive Christians: "Now, therefore, you are no longer a Stranger and a Foreigner, but you are a fellow-citizen with the Saints, and the Domestic of God." Be it now your duty to honour, by the sanctity of your life, the Holy Habit which you have put on, and to merit by your faithful correspondence with the merciful designs of God in your regard, the further grace of being admitted to Holy Profession."

We shall close our notice of the interesting and impressive Solemnity under consideration, with our congratulations to our Calcutta Catholic Brethren, on the important accession made here on last Wednesday, to the number of the Candidates for the Loretto Institute—an Institute, which has already conferred on them benefits, great indeed, but yet only the beginning and source of yet more copious blessings, to be transmitted to a future generation. The names of the Postulantes received on the occasion just mentioned, are Miss Alice Hodson,—Sister Margaret; Miss Catherine Croker,—Sister Baptiste; and Mrs. Gallagher, a Widow, called in Religion, Sister Monica.

SUPREMACY OF THE SUCCESSOR OF ST. PETER.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

Rome dont le destin dans la paix, dans la guerre,
Est d' être en tous les temps maîtresse de la terre;
Rome destined to enjoy perpetual sway,
Thy power Supreme all nations shall obey.
Voltaire's Henriade.

Sir,—As it would infringe perhaps too much on your time and space, to prove that the Supremacy was vested in St. Peter by Christ Himself, I shall pass on, and show, that this supreme power in spiritual matters, was exercised by him at the first Council of Jerusalem. That Council it appears was convened, for the purpose of settling some dissensions, that then prevailed at Antioch; the Jewish Converts there, had strongly insisted, that all Gentiles embracing the Christian Faith, should be subjected to the rite of circumcision and the legal observances. These rites, Paul and Barnabas labored to dissuade the Gentiles from receiving; observing, that they ought not to be imposed upon their brethren in the faith; since the Christian dispensation had entirely set them free from them. But notwithstanding all their efforts to wean the people from the ceremonial: so deep-rooted were their prejudices in its favour, that two Apostles found themselves unable to stem the tide of opposition, which set in so powerfully against them.

In this critical emergency, which seemed to threaten the peace of the Church, it was resolved upon, that, as a last resource for the final settling of the matter under dispute, the subject should be referred for adjudication, to a council of the Apostles at Jerusalem. Accordingly, a council being convened, St. Peter presided as its Head, in which after much unnecessary disputation had taken place, without a likelihood of coming to an amicable termination of the matter at issue, St. Peter interposes his authority and settles the case for ever, by telling them—"That God did not intend to put a yoke upon the necks of the disciples, which their forefathers were unable to bear, that He Himself with his brethren in the ministry, though they had submitted to the Ceremony of Circumcision, yet believed, that through the Grace of Jesus Christ they would be saved." These words uttered in a meek, humble but authoritative manner, had the desired effect of calming their angry feelings, of dissipating their deep cherished prejudices, of restoring to them once more peace and harmony, and finally of settling the question under discussion for ever. All the multitude says the sacred text, held their peace; not a single murmur of disapprobation escaped their lips, not a dissenting voice was heard, to protest against the decision given by him, who presided there in the capacity of Christ's vicegerent upon earth. The loud voice of former opposition was now hushed for ever, since the presiding chief had spoken, and the angry bickerings that heretofore existed, now gave way to love and friendship, to peace and unanimity. In a word, harmony of mind, and unity of spirit once more reigned amongst them,—the letter of the council, drawn up in the name of the Apostles, and ancients, is declared to emanate from the Holy Ghost. "It hath seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us" &c.

Whilst, almost all the writers of antiquity speak of it, as the sentence or decree of St. Peter, St. Jerom says that Peter was the author of it. Theodoret the celebrated Bishop of Oyd, writing to Leo on the foregoing discussion, respecting the observance of the law of circumcision, thus speaks of the Supremacy of Peter in the council of Jerusalem. "If Paul who was the herald of truth, the organ of the holy spirit had recourse to the great Peter, in order to obtain a decision from him concerning the observance of the law, for those who disputed at Antioch on this subject, with much greater reason they who are abject and meek have recourse to your Apostolic See, that we may receive from you remedies for the wounds of the churches. For it is fit that you in all things should be first, since your throne is adorned with many prerogatives." St. Chrysostom too, speaking of the discussion at Antioch, and the subsequent council of Jerusalem eulogises in a very flattering strain, the wisdom of Peter in permitting the dispute about circumcision to go on for some time, before he interposed his Supreme Authority. "See says he; he allows the enquiry and dispute to go on, and then he himself speaks." Tertullian also describes the Supremacy of Peter in this council. 'The decree of Peter says he, loosed such things of the law as were set aside, and bound fast such as were retained.' Even the Protestant Baron candidly confesses the prominent or leading part that Peter bore in this council. At the Convention (says he) of the Apostles and Elders about resolving the debate concerning the observance of Mosaical Institutions he (Peter) first rose up and declared his sense. Again the same candid author says "In the promulgation of the Gospel, and defence thereof, before the Jewish rulers, he (Peter) did assume the conduct, and constantly upon him to be speaker, the rest standing by him, implying assent and ready to avow his word."

Hoping, that the foregoing will be acceptable.

I remain Sir,

Your most obdt. servant,

C. C.

Calcutta,
Jan. 27th, 1851.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

Sit mihi fas audita loqui. What I have heard permit me to relate.

The Honourable Sir W. W. Burton's Work entitled, the State of Religion and Education in New South Wales. London: Simpkin and Marshall 1840.

Sir.—In your Journal of the 25th instant, there is a very interesting account given of a visit paid by the Honourable Judge Burton, to the several Catholic Institutions of Calcutta. The object of the Learned Gentleman's visit according to your report was not for the purpose of gratifying an idle curiosity, but rather for the more honourable one, of ascertaining by personal inspection their mode of instruction, and how far education was diffused over this extensive country. The mode of imparting instruction pursued in the forementioned establishments, as well as the proficiency of the pupils in the several departments of science and literature, must have highly gratified the feelings of the Learned Judge, since your report makes him speak thus at his departure. "That of all the agreeable days he had passed, since his arrival in Calcutta, not one could be compared to that, on which he had the pleasure of witnessing the blessings bestowed by these Institutions, on the rising youth of this great Metropolis." This declaration of the Learned Judge, shows how pleased he must have been, at what he witnessed. And great indeed must be his admiration, since he reiterates his former sentiments respecting them, in a letter to his Grace the Archbishop. The worthy and Learned Gentleman it seems, takes a very deep interest in the state of education, and its progress, in the several parts of the world, which he occasionally visits. In the year 1840, he published a work on the State of Religion and Education in New South Wales, in which he bears testimony to the increase of Catholicity in that rising Colony, and pays a tribute of esteem and admiration to the deep devotion and fervent piety which in some cases characterise its Catholic inhabitants. In the year 1833, according to the Learned Judge's testimony, the Catholics there did not exceed seventeen thousand two hundred and thirty eight; whilst in thirty six, their numbers had increased to twenty one thousand, eight hundred and ninety eight.

Before the arrival of Dr. Ullathorne in that Colony, only one or two Priests administered to the spiritual wants of the entire Catholic body, so that this deficiency of Pastors duly commissioned from above, to break unto them the bread of life, may account for the rather slow progress of Catholicity in these parts, previously to the period referred to. But, afterwards, when the grievance was removed by the introduction of British Priests, the sacred, solemn, and sublime truths of Catholicity began so rapidly to gain ground, (in spite of every opposition) as to convince even the most sceptical, that its origin must be divine; so much indeed, has Catholicity spread in this Colony, within the last few years, that it is supposed, that in a few years more, the Catholic will be there the prevailing religion, —Thus outliving in immortal youth, the war of Controversy, the wreck of heresy, and the crush of unbelief. A glance at the back numbers of the Herald, wherein the articles on the amazing increase of Catholicity in New South Wales are contained, will at once convince the reader, that the foregoing assertion is not imaginary, but that it rests on respectable authority. In the work already referred to, the Honourable and Learned Judge gives one or two striking illustrations of the fervent piety, which characterised some of the early Catholic inhabitants of that colony. It seems that a Priest when leaving Sydney, had left the holy Sacrament in the house of a very pious Catholic, in order that the faithful might occasionally resort there, to offer up their prayers and receive comfort in their miseries. Accordingly, the faithful did assemble there at certain stated periods, to strengthen their faith in the hour of need, by obtaining an increase of those heavenly graces promised by Jesus Christ Himself to all who come to crave them, when He says "Come to me all you that labour, and are heavy burthened, and I will refresh you," Upon the foregoing inspiring scene, the Honourable and Learned Judge, thus expresses himself.* "It is remarkably beautiful to contemplate these men of sorrow round the bread of life, bowed down before the Crucified; no voice but the silent one of faith, not a Priest within ten thou-

* Whilst we concur with the Writer of this letter in paying to Judge Burton, the meed of praise to which he is entitled, we deem it right to remark, that in narrating the occurrence here referred to, the Hon'ble Gentleman, doubtless through inadvertence, makes use of certain expressions in reference to Catholics, so offensive, that the Protestant Reviewer of the Judge's Work on Australia, in the British Critic No. 54, expresses his regret at the oversight in the following words:—

'It, as we think, is no very becoming language from one who we doubt not most firmly believes the words spoken of this blessed sacrament in our own catechism. At all events the zeal of these Romanists, which made them adopt this expedient, lest they should be cut off from that which we as well as they believe to be generally necessary to salvation, affords a contrast not very favourable to the lukewarmness indifference of those who with ourselves hold a purer faith, and yet the same faith. For we should not forget that the sacraments of the Church of Rome are still sacraments, and as such, we doubt not, accompanied by a life-giving influence, though grievous errors have unawares crept into their administration as well as into her other rites and ceremonies. A tone other than that which the subject authorizes, seems to us, though we may be mistaken, to pervade the notice of this private reception of the blessed sacrament by these outcasts from their Church. These private communicants did indeed that which is not allowed by our own Church, but they did all they could; they did that which was commanded them by those whom they believe to be the authorized rulers of the communion to which they belong. It was an act of faith, at most an ill-judged one; yet as an act of faith may be pleasing to God. Some of the most pious of our own communion, the non-jurors, seem to have allowed a similar practice in cases of emergency. In one of their books of devotion a form is introduced for the private reception of the communion by those who are unable to attend its public celebration."—British Critic and Quarterly Theological Review, No. LIV. Art VI. p. 436.

sand miles to offer them that pledge of pardon to repentance, whose near presence, they see, and feel.". What sentiments are the foregoing, coming as they do from a Protestant, so high in rank, in power and station, as Judge Burton unquestionably is? And how ought it to rejoice every true and sincere Catholic, to see the words of the Poet verified. "Talis Cum sis, utinam et Noster esses." When the misty vapours of early prejudice, education, and sectarianism were so far removed; would to God, he had gone a little further and become a Catholic. In the course of his travels, Mr. Justice Burton visited Norfolk Island, and thus describes the mental agony, that a poor Convict sentenced to die, endured through the want of a Catholic Priest to confess himself. "Another (says the learned Judge) took ingenious advantage of some discrepancy in the evidence to make a powerful appeal to the Judge, founded upon his assertion of his own innocence, and that his person was mistaken. And finding that appeal ineffectual, and that he was sentenced to die, he broke out in the most moving and passionate exclamations and intreaties, that he might not die without the benefit of confession. 'Oh, your Honor, he said' as you hope to be saved yourself, do not let me die without seeing my Priest'. 'I have been a very wicked man indeed, I ought to die, but do not send me out of the world without seeing my Priest'. Poor soul he was a Roman Catholic; And after this he was taken away to his Cell, and in a miserable agony, employed his time in embracing a rudely constructed figure of the Cross, which a fellow-prisoner of the same persuasion had made for him, and incessantly pronounced those brief exclamations for mercy, which such a one could teach him." Such sir is the Honourable and Learned Judge's testimony of the effects of Catholicism in the far distant clime of New South Wales. His testimony is honourable.—It does credit to his heart and head, that though professing a different religion, he writes so commendably on the ways of those that happen to differ from him. And should he write a work on the state of Education and Religion in India, similar to the one which he has written about New South Wales, it is to be humbly hoped that he will show us the same Justice here, that he has shown to our Brethren elsewhere.

I remain Sir,
Your most obdt. servant,
T. U. R.

BISHOP OLLIFFE'S LETTER TO HIS GRACE THE MOST REV. DR. CAREW ARCHBISHOP V. A. W. B.

My dear Lord Archbishop,—I have the pleasure to inform your Grace that I have just visited Jessore, and ascertained the extent of its spiritual necessities. A great number of French and other Catholic planters are scattered over the district, but generally at a great distance from the Civil Station. Hence the difficulty of visiting them in the dry seasons. The best time therefore to do so, is at the beginning, or towards the height of the inundation in August, when a boat can travel over the paddy fields from factory to factory. This of course is also the least expensive, as well as the most convenient mode of visiting the district. The number of Native Christians in the station itself, is small, and I heard that they are Baptists. A Deputy Magistrate resides at Magra on the Nabogunga, which place is most central with reference to the Factories, and he himself (a Mr. Cockburn), would I am sure most readily put a Clergyman in the way of doing his business efficaciously.

I must not conclude this brief account of Jessore, without adding that Mr. Steer the acting Judge there, entertained me most kindly, and that I had the happiness, together with Rev. Mr. Krick, to celebrate the Divine Mysteries in his house, at which most of the European Protestants assisted. The station can be reached by dâk in 16 hours from Calcutta, and that mode of travelling so far, would hardly exceed the expense of a boat, (with provisions) for 8 days. The Postmaster Dr. Palmer, a very kind person, would give every information on that subject.

Rev. Mr. Krick, who was very useful to me during my visit, writes in most respectful compliments to your Grace, and in every good wish for the prosperity of the new Jessore mission, while,

I have the honor to remain,
My dear Lord Archbishop,
Your's most resptly. attached in Christ, ✠ Thos. Olliffe, Bp.
and V. A. B. B.

Calcutta,
Jany. 28*th*, 1851.

RANGOON.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

Dear Sir,—I was reading in the "Friend of India," of the 23rd January, an extract from the Englishman of a few days back regarding the fire at Rangoon, and the dreadful havock committed by that destructive element for several miles around; no doubt you might have seen the article, and perhaps the paragraph I am about to quote from it may have escaped your attention; but, which I am induced to notice as having forcibly struck me as a beautiful proof for our separated brethren of the truth of our Holy Religion, exhibited by an Almighty Hand.

After enumerating a great portion of the losses sustained during this terrific visitation the Rangoon Correspondant proceeds:—

'The Catholic Church was saved as it were by a miracle. Already had the devouring element consumed the enclosures by which it was surrounded, and its fate seemed sealed, when on an instant the breeze shifted to the opposite quarter, turned the course of the flames, and left the Church a solitary Monument of this most dreadful conflagration.'

Really how mysterious are the ways of Providence; at a time when religious controversy is the topic of the day, and almost every newspaper rings with calumnies against the Catholic Church, its Divine founder wonderfully preserves it during an awful scourge, and although He showers His wrath on the Country and a Church of another denomination shares in the destruction, the dwelling place of the Most High remains unscathed 'a solitary Monument.'

Such was the described desolation of the place that the few who were saved could not discern where their houses stood, but the House of God stands erect; the people suffered the vengeance of God in retribution for their crimes, but His Holy Church deserved no punishment, it can 'never err,' and therefore remained firm as the rock upon which it is built, with outstretched arms, as the only shelter for those repentant ones who are desirous to be reconciled to an offended maker.

Trusting you will excuse this long letter in consideration of the feelings which have dictated it; and begging a place for its insertion in your next issue,

I remain, dear Sir,
Your sincere well-wisher,
A CATHOLIC CONVERT.

Jany. 27th, 1851.

LECTURES ON CERTAIN DIFFICULTIES FELT BY ANGLICANS IN SUBMITTING TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, PRIEST OF THE ORATORY OF ST. PHILIP NERI. LECTURE IV: &c. &c.

(Continued from our last.)

When I thus represent the idea of the movement, of which I am speaking, I must not be supposed to overlook or deny it its theological, or its ritual, or its practical character; but I am speaking of what may be called its form. If I said that the one doctrine of Luther was justification by faith only, or of Wesley, the doctrine of the new birth, I should not be denying that they respectively taught many others; but merely should mean that their teaching was cast in that particular shape which I have mentioned, each portion in detail being made subservient to its inculcation. In like manner, the writers of the Apostolical party of 1833, were earnest and copious in their enforcement of the high doctrines of the faith, of dogmatism, of the sacramental principle, of the sacraments (as far as the Anglican Prayer Book admitted them), of ceremonial observances, of practical duties, and of the counsels of perfection; but, considering all those great articles of teaching to be protected and guaranteed by the independence of the Church, and in that way alone, they viewed sanctity, and sacramental grace, and dogmatic fidelity, merely as subordinate to the mystical body of Christ, and made them minister to her sovereignty, that she might in turn protect them in their prerogatives. Dogma would be maintained, sacraments would be administered, religious perfection would be venerated and attempted, if the Church were supreme in her spiritual power; dogma would be sacrificed to expedience, sacraments would be rationalized, perfection would be ridiculed, if she was made the slave of the State. Erastianism then was the one heresy which practically cut at the root of all revealed truth; the man who held it would soon fraternize with Unitarians, mistake the bustle of life for religious obedience, and pronounce his butler as able to give communion as his priest. It destroyed the supernatural altogether, by making most emphatically Christ's kingdom a kingdom of the world. Such was the teaching of the movement of 1833. The whole system of revealed truth was, according to it, to be carried out upon the Anti-Erastian or Apostolical basis. The independence of the Church is almost the one subject of three out of four volumes of Mr. Froude's Remains; it is, in one shape or other, the prevailing subject of the early numbers of the "Tracts for the Times," as well as of other publications which might be named. It was for this that the writers of whom I speak had recourse to Antiquity, insisted upon the Apostolical succession, exalted the Episcopate, and appealed to the people, not only because these things were true and right, but to preserve them by uttering them; in order to their firmer reception, they introduced them in the first instance as means towards the inculcation of the idea of the Church, as constituent portions of that great idea, which, when it once should be received, was to convert the world.

"Our one tangible object," it was said, in a passage too long to be extracted at length, "is to restore the connexion, at present broken, between Bishops and people; for in this every thing is involved, directly or indirectly, for which it is a duty to contend. We wish to maintain the faith, and bind men together in love. We are aiming, with this view, at that commanding moral influence which attended the early Church, which made it attractive and persuasive, which manifested itself in a fascination, sufficient to elicit out of Paganism and draw into itself all that was noblest and best from the mass of mankind; and which created an internal system of such grace, beauty, and majesty, that believers were moulded thereby into martyrs and evangelists. If master-minds are ever granted to us, they must be persevering in insisting on the Episcopal system, the Apostolical succession, the ministerial commission, the power of the keys, the duty and desirableness of Church discipline, the sacredness of Church rites and ordinances. But, you will say, how is all this to be made interesting to the people? I answer, that the topics themselves which they are to preach, are of that warm and attractive nature, which carries with it its own influence. The very notion that representatives of the Apostles are now on earth, from whose communion we may obtain grace, as the first Christians did from the Apostles, is surely, when admitted, of a most transporting and persuasive character. Clergymen are at present subject to the painful experience of losing the more religious portion of their flocks, whom they have tutored and moulded as children, but who, as they come into life, fall away to the Dissenters. Why is this? They desire to be stricter than the mass of Churchmen, and the Church gives them no means; they desire to be governed by motives more constraining than those of mere argument, and the Church keeps back those doctrines, which, to the eye of faith, give a reality and substance to religion. One who is told that the Church is the treasure-house of spiritual gifts, comes for a definite privilege. Men know not of the legitimate priesthood, and, therefore, are condemned to hang upon the judgment of individuals and self-authorized preachers; they put up with legends of private Christians, in the place of the men of God, the meek martyrs, the saintly doctors, the wise and winning teachers of the Catholic Church*."

Passages such as this, which is but a portion of a whole, show to me, my brethren, clearly enough, that these men understood the nature of the Church far better than they understood the nature of the Establishment, which they sought to defend. They saw in it, indeed, a contrariety to their Apostolical principles, but they seem to have fancied that such contrariety was an accident in its constitution, and was capable of a cure. They did not understand that the Establishment was set up in Erastianism, that Erastianism was its essence, and that to destroy Erastianism was to destroy the Establishment. The movement, then, and the Establishment, were in simple antagonism from the first, although neither party knew it; they were logical contradictories; they could not be true together; what was the life of the one, was the death of the other. The sole ambition of the Establishment was to be the creature of the State; the sole aspiration of the movement was to force it to act for itself. The movement went forth on the face of the country: it read, it preached, it published; it addressed itself to logic and to poetry: it was antiquarian and architectural, only to do for the Establishment what the Establishment considered the most intolerable of disservices: every breath, every sigh, every aspiration, every effort of the movement was an affront or an offence to the Establishment. In its very first Tract, it could wish nothing better for the Bishops of the Establishment than martyrdom, and, as the very easiest escape, it augured for them the loss of their temporal possessions. It was easy to foresee what response the Establishment would make to its officious defenders, as soon as it could recover from its surprise; but experience was necessary to teach this to men who knew more of St. Athanasius than of the Privy Council or the Court of Arches.

(To be continued.)

* British Magazine, April, 1839.

DUBLIN REVIEW.

ART. XI.—The Manual of Devotion, By Ambrose Lisle Phillips, Esq. Derby; 1843.

(Continued from our last.)

It has often struck us, that many who, in latter times, have not scrupled to use the coldest, and even disrespectful, language respecting her, would shrink from the idea of acting similarly towards her, had they lived in her day, and had her near. When, particularly, we have heard the indignation of fancied zeal break from female lips against any respect being paid, or devotion expressed towards her who is the peerless glory, the matchless jewel of her sex, we have been led to think how differently the heart that gave the tongue such utterance would have felt, had its compassion been claimed by the venerable matron, whose bereavement of the best of Sons had been caused for its sake. Many who can speak unkindly of her in heaven, would have melted into compassion over her on earth; would have kissed with deep reverential awe the hand that had lifted from the ground and received into a maternal embrace the same sacred body, just born, and just dead—the infant and the corpse: and would have deemed it a privilege inestimable, if granted them, to listen, low upon the ground, to her many tales of joy and sorrow, —glowing in her delight, and softening in her griefs, and exulting in her triumphs. That some holy souls partook of such happiness, no one can doubt. During the years that she survived her Son, she conversed with His and her friends, an object surely of affectionate regard and deep veneration. And of what would she discourse so willingly and so well, as of Him of whom her breast was ever full? Or, how would they express their love, better than by making Him their theme? How easily does the imagination depict the scene of some faithful follower, like Luke, anxious to have accurate knowledge of all things from the beginning, making enquiries concerning the earlier periods of our Lord's life; and then listening to the marvellous history most sweetly told:—how fair and reverent the Archangel came and how her heart fluttered when she heard his salutation, and how her soul overflowed with consciousness of unheard-of grace, as she accepted his errand: how wonderfully Elizabeth greeted her, and how their infants mysteriously rejoiced in mutual recognition; how that cold December night was warmed and brightened by the first appearance of her god-like child, and her breast enraptured with heavenly delights, as He thence drew His first earthly nourishment: how holy Simeon proclaimed His dignity, and showed Him honour in the temple; and how her three days' tears were dried up, when she found her lost Son, sitting mild, and radiant with celestial wisdom, amidst the old men of the law. What looks, what emotions accompany the [illegible] With what breathless respect is it [illegible] in by the future evangelist! Or, we fancy John more privileged to tread upon tenderer ground, on which both have walked together,—the path of the cross, on some sad anniversary, dwelling with her upon each afflicting event, recalling faithfully every sacred word, till she voluntarily felt over again the sword of grief which had pierced her soul. And then would he not change the theme, and pass over to the bright Sunday morning, which saw Him rise from the grave to comfort the sharers of His sufferings, and to show He mounted before them all to His proper seat, at the Father's right-hand, and thence sent down His holy Spirit on them? And who would now restrain her thoughts from following Him in spirit thither, and casting up a wistful glance towards the resting-place for which she longed, in which she saw Him, her sovereign love, prepared to receive and crown her, when the fulness of her time shall be complete, and the perfection of her patience manifested?

(To be continued.)

Selections.

ENTHRONISATION OF CARDINAL WISEMAN.

Yesterday the ceremonial prescribed by the Roman Catholic Church for the induction of an archbishop to his see, was performed at the church of St. George's, Southwark. Considering the great excitement which prevails, on the subject of Cardinal Wiseman's installation, it might have been expected that some indications of that excitement would have been presented to view. But the reverse was the fact. The precincts of the building wore the usual aspect of tranquility, and the exterior calm was reflected by silence inside doors.

The sombre character of St. George's derived additional dimness from one of the foggiest mornings of the winter season. Nor was artificial lustre, that gorgeous accessary to the service of the Roman Catholic Church, much restored to, in aid of the feeble light which glimmered through the windows of St. George's. For half an hour after visitors were admitted to their seats nothing preparatory was observable, the organ was hushed and the choir silent; but about half past 11, the preparations were observable in every part of the edifice. An acolyte came in this direction with a thurible; another carried a cru- [illegible] to one. The order for forming the procession was given by the tolling of a bell, and the attendant clergy of the new archdiocese formed into regular order at its summons. The Cardinal himself, robed in scarlet and white, and wearing a small scarlet cap, proceeded from his flowing vests borne by two [illegible]. After a brief pause, at the extreme [illegible] navs of the church, the choir commenced chaunting the 'Hallelujah,' from Beethoven's 'Mount of Olives,' and presently the procession was observed to move up the nave in the direction of the central altar. Foremost was borne the cross, with lighted candles on either side. Then came the Roman Catholic clergy subject to the new archdiocesan's jurisdiction two by two, habited according to their respective ranks and orders. The peculiarity of the Oratorian costume was striking. At length the Cardinal himself appeared, wearing a gorgeous mitre and pallium. A canopy, fringed with silk and gold, was borne over his path by (it was stated) the 'converts' exclusively. There were about two hundred between the secular clergy and the various religious orders in the procession. Lastly came Dr. Doyle, robed in the usual sacrificial vestments, proceeded by Dr. Cox, the Rev. Mr. Cotter, and the Rev. Mr. Daniel, as masters of the ceremony, deacon, and sub-deacon. Having reached the screen which fronts the sanctuary, the Cardinal was led into small compartment at the left of the principal altar, called the Chapel of the Blessed Eucharist, whence, after a brief interval, the procession moved within the sanctuary, Cardinal Wiseman kneelling at the foot of the altar, and the celebrant clergyman ascending its steps—assisted by the deacon and sub-deacon. The customary form of prayer having been read, the mitre, which had been exchanged for a scarlet cap a short time before, was formally placed upon the head of the new archbishop, whilst the crosier, emblematic of his authority, was also placed in his hands. He was then conducted to the arch-episcopal chair, at the foot of which the body of the clergy made the usual obeisance —kissing the Cardinal's ring in recognition of his spiritual authority. The solemnities of high mass were then proceeded with; after which the Bull was publicly read, in virtue of which Cardinal Wiseman assumes arch-episcopal jurisdiction of Westminster. The proceedings closed with the presentation of an address to the new archbishop and an exhortation, in which he impressed upon his clergy the duties and obligations incidental to their important mission.

The Cardinal ascended the pulpit, having the mitre on his head and the crosier in his hand. His train was borne by Mr. P. Searle and the Rev. G. Wenham, the deacons, who remained by his side in the pulpit. He addressed the audience nearly as follows:—

'In the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy [illegible] have this day been a witness. It is natural, so obvious, that it may be said not to be, strictly speaking, of an ecclesiastical character. It is only employed in the more solemn forms which the church always uses. It is a customary and almost a spontaneous mode of giving expression and solemnity to any public appointment. You are aware that in this city, that in every commonwealth, those who receive any post requiring the public exercise of functions, are not merely appointed thereto by the word of the sovereign, or of whomsoever has the power of so appointing, but there is some public ceremony or form gone through, whereby they are said to be installed in their new office—that is to say, that the public are thereby made acquainted that from that moment forward they enter into the actual exercise of those duties and the enjoyment of those privileges of which they were before fully possessed. For let it not be understood, dear brethren, that when a bishop takes possession for the first time of his see, or of his cathedral that he becomes by that act invested with jurisdiction, or authority, or, power, or prerogative of any sort. That must come from a superior source. That must be bestowed upon him by a competent authority. This is only a proclaiming to the faithful, to the clergy and flock, that he has come publicly to discharge the duties of his office. It has been my happiness, to day, solemnly and in the presence of God's altar, to take possession of that seat of dignity, indeed, but of heavy responsibility, in which it has pleased the supreme power of the church to place me. I will therefore rather content myself with explaining what more particularly is the meaning of this function when employed in the Catholic Church. From its very commencement it has been usual to associate the idea of the episcopal seat, as it is called in the Catholic ritual, with the exercise of episcopal jurisdiction and the discharge of pontifical duties. When we descend into the very catacombs themselves, we are delighted, though perhaps somewhat surprised to find, as has been the case in some of the most recent discoveries, that in front of the altar, and above the very tombs of martyrs, in one of those solemn temples which were made for the public service of the Christians, in the time of persecutions a marble fixed throne or seat, facing the people, so that he who presided, seated there, would instruct the humbler crowds of the persecuted followers of Christ who gathered around him, in that, the first abode of sublime Christian truth. And no sooner had the Christians emerged from those, their hiding places, and either taken possession of the temples of the heathens, or had built for themselves those Basilicas which yet remain as a monument of early Christian zeal, than pursuing, as far as they could, the example of their predecessors, they placed the episcopal throne at the very extremity of the church—a fixed, a stable, immoveable well built up throne round which the presbyters sat, and before which the altar stood; so that by the stability of that seat and the permanency of the session, the everlasting unity and sameness of the doctrines there to be taught might be fully and completely symbolised; and so those seats and sees of the ancient bishops of Rome preserved their character. They still remain in the place in which they were occupied by the venerated pontiffs in early ages, and we see even that the piety of the faithful has since sculptured upon them the very homilies which they recited to their flocks. Thus, then, my brethren, came the idea of the pontifical chair, or seat, to be associated with the discharge of the great office of a bishop, that of teaching sound doctrine to his flock—and that word which at first signified only that chair in which he sat, came by degrees to be synonymous with the extent of his jurisdiction. Hence the see of a bishop is the same as his 'seat' in our own language, as it is in the Latin and other foreign languages in which the throne or chair of a bishop is expressed by the same word as the see or diocese over which he has jurisdiction. Hence that the word intimates that a bishop's taking possession of his seat, see, or throne, was the same as to say that he had taken possession of the entire diocese committed to his care. And, in fact, my brethren, the connexion between being seated on the chair and the having authority to teach, is so natural and obvious that our beloved Redeemer himself was pleased to make use of it, and to employ it in a manner that affords us great instruction; for at the time that he was reproving the corrupt practices of the rulers of Israel, he was pleased to say to his followers—'On the chair of Moses the Scribes have sat, whatever, therefore, they shall tell you to do, that do. In other words—'By the fact of their being in possession of the seat of authority which has been held in the synagogue from the time of Moses they have acquired a right to your obedience whenever they impose on you religious commands,—though it was obliged to add the caution—that their works his followers were not to imitate.' Then, the taking possession of the chair implied the taking charge of that deposit of faith, of those truths, which each bishop had received from his predecessor, and which he was bound to hand down unimpaired. Hence, the foundation of a church by the constitution of a new chair or see became an object of such veneration as to lead to the establishment of festivals to preserve its memory, for the church yet commemorates the establishment of the two great sees of Antioch and Rome, both being founded by the same saint, the prince of the apostles, and in the Catholic Church to this day the chairs of St. Peter at Antioch and at Rome are to be found in the calendar as days of solemn observance. We know that every church commemorated by yearly festival the original establishment of an episcopal see, and the great St. Augustine tells us that one church solemnised the establishment of an episcopal see in another or neighbouring church. Then, my brethren, when here we have these two combined—when, not only the chair is taken possession of this day in this church, but the first act of that new ecclesiastical jurisdiction is solemnly performed which our Holy Father has been pleased to grant to his Catholic children in England—it should undoubtedly be a day of rejoicing and thanksgiving—not because any one given individual has been raised to dignity or distinguished by honours which none is more conscious than himself how little he deserves, but because God has again restored here to us a chair, a seat, in which Catholic doctrine such as is recognised by the whole Catholic Church is taught: and though through the divine mercy, that chain of Catholic tradition which formerly had a link added to it by each successive prelate in every see in this country, had not been altogether broken among us—though in the humbler ministration of the pastors of God's dispersed flock unity of faith and of discipline had been inviolably preserved—though during that interval of three hundred years the communion of Catholics in this country with their Supreme head, and with the bishops of the church, has been uninterrupted; yet surely we must feel that it is a consolation to us and a privilege to be again put on that same footing on which the churches of our Catholic neighbours are—a position in which the bishop sits, not merely by a simple delegated authority, but himself holds a see in which he is divinely authorised to teach. Then, what consequences flow from this? As far as I am concerned, I feel that I have this day taken upon myself a solemn engagement, in the sight of God, so engagement, not which can add strength to my previous convictions, but which may add more solemnity to them in the face of the church; an engagement not to sacrifice or to compromise any, the smallest tittle, of the faith, the glorious faith, of the universal Catholic Church; but as I have received it so to hand it down to him whom it may please Almighty God to appoint as my successor, so as to be able to say 'I have preserved the faith'—that it has not been allowed to be weakened or perverted during the time that it had been in my keeping; that I have not withdrawn from you anything committed to my charge, anything that is useful or profitable towards your eternal salvation; but endeavour, however imperfectly, still with all zeal, to keep together the sheep of God's pasture, and to exhort myself to the very utmost by every legitimate and holy means in my power to propagate that faith, to extend the tabernacles of God's true abode, and to increase the sheepfold of the Son of God, that it may take in many who, though not of this fold, do wish to join the communion of His own true Catholic Church. Then on your side, dearly beloved brethren, you hereby enter into a compact with me not to listen to evil doctrines: not that I accuse you, for of your docility and teachableness I surely have no cause to complain. But that you will aid and support me by your prayers, by your supplications day by day, to the throne of mercy, that God will bless, will confirm, will maintain the work, that He has begun; and that the faith may not be shaken by any efforts of men, and that it may not be weakened by any individual imperfections of the individual chosen, but that, protected by the right hand of God, it may go on brightly and calmly, in meek and patient bearing, but still in gradual and certain progression, ever to the end. Pray to Almighty God, especially, that he may preserve in our hearts determination to be true to the doctrines and precepts of our holy church, not by words only, but far more by example, to conserve and maintain that our religion, which teaches us to be submissive, and docile, and obedient, and affectionately attached and loyal to those powers which God, in his goodness and wisdom, has placed over us; that your religion makes you worthy and active members of everything that is good in society, attached to all that is sound and good in every part of the constitution of your country, that it makes you friendly, kind, and charitable to your fellow men, without distinction of creed or politics; and that it makes you able to bear with misunderstanding and misrepresentation, and disinclines us to wait till [illegible]'s appointed time. You, when oppressed or persecuted, show that your religion makes you good and virtuous. You members of every family with which you are connected—in your own or more strict communion—show charity to all—show them that your religion calls on you to be not only good men and honest, but serious, devout, holy, and to give an example of every good gift, however difficult it may appear in the eyes of men. That is the resolution, dearly beloved brethren, which I implore you to make this day; and with God's blessing on his flock, we may hope that from this day forward there will be a new race run in faith and in truth—in justice and in charity—a race in which the goal may be won by us all, and recollecting this duty and the solemnity imposed upon us, we may assure ourselves that God will give us our reward in the enjoyment of being hereafter around him in happiness and in the inexhaustible blessing of glory.'

His Eminence then pronounced a Benediction on the congregation.

His Eminence afterwards dined with twenty of the principal clergy, the largest number the refectory was capable of accomodating, and subsequently gave a grand soiree at the episcopal residence in Golden square.—Daily News, December 7.

THE MANIFESTO.

The Roman poet wrote in his Georgics:—

> "Acer Romanus in armis
> Injusto sub fasce viam carpit, et hosti
> Ante expectatum positis stat in agmine castris."

The Cardinal has astonished the natives. Our anti-Popery zealots hardly knew that Dr. Wiseman had left the 'Flaminian-Gate, when lo! he appears, and issues a Manifesto, in which he certainly deals slashing blows, right and left, among his assailants, even if he does not succeed in parrying all those that have been aimed at his own party. We have seldom read an abler specimen of controversial writing than this document, and the grace of its style, the simple clearness of its language (where it suits the writer to be clear), the polished keenness of its sarcasms, and the occasional beauty of its descriptions, make it as agreeable to the reader as it is able. The injudicious exhibitions in which certain grave judicial personages have lately indulged for the sake of acquiring popularity by their Protestant zeal, are admirably criticised by the calmly severe and courteously cruel Catholic champion. The pomps and riches of our Anglican clergy are made acutely prominent, when their ecclesiastic thunders against the new unendowed rival hierarchy are referred to. There is a skilful and seemingly frank appeal to the national love of fair play, and a well-worded protest against the mob violence with which the Catholics have in some instances been threatened during the recent excitement. Where the Cardinal handles our statesmen, he exposes their inconsistencies and vacillations in merciless though in apparently humble style. It is, in short, an admirable reply to a great number of bad advocates of the opposite side, so far as regards the exposure of their advocacy. But whether it grapples fairly with the substantial merits of the case, and proves its writer to have the best side of the issue, as well as the greatest cleverness in conducting it, is quite another affair. Dr. Wiseman maintains two points respecting the recent Papal parcelling out of England into new Bishoprics, and establishment of a Catholic hierarchy. He maintains, first, that it is strictly within the letter of the law of the land; and, secondly, that there is nothing in it at which the English nation might fairly be expected to take offence. These are the real points of his manifesto: not indeed thus expressly stated, for he is too adroit a disputant for that; but they form in substance his defence of what has been done; and it is essential to his success that he should prove both. In our opinion he has proved neither. But wholly disagreeing with the arguments of Cardinal Wiseman, we have no wish to see him or his suffragans either indicted or mobbed: Let them alone. Enough has been said and done to convince them, and their traitorous tractarian allies, of their error in thinking England ripe for Romanism. If the establishment of a rival hierarchy shame our own into a little more active Christianity, we shall have cause to rejoice at the appearance of 'the Illustrious Stranger' among us. There is ample room for such competition. There is a wide and dense field of misery, ignorance, and vice, to the reformation of which the Romanists, the Anglican, and the Dissenter, may apply their energies, and where, in the practice of the virtues of their common Christianity, they may forget the evil passions of their sectarian distinctions. We have been led to this reflection by a beautifully written passage at the close of Dr. Wiseman's manifesto, with which we also gladly close this notice:—

'The diocese, indeed, of Westminster, embraces a large district, but Westminster proper consists of two very different parts. One comprises the stately Abbey, with its adjacent palaces and precincts. To this portion the duties and residence of the Dean and Chapter are mainly confined, and they shall range there undisturbed. To the venerable old church I may repair, as I have been wont to do. But perhaps the Dean and Chapter are not aware that were I disposed to claim more than the right to tread the Catholic pavement of that noble building, and breathe its air of ancient consecration, another might step in with a prior claim. For successive generations there has existed ever, in the Benedictine order, an Abbot of Westminster, the representative, in religious dignity, of those who erected, and beautified, and governed that [illegible] and never they heard of any claim or protest on his part, touching their temporalities? Then let them fear no greater aggression now. Like him, I may visit, as I have said, the old Abbey, and say my prayer by the shrine of good St. Edward; and meditate on the golden times, when the Church filled without a coronation, and multitudes hourly worshipped without a service. But in their temporal rights, or their quiet possession of any dignity and title, they will not suffer. Whenever I go in, I will pay my entrance-fee, like other liege subjects, and resign myself meekly to the guidance of the beadle, and listen, without rebuke, when he points out to my admiration detestable monuments, or shows me a hole in the wall for a confessional. Yet this splendid monuments, its treasures of art and its fitting endowments, form not the part of Westminster which will concern me. For there is another part which stands in frightful contrast, though in immediate contact, with this magnificence. In ancient times, the existence of an abbey on any spot, with a large staff of clergy and ample revenues, would have sufficed to create around it a little paradise of comfort, cheerfulness, and ease. This, however, is not now the case. Close under the Abbey of Westminster there lie concealed labyrinths of lanes and courts, and alleys and sluins, nests of ignorance, vice, depravity, and crime, as well as of squalor, wretchedness, and disease; whose atmosphere is typhus, whose ventilation is cholera; in which swarms a huge, and almost countless population, in great measure, nominally at least, Catholic; haunts of filth, which no sewage committee can reach—dark corners, which no lighting board can brighten. This is the part of Westminster which alone I cover, and which I shall be glad to claim and to visit, as a blessed pasture in which sheep of Holy Church are to be tended, in which a bishop's godly work has to be done, of consoling, converting and preserving. And if, as I humbly trust in God, it shall be seen that this special culture, arising from the establishment of our hierarchy, bears fruits of order, peacefulness, decency, religion, and virtue, it may be that the Holy See shall not be thought to have acted unwisely when it bound up the very sanctification of a chief pastor with those of a city where the name indeed is glorious, but the publick infamous—in which the very grandeur of the public edifices is as a shadow, to screen from the public eye sin and misery the most appalling. If the wealth of the abbey be stagnant and non-diffusive, if it in no way cause the neighbouring population from the depths in which they sink, let there be no jealousy of anyone who,

by whatever name, is ready to make the latter his care, without interfering with the former.' —Weekly News.

CARDINAL WISEMAN'S APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND.

We have published at length Cardinal Wiseman's voluminous and ably written 'Appeal to the People of England.' It was not difficult to anticipate its tone or its tenor. The same skilful adaptation of manner to circumstances which induced the titular metropolitan, in his inaugural address to the faithful, to assume the pompous and confident tone of a Dunstan or an A'Becket, is illustrated by the mild resignation of his plea for continued tolerance among a Protestant community. The No-Popery agitation, which has unfortunately been excited by Lord Russell's ill-judged attempt to acquire popularity by an appeal to religious bigotry furnishes the Cardinal with the most plausible and effective portion of his argument; and should his obvious endeavour to enlist on his side the feelings and conviction of the Protestant Dissenting community be attended with a success proportioned to its dexterity and tact, the result will be largely due to the short-sightedness of the former patron of 'civil and religious liberty in affording so excellent a handle to the Papal divine. We have anticipated, and we concur in, Dr. Wiseman's just complaint of the factious and dishonest conduct of the armed partisan.

'Who preferred to deliver his award against us from behind the table of a Mansion-house banquet, elicit the anti-Popish cheers of his civic companions, rather than the honoured approbation of the peerage and the bar.'

Nor are we surprised at his remarks on the flippant language, which a more honest and respectable functionary was tempted to use with respect to

'The religion of many millions of her Majesty's subjects, nearly all Ireland, and some of our most flourishing colonies.'

'The charge,' he adds, uttered in the ear of that island, in which all guarantees for genuine and pure Catholic education will of necessity be considered in future as guarantees for 'confining the intellect and enslaving the soul'—all securities for the Catholic religion as security for 'the mummeries of superstition' in the mind of their giver—guarantees and securities which can hardly be believed to be heartily offered—the charge thus made, in a voice that has been applauded by the Protestantism of England, produces in the Catholic heart a feeling too sickly and too deadening for indignation; a dismal despair at finding that, where we have honoured, and supported, and followed for years, we may be spurned and cast off, the moment that popularity demands us as its price, or bigotry as its victim.'

In this passage Dr. Wiseman only expresses the feelings of all Roman Catholics with respect to the Prime Minister's attack upon their creed. Mr. Howard, of Corby Castle, publishes his "conviction, that the 'phrase, 'mummeries of superstition' can only be looked upon as a deliberate insult to the faith and religious practice of at least one-third of the loyal subjects of the British realm." We regret that the false position taken up by the Prime Minister should have enabled Cardinal Wiseman to assume, with so much plausibility and success, the defensive position of representative of an injured and insulted community. He shows much ingenuity in pointing out the inconsistency of the officials who are so greatly surprised at the new Romish aggression, and so eager to attribute it to theological tendencies which they are pleased to stigmatise as heretical. With a malicious pleasure he re-capitulates the successive acknowledgments which the No-Popery Ministers have found it expedient to make of the pretensions of Romish prelates to territorial authority in the empire. The recognition by the government of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Australia, and the legal sanction conferred by provincial Acts on the titles of the bishops of the same Church in various parts of our North American provinces, are not unnaturally put forward in contrast with the zeal which, not content with the resenting the encroachments of the Pope, extends to the condemnation of his 'superstitious mummeries.' Dr. Wiseman states that the government was three years ago officially informed of the scheme which has now been accomplished. 'I have already alluded,' he says, 'to Lord Minto's being shown the brief for the hierarchy, printed about two (three) years ago. The circumstances may have escaped his memory, or he may not at that time have attended to it, having more important matters in his mind. But as to the fact that his attention was called to it, and that he made no reply, I can have no doubt.' The Cardinal's supposition that the itinerant Cabinet Minister may have thought the matter, which has so strongly excited his official superiors indignation, too trifling for notice is humorous—and the more so because it is probably true. Lord Minto's hopeless ignorance of the political questions with which he was instructed to deal in Italy will probably always remain incredible to those who do not take the trouble to verify by examining the official despatches; but that a mere hierarchical change in the Roman Catholic organization in England could in any way concern his Sovereign or her subjects, or form a reason for weakening the Parliamentary alliance between the Roman Catholic body and family League, was a thought too foreign to a mind such as Lord Minto's to have been likely to occur or to impress itself. If thus far, in considering Cardinal Wiseman's pamphlet we have seemed attribute too much weight to arguments in favour of a measure which we reprobate, and which we have reprobated from the first, we may remind our readers that we have hitherto dealt only with the personal and accidental advantage with which the imprudence of his opponents has furnished him in the dispute. He is right in defending his religion against insults, and he is excusable in pointing out the inconsistencies of the Minister who denounces him; but his defence of the measure which the Pope has adopted at his instigation and at that of his colleagues, remains where it was before.—Chronicle.

"DANGER WITHIN ITS GATES."

Mr. Waterton has addressed the following letter to the Protestant hierarchy of the church of England by law established. 'Incustoditum captat ovile lupus:'—

"My Lords Spiritual—Had ye been doing continual and efficient duty in your reformed fold, the Prime Minister of England would not have had reason to tell the Bishop of Durham that 'the danger within its gates alarmed him much more than any aggressions on the part of the Devil, the Pope, and Cardinal Wiseman.' Startling, indeed, must have been the contents of the Premier's letter to the northern Prelate; and I can well conceive the perturbed state of Lord John Russell's mind when he made the appalling discovery, that the rot is in your church by law established. Indeed, where is there a congenial mind that would not be fearfully agitated on seeing its Pastors 'leading their flocks, step by step, to the very edge of the precipice;' or, in other words, knowing to a certainty that those Pastors were introducing damnable doctrine into the pure Church of England? Perhaps, too, some delusive phantom might have gently whispered in his Lordship's ear that the redoubtable trio mentioned above, was in full march to Woburn Abbey, with the insidious intention of inspecting the title deeds of that regal residence—once a refuge for the poor, the sick, the helpless, and distressed—but now, alas! has nothing save the name. Things were not so, my lords, in good old Catholic times, ere your unhallowed Reformation, like a furious blast from Pluto's murkey regions, swept away from its holy cloisters all that was good and useful to mankind. But to return from this digression. There can be no doubt whatever, my Lords, but that a very dangerous species of rot pervades your Church. The Premier, its deputed head, has told us so in words which cannot be misinterpreted by any possible quibble of language. In the meantime my Lords Spiritual, you yourselves are enjoying enormous ecclesiastical benefices, and you seem to be taking no steps to eradicate the awful malady announced—although you have sworn at your ordinations to keep your church clean, and to do every thing for the temporal and spiritual welfare of your flocks. It were much more creditable for yourselves, ye mighty lords of England's tainted creed, to begin the Augean work at once in lieu of losing you mitred time by trying to resuscitate the long-buried bugbear of 'No Popery.' You will fail in the attempt. That imp of intolerance served the ends of the sacrilegious thieves who pilfered the Catholic Church three centuries ago. But its day has now gone by. It has become an empty sound—a thing of nothing—a mere scarecrow, old, and ragged, and utterly unprofitable to you. I have the honour to be, my Lords Spiritual, your most obedient, humble servant, 'CHAS. WATERTON.

'Walton Hall, Nov. 18.'—Tablet.

ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE.

In reply to a requisition for a public meeting in his archdeaconry this Rev. dignitary writes:

'Now I retain the conviction, which I have frequently expressed, that it is unwise in the civil magistrate to impose restrictions upon the religious liberty of any class of his subjects. I still believe, as I stated to you in 1845, that 'the principle of toleration, however paradoxical in theory, is in practice adapted by God's providence to the circumstances of the world,' and consequently that 'those, who, like myself believe it most favourable to the development of truth, must desire to see it carried out in its extremest latitude.' . . . These considerations however, would not prevent me from meeting you to-morrow, were it not for the present year. The civil power has this year assumed that office of settling matters of doctrine, which conformularist assign to the Church, and which the Church, in my opinion cannot surrender without relinquishing rights which were bestowed upon her by Christ our Lord.'—Atlas.

DISCOVERY OF A THIRD RING ROUND SATURN—FURTHER PARTICULARS.

Letters received from Boston by the Africa announce the discovery of a third ring round the planet Saturn. It was announced that this important fact was ascertained by the astronomers at the Observatory at Cambridge. It is interior to the two others, and therefore its distance from the body of Saturn must be small. It was well observed through the great equatorial, with powers varying from 150 to 900; the evening for astronomical observations being remarkably fine, perhaps the finest since the establishment of the Observatory, although, singularly enough, the sky was so hazy that to the naked eye only the brighter stars were visible. It will be remembered that the eighth satellite of this planet was also discovered at Cambridge, by Mr. Bond, about two years since.—Liverpool Albion.

THE BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 6.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, Feb. 8, 1851.

INSTITUTE OF THE CHRISTIAN BROTHERS.

In our preceding issue, we noticed with pleasure, the recent Solemnity at St. Thomas' Church, on occasion of the admission of three Candidates to the Religious Habit of the Loretto Institute. We, at the same time, adverted not only to the important blessings, already actually derived by all classes of our Community from the establishment of the Loretto Institution amongst us, but also to the still more enlarged benefits, which, through the same means, will, with the Divine aid, be transmitted to future generations, in this immense and daily encreasing Metropolis.

The good education of Female Youth is, doubtless, of primary paramount importance towards the welfare of Society. For, both the moral and often the temporal well-being of the Children of a family, are dependent on the early impressions in favor of virtue and order, which will be made on them in their tender years by their mother's example.

In the ordinary course of things, the Father's avocations in life, will call him from his domestic circle, and oblige him, for the greater part of each day, to mingle in the bustle of life, in order to provide for the maintenance of his family. His intercourse with his children being thus comparatively limited and momentary, it is with their Mother only, that they will be habitually familiar. To the maternal eye, all their opening virtues and vices will be unceasingly subject, and, assuredly, if the Mother be, what religion and nature require her to be, no other could be incited by so many sacred impulses as she, to labour for the development of their good, or the correction of their perverse dispositions. In proportion to the intimate continued fond intercourse of a Mother with her Children, must her influence over the formation of their minds and hearts, correspondingly predominate over that, either of the Father, or of any other person, howmuchsoever beloved or venerated by them. Hence, as we have premised, it becomes obvious, that the concern of imparting a really good education to Female Youth, must be regarded as one of primary paramount importance.

But, whilst we thus readily acknowledge the superior claims, which the care of Female education has on the moral and temporal welfare of Society, we do not, by any means, intend to overlook or undervalue the importance, of consulting for the promotion of the same great interests, by the exercise of a due zeal, and diligence, in providing also for the useful and suitable education of all classes of the Male Youth of our community. It must, indeed, be clear to every reflecting person, that to eglect or undervalue the discharge of this duty, would paralyse in a great measure, and very much defeat the grand object, which the careful education of Female Youth is designed to accomplish. However general or powerful the influence of the Mother may be, and is, ordinarily, over her children, yet she will stand in need, oftentimes, of the cordial approval and firm support of her husband, in order to uphold the arrangements and regulations established by her, for the maintenance of order and subordination in her family. Without such co-operation, and support, the structure raised by the mother's piety and prudence will be quickly demolished—a good and evil principle will be engaged in active hostility to one another; and all the evils of a house divided against itself must speedily ensue. It was for the grand purpose of remedying this disorder, by the general diffusion of a sound education among the Male Youth of the Catholic community, that the Christia [illegible] established.

In our next number we shall allude to its origin in Ireland and to the blessings which it has since disseminated over other portions of the British Empire.

(To be continued.)

THOUGHTS UPON THE PRESENT ROMEWARD MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND, IN CONNEXION WITH THE PAPAL SUPREMACY.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

A Nation so learned as England will not long remain in its blindness. The respect, which it has for the Fathers, and its curious and continual researches into antiquity, Will lead her back to the doctrine of the first ages. I cannot believe that she will persist in her hatred against the chair of St. Peter whence also received her Christianity. Bossuet.

The Bishop of Rome being the first of the Patriarchs in dignity, might be called, the honorary Primate of all Christendom. Oxford tracts for the times.

Our Great Stimulator is the Church of Rome. It is only when she sounds the trumpet to Combat, that we feel the real danger of our Situation, and put on all our armour. The unceasing efforts of our political enemies we can endure, the motley crowd of dissenters bristling and blundering with their own sense of Scriptural Scraps; we can despise, but what we can neither despise, or elude, or endure, is the force of the arguments advanced by Catholic Controvertists—yes: Romanism survives on the field of free argumentation.' British Critic and Quarterly Theological Review.

Sir,—How very strange and curious are the foregoing extracts, when viewed in relation, to the present eventful period? How startling must the intelligence conveyed in them be to some, and how cheering to others, who are engaged in the noble work of re-uniting all parties, in the sweet bonds of love, peace, and unity. A new era indeed, seems about to dawn upon the Catholic world. The murky clouds of ignorance and misrepresentation of her doctrines, which hitherto hung over England, now seem to be fast flitting away, beneath the brilliant influence of the sun of truth, as it rises with refulgent splendor to illumine once more, that ill-fated country, so long severed from the centre of Unity—Truth being one, immutable and everlasting must eventually prevail. It may be repressed for a time, through the influence of interest, party spirit or overzeal in a bad cause, yet such a repression instead of obscuring its light tends to make it shine forth the more brilliantly in the end. As the rays of the sun ever appear more glorious to the spectator's vision when they burst forth from beneath a passing cloud, so truth becomes more lucid as it emerges from the dense mists of error and prejudice. What greater proof can be adduced of this, than to see, those very persons who heretofore exerted themselves in proving our religious tenets to be unsound [illegible] openly acknowledge the contrary, and candidly confess that on the field of fair argumentation, Catholic truth must ever prevail. Whence arises this sudden revolution in the religious world in favor of a heretofore proscribed Creed?

To what strange cause are we to attribute the extraordinary scenes that daily pass in Review before us, ——— persons of wealth, and rank discarding their deep cherished prejudices, and their erroneous opinions, in humble obedience to the dictates of conscience, and ranging themselves beneath the saving banner of Catholicism. How are we to account for the mighty movement now taking place in England in favour of Catholic tenets, and for its onward tendency, towards a reunion with the See of Rome. Rome which they hitherto carefully avoided holding any intercourse with, on account of her religious belief, though they entertained no such scruples, with regard to the Sublime Porte—thus appearing to regard the grand Turk of Constantinople, a greater favourite of Heaven, than his present Holiness, the Illustrious Pius the Ninth: I say again, how are we to account for the Romeward movement, that now engrosses the attention of the Great majority of the English nation? It is a question that demands serious investigation, since on its true solution depends, in a great measure perhaps the weal or woe of thousands. By placing this question in a proper light as I hope to do in my next letter, the Community at large may be highly benefited.

I remain Sir,
Your most obedient servant
C. C.

Calcutta,
6th Feb. 1851.

LECTURES ON CERTAIN DIFFICULTIES FELT BY ANGLICANS IN SUBMITTING TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, PRIEST OF THE ORATORY OF ST. PHILIP NERI. LECTURE IV. THE PROVIDENTIAL DIRECTION OF THE MOVEMENT OF 2833, NOT TOWARDS THE NATIONAL CHURCH. LONDON: BURNS AND LATMBER.—1850.

(Continued from our last.)

"Why should any man in Britain," asks a Tract, "fear or hesitate boldly to assert the authority of the Bishops and pastors of the Church on grounds strictly evangelical and spiritual?" "Reverend Sir," answered the Primate, to a protest against a Bishop elect, accused of heresy, "It is not within the bounds of any authority possessed by me to give you an opportunity of proving your objections; finding, therefore, nothing in which I could act in compliance with your remonstrance, I proceeded, in the execution of my office, to obey Her Majesty's mandate for Dr. Hampden's consecration in the usual form."

"Are we contented," asks another Tract, "to be accounted the mere creation of the State, as schoolmasters and teachers may be, as soldiers or magistrates, or other public officers? Did the State make us? Can it unmake us? Can it send out missionaries?" Can it arrange dioceses? "William the Fourth," answers the first magistrate of the State, "by the grace of God, of the united kingdom of Great Britain, and Ireland, king, defender of the Faith, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting; We, having great confidence in the learning, morals, and probity of our well-beloved and venerable William Grant Broughton, do name and appoint him to be Bishop and ordinary pastor of the see of Australia, so that he shall be and shall be taken to be Bishop of the Bishop's see, and may, by virtue of this our nomination and appointment, enter into and possess the said Bishop's see as the Bishop thereof, without any let or impediment of us; and we do hereby declare, that, if we, our heirs and successors, shall think fit to recall or revoke the appointment of the said Bishop of Australia, or his successors, that every such Bishop shall, to all intents and purposes, cease to be Bishop of Australia."

"Confirmation is an ordinance," says the Tract, "in which the Bishop witnesses Christ, Our Lord and Saviour, confirms us with the Spirit of all goodness; the Bishop is His figure and likeness, when he lays his hands on the heads of children. Then Christ comes to them, to confirm in them the grace of baptism." "And we do hereby give and grant to the said Bishop of Australia," proceeds His Majesty, "and his successors, Bishops of Australia, full power and authority to confirm those that are baptized and come to years of discretion, and to perform all other functions peculiar and appropriate to the office of Bishop within the limits of the said see of Australia."

"Moreover," says the Tract, "the Bishop rules the Christ here below, as Christ rules it above; and is commissioned to make us clergymen God's ministers. He is Christ's instrument." "And we do by these presents give and grant to the said Bishop and his successors, Bishops of Australia, full power and authority to admit into the holy orders of deacon and priest respectively any person whom he shall deem duly qualified, and to punish and correct chaplains, ministers, priests, and deacons, according to their demerits."

(To be continued.)

DUBLIN REVIEW.

ART. XI.—The Manual of Devotion, By Ambrose Lisle Phillips, Esq. Derby; 1845.

(Concluded from our last.)

Now, a contemplative mind, deeply, affectionately contemplative, not envying, but striving to copy, those who had such singular happiness as we have described, will find in the holy Rosary the opportunity of most nearly approaching it. Looking at the Blessed Mother of God as only removed in place, not in affection,—changed in situation, not in heart, he will love to entertain himself with her, as he would then have done; will fix his eye on her, as he discourses with her, in a devout salutation and prayer, upon each of those mysteries, successively, in which she had such an interest. Instead of the barren and distracting form of prayer, which some complain they find it, they will thus discover in it that mine of spiritual riches, and that sweetness of consolation, which we know all those saints have found in it, who have been particularly distinguished for their piety and devotion towards the life and death of the Son of God, as well as towards his loving Mother.

We may be asked,—Is this what may be called the popular understanding of this devotion, and is it thus that the poor in Catholic countries practise it? We answer,—it is, as far as their capacity goes. They know that each decad in the rosary has reference to a particular mystery, and their catechism has taught them exactly to know them; and whenever the rosary is recited in common, the contemplation of each is expressly suggested. And this advertence is necessary to gain the indulgences granted to the devotion. They direct therefore their attention to the proper mystery, and say their prayers in its honour; this is sufficient. Ignorant persons cannot meditate as well as the more instructed; nor do they equally understand the words of prayers, or lessons from scripture read to them. But their good will and fervour do more than make up for this. Happy should we be, if we could plead the same excuse! What we have wished to do, is recommend the devotion of which Mr. Phillipps's book treats, to those who fancy it insipid and unprofitable; by shewing that the most spiritual-minded may find in it much food, wholesome and strengthening food; most sweet and delicious food too. But we must likewise add, that we have another ground for loving this devotion, and encouraging all to it,—those even who find it difficult to realize in practice what we have said. It is because it is the devotion of the poor among Catholics, the devotion of the lowly, the ignorant, the afflicted, the humble beadsmen, the pauperes Christi. It is with theirs that we wish our prayers to be judged, not with the Pharisees'! We dread the thought of being one day interrogated concerning them, as men of education, men of information, book-men, that looked down upon the poor pilgrim at the church-door, who could only repeat his Paters and Aves. We look with fear to being asked what we drew out of our silver-clasped, velvet-bound prayer books, that the simple old peasant at the bottom of the church did not get out of her beads, which we despised? Whether we have thence become more earnest, more fervent, more humble, more devout? We like not that sentence of an ancient Father, "Surgunt indocti, et rapiunt regnum Dei; et nos cum nostris literis mergimur in profundum." So will be pleased to be reckoned among the poor, and ask to be held to have prayed with them.

Want of space precludes our carrying our subject further; enough remains to occupy us again, with other secondary services of the Church, which cannot be too much recommended.

HISTORY OF THE LIFE, WRITINGS AND DOCTRINES OF MARTIN LUTHER

By J. M. V. Audin

THE TWO BULLS 1520.

LEO X—1521

(Continued from page 17.)

We have already seen that Luther had visited Italy. He made the pilgrimage, less through obedience, than from the instinct of curiosity, which then prevaded all minds, and which was excited by the marvellous relations of those who had returned from that country. He came, then, as one who believed in the future regeneration of the human mind, which he knew must soon pass through an ordéal, and engage in a struggle that would change the whole social system. He came to Rome, because men looked there for the star, which was to be the guide of everyintellect in the new paths, on which they were about to enter. Luther passed on, without casting a look at those grand creations of human genius, the sight of which ought to have made his heart beat. The view of modern Italy excited no feeling of admiration in him, and his breast felt no emotion of delight at the magnificent trophies of art, which every where met his view. It is painful to see him pass, without seeing any thing, learning any thing, or retaining any thing. He brought away with him neither emotion nor poetic recollections, nor joy of soul, nor elevation of thought. He recollected nothing of Rome, but house-wife's stories or mendacious anecdotes. Who will believe him, when he says, that in 1510, he heard courtiers say, at the time of the consecration in the Mass:—"Thou art bread, and thou wilt remain bread,"—"Thou art wine, and wilt continue wine!"* —Just at this moment, Sanzio was painting the miracle of Bolsena, a fresco, where he represents the sacred host distilling blood before the eyes of an incredulous priest. This single monument of art avails more than the anecdote of Luther. Such pictures are not exhibited to an unbelieving people. No: impiety did not reign at Rome under Julius II., or Leo X. Had the fact a better authority than that of Luther, it would not be fair, like some biographers of the monk, to make his sacrilegious mockery the criterion of the general belief. Accolti, Bembo, Sadolet, Cajetan, Leo X., united piety with genius.

* Ego Romae non diu fui. Hic celebravi ipse, et vidi celebrari aliquot missas; sed ita ut quoties recordor, exeror illas. Nam super mensam, inter alias audivi curtisanos quosdem ridendo gloriari, nonullos in ara super panem et vinum haec verba pronuntiare: "Panis es et panis manebis;" "vinum es et vinum manebis." Op. Luth. t. vi. Jamae apud Melch. Adam in vita. 49.

Erasmus also wished to see Italy, especially Rome, where he sojourned a long time. In his correspondence with the philosophers, the humanists, the artists of Germany, you will in vain look for any thing discreditable to the character of the Italian clergy,—or for any thing implying a contempt for holy things, a degeneracy of morals, a disregard of the divine worship, or of the respect due to religion. His letters are frequently real eulogiums of the Roman prelates. Scarcely could Luther, after all his searches, find, three or four cardinals of any literary merit; but what a different idea we have of these princes of the church, when we read the correspondence of Erasmus!

(To be continued.)

THE HISTORY AND FATE OF SACRILEGE.

BY SIR HENRY SPELMAN, A PROTESTANT AND CONTINUED BY TWO PRIESTS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND, TO THE PRESENT TIME.

CHAPTER VI.

(Continued from p. 349.)

Burnham Priory.

It was sometime in the Southwells of S. Faith's, whose family is either extinct or gone out of the county. It was afterwards Francis Cobbes', gent., who likewise is gone; then sir Charles Cornwallis, knight, wasted, and by him sold to Alderman Soame, who left the same to John Soame, Esq his second son deceased.

Peterston.

About the latter years of queen Elizabeth it was Richard Manser's, gent., who had much suit and quarrel with Firmine Gray about a lease of it, and died without issue, disposing it by a will (as was reported) to one Roger Manser, his brother; but they were both nipt of it by —— Armiger, of Creake, who married Richard Manser's sister, and left it to William Armiger, his son and heir, who sold it to my lord Coke, to secure the title.

Carbrooke.

A monastery of Hospitallers of S. John of Jerusalem.

Sir Richard Southwell, knight, (a great agent in spoiling the abbeys,) was owner of it: he married Thomasin, the daughter of sir Roger Darcy, of Danbury, and living long together, had no issue by her; but in the mean time, he had by Mary Darcy, daughter of Thomas Darcy, also of Danbury, Richard Southwell of S. Faith's and Thomas Southwell of Moreton, Mary and Dorothy, all born in adultery, and Katherine, married to Thomas Audley, of Beer-church in Essex, cousin and heir-male to the lord Audley (born, as it seems, after the death of Thomasin his wife), by the said Mary, who then and before was by sir Richard married to one —— Leech, a swallowman of Norwich, that had been his servant; and now his lady dying, he took this Mary from Leech her husband, and married her himself, alleging that she could not be Leech's wife, for that he had another former wife then living: hereupon a great suit ensued in the high Commission court, where sir Richard prevailed, enjoyed her with shame enough.

Sir Richard dieth without other issue than by this Mary, leaving the abbey of S. Faith's to his baseborn son Richard, and Moreton to his base son Thomas.

His son Richard marries Bridget, daughter of sir Roger Copley, knight, and had issue by her, Richard, Thomas, and Robert. This last Richard married the daughter of sir Thomas Cornwallis: and having issue by her, sir Thomas Southwell, and two or three other sons, dieth in the lifetime of his father, who for his second wife marrieth his maid, the daughter of one Styles, parson of Ellingham, and by her had issue sir Henry Southwell, now owner of Moreton, and some daughters, whereof Ann was* —— in London. And this Richard, the father, having wasted his estate, and sold the abbey of S. Faith's to the lord Chief-justice Hobart, died a prisoner in the Fleet.

Thomas Southwell, the other base son of sir Richard, dieth without issue; having given by his will the manor of Moreton to his sister Audley for life, the remainder to Thomas, her younger son. Sir Thomas Southwell, nephew of the testator, seeketh to overthrow the will, and to have the manor as heir at common law to Thomas testator: hereupon the heir of Leech strikes in against them both, labouring with sir Thomas to satisfy the will against Mrs. Audley, and excluding sir Thomas, by alleging bastardy against him in Richard his father, for that Mary Darcy, the mother of this Richard, was wife to the father of this Leech when Richard and Thomas the testator were born.

This brought all the filthiness aforementioned to be raked over again; and when all were notoriously defamed by it, they all sit down without any recompense.

Thomas Audley, that was in remainder, died without issue in the life of his mother,

* [So in the MS.—EDD.]

whereby Moreton came to his brother, sir Henry Audley,

Anthony Southwell, and —— Southwell, brothers of sir Thomas, were in the robbery of Mrs. Grave, and fled into Ireland.

Sir Henry Southwell married the daughter of lord Ilor* in Ireland, without issue.

After the death of Richard Southwell, his nephew, sir Robert, succeeded in the great inheritance and the hospital of Carbrook. He married the daughter of the earl of Nottingham, and died in the flower of his age, leaving his son, the now sir Thomas, an infant, who about his full age had a base daughter by Dr. Corbett's maid; and marrying her privily, liveth now in dislike of her, and keepeth the daughter of one Eden in a poor-house at Notton, and hath consumed the greatest part of his estate.

His sister, Mrs. Elizabeth Southwell, liveth at Florence, in adultery with sir Robert Dudley, having another wife before he married her, and both of them still living.

(To be continued.)

Selections.

CONVERSIONS.

The "Diario di Romá" states that the Rev. Mr. Keen, an Irish minister of the Establishment, was lately received in the Church in the Holy City.

The Rev. R. J. Butler, M.A., of Brasenose College, Oxford, and Chaplain to the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, was received into the Catholic Church, at Rome on the 23rd November last. This gentleman was formerly warden of the House of Charity in Rose-street, Soho.

Mr. Bowyer, D.C.L., the eminent convert of the Middle Temple, has been obliged to resign his Lectureship on Civil Jurisprudence, the remuneration of which was 1,000*l.* for the term of three years, on account of the offence given by the liberality of his views on those subjects which were connected with Catholic belief.—Catholic Standard.

The Rev. Mr. Anderson, member of the University of Oxford, abjured the Protestant religion, and was received into the bosom of the Roman Catholic Church, on Sunday last by Father de Ravignan, in the chapel of Notre Dame de Sion, Mr. Anderson was confirmed on Tuesday, by Cardinal Fornari, in the chapel of the Apostolic Nuncio.—Galignani.

* [The name is illegible in the MS. In the printed copy it is Ilor; but there is no title in the peerage resembling this.—Edd.]

We learn that Lord Nigel Kennedy, a brother of the present Marquis of Ailsa, has embraced the Roman Catholic faith. His lordship, who resides near Ayr, is quite a youth, and held a pew in the Episcopal Chapel, but now waits on the ministration of Father Thompson, the Popish priest for that district.—Scottish Guardian.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Camden have been received into the Catholic Church at Bruges.

Rev. Mr. Henn, an Irish Clergyman, conformed at Rome last month, and was received by Cardinal Fransoni.—Limerick Chronicle.

Mr. Bastard, of Kitley, Devon, who has just gone over to Rome, is the son of the late Edmund Pollexfen Bastard, Esq., who about thirty years since repeatedly contested, in conjunction with Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Bart., the representation of Devonshire with the present Earl Fortescue, then Lord Ebrington, and spent a large fortune in so doing—one contest alone cost Mr. Bastard 30,000*l.* During the long minority of the present pervert the vast property which he inherited was, by the careful management of his guardians, relieved of its incumbrances. This gentleman was inoculated at Oxford University with tractarian views.

Mr. Monsell, M.P., has been received into the Church of Rome. He and his Lady made their profession at Gracedieu Manor, the seat of A. L. Phillips, Esq.—Atlas for India.

CARDINAL WISEMAN ON THE CATHOLIC HIERARCHY.

The following is the substance of Cardinal Wiseman's first lecture, delivered on Sunday, at St. George's, Southwark, on the subject Catholic Hierarchy:—

"The question of the Catholic Hierarchy, or rather its history, may be summed up in a very few words. Its substance is as follows:—Catholics being, in regard to the exercise of their religion, on a footing of perfect equality with their fellow-subjects (so at least it was thought till a few weeks ago), and being members of a Church necessarily Episcopal, having been governed till now, under a temporary form, by Vicars-Apostolic, have received, from the acknowledged and legally recognised head of their Church, a Hierarchy—that is, a body of Bishops having their sees and titles from them in England. Now, let it be observed, that the change does not consist in this, that up till lately Catholics had no Bishops, and now have them; for their Vicars-Apostolic were Bishops, with foreign titles. Had this been the change, we might easily have imagined that the Church of England, if till then the only Episcopal Church in this island, might have raised an outcry at the sudden appearance of another body of Bishops, whose character, as such, it does not now impugn. But this was not the case. It has been merely a change of title. Bishops who before bore foreign titles, under which spiritually to govern British Catholics, have now received domestic titles. And the sphere of their jurisdiction is called a diocese instead of a district.

"Let us see more in detail what the amount of difference is between the previous and present position of these Prelates:—

"1. Not one of them has received or will receive any new consecration. Not one, in other words, will be one atom more a Bishop than he was before.

"2. Not one enlarges or alters materially the limits of his Ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Some few counties are transferred from the limits of one former district to another, but these are only slight deviations from the principle of merely changing districts into dioceses.

"3. Not one obtains increased power or jurisdiction over Clergy, or laity, or property, or trusts, or any person or thing. If anything, powers before held are curtailed or limited.

"4. Not one probably will change his place of residence.

"5. Not one will gain, by the change, any increase of emoluments or of income.

"Not one acquires, or dreams of acquiring, the slightest alteration of social position, or legal addition of title or honour.

"Each one remains where he was, and as he was, and what he was, with the sole change, so far as outward relations go, of the title which he bears. He, for instance, who was Bishop of Hetalona is Bishop of Birmingham, where he has always lived in honour; he who was Bishop of Samosata is now of Hexham, and will, no doubt, continue to live at Darlington, where he has lived respected by all, till now.

"And now, let the first question be, to whom or to what is any danger threatened? Is it to the State, or to the religion of this country?

"In the confusion of ideas which has prevailed during the recent period of excitement, there certainly seems to have been no thought of unravelling this question, and deciding which of the two was in danger. The usual results followed; all were mixed up, and the cry embraced every possible or imaginable peril. It was the State in every department, which was invaded by the Pope's granting to Catholic Bishops mere titles in England. The Crown was wounded in its prerogative, its supremacy, its right to allegiance, its very sovereignty; the constitution was endangered in its principles of civil and religious liberty; the nation assailed in its 'spiritual independence;' individual freedom jeopardised by the intended introduction of the Inquisition, of the confessional, and some undefined mysterious agency on the mind; the Church was endangered, and suddenly, after years of acquiescence, not only in dissent of every sort, but in latitude of pasture within its own pale, to the extent of a desert, it has been again asserted to be so completely part of the constitution, that to assail it is to attack English nationality; its Episcopal rights are encroached on; its universality of jurisdiction in the realm trenched on; and the toleration graciously granted by it to Catholics abused. And finally, this is not all. Protestantism, as a general and comprehensive form of religion, embracing many divisions, has been insulted, attacked, threatened, and almost put to peril.

"Now, my Brethren, this all but a small part of what has been said of this Ecclesiastical change in our body. And let me put it to your common sense, must it not be something of vast magnitude, of huge power, that could at once, in one moment, produce all these complicated and tremendous effects? Ought it not be a political earthquake and a religious hurricane combined, that could thus shake the stability of a vast empire from throne to hearth, from cathedral to cottage? Would news of a foreign invasion by a vast confederated army, united with a wide conspiracy detected at home, have done more, or threatened more, or alarmed more? Could there have been, in the event of such a concurrence of foreign and domestic dangers, more warm expressions of feeling, more enthusiastic resolutions of resistance, more concentration of power?

"Then now let me ask you another question. Suppose that any one had told you six months ago that the Bishop of Rome had it in his power to throw this vast empire into convulsions; to upheave, by 'the breath of his nostrils,' the granite foundations of the noble British constitution; to shake to its basis the throne of our gracious Queen, which rests secure upon the affections of every subject (of none more than of Catholics); to despoil of its rights and prerogatives a Church which has a thousand rools in the very substance of the nation; to imperil the religion of the Bible in all its various diramations; and finally to introduce all that has been a popular bugbear in Popery into your very families:—had any one told you six months ago that the Bishop of Rome had power to do all this in England, you would have laughed—yes, you would have laughed to scorn the man who should have presumed to tell you that he had such tremendous power.

"And if, by way of jest, or through curiosity, you had asked the fanatic who told you so, by what wonderful machinery, by what magical agency he could do all this; and he had answered you: 'By a scrap of paper, wherein he should desire the Catholic districts of England to be thenceforth called dioceses, and the Bishop of Trachis to be called the Bishop of Beverley, and the Bishop of Tloa to be called Bishop of Liverpool; you would, I am sure, have considered the man little better than an idiot, who asserted or believed in such effects from such a cause.

"And yet, now that this has been done, all those terrible consequences are seen to have flowed from it; the nation is made to believe that the Pope has possessed, and has exercised this tremendous power. But go back to your former cooler judgments, and through them look at the matter now effected, as you would have looked upon it when spoken of as future, and you will see that it is ridiculous to attribute such mighty results to so simple an act of Ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

"And in truth, my Brethren, if the Holy See does possess the power attributed to it, we may reasonably infer that its effects would be in proportion to the strength and vigour which it infuses into its acts. The sending of a Bishop into a country must be a more direct and effectual exercise of the Pope's strength than the change of that Bishop's denomination. The communicating to him an immediate and personal delegation from himself, and placing him on the scene of his activity as a part of his own individuality, as a vicarious-self an 'alter Ego' would naturally appear to any one as a more direct bringing to bear of the Papal [illegible] and strength upon a country, than the appointment to it of Bishops constituted as they are in Catholic countries, with ordinary, not extraordinary, powers. And again, the multiplying of such agents, the doubling of those active centres of his own power, would seem to be a much more alarming act (if cause of alarm there be) than the altering the style and title of those already holding those Vicarial offices.

"But no: in the present state of feeling it is not so; it cannot be allowed to be so. The Pope has named Bishops where there were none before, whether in Ireland or the colonies; but it mattered not. He has had his Vicars in this island and its dependencies, Bishops with more than ordinary faculties; yet no one heeded them. Within these few years he had doubled their number in England, and nearly so in Scotland, and still nobody gave himself concern. But now he changes their titles, and all England is on fire at the dangers, as at the supposed boldness, of the deed! Then, is a title more to give, or more to fear, than authority? Is a name more powerful than jurisdiction? Does more strength lie in a sound than in action?

"Now, I tell you, as you have been again and again told, that the Bishops, as now constituted, have straitened, and not enlarged powers, compared with what they had before; and as to the importance of the step taken ten years ago of doubling the number of Vicars Apostolic, no one who has observed its results will hesitate to allow that to it may be traced an increased vigour of action in the Catholic body, and a diffusion of Catholic doctrine without it. But even taking the question of names, I have scarcely any doubt that a very few years, or perhaps even months ago, had the question been put to the great mass of the English people, 'Whom would you rather have to govern the Catholic Church in this island, the Pope's own Vicars, or Bishops belonging to the country?' the latter would have been preferred and chosen, as being more thoroughly native English, and domestic, and as implying, in name at least, a less immediate connection with that great object of Protestant prejudice, the Pope of Rome. Indeed, I have been assured, upon what I consider excellent authority, that even in 1799 Pitt suggested to Cardinal Erskine, as one good mode of diminishing English prejudices in regard to Catholics, that the Bishops should cease to be Vicars Apostolic, and become local particulars.*

"Throughout all this excitement, one important element of calculation, one obvious source of deduction, seems to have been overlooked. Public speakers and writers treat the matter as if England were the only country in the world to which certain acts, and still more certain possibilities, could apply. They overlook the experience and tests of other vast countries. They forget that there are Catholic countries which exercise great vigilance over the Church, and are as jealous as England of either foreign or ecclesiastical authority. They seem not to know that there are other powerful countries which have a mixed population, containing Catholic [illegible] and their flocks.

"Calm and reasonable minds would look at working of the Catholic system in both these, and thence judge of the reality of dangers announced to England by prophets of evil. Have not the people been threatened with the fear of the inquisition, or other terrible institutions, as being necessary consequences of the prevalence of Catholicity? And yet is there any inquisition in Spain, in Portugal, in Brazil, in Mexico, in any of the South American Republics—countries exclusively Catholic? Certainly not. Is there any in Austria, in Bavaria, in Belgium, countries with a mixed population, but with Court, Government, and majority eminently Catholic? Certainly not. Then is it not mere imposture to tell the people that there is even the remotest danger of the introduction of such a tribunal into England, of all places in the world, should it even all become Catholic? Could not the people resist what is called Papal tyranny, or interference in temporal concerns, as well as the nations of Spain or Portugal?

"I put all this as a supposition—as an imaginary case; for it is too ridiculous to put it seriously to thinking men. And it is only to get up a cry, and to gull people (I use a homely but expressive word) into fanaticism, that interested persons pretend to fear what they know to be, not remote, but (to use now a more scientific phrase) too distant to have a parallax.

"Again, the canon law is quoted as containing assertions opposed to the rights of the Crown, or the principles of civil law; and those, of course, are dangerous to England alone. Would not fairness and common sense dictate, that as this law cannot, by either possibility or fatality, be more forced on England than on other countries, so no more need be feared here, supposing things to come to what (in the minds in question) would be the worst, than is experienced in so many other countries? Let any one, therefore, go and ask in Belgium, or even in Spain, whether the Bishop or Clergy stir up the people against their civil rulers, on the ground of a text in the 'Decretals,' or the 'Extravagantes,' or whether the people are edified by newspaper or pamphlet extracts from the 'Corpus Juris,' as it is called, to prove to them that they must withhold their spiritual allegiance from the Pope! What some are so busy in doing now, in the line, is wise and as practical as it would be in one who knows nothing of law to rake up the statute book, and pretend to argue about the present practical state of the law from the enactment of King Stephen and Richard I., without any reference to modern enactments, declarations, explanations, judgments, tacit repeals by desuetude, or actual usages and prescriptions.

* The statement came from the late Sir John Coxe Hippesley.

"Again, oaths or declarations are brought forward as inconsistent with the civil duties of those who take them. It is not for a moment reflected that the same oath has been certainly for at least 700 years, and probably much more, by every Bishop of all Christendom, with the knowledge and consent of their Sovereigns and rulers, from the Emperor of Austria to the President of the French Republic, without jealousy or suspicion; and, what is more, without a single instance on record of any Ecclesiastic in history having inviolated his allegiance, and justified it by that oath.

"But, my Brethren, I will give you two most practical illustrations of how well other countries can understand the difference between Ecclesiastical and civil duties, and know how to let each estate take care of itself, without apprehending a collision between them."

After citing America as an instance, his Eminence continued:—

"But to come to another government nearer home. In Belgium there is no State Church. The majority of the nation is Catholic; the King is Lutheran. All religions are equal in the eye of the law. When the country asserted its independence, it was in the power of the Catholics to legislate as they pleased. But they asserted no pre-eminence for their Church—they preferred freedom to the golden fetters of the State. The Cardinal Archbishop of Malines and the Bishops have no seat in the Chambers; nor have they any tribunals of their own. The Ministers of all religions are paid by the State. Protestants, perhaps, more than Catholics, being a married Clergy. But the Government has nothing to do with the nomination of Bishops or Clergy, or other purely Ecclesiastical matters—it has no Concordat with Rome. In this respect the Clergy are in the same position as we are. Now, let us see how clearly the Government can discriminate the duties, or, to use a more homely word, the business of each power, the civil and the Ecclesiastical.

"While England was in the height of its ferment, on account of the 'Papal aggression,' the Minister of Justice in Belgium, who has charge of religious matters in the Government, M. Tesch, thus spoke in this Chamber of Representatives (the House of Commons) of Belgium, Nov. 15th last.

"What, for example, is our present position? On the one hand, the Pope has the right to name, in Belgium, as many Bishops as he pleases; to create as many Dioceses as he pleases. What is the right of Government? That of not paying any more than it considers sufficient for the wants of religion.... And so again with regard to Canons of Cathedrals; the Ecclesiastical authority can create ten, fifteen, twenty, in a diocese, if it pleases; but, on the other side, the Government preserves its right of not giving salaries to more than it considers necessary for the administration of dioceses."

"Two months have now elapsed since the Papal letter (for Bull there has been none) was issued; and the new Bishops have carried on their administration for nearly that period under their new titles. Has anything sinister thence arisen? Have they 'tithed or tolled' in the realm of England? Have they summoned Protestants to their obedience? Have they claimed any portion of the revenues of Church or State? Are the dangers, or invasions, or aggressions, so loudly denounced, as yet in prospective? They were not there in the act itself. If not, wait a few weeks more; nay, a few months, and see if they gradually unfold. But if, after a further period, you shall find, that all is as it has been, that the Catholic Church in this island keeps on in its usual and even course, and no interest, public or private, has suffered, you will perhaps come to the reasonable conclusion that religious questions like these had better be left to the wise standard of judgment suggested of old by Gamaliel: 'Ye men of Israel, take heed to yourselves what you intend to do, as touching these men .....And now, therefore, I say to you, refrain from these men, and let them alone; for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought. But if it be of God, you cannot overthrow it; lest perhaps you be found even to fight against God.' (Acts v., 35-39.) New legislative enactments may be passed, as it has been suggested, whereby the obnoxious sound of new titles may be hushed, and the ears of the zealous be no longer offended by their utterance; and then the conclusion will come of itself, that the name, and not the thing, caused all the fear and the displeasure. For no amount of human legislation can touch the substance, annul the spiritual and organic structure, of the Catholic body, or permanently derange its vital functions. You will have to prove rights most tenderly cherished by every class, religious or social; you will have to disturb the powerful possession by millions of dearly-earned privileges; you will have to recommence the destructive work of reproducing inequalities, the moment you attempt to deal with religious principles and convictions, or make them subject to external control. Now, the obedience which every Catholic will pay to his Catholic Bishop, the bond of union which holds together Pastor and flock, cannot be affected by any law; and so long as every Catholic, who, six months ago, obeyed a Vicar Apostolic of a District in which he lived, now will obey the Bishop of a See placed in another county, because the Pope has named that Bishop, and has transferred him to his obedience; so long as this is the case, all the substance, and essence, and reality of the Hierarchy will exist, although he may be under penalties, as his fathers were, if he presume to call his Bishop by his title.

"Think not, my Brethren, that if I speak confidently, I therefore speak contemptuously, or disdainfully, of what has happened in our regard. Would to God it had been in our power, by any sacrifice of ours short of duty, or by any personal suffering, to have spared ourselves and others the turmoil, and disputes, and dissensions, and more the sins and excesses, which have taken place throughout the island. On this subject we may have further occasion to speak. I mention it at present only with reference to ourselves. Had we not felt, and felt deeply, the obloquy, the vituperation, the false and calumnious things that have been spoken, repeated, and believed about us, we must have been more, or less, than men. To be represented before one's fellow-countrymen as deceitful untruthful,—yea, as having minds 'steeped in deceit,' and trained to lies; to have our words doubted and our acts misinterpreted, and every motive distorted; to be introduced as rebellious, treacherous, as hating one's Sovereign, as greedy of the dying man's wealth, and of his children's inheritance, as tampering with documents and sacred books, as ready to foment sedition, almost murder,—one must have a heart not of flesh, for it to be callous to such unfeeling reproaches. And while the storm raged and pelted morning and evening, what could be done but meekly bear it? Or, rather, as in religious imagery you see the holy martyr St. Stephen represented as having gathered into the folds of his dalmatic, like to precious gems, the stones with which he had been struck, what should a Christian Bishop do else but bear the up-heaped indignities with him to the foot of the altar, and there find consolation in thought of Him who suffered mockery and scoffs, and false accusations, and buffets even, for our example and our sake.

"To conclude, my Brethren, the Catholic ritual for the first approach of a new Bishop to his See, exhorts that the streets through which he shall pass be festooned with garlands, and his path strewn with flowers. For us, no doubt, it has been better that our road should have been hedged with thorns, and our way sown with briars. The more closely and roughly any work bears the impression of the Cross, the more surely does it come to us sealed of God. The Episcopal dignity is an elevation of fearful duties and responsibilities; and it can never feel so safe as when the height chosen for it by Providence is on Calvary, rather than on Thabor. Then do you, my dear Catholic children, lift up your heads, in humble hope, in proportion as affliction and tribulation assail you. Leave to the powerful protection of a gracious and gentle Sovereign, who loves all her faithful subjects alike, the guardianship of your civil and religious freedom, once granted to you; trust to the good sense of your countrymen for a better understanding of your principles, your actions, and your motives; but look up to God alone for the only blessing which can make the Hierarchy of your Church in this country fruitful in heavenly gifts for your souls, and an instrument of eternal salvation."—(By the Daily News.)

THE CATHOLICS OF BIRMINGHAM.

On Monday an influential meeting of the Roman Catholics of this town was held in the hall attached to the Bishop's house, for the purpose of considering the propriety of adopting an Address to the inhabitants of the town relative to the establishment of the Roman Catholic hierarchy.

At eleven o'clock, the Very Rev. Dr Weedall having been called to the chair, the gentleman opened the business by a brief address.

Dr. Newman said, he considered it extremely kind and complimentary to have entrusted to him the resolution he held in hand. It was simply one of congratulation, in the sentiments of which he entirely concurred.—The following address from the Catholics of the town be presented to the inhabitants of Birmingham:—

"A moral persecution is now raised against the religious liberties of the Catholics of England and great efforts are made, not only by a considerable portion of the press, but also by dignitaries and clergy of the Establishment, through appeals to the passions and prejudices of men, to inflame the public mind, and induce the Government to re-enact penal statutes against us.

"This persecution strikes at the very root of our religious liberties, both as Englishmen and as Catholics. The principles upon which these appeals to the passions are based strike with equal force against the religious liberty of the Catholics of the other nations of the United Kingdom, and even of the whole British Empire.

"The Catholic subjects of Her Majesty constitute one-third of the inhabitants of these realms; they are fully as numerous as the bona fide members either of the Establishment or of any other communion, and they constitute a vast proportion of the Christian population of the whole Empire.

"The real question involved in this agitation is—Shall the Catholics of the British Empire live and breathe in the free exercise of their religion or not? Shall religious liberty continue to be the principle by which the spirit of our country is ruled, and on which the law is administered?

"The case stands thus,—We cannot live as Catholics without the elements essential to our religion. Amongst the most essential are—our ecclesiastical government by bishops of our own, and the godsends of the head of our Church. Without these we are no longer Catholics; just as the Church of England would no longer be the Church of England without its bishops and its head.

"It is essential to the very idea of a bishop that he have title derived from some locality that may constitute the centre of his communications with his flock. Where there is more than one bishop in a kingdom, there must be a division of [illegible] should know the members of his [illegible] in order to another's; nor could either [illegible] distinct jurisdiction over his people. [illegible] in a canonical sense, as well as canon law. The English Catholics claim their right of having their own bishops—bishops known to them [illegible] by [illegible] whom they may recognise as English bishops of English Catholics, by titles taken from places in the country of their own homes.

'If hitherto, and for a long time past, they have had bishops holding their titles "in partibus infidelium," it was because the Pope in reality exercised the jurisdiction of immediate bishop in England, and the local bishops exercised their functions not as English bishops, but as Vicars Apostolic of His Holiness.

'But this was an anomalous state, and not the permanent order of things. It was established when we were under persecution, and is not the ordinary condition of our Church, such as exists, and always has existed, in Ireland, and is established in Her Majesty's colonies and foreign possessions, and in every Catholic country.

'The great increase in the numbers of English and Irish Catholics which has taken place in this country has made it requisite that a larger number of bishops should be created, and that they should have their sees in this country. We violate no law known by having bishops of our own; and independently of human law, we have an inherent right to whatever benefits we require from their jurisdiction and spiritual functions.

'Besides this our original, indefeasible right, the Emancipation Act of 1829, left the adoption of this measure open to us by setting us at liberty to exercise our religion in full freedom, with the exception that the use of certain episcopal titles, specified in the Act, was prohibited; which enactment has been respected, and those titles not taken. Hence, if a restriction were now made in the liberties recognised and secured to us by that Act, it would, as an expost facto law, and bear a character of severity alien from the spirit of the constitution. In fact, it would be a condemnation of us for availing ourselves of the benefits of that Act, while paying at the same time a deference to its prohibitions.

'As Roman Catholics, our bishops cannot be appointed without the authorisation of the head of our Church. The bishoprics of our Church can no more be regulated without the intervention of our Head, than the bishoprics of the Church of England without their head. The law admits that we have the Pope for our Head, and leaves us at liberty by the Emancipation Act to acknowledge him openly as our Head.

'His Holiness continually nominates Catholic bishops in Ireland; a hierarchy has also recently been established in the Australian colonies, and in all these cases the Government has directed their titles of honour to be given to the bishops, and has recognised their episcopal character in Acts of Parliament. All these bishops are well known to derive their titles from localities over which they preside within the Queen's dominions. Are we, as Englishmen, entitled to less liberty and to fewer religious rights than our brethren in Ireland and in the colonies?

'As the late appointment of our Bishop has been solely for spiritual purposes, and confers on them none but spiritual powers, it is most untrue that in this appointment the Head of our Church has in any way attacked the Established Church, or the prerogatives of our beloved Sovereign, or encroached upon the liberties, whether civil or ecclesiastical, of the realm; nor have we by this measure laid claim to any rights over the Protestant establishment, nor interfered with any right or privilege of a single individual who is not a member of our Church.

'The laws abrogated by His Holiness are our own Catholic ecclesiastical laws, laws which have either emanated from the Holy See, or the authorities of our Church in this country—those by which we as Catholics are governed by our own ecclesiastical superiors in our own ecclesiastical affairs. There has been no interference with any law of the State or of the Establishment as such.

'What His Holiness has done is to appoint bishops to preside over us in certain sees, to resign into their hands a portion of the power over us as Catholics of which he has hitherto retained exercise in his own, and to leave us free from the obligations of certain ecclesiastical laws which might otherwise have embarrassed the spiritual administration of our Church.

'Our loyalty to our Sovereign is unimpeachable. None of Her Majesty's subjects have given greater proofs of their loyalty than the Catholics of England. We have often declared, and again we declare, that we have no temporal Sovereign but our Queen, to whom, and to the Constitution of our country, we are loyally and devotedly attached.

'We claim the right to regulate our own religious concerns as independently of the headship of the Church of England as any other community which does not acknowledge this head; but we cannot but feel that the religious liberties of all our countrymen are bound up with our own, and that an attack upon our religious arrangements strikes equally at the liberty of every subject in the British Empire.

'We equally feel that the passions of the multitude once stirred up against the Catholic episcopacy may easily be turned against every other ecclesiastical authority; and that the weapons of misrepresentation, of ridicule, and of sarcasm, whilst they are aimed at us, may have their rebound against all religious institutions and all sacred things.

'We beg to offer to you this explanation of the recent measure of the establishment of an hierarchy, in the hope, that as we have hitherto lived among you in the peaceable enjoyment of our religious liberties without giving occasion of offence by interference in the concerns of others, you will not now be induced to join in the outcry by which our rights and privileges are at present assailed.'

The rev. gentleman, in continuation, said, the Address especially alluded to the power and fair scope which the bishops and clergy would have under the new arrangement, but nobody could think that it meant more than scope in spiritual matters. It was not their intention to interfere with others, to exert any improper influence or temporal power directly or indirectly over any one. He believed conscientiously they were right, in a proper position, and could not but wish their friends and neighbours to be in the same; but other than purely legitimate means never contemplated using towards any one.

fessors will be made with the object of freeing us from the dreadful state of slavery and ignorance in which we, in common with nearly two hundred millions of our brethren, constituting the most civilised and enlightened portion of the human race, are placed, in order to make way for the diffusion of the lights and liberties of the Reformation among us? Let every Catholic weigh this matter; and if he have any regard for his creed, he will remain convinced that we should not put any trust in the Queen's college as at present organised."

LETTER OF CHARLES WATERTON ESQ.

TO THE STATE CHURCH.

"Quid ut noverca me tueris, aut uti Petita ferro bellua?"

Unfeeling Stepmother—Thou art indeed a bad one. Say, what really incites thee to conjure up such multitudes of thy best—and of thy worst—upholders in battle array against us unoffending Catholics, who love our country, and would die in its defence?

The day of thy divorce from State is just upon its dawn.

Three hundred years of rioting amidst the dainties of thy neighbour's storehouse have made thee vain and reckless. Guarded as thou art by the law and by the bayonet, one would suppose that common sense alone would urge thee to keep quiet at a time when the title to thy enormous wealth is seriously called in question by millions of Britons who reject thy spurious maternity.

But no. Ever bent on mischief, at present thou canst think of nothing but war and agitation, although the Prime Minister himself has warned thee of disorder and rebellion in thy own camp.

Wilt thou call a Synod to root out existing heresies within thee? No; thou darest not attempt the task. Will Lord John—thy deputed spiritual head under her Majesty—suspend his Archbishop for repudiating infant baptism? No. Will he anathematise and turn out of the fold the Puseyites, who have so scared him by their dangerous novelties? No; 'twere madness to interfere. They would turn round upon him, with the unregenerating Archbishop at their head, and they would exclaim—"We are Protestants, and we possess the right of private judgment."

Still, by the way, thy virgin (?) foundress in the olden time carried her point without the fuss and parade of a Synod; for when the new Bishops began to show symptoms of not being sufficiently pliant to her holy will and pleasure, she swore "By G——, that she would unfrock them all."

But to proceed. Has not this ruthless agitation of thine tended in some sort to tarnish the universally acknowledged dignity of England's glorious Chancellorship?

The St. James's Chronicle tells us that at the recent metropolitan banquet the Lord Chancellor of England exclaimed—"Under our feet we'll stamp thy Cardinal's hat," &c. This, indeed, from the lips of such a personage, upon such an occasion, and in such a place, was an unbecoming declaration. Could Solon, or Lycurgus, or Sir Thomas More, have been there, they would have hung their venerated heads in shame, and have left the banquet.—I am, &c.,

CHARLES WATERTON.

Walton Hall, Dec. 2, 1850.

[Tablet.]

A Royal Commission is about to issue to inquire and report upon the whole subject of the law of divorce—not merely the proceedings in Parliament—not the divorce a mensa et thoro alone, but the more weighty and important question of the divorce a vinculo matrimonii. The commission is chosen from the most eminent lawyers and members of both Houses of Parliament. It will be composed of the following:—Lord Campbell, Lord Beaumont, Lord Redesdale, Dr. Lushington, Spencer Horatio Walpole, M.P., W. Page Wood, M.P., and the Hon. E.P. Bouverie, M. P.

Few persons have an idea of the value or extent of the importations of ivory into Southampton, principally from Alexandria. The tusks and pieces (nearly 3,000 in all) brought by the Ripon on her last voyage, were on Tuesday last sold by auction, and readily realised from 18*s.* to 25*s.* per lb., the whole producing nearly 25,000*l.* It appears that the large quantities of tusks which have been from time to time shed by wild elephant are found buried in the deserts of Arabia; these are bought up principally on account of the Pesha of Egypt, and then transmitted to England for sale. Some of the teeth imported the Ripon were of this class, and in an advanced state of decay, such as it must have taken centuries to produce.—Atlas for India.

Lord and Lady Fielding left Downing-hall, Flintshire, on Friday, for Rome, before the county Protestant meeting, which, as High Sheriff, he was to preside at.—Limerick Chronicle.

AMERICAN RAT-TRAP.

Among the list of new patents issued in the United States, is one for an invention of Mr. Stephens, of Maryland, whereby he has endeavoured to bring the science of optics to aid him in constructing a trap for catching rats. In this new trap a mirror is so arranged that the rat which looks at the bait shall see his own image reflected in such a position as will lead him to believe that a second rat is trying to get before him in seizing the bait; and when the first rat has been caught, his image will be reflected by a mirror, so that the next rat who shall look at the bait shall see two rats apparently striving to seize it, thus decoying him upon the turning-table, which yields to his weight, and precipitates him into the body of the trap.]—W. News.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 7.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, Feb. 15, 1851.

INSTITUTE OF THE CHRISTIAN BROTHERS.

FOR THE EDUCATION OF THE MALE POOR.

In our preceding number, we promised to notice the origin of the Christian Brother's Institute in Ireland, and its diffusion throughout that country, as well as in other parts of the British Empire. Our Readers need hardly be informed, that so recently as fifty years ago, Ireland, although her people always undeviatingly adhered to the Catholic Faith, in spite of a cruel persecution continued for three centuries, and in spite of the far more dangerous ordeal, of the riches and honours, promised, by a bigoted Government to apostates real or pretended, yet was deprived, by sanguinary heartless enactments, of every means of providing for the education of her children, whether rich or poor, solely because these remained faithful to the ancient

It was not enough for the unfeeling shattors of the bigoted code we now speak of, to render it penal for the Irish Catholic to educate his child in his own country, they further pursued him with the vengeance of the Law, if he dared send his son abroad for the purpose of procuring for him, in a foreign country, a liberal education, a benefit, from which he was excluded at home. In this state, things continued for nearly three centuries until every vestige of Catholic Schools and Seminaries was exterminated in Ireland, and her people forced into a state of ignorance and semi-barbarism by their Saxon oppressors. And yet these heartless tyrants were not ashamed afterwards, to upbraid their victims, and reproach them for the very ignorance and want of civilisation, which their own brutal legislation had engendered.

But the same Divine Providence which says to the raging Sea, "Thus far shalt thou come and no farther" and which bids the stormy wind to be still, and presently a calm ensues, had also fixed the limits beyond which the power of the persecutor was not to pass. As, from Egypt of old, the voice of his people's lamentations and wailings, because of the grievousness of their tribulation, ascended into Heaven and reached the throne of the Most High, so in the appointed season of mercy, the sorrows of the faithful children of the Church in Ireland, moved the Almighty to compassion, and hushed into repose the angry tempest of persecution, which had so long blasted and blighted the fairest and choicest fruits of that portion of the Saviour's vineyard. Scarcely had the murmuring of the expiring storm ceased, when Divine Providence, in order to repair the ravages which that precious part of his inheritance had endured, and restore to it, its ancient beauty and fruitfulness, sent forth his Holy Spirit with its abundant graces, to enkindle the sacred fire of the sanctuary, which, during the sad days of persecution, had been almost changed into muddy water, and raise up in "the Island Saints," worthy successors to those illustrious personages, whose piety and learning, had won for their country that glorious appellation.

But whom will the wisdom of God select for the accomplishment of so great an undertaking. Doubtless, human reason will suggest, some person raised above the common by his talents, his connections or his wealth! No, on this occasion, as at the first foundation of his Church, the Almighty will employ, in preference to all others, the lowly and the poor as his chosen instruments. In virtue of this heavenly economy, Edmond Rice, a meek, humble, and hitherto unknown person to the world, but well known to his Bishop and to the small circle of the virtuous among whom he lived, as a man wholly devoted to the service of God and his neighbour, was selected to be the Father and Founder in Ireland, of the Christian Brother's institute. The following brief extracts from the Life of the Venerable J. B. De La Salle will show that this eulogy is justly due to a man, of whom every Catholic should be proud because of his religion, one whose name should be dear to every Irishman, because of the unspeakable blessings spiritual and temporal, which the Christian Brother's Institute has conferred upon his country:—

"In 1802, Mr. Edmond Rice, of Waterford, commenced an establishment in that city for the gratuitous instruction of youth in literature and Christian piety. He was joined in this undertaking by two young men, desirous of devoting their lives to the same laudable purpose. On the 7th of June, 1803, they came to reside in the new dwelling-house, but the schools were not finished until the close of the same year. The building was commenced in the episcopacy of the Right Rev. Dr. Thomas Hussey, then bishop of Waterford, who highly approved of Mr. Rice's intention, and liberally contributed to the good work. This excellent and learned prelate died at Dunmore, the 11th of July, 1803, and was succeeded by the Right Rev. Dr. John Power, a sincere and active friend to the rising Institute. On the 26th of January, 1810, this zealous supporter of every good work closed his mortal career.

The schools were opened for the reception of children the 1st of May, 1804. Mr. Rice and his two companions were joined about this time by another young man. The good effects of their instructions soon became manifest in the conduct of the children; a circumstance which speedily attracted public notice, and augmented the number of scholars. In 1806, Mr. Thomas O'Brien, wine merchant, of Waterford, seeing the good which resulted to the children from these schools, commenced, with the approbation of the Right Rev. Dr. Power, a similar establishment in Carrick-on-Suir: it was finished in 1807. Towards the close of that year, another foundation was made in Dungarvan. At the beginning of 1808, there were five members in the Waterford house; two in Carrick, besides Mr. O'Brien; and two in Dungarvan: in all nine. About this time they came to the resolution of making annual vows. On August the 15th, of that year, seven members, at the close of an eight-days' retreat, pronounced their vows in the presence of Dr. Power, according to a form drawn up by his Lordship.

The schools in Waterford were now found inadequate to accommodate all the children who sought admission. Additional schools were commenced; the Right Rev. Dr. Power and the benevolent citizens contributed generously to the building, which was finished in 1816.

The Institute is composed of nineteen houses, having ninety school-Brothers, fifteen serving Brothers, fifty-eight schools, and about ten thousand children and adults under instruction. There are eleven of the houses situated in Ireland; namely, in Dublin (three); Wrterford, Cork, Limerick, Dungarvan, Carrick-on-Suir, Thurles, Enniskymon, and Clare Bridge, County Galway: seven in England—London (two); Manchester (two); Liverpool, Preston, and Sunderland; and one in Sydney, to which three Brothers were sent with the Most Rev. Dr. Polding, at the express request of the Sacred Congregation. Several applications are being daily made from the colonies, America, and various parts of Great Britain and Ireland.

The knowledge communicated in the schools of this Institute embraces not only reading, writing, arithmetic, grammar, geography, book-keeping, but also an acquaintance with such branches of mathematical science as are suited to the taste and talents of the pupils, and to the stations of life which they are destined to occupy. Geometry, mensuration, drawing, and mechanics, become special objects of attention. As to the manner of communicating knowledge, the most approved modern methods are sought out, and when found worthy of adoption, are carefully reduced to practice. Normal schools are established, in which the junior members, after having gone through a regular course of study, are trained, and thence sent to the other establishments of the Institute. Besides this, all the members are bound to occupy themselves for at least an hour and a half every day in studies connected with the schools; and as this is done in community, they enjoy all the advantages of mutual assistance.

A detailed account of the manner in which each branch is taught in the schools would be tedious. It may, however, be remarked, that the ordinary reading lessons are made the means of communicating much useful information on every subject within the sphere of youthful intellect, as the interrogatory system is brought into full practical operation. Grammar, geography, and lessons on objects, are to a certain extent given simultaneously; but, as this method cannot be adopted without evident loss of time to many of the scholars, owing to the different degrees of talents and acquirements, care is taken that it should not interfere with monitorial or individual instruction. Regular lectures are given each day to the children, on the various subjects they are learning; and some of the more advanced scholars are trained to the delivery of such lectures. Thus the three methods of instruction, simultaneous, mutual, and individual, are daily brought into operation in the Christian Schools. The mutual instruction is so arranged, that no monitor ordinarily teaches for more than one hour of the six which he attends school, and this, instead of interfering with his own progress, is a great means of facilitating it, as it gives him the advantages of repetition, a great facility in communicating his ideas, and business-like habits, which in after-life are of great advantage.

But it is to the Communication of religious knowledge that this Institute is chiefly devoted To this great object, the members direct their best energies. They look upon it as their principal concern; the one for which chiefly, under God, they have been called into existence; and though they are careful to impart a knowledge of everything that can tend to their pupils' temporal advancement, yet the knowledge of religion, and of the duties it inculcates, are the objects to which their minds and hearts are most particularly directed. For this purpose, prayer is said at the opening and close of the schools; the presence of God is recalled at the end of every hour; the catechism is repeated, and regular catechetical instruction given every day; stated times appointed for approaching the holy sacraments, for which, at particular seasons, the children undergo a long course of instruction. Each of the junior members of the Institute delivers in his turn a catechetical instruction in the presence of those who are older, that he may be regularly trained to the most perfect manner of discharging this important duty. The Brothers are required not to deliver any religious instruction without immediate preparation, and to be, as their rule inculcates, "vigilant, zealous, and laborious in their schools, and ever to exhibit to the children, in their own persons, a living example of those virtues which they teach and exhort them to practise." On Sundays and holydays, and at other convenient times, the Brothers give religious instruction to adults."

THOUGHTS UPON THE PRESENT ROMEWARD MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND, IN CONNEXION WITH THE PAPAL SUPREMACY.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

There will ever be a number of refined and affectionate minds, who disappointed in finding full matter for their devotional feelings in the English system as at present constituted, betake themselves through human frailty to Rome. "And truly when one surveys the grandeur of their system; the antiquity, the universality, and the unanimity of their Church, a sigh arises in the thoughtful mind to think that we should be separated from them."—Oxford tracts for the times.

"And many an ardent prayer ascends from many a hidden spot.
That England's people be Catholic though England's set be not.

Sir,—It appears to me that the present movement towards Catholicity in England, is principally to be ascribed, in the first place, to the tender mercy of God, in listening to the prayers offered up from all parts of the earth, for that Country's reunion once more with the See of Rome, and in condescending to illumine from on high so many of her people, with grace to see both their former errors, and the divine impression stamped upon the glorious truths of Catholicism. This is the first cause, which I would assign, for the Romeward movement now progressing in England. The second seems to be the great spirit of enquiry prevailing in England into the writings of antiquity, in order to learn from them, what doctrine was taught and propounded to the faithful, in the early ages* of the Church. They have dived deep into the writings of the holy Fathers. They have examined, and weighed with minute care, and attention, the belief which these professed, as set forth in their works. The Ancient Canons, Councils, and Decrees they have laboriously investigated, and finding nothing contained in them as an article of belief, which could not be proved to be of divine origin, they have come to the conclusion, that if the Catholic Church was the true spouse of Jesus Christ in the second, third, and fourth centuries, she must be certainly the same now in the nineteenth. For she propounds, or teaches nothing to her Members now, but what can be distinctly proved to have been taught in the most early period of her existence. Now as her most bitter opponents grant that she was then pure, so must she be too at the present day,—the same divine Spirit, which then guided all her operations, still directing and controlling them.

'This is the Second cause in my Judgment, of the present Romeward movement in England. And it is most gratifying to find, that these causes are assigned also by one of the most brilliant writers, that ancient or modern times have produced. I mean the Great Bossuet, who in his immortal work, the Variations of the Protestant Churches, thus expresses himself. 'A nation so learned as England, will not long remain in its blindness. The respect which it has for the Fathers, and its curious and continual researches into antiquity, will lead her back to the doctrine of the first ages. I cannot believe that she will persist in her hatred, against the chair of St. Peter, whence she received her Christianity. In fine the time of vengeance and illusion shall pass away, and God will hear the groans of the Saints.'

* The general ignorance which prevailed at that time (the Reformation) respecting christian antiquity, has been frankly acknowledged by one of the best informed, and perhaps the most learned men of his time among the followers of the reformation. Chatillon makes the acknowledgment in these terms (a): "Certainly, to speak the truth, our age is still buried in the thick darkness of ignorance. The manifest proof of this appears in our important obstinate and fatal discussions; in our numerous and ever unsuccessful conferences to settle our disputes: and in fine, in the multitude of works which are every day appearing, and which come to an agreement upon nothing....If the pure day of truth," continues he, "was shining upon us, should we be still groping by the sombre and dull light of these obscure productions?" Trevern's Amicable Discussion.

I have invited your attention, Sir, to the curious and I might say prophetic testimony of the Illustrious Bishop of Meaux, respecting the return of the English nation once more to that Centre of Unity, from which she was so unhappily severed in the great outbreak of the Sixteenth Century. And who will have the hardihood to maintain (considering recent events in that Country), that that prediction is not on the very eve of being realised. It is true, that some may spurn the idea of being united in the one fold, and under the one shepherd. They may despise the proffered grace, and still cling with obstinate tenacity, to their former errors. They may like the Israelites of old, prefer the savoury fleshpots of Egypt, to the manna of the desert, or the milk and honey of the promised land. They may like Jeroboam, rather prefer to worship the golden calf of their rich sinecures, to the adoring of the God of Israel within the only Temple in which he will accept of their homage. Doubtless many will unhappily act thus perversely. But, through the Divine grace, many others will generously confess and embrace the truth. For "Magna est veritas et praevalebit.

I remain Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
C. C.

Calcutta,
12*th Feb* 1851.

LECTURES ON CERTAIN DIFFICULTIES FELT BY ANGLICANS IN SUBMITTING TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, PRIEST OF THE ORATORY OF ST. PHILIP NERI. LECTURE IV. THE PROVIDENTIAL DIRECTION OF THE MOVEMENT OF 2833, NOT TOWARDS THE NATIONAL CHURCH. LONDON: BURNS AND LAMBERT.—1850.

(Continued from our last.)

"The Bishop speaks in me," says the Tract, "as Christ wrought in him, and as God sent Christ; thus the whole plan of salvation hangs together; Christ the true Mediator; His servant, the Bishop, His earthly likeness; mankind, the subjects of His teaching; God the author of salvation." And the Queen answers, "We do hereby signify to the Most Reverend Father in God, William, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, our nomination of the said Augustus, requiring, and by the faith and love whereby he is bound unto Us, commanding the said Most Reverend Father in God, to ordain and consecrate the said Augustus." And the consecrated prelate echoes from across the ocean against the Catholic pastor of the country, "Augustus, by the grace of God and the favour of Queen Victoria, Bishop."

"You will, in time to come," says the Tract, "honour us with a purer honour, than many men do now, as those who are intrusted with the keys of heaven and hell, as the heralds of mercy, as the denouncers of woe to wicked men, as intrusted with the awful and mysterious privilege of dispensing Christ's Body and Blood." And a first Episcopal charge replies in the words of the homily, "Let us diligently search the well of life, and not run after the stinking puddles of tradition, devised by man's imagination." A second, "It is a subject of deep concern that any of our body should prepare men of ardent feelings and warm imaginations for a return to the Roman Mass-book." And a third, "Already are the foundations of apostasy laid: if we once admit another Gospel, Antichrist is at the door. I am full of fear: every thing is at stake; there seems to be something judicial in the rapid spread of these opinions." And a fourth, "It is impossible not to remark upon the subtle wile of the Adversary; it has been signally and unexpectedly exemplified in the present day by the revival of errors which might have been supposed buried for ever." And a fifth, "Under the spurious pretence of deference to antiquity and respect for primitive models, the perfumes, the nectar, &c., are costly things, and how it is possible to enjoy all this luxury in a democracy of divinities. One day, Voltaire, to amuse himself, made a calculation of what each individual would get, if an agrarian law were adopted in its entire rigour, and he found that every Frenchman would derive from his portion of the partition, fifty crowns a-year. The nectar and purple mantle must vanish at such an estimate. To attain this equality of costly pleasures, modelled after Roman luxury, we must first re-establish what the gospel has abolished—slavery!

"But your temperance," say the philosophers of nature, is nothing more than a deplorable system of privations: it banishes all happiness from its gloomy domain."

A temperate life affords more happiness than a dissipated one, as has been acknowledged by the sages of a pagan antiquity. "Every one desires to be happy," says Seneca, "but no one seems to know where true and permanent happiness is to be found. One man believes that he will find it in pleasure, and another in banqueting. All these fleeting and delusive pleasures treat those who pursue them like drunkenness, which for an hour's gaiety leaves a lasting regret in the soul. Happiness springs up only in the soul which has a consciousness of being virtuous: none but the man who is brave, just, and temperate, can be happy."

(To be continued.)

THE HISTORY AND FATE OF SACRILEGE.

BY SIR HENRY SPELMAN, A PROTESTANT AND CONTINUED BY TWO PRIESTS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND, TO THE PRESENT TIME.

CHAPTER VI.

(Continued from p. 76.)

Marham.

Sir Nicholas Hare, knig and John Hare, citizen and mercer of London, 3rd, July, anno 38 Hen. VIII. purchased [it] of the king.

Sir Nicholas Hare married the daughter and heir of Bassingbourn, and had issue, Michael that died without issue, Robert that died without issue, and Richard that died without issue; and his inheritance went away to his two daughters, the one married to Rouse, the other to Timperley. See more of this Sir Nicholas in the Speaker of Parliament, anno 31 Hen. VIII., where he prophesied this ruin of his family.

John Hare, the citizen, had issue Nicholas the lawyer, that died without issue, Ralph that died without issue, Edmund, lunatic, at a lodge in Enfield Chase, Hugh that died without issue, Richard Rowland and John that had issue, and Thomas, of Orford, that married and died without issue.

Richard, the elder, [who slew —— Blackwell, and obtained a pardon with £1200,] married Elizabeth, daughter of ....., and had issue sir Ralph Hare, knight of the Bath; and he married ....., the daughter of Alderman Hambden, [and Richard, who was lunatic,* and in the King's Bench, and Margaret, married to Lewis Cooking.] John, son of John brother to Richard, was clerk of the Court of Wards, and had issue Nicholas, who was lunatick, and died without issue, and Hugh, now lord Coleraine in Ireland. [Family extinct 1749.]

Sir Ralph Hare, to expiate this sin of his family, gave the parsonage impropriate of Marham, worth £100 yearly, to S. John's college in Cambridge, anno 1623,† and died, leaving one only child, sir John Hare, who married sir Thomas Coventry the new lord-keeper's daughter, and hath by her, she not being ..... years old, ... sons and daughters, with hope of a numerous posterity. God bless them. [They had eleven children, of whom nine lived to be married.]

CONVERSIONS.

During the present week, a widow Lady, a Protestant, born in this Country, was received into the Catholic Communion by the Rev. Mr. Mascarenhas, Vicar of the Dhurrumtollah Church.

A young Mussulman Lad who has been adopted by a Christian Family was, after due instruction, baptized in the course of this week by the Rev. Mr. McCabe.

The Bombay Examiner makes mention of the Conversion to the Catholic Faith of two Protestant Soldiers, (Europeans) at Karrachee.

Selections.

LETTER FROM THE REV. MR. BENNETT, TO LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

The Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, of St. Paul's Knight's bridge, has published a pamphlet under the title of "A First Letter to the Right Hon.

* [This sentence is omitted in the printed copy.—ED.]

† [This money was by sir John Hare's direction, in the first place expended in the ..... of S. John's Library.—ED.]

Hon. Lord John Russell, M.P., on the present Persecution of a certain Portion of the English Church," from which we make the following extracts, which a great press of matter alone prevented our giving last week.

Mr. Bennett commences by complaining bitterly of the interruptions and disturbances to which his congregation has been subjected for several Sundays, and proceeds thus:—

"It is time, indeed, my lord, when a congregation of Christian worshippers is obliged to have detective police within the walls of their church to keep order, and a body of one hundred constables without, to keep off an unruly mob from bursting in and violating the Lord's sanctuary; when, in their attendance at divine service, the parishioners come in and go out in actual bodily fear; when the residence of a simple inoffensive clergymen is obliged to be guarded, all day and night, by special police constables, as though he were in a state of siege, defending himself against an enemy; it is time my lord, then, that we ask ourselves the question—what is the meaning of all this? How has it come to pass? Where is the cause of it? Who has done it?

"I am about to tell you, my lord, who has done it. I am about, if you will have the patience to listen, to tell you where lies the moving cause of all this outrage and blasphemy. To those who have the eyes to see, alas it is too plain!"

The Rev. Mr. Bennett here quotes at some length the letter and speech of Lord John Russell at Guildhall, and proceeds:—

"Now all this, I confess, did somewhat startle me. I could not conceive how it was that the members of her Majesty's government could find themselves of a sudden such deep masters of divinity as thus to pronounce ex cathedra upon the deep mysteries of our most holy faith. It was a wonder to me how your lordship should have found time to add to the incessant toils of your political office the study of theology to such an extent as to pronounce on some of the most difficult dogmas of the Church. But, nevertheless, I said to myself—this letter is a very important thing, be it as it may. I compared the unhappy disturbances at our church of St. Barnabas with those speeches at Guildhall—I compared the mob, with its outcries of 'No Popery,' 'No mummeries,' and the like, with your lordship's letter, which breathes the same spirit, of 'no mummeries of superstition'—'no superstitious ceremonies'—and the like. I said to myself—It cannot be very much a wonder that ignorant persons, consisting mostly of the lowest orders of society, should be so stirred up to molest us poor people of St. Barnabas, when the Prime Minister himself writes them a letter, and tells them that we are more dangerous than even the Pope of Rome."

Mr. Bennett then proceeds to show that Lord John Russell's letter was plainly intended to raise a "No Popery" cry, which the newspapers of course re-echoed, and from which the mob drew natural conclusions.

Did you want them to draw this conclusion? If never, so it was. A statesman knowing Though I had been sorely puzzled to know why we were so attacked at St. Barnabas, now it was plain enough. For days and days not a single newspaper but teemed with letters and articles about our poor inoffensive church; though I had been before sorely puzzled about it in my simplicity, now it all came upon me in a moment of enlightenment. How was it possible they should avoid it? How was it possible, when the uncultivated, ignorant minds of the common people were so skilfully plied with incendiary matter by the Prime Minister of England, backed by the Lord Chancellor and an unscrupulous public press, that they should not take fire? When the law in Court of Chancery, and the law in Court of Queen's Bench, represented by grave and solemn men, spoke out from a Guildhall dinner, and egged on the multitude with speeches about 'civil and religious liberty;' and with many jestings about the Pope, and when Sir Peter Laurie wound up the story by saying:—'Whether ministers led or followed, one thing was certain—Britons never would be slaves;' to what; 'either to Puseyism or to Popery!' How, my Lord, could we wonder any longer at what had taken place? Why, it would have been a perfect miracle had we escaped. You might as well have laid a train of gunpowder from Chesham-place, stretching along the streets to poor St. Barnabas' Church, and then put into the hands of your friends, 'the people,' a torch, and have said—'Now you know where the mischief is;' and then have expected that the torch would not have been applied to the train."

Mr. Bennett then states his opinion that there is much of rottenness and corruption in the English church, and that the source of that corruption is the royal supremacy, as now administered; and claims an Englishman's right to combine with others in measures for its reform, without their being considered as 'insidious' in regard of their faith, or as enemies in regard of the Church.

"But, my lord, either not understanding this or else wilfully passing it by—I hope the former,—you throw dust into people's eyes, and say that we, a certain portion of the English clergy, are bowing in the Pope, because we speak against the Queen's supremacy.

"It is not the Queen's supremacy that we complain of—it is the Prime Minister's supremacy that we complain of—not the thing, but the abuse. Your Lordship is very earnest in your cry for 'liberty of conscience.' Why will you not concede it to us the clergy, as well as all other of her Majesty's subjects?

* * * * * *

"If 'civil and religious liberty' means any [illegible] we have a right to say this, and to act upon it, and that right we claim. It is your inconsistency that we would point out to the world, in fighting so bravely and enduring so much for a principle in yourself, and for yourself, which you will not concede in another.

My lord, I quite agree with you that no man has a power to enslave the soul of another—that man's conscience is free. But I charge you with inconsistency in not following this up, and allowing a fortiori that neither has a state such power."

Mr. Bennett speaks with great severity of Lord John Russell's inconsistency and insincerity in pretending to consider that the Queen's supremacy in temporal things is in danger from the appointment of Catholic Bishops—

"You do not really mean that a number of Roman Bishops, exercising spiritual jurisdiction over their people, is an aggression against the Queen's right to her throne; for, if you did, you would not surely act as you have done all your life, in endeavouring to promote this very point. You would not have repealed statute after statute to prepare the way for it. You would not have given large grants of money to the College of Maynooth. You would not have acknowledged Archbishops and bishops in the colonies, and have paid them salaries, and have recognised their titles. You would not have counselled and aided in various Acts of Parliament in which these titles and salaries are made the law of the land. You would not have conceded in the court of Dublin a priority of rank, or, at least, a recognition of rank in the Irish Bishops, and have, on many occasions, addressed them by their titles. No, my lord, I cannot impute to you the idea of having done all this, or joined in all this, freely and notoriously, with a conjunction of your opinion being in reality what it seems, that Popery is like to be the destruction of the Queen's authority in this realm of England. Why, I would ask you, are you now denying both the words and the works of your whole life? Why put before the people these exciting things, to which your life gives the great answer, they are not true? Why, my lord, fondle, and pet, and nurse a viper which you knew would only sting you when it got sufficient warmth and vitality? If the Roman Catholics are dangerous, why did you foster them? If they are not dangerous, why do you say they are?

"My Lord, you not only excite 'the weak minds' of the people of England against Cardinal Wiseman and the Pope, and cry 'no Popery' but you do something more. While you say 'Popery is dangerous, down with it,' you say—'It is not my fault, gentlemen. It is true I have always advocated their claims, and forwarded their views; but now that they have come out into power, that is not my fault; it is the fault of certain clergy within our Church.' You couple yourself with us, although now a follower of Dr. Cumming—a Presbyterian. It suits you for your purpose to do so, and you do it. Knowing where the blame ought to lie, you turn it off and say,—'There, look at that—look at these clergy—look at their 'mummeries' and their 'superstitions'—observe their Roman doctrines, and their insidious teaching. These are the men that have caused this danger.' Thus, under a masked battery, having diverted the attention from yourself, you aim your guns with the true an aim against us. 'Down with these clergy of 'mutterings,' and of 'confessions,' and of 'infallibility,' and of 'freedom from the Queen's supremacy.' These are the 'mischief-makers.' Then the mob is stirred and infuriated, and instead of the Roman Catholics themselves, we become the buts and objects of hatred, and ridicule, and violence. If there is a precipice at the end of a certain walk, and you know it, and dread it, and would not for the world move towards it, for fear of falling over it—you would not hate the precipice; you would know of its existence, and simply avoid it. But if after a while some one began to lead you towards it, step by step—and you went on under his guidance, as it were fascinated and bewildered, when you should at length arrive at the precipice, and fall over, and thereby injure yourself—with what kind of feeling would you look at such a guide?—hatred, wrath, repugnance, punishment. But this, my lord, you have just done towards us, the clergy of St. Barnabas. You have told the whole Protestant world concerning the Roman Church, that it is the great enemy of the crown of Queen Victoria. You have saturated the people with the unchristian feeling of looking upon Rome with a sort of hatred, as though it were a natural enemy to England. Having signified this, you go to the Bishop, and you say—See what the very Bishop says. He speaks of these clergy as men 'leading you step by step to this precipice.' What is to be done with them?"

Mr. Bennett proceeds to Lord John's connection with the Church of St. Barnabas, and establishes the following points:—That from the consecration of St. Paul's Church, at Knight's-bridge, by the Bishop of London, Lord John had been a constant member, receiving the Sacrament at the hands of Mr. Bennett; that he continued a member for nearly seven years without objecting to the system adopted there; that when the Church of St. Barnabas was in contemplation, Lord John was amongst the first who contributed sums for its advancement; and that even so late as the year 1849, at the Anniversary Festival of St. Barnabas, he said that he could take part in their festivities.

"So far, then, as St. Barnabas's day, 1849, there was no diminution of agreement and countenance, to a certain extent, of the tone and principles of worship in St. Paul's church.

* * * * * * *

If my course was insidious, why did you take part in that course? If I so muttered the liturgy as to disguise its language, why did you join in so glaring a profaneness for nearly seven years? If I practised 'mummeries and superstition'—why did you come to join in them for nearly seven years? Why did your so far and so deeply join in them as to receive at my hands, so late as Ash Wednesday, 1849, the Holy Eucharist, yourself and your family? If I were one of those designated in your letter as bringing a greater danger than even the Pope, why then, my lord, was it that you said not all this before? Why, for seven years—not occasionally, remember, or as a stranger, but in your place as a regular Parishioner—why by external acts of union and participation in what was being done—why by this participation manifested in the deepest mystery of our faith, did you signify to the world (as far as such things can be signified) your agreement essentially in all that was done"

If you really thought that your soul and the souls of your family, were likely to be enslaved, and their intellects confined, why place yourself and yours within a sphere of religious teaching which was tending towards that end? Or if you feared not for yourself, as being too strong to heed it, why countenance it by your own example, in regard of others who were weak? why ten and co-operate with a system which was likely to be so pernicious and so fatal to their spiritual welfare? And lastly, my lord, why in the midst of all this (if it were so) 'insidious teaching,' 'mummeries of superstition,' and 'leading of the flock to the verge of the precipice'—why did you lend your countenance and give your alms, not only to the maintenance and support of that system as then established at one church, but also to the building and establishment of another, which you knew would be conducted on the very same principles? Why not only look on, and bear with it, and take part in, such a profane and wicked perversion of truth as I must really have been guilty of, if your words are true, with a passive or acquiescent permission, but join publicly and actively in its propagation and extension? Either, my lord, you and myself must have been wilfully, and grossly, and wickedly wrong for seven years, or we were right—and only mistaken, or misunderstood. If the former, how awful must be our case before the living God, at the great day of judgment—tampering with holy things, receiving of His blessed Sacrament, joining in His holy ordinances, presuming to stand before Him, and invoke His holy name in prayer, and all the while imagining that we were doing no more than a 'mummery,' and believing no more than a 'superstition?' If the latter, why have you given up what you once approved, or at least assented to? why have you abandoned what you were content to practice? why have you denounced what you helped to advance and to increase?"

"Mr. Bennett next proceeds to the second section of his letter—the subject of Lord John Russell's theology. The first religious topic he treats of, following the order of his lordship's own letter, is "the honour paid to saints." This practice, as followed by the Church of England, Mr. Bennett defends as a commemoration in no way remarkable, instancing her dedication of Churches to saints, the special services set apart in honour of them in the prayer book, and the example of antiquity as proof of its propriety; and he expresses his desire that Lord John Russell would as a member of his parish, escape from the teaching of Dr. Cumming, in regard to this point of honour paid to saints, because he believes that the Presbyterians deny all idea of that great doctrine, which the Catholic Church has always faithfully clung to, namely, the "communion of saints." He proceeds:—

"Your next topic, my lord, is 'the infallibility of the Church.' Here, again I plead guilty to your charge. I do claim for the Church infallibility. I have always taught this, and I now desire so tell you why I have taught it. I think infallibility is essentially necessary for the existence of a Church; that any article of faith, vital to salvation, depends necessarily upon it—that without it we have nothing certain to believe at all. But in what sense, and how? I do not believe there is infallibility in the English Church, or in any particular national Church: our articles of religion expressly say that there is no such infallibility; that all national Churches are liable to err. But national Churches are not the Catholic Church. It is the whole, universal, Catholic Church throughout all ages, and in all countries, and in all times, agreeing and blessed by the Spirit of God, as the apostles were at Pentecost...it is this Church, the Church of the living God, of Christ Jesus our Lord that is expressly called in holy scripture—'the pillar and the ground of truth.' Your faith rests upon holy scripture; holy scripture must be true. You can only know that it is true upon the infallibility of the Church, which has pronounced it to be so, and handed it down to you. In proportion as you take away the infallibility of the Church you take away the certainty of the holy scriptures, you destroy your own faith in Jesus Christ, by which you hope to be saved. Without this idea, I see no resting place anywhere for any doctrine or for any practice—no certainty for anything that we read, see, or imagine in the whole wide ground-work of our salvation. We become at once rationalists; and from rationalists, sceptics; and from sceptics, infidels.

"Next to the doctrine of the infallibility of the Church, you mention 'the sign of the Cross,' and you call it superstitious. I do not suppose you mean to make any distinction between a superstitious sign of the Cross, and a sign not superstitious; because if you only mean that, of course we grant your charge at once. Anything superstitious as such, is, of course, objectionable. Superstitious prayers, superstitious reception of the sacrament, superstitious reading of the Bible, as far as it is superstitious, is of course wrong; but take away the superstitution, and then the thing itself is right. This you would readily grant. But what you mean, no doubt, is this—that all use of the sign of the Cross is superstitious. If so, then you go against the Church, which commands it at the font in baptism. I myself will freely confess to you, that I highly delight in that holy sign."

Mr. Bennett then refers to Bishop Grindal's Articles of Visitation, L'Estrange's 'Alliance of Divine Offices,' and the canons of the Church in defence of the use of the sign of the Cross. He then proceeds:—

"I can conceive a Socinian, or a Deist, or an Unitarian, or some violent heretic of that kind, to object both to the name of the Holy Trinity and the Cross of Jesus, both its doctrine and its sign; but how an orthodox Christian can object (always setting aside prejudice), I am quite at a loss to understand."

He briefly alludes to the charge of muttering the liturgy, expresses the deep anxiety which he always felt as a pastor of Christ, for the spiritual welfare of his Lordship.

"But this now I will tell, known before only to God, that frequently, very frequently, in 'the lone night,' and when you have been labouring in the House of Commons, I have been in the Church where you worshipped, and by name (of course with others of my flock according to their needs), have invoked the Almighty God of nations, that he would vouchsafe to guide your policy for our country's welfare, and our Church's blessing.

* * * * * *

I say this now, because at such a time it was—I mean in the year 1849—so late as Ash-Wednesday, 1849—I find a note in my journal, thus:—'Lord and Lady John Russell at the Holy Communion this day. This looks well. Oh, that we could make them love the Church!' I give you, my lord, the very genuine simple words of my private journal, such words of course never expecting to see the light.

* * * * * *

But what has all this to do, you will say, with auricular confession and penance? Why this much, that on that day you did hear and join in that solemn service of the Church which is called 'the Commination Service;' and in that service you heard these words—'Brethren, in the primitive Church there was a godly discipline, that at the beginning of Lent, such persons as stood convicted of notorious sin were put to open penance, and punished in this world, that their souls might be saved in the day of the Lord, and that others, admonished by their example, might be more afraid to offend. Until whereof (until the said discipline may be restored again, which is much to be wished), it is thought good,' &c. The idea of penance is, then held in the Church of England as a thing desirable.

"With regard to auricular confession, and absolution by the priest, you will see the doctrine of the reformed Church clearly set forth in the first prayer-book of Edward VI.

* * * * * *

If you find fault with those clergy who do, for the comfort of penitent souls, receive their confessions when tendered—if you find fault with them for going to the priest in difficulties, and when they cannot find their own way out of conscientious scruples, and misgivings of sin—if you find fault with priestly absolution, and the announcement made to sinners that they may repent and be saved; then you find fault, not with the clergy, but with the prayer-book; not with me, my lord, but the Church.

* * * * * *

I am not much afraid that you care about the infallibility of the Church, or her power of the keys, or the muttering of the liturgy; I should rather be afraid that these are put forth, because you believed that they would prove popular objections, to the mob. I really believe that the one, and the only one, real objection and alarm in your Lordship's mind is this—the Queen's supremacy. I think, from what I have observed in the course of Dr. Hampden's appointment to the see of Hereford, and Mr. Gorham's appointment to the living of Bramford Speke, that your opinion concerning the royal prerogative in the matters of the Church is very high indeed; that you arrogate for the Crown something which approaches the actual Papal power, against which, in the Pope, himself, you so vigorously protest. And then we must remember that the royal prerogative now is nothing more than the Prime Ministers prerogative; and the Prime Minister's prerogative is the people's prerogative. Hence the strength of the cry which now rises up against any party in the Church which either denies or limits it. It is easy to see why parliaments, why meetings, why parish vestries, why all assemblies of men, of whatever creed, or whatever kind, or for whatever purpose banded together, decry what is now called 'The Papal Aggreson.'

* * * * * *

"It suits your Lordship, because it is a popular outcry, to set the people on a false scent about 'No Popery,' in order to strengthen your own secret schemes within—of strengthening the royal power in the things of the church. All the bishoprics, deaneries, canonries, a great number of livings, and offices and places in or about the Church, are yours. You are contending therefore for the continuance of your own advantage when you contend for the continuance (in your sense of it) of the Queen's supremacy. When you contend for a royal headship over the Church, you are contending for your own power to appoint a Dr. Hampden to all the sees of England, and a Mr. Gorham to all the parishes of England, that by so doing you may, by the weakness of the clergy, and their division, and their jealousies of each other, ride through the storm yourself triumphant. I leave it for your consideration, whether you really have any love for the truth, and any desire to increase the strength of Christ's Church, as such, when you speak of the royal supremacy, or whether it is only from a sort of statesman's etiquette that power should always be in his hands.

Mr. Bennett next proceeds to state what he considers to be the nature of the union between Church and State, and embodies the idea of the Royal Supremacy in these propositions:—

"1. I have hitherto acknowledged, and do now acknowledge, the supremacy of the crown in ecclesiastical matters, to be a supreme civil power over all persons and causes in temporal things, and over the temporal accidents of spiritual things.

"2. I do not, and in conscience cannot, acknowledge in the crown the power recently exercised, to hear and judge in appeal the internal state, or merits of spiritual questions touching doctrine or discipline, the custody of which is committed to the Church alone by the law of Christ.

"3. I therefore, for the relief of my own conscience, hereby publicly declare that I acknowledge the royal supremacy in the sense above stated, and in no other.

"These propositions I believe have been subscribed by about one thousand eight hundred clergy.

Denouncing the doctrine that the Church is dependent upon any temporal crown, or on acts of Parliament, Mr. Bennet thus concludes:—

"What is the general character of the Church of England; its general tone,—the beating of its pulse—the circulation of its blood? Statesmen as such know very well. And how to rule her and make her subject either to the blandishments of worldly delights or the threats of world by violence, they know very well. Its Erastian spirit—is barren, and generally speaking, lukewarm care for souls when contrasted with the Roman Church, we feel humbled in acknowledging. What a bitter and biting sarcasm that is, my lord, of the new Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, when he speaks of conceding the parks and the palaces of Westminster to us, retaining the lanes and streets of the poor for his archbishopric? In parallel with this, I would ask you to read what Dr. Arnold says. He speaks of the Church of England as never recovering the 'aristocratic and regal selfishness of its birth' [Life and Correspondence, vol. ii., p. 382.] I quote Dr. Arnold, let me remind you because he is one of your own.

"But now to bring this letter to a conclusion, I would say to you, my lord, in the language of Hosius to the Emperor Constantine:—

"Stay, I beseech you. Remember that you are a mortal man. Fear the day of judgment. Keep your hands clean against it. Meddle not with Church matters. Far from advising us about them, rather seek instructions from us. We may not bear rule upon earth; you, O Emperor, may not bear rule in the things of worship. I write this from a care for your soul.—Ath. Hist. Arian, ad Mon. 44.

"I pray God, my lord—even yet daily more and more will I pray—that you may be spared from being the instrument, under God's hand, for the destruction of the Church of England. It is a fearful thought for a man to dwell upon, that possibly he may be the appointed channel in the councils of God for some sweeping calamity about to descend upon this great nation. I presume you would really think that the loss of her Church would be a sweeping calamity. Yet the loss of her Church is by no means, at the present moment, in her peculiar position, an impossible thing. May I, a very humble individual entreat you to pause, to stay your hand, to arrest the downward course of her fall, before it be too late. For myself, and those around me here, while we will give ourselves only the more sedulously to prayer and the sacraments, and the good works of the poor, we will not give way one single inch in the duties we owe to the Church. The spirit of Pilate may be in the rulers—the spirit of Judas in the brethren—the spirit of Gallio in the nobles—but yet let us hope that there may be the spirit of Peter and Paul in the Priests and Bishops of the fold. For ourselves, the greater the fierceness of the people's madness, so much the greater our patience; the more violent their outcries of wrath, the more earnest and the longer our prayers.

"I have the honour to be, my lord, your lordship's humble servant and parish priest,

"Wm. J. E. Bennett."

In a postscript Mr. Bennett states that the ceremonies observed at St. Barnabas Church continue in all respects, save two, the same as were observed on the 11th of June, when the church was consecrated by the Bishop of London. The two points in which alterations have been introduced are in the celebration of the holy communion, which is now in accordance with the forms displayed at All Saints, Christ Church, and St. Pancras, and in the burning of lights on the altar—an observance for which authorities are quoted in Dr. Hock's "Church Dictionary."—Catholic Standard.

THE NO-POPERY HUBBUB.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

My Lord,—You have driven the country fairly out of its wits. With as little ceremony as Jove threw Vulcan over the crystal battlements of Heaven, and for a purpose equally disinterested, has your Lordship extruded the most practical nation in the world from the fair domain of common sense. Your small mind, incapable of moving in a circle larger than the circumference of a four-penny-bit, has at last hit upon an expedient less ingenuous than ingenious for attaining that celebrity heretofore denied to exertions less zealous, though more respectable. Though "Circumstance, that unspiritual god and miscreator," has long raised you to a position of greatest eminence, you are sensible that your first exhibition of qualifications for such a situation has yet to be made. Your influence with your countrymen on all subjects in respect of which they can exercise a sound judgment, having tended but little to your own glory and their advantage, you have resolved to try what may be done with them in a question upon which they have never been particularly sane, and upon which, thanks to your Lordship, they are now ecstatically mad. Having failed to attain anything like a historic reputation, by the action of your mind upon their virtuous propensities, you have not disdained to appeal at their unworthy qualities—

"Si Superos nequeo flectere, Acheronta movebo."

Whether, in playing the part of a Lapland witch, and selling your winds to men who will, not improbably, brew from them such a hurricane as will burst over our heads in the shape of a civil war, you have best consulted for your own reputation, and the welfare of your country, is a problem which as yet is written in the stars, and which time alone can transcribe into more legible characters. Meanwhile you must not be surprised if men who have not the good fortune to think as highly of your sagacity as you do yourself, should watch your proceedings with a feeling of anxiety which would no doubt be superfluous, did the world's estimate of your character accord more strictly with your own.

To say that the case between the Pope and your Lordship lies in a nut-shell, is to assign to it more extensive limits than the exigencies of the case require. Like your own capacity, my Lord, it may be bounded in the hollow of a cherry-stone and "think itself master of infinite space." His Holiness, finding that the number of his spiritual subjects in this country has of late years enormously increased, and is still hourly augmenting—an unpleasant fact, from which you hope to escape by the profound Whiggish expedient of ignoring it—has perceived that it is desirable with a view to the convenience both of his clergy and his laity, that the Catholic Church should be governed by a more regular and canonical than suffices for a mere missionary establishment. This could only be effected by the substitution of regular Bishop for Vicars-Apostolic, and his Holiness proceeded to appoint his Bishops accordingly. But no sooner had he taken this step than your Lordship began to act like one possessed. Mr. Isaac Hawkins Browne is famous for having converted lava into buttons; but it was reserved for your Lordship to reverse the prodigy, and earn immortality, by converting buttons into lava. The act of the Pope—in itself the most legitimate and inoffensive that can be imagined—has been effected in the manner least calculated to wound the feelings and shock the prejudices of the Protestant community. His Holiness, in the exercise of the same power whereby a predecessor of his created in London that Bishopric into which Mr. Broomfield has intruded, has erected Westminster into an Archbishopric; but he did not, nor does he, arrogate to himself any temporal rights in respect of that archdiocese; nor does he lay claim to as much of the land over which it extends as might suffice to sod a lark. He was aware that Henry the Eighth, in his anxiety for the salvation of immortal souls, assigned the whole revenues of a monastic establishment to an old woman who made a dumpling for him;* but his Holiness took care so to model his own conduct as to give no colour to the apprehension that he intended to emulate the example of that saintly monarch. He does not profess, nor does he contemplate to attempt, the smallest interference with the revenues of any church or institution whatsoever, at present in the possession of the Protestant Church. With the sees now usurped by the Protestant Prelates, he does not interfere. Over the Ancient Abbey Church of St. Peter, at Westminster, he seeks not to exercise the least jurisdiction. True, it was founded by Catholic monarchs for Catholic purposes, and the Sursum Corda once re-echoed through those walls, to which demands for twopence are now more familiar sounds; but his Holiness does not pretend to disturb a state of things so much more congenial to the feelings of the English people. The "man in possession" still stands at the door, with his leather pocket full of brass money, and there he may stand, for any attempt his Holiness will make to remove him, till the stars sicken at the day of doom. Of all this your Lordship is as well aware as you are of the not very important fact of your own existence; and yet you have not hesitated to raise the "No-Popery" war-whoop, and to indulge in antics so repugnant to common sense, that it is impossible to compliment your sincerity otherwise than at the expense of your sanity. It is inconceivable that any man—even a man of your Lordship's calibre—could be such a potatoe as seriously to suppose that the Pope intended or that, even though he intended, he was not in a position to attempt—any aggression on the crown and dignity of her Majesty. There is no parallel in history for the panic you have raised, unless it be in the case of Lord Digby, who, for having driven through Kingston-on-Thames, in a coach-and-six, attended by a few livery servants, was adjudged to have appeared in a hostile manner, to the terror and affright of his Majesty's subjects, and to have levied war against the King and Kingdom!* And you talk, forsooth, of the penalties of præmunire, and threaten to disinter, for our persecution, those penal enactments of bygone days which have made Protestantism so much more successful in converting the sons of the Catholic Church into martyrs, than her own children into saints. It may be in the recollection of your Lordship—though, probably in that of very few besides—that some years ago you wrote a tragedy, in which nothing was half so tragic as the sufferings of your audience. Believe me, I would not be so unfeeling as to allude to this unhappy production, were it not that I wish to illustrate my position in the strongest manner possible, and I know not how I may better do so than by representing that the renewal of the statutes in question, at this hour of the day, would be almost as cruel as to inflict Don Carlos† on the audience of the Haymarket.

Your Lordship's determination to abate "no jot of heart or hope" in the devotedness of your countrymen's attachment to the

* Vide Hume's History of England.

* Vide Hume's History.

† Please apply at the Pastry Cooks, passim.

"glorious principles" and "immortal martyrs" of the Reformation, is perhaps, the most remarkable instance on record of a sanguine temperament. Before you require them to gird up their loins for fidelity, even unto death to the "glorious principles" of the Reformation, perhaps you would be so good as to indicate the quarter to which they are to apply for an intelligible definition of those aforesaid principles. Must they go to Bishop Philpots or to Mr. Gorham?—to Bishop Bloomfield, who acknowledges the Pope as the "Head of one great branch of the Church Catholic," or to Dr. Croly, who sees in his Holiness "a worshipper of idols?" Heretofore, it had been generally supposed that amongst those principles to which you apply the epithet "glorious," was the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration. That verity was believed to be the corner-stone of the Christian edifice; but it is mainly through your Lordship's instrumentality that the world has been brought to understand how erroneous was any such supposition. The primary and most essential of all the dogmas of religion has been discarded with as little remorse as the "Man in Brass" has been omitted from the Lord Mayor's Show, and the English people, of whose heroic constancy you rant so pompously, have missed it just as much. And to whom do you allude, my Lord, when you talk of the martyrs of the Reformation? Do you refer to the few hundreds, who, in the time of Mary, fell victims to a politico-religious phrenzy, or do the countless thousands, whose blood ran in rivers during the reigns of Henry, Edward, and Elizabeth, rise up before your affrighted imagination? To men of honest hearts the burning of Latimer, Hooper, and that other martyr—(Cranmer)—who made a bon-fire of the unfortunate Joan Borcher, is not more horrible than the slaughter of Fisher, the murder of More, and the miserable butchery of the last of the Plantagenets. But your Lordship is one of those delicate sentimentalists whose horror at a bloody dagger very much depends upon the hand they discover at the hilt. More than one-half of your "Immortal Mertyrs" are apochryphal, and as for your "glorious principles," you will not get two men in England to agree in a definition of them—yet you are so enthusiastic as to expect that your countrymen will be faithful to the last extremity, under circumstances so mystical and perplexing. Really, my Lord, this is the funniest thing since your tragedy.

And to crown the absurdity of your proceedings, you have the presumption to decry, as the "mummeries of superstition," religion which is the ancient faith of Christendom, and which is still professed by millions of those whose stipendiary you are. Your Lordship is emulous of imitating the example of that small crab, which undertook at the request of Juno, to bite Hercules in the heel. Ah! my Lord, the Catholic religion will flourish in beauty perennial, and never fading vigour, when the mummeries of Whiggism are forgotten, or remembered like bad authors, and worse statesmen, only to be despised.

For whatever comes of this wild delirium, you must be responsible. If evil comes of it in vain will you seek to take refuge under your good intentions. Like Lord Baltimore, after committing an atrocious offence, you may exclaim—"Hic murus atheneus esto, nil conscire mihi!" but the judicious will take your hypocrisy for what it is worth, and the candid of all parties will know you for what you are the parricide of the country you are paid to serve, and the only real aggressor on the monarch you have sworn to protect.

In the spirit of a conventionalism, empty and meaningless as your own professions, I subscribe myself, my Lord, your Lordship's obedient and humble servant.

CEPHAS.

The Erictheum, London,
Dec, 1, 1850.

A SENSIBLE PETITION.

The inhabitants of the town of Bangor (N. Wales) have set an example which deserves to be universally followed, in sending up to the Queen the subjoined petition very numerously signed. We recommend it to general adoption:—

'That your petitioners beg to express their earnest attachment to your Majesty's throne and person, and their determination to maintain the just prerogative of the crown against all encroachments civil or ecclesiastical. But that your petitioners nevertheless consider that the only effective safeguards against the usurpation of the Pope and the superstitions of popery will be found in those weapons by which the Reformation was originally achieved, namely, the force of truth and the diffusion of knowledge, and also in the extension of the sympathy of the government and of the people of this country to those nations who have still to struggle against spiritual tyranny upheld and enforced by the arm of temporal power. That your petitioners therefore humbly conceive that it is of primary importance that the universities and schools of this land should be rendered seminaries for the instruction of youth in the pure principles of the Protestant faith, and in the rudiments of an enlightened secular education.'—Examiner.

foundations of our Protestant Church are undermined by men who dwell within her walls, and those who sit in the Reformers' seat are traducing the Reformation." "Our glory is in jeopardy," says a sixth. "Why all this tenderness for the very centre and core of corruption?" asks a seventh. "Among other marvels of the present day," says an eighth, "may be accounted the irreverent and unbecoming language applied to the chief promoters of the Reformation in this land. The quick and extensive propagation of opinions, tending to exalt the claims of the Church and of the Clergy, can be no proof of their soundness." "Reunion with Rome has been rendered impossible," says a ninth, "yet I am not without hope that more cordinal union may, in time, be effected among all Protestant Churches." "Most of the Bishops," says a tenth, "have spoken in terms of disapproval of the 'Tracts for the Times,' and I certainly believe the system to be most pernicious, and one which is calculated to produce the most lamentable schism in a Church already fearfully disunited." "Up to this moment," says an eleventh, "the movement is advancing, under just the same pacific professions, and the same imputations are still cast upon all who in any way impede its progress. Even the English Bishops, who have officially expressed any disapprobation of the principles or proceedings of the party, have not escaped such animadversions." "Tractarianism is the masterpiece of Satan," says a twelfth

But there was a judgment more cruel still, because its apparent tendency lay the other way; but it was the infelicity of the agents in the movement, that, the National Church feeling as it did, their doctrines could not be sheltered except at the expense of their principles. "A Bishop's lightest word, ex Cathedrâ, is heavy," said a writer of the "Tracts for the Times." "His judgment on a book cannot be light. It is a rare occurrence." And an Archbishop answered, "Many persons look with considerable interest to the declarations on such matters that from time to time are put forth by Bishops in their Charges, or on other occasions. But on most of the points to which I have been alluding, a Bishop's declarations have no more weight, except what they derive from his personal character, than any anonymous pamphlet would have. The points are mostly such as he has no official power to decide, even in reference to his own diocese; and as to legislation for the Church, or authoritative declarations on many of the most important matters, neither any one Bishop, nor all collectively, have any more right of this kind, than the ordinary magistrates have, to take on themselves the functions of Parliament."

It is hardly necessary to prolong the exhibition of the controversy, or to recall to your recollection the tone of invective in which each party relieved the keen and vehement feelings which its opponents excited: how the originators of the movement called Jewell "an irreverent Dissenter;" were even "thinking worse and worse of the Reformers;" "hated the Reformation and the Reformers more and more;" thought them the false prophet of the Apocalypse; described the National Church as having "blasphemed tradition and the Sacraments;" were "more and more indignant at the Protestant doctrine of the Eucharist;" thought the principle on which it was founded "as proud, irreverent, and foolish, as that of any heresy, even Socinianism;" and considered the Establishment their "upas tree," "an incubus on the country;" and its reformed condition, "a limb [illegible] set, which must be broken before it [illegible] righted;"—and how they were called "[illegible]erstitions," "zealots," "mystics to punish us," "[illegible]ants," "Oxford hereties," "Jesuit is obvious [illegible]tampers with Popish necessary [illegible]," "a synagogue [illegible]grass," "walking about [illegible]ed Church, polluting the sacred edifice, and leaving their slime about her altars;" "whose head," it was added "may God crush."

Is it not then abundantly plain, that, whatever be the destiny of the movement of 1833, there is no providential tendency towards a coalition with the Establishment? It cannot strengthen it, it cannot serve it, it cannot obey it. The party may be dissolved, the movement may die—that is another matter; but it and its idea cannot live, cannot energize in the National Church. If St. Athanasius could agree with Arius, St. Cyril with Nestorius, St. Dominic with the Albigenses, or St. Ignatius with Luther, then may two parties coalesce, in a certain assignable time, or by certain felicitiously gradual approximations, or with dexterous limitations and concessions, who mutually think light darkness and darkness light. "Delenda est Carthago;" one or other must perish. Assuming then that there is a scope and limit to the movement, we certainly shall not find it in the dignities and offices of the National Church.

(To be continued.)

DUBLIN REVIEW.

The Life of the Venerable J. B. de la Salle, founder of the Christian Schools, with an Historical Sketch of the Institute to the present time. Translated from the French of Père Garreau, S. J., and also an Account of the Rise and Progress of the Society in Ireland, by the Christian Brothers. William Powell. Dublin: 1843.

We have particular satisfaction in announcing this little work to our readers; our recommendation it will not need, for we are persuaded that no publication could be more generally acceptable, none more seasonable, than the life of the venerable founder of the Christian Schools. The great want of education for the children of the poor, and the difficulty of obtaining any for them, worthy of the name, has of late fixed the attention of Catholics most strongly upon the Christian brothers. Those who have seen their schools are not likely to be satisfied with any other; they are indeed perfection: their rule, matured by the experience and most religion has nearly two centuries, produce[d] verse as the decision, and peace, as make a s[tate] from the derful to say! in itself an harmo[nious] people, pleasurable object of contemplation; much more so when it is considered [how] each individual child is there the object of the most charitable and patient solicitude. The admirable education of these schools is in no one point defective; sound secular instruction, amply sufficient for the majority of the boys receiving it, and an excellent preparation for those whose talents may incline them to make further progress, is added to such religious teaching as it falls to the lot of few to receive: and how sweetly is all inculcated! Many a boy escaping from a rough and vulgar home, must here have learned to associate religion and knowledge with the very happiest hours of his life; even the aspect of these venerable brethren must make a salutary impression upon the minds of children.

To our thinking no parish is complete without one of these schools, nor can any pastor be entirely contented with the condition of his flock unless he can unburden his soul by placing his little ones under the charge of these Christian instructors; and yet there are but seven of these schools in England;—in England, where upon every account they are so greatly required. When we read an account of the "irrectible joy" with which their pious founder accepted an invitation to a district of France, infected with Calvinism; "seeking nothing more conformable to the object of his institute, than to labour in rooting out heresy," we could not but hope that he will intercede for us, surrounded and on all sides endangered by this great evil. May his prayers (which soon we hope it will be lawful publicly to implore) avail us for the increase and prosperity of his institute amongst us; and meanwhile let us not be wanting to ourselves.

We are sure that no Christian will read this admirable work without feeling his courage stimulated to the overcoming of difficulties, and his devotion heightened by the example. Wise as the serpent, yet harmless as the dove, although forced into contact with a most corrupt age, amidst all its entanglements he kept his soul fixed solely upon his God. Crosses were multiplied upon his patient head; storms from within and from without buffeted his infant institute; it struck the deeper root, and had attained to great prosperity, when the dispersion of all religious societies in 1790, called upon the brothers to take their part in the martyrdoms and sufferings of the clergy. When the fury of the Revolution had passed by, this order was one of the first to reassemble: its unpretending usefulness recommending it to the favour of Napoleon. It is now prosperous in France; it has sent out branches to many countries, and received a new ingraft, or rather a sister and ally, from our own favoured land.

FLOWERS OF HEAVEN.

Connexion between Religion and Morality.

CHAPTER XIII.

MODERATION.

(Continued from page 348)

"But" reply the pantheists, "although temperance was good in the first ages of the church, as a remedy for the ills of the Roman world, which its passions and brutal debauches had enervated, it is no longer in its place in this age of light and purity. You require simple manners, austere morals, frugal enjoyments; whereas we, on the contrary, call for nectar and ambrosia, royal robes, the luxury of perfumes, dances, nymphs, music, and the theatre—in a word we wish to found a democracy of terrestrial gods."*

A democracy of gods! Thirty-two millions of sensualist divinities in France alone, and the whole globe for a pantheon! They were infinitely wiser in ancient Rome, where the demigods alone were aristocratically chosen out of the patrician class. But we have a difficulty to be solved; the royal robes, the

* De l'Allemagne, par H. Heine.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 8.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, Feb. 22, 1851.

REFUSAL OF A CATHOLIC TO MAKE USE OF THE PROTESTANT BIBLE WHEN MAKING OATH BEFORE A MAGISTRATE.

We subjoin an extract from an English Newspaper of recent date, in which a Catholic, a Convert from Protestantism, refused to make use of the Protestant version of the New Testament in taking an oath before a Magistrate, on the grounds, that, were he to do so, he would thus recognise that version as a genuine authentic one—an admission which would be contrary to his principles as a Catholic.

As the subject here alluded to is one of great moment, especially in every part of the British Empire, on account of the general admixture at home and abroad of Protestants and Catholics in every department of the state, it appears to us, to be deserving of notice. In order then to place the matter in a just point of view before our Readers, it is proper to recall to mind the definition of an oath which is received among Catholics, "an oath is an invocation of Almighty God, to witness the truth of what we say, and to punish us if what we say be false." Now, it is obvious, that, whenever it becomes necessary for the public or the private welfare of others, that any person should be required to give testimony under the sanction of an oath, it suffices, that he call God to witness the truth of his evidence in such a way, as will inform those present and concerned in the proceeding, that he makes his statement, under the solemn and awful obligation, which arises from his having invoked God to witness, that he speaks the truth. Thus much and no more is required of the person swearing, in order that he should become responsible to God and to Society for his testimony.

It is hence evident, that it is a matter of utter indifference, what particular, external, conventional form may be employed in any country, for the purpose of ascertaining, that the party, who may come forward to give his evidence, undertakes to do so, under the sanction of an oath. Of course, when we say, that the external form used in swearing is a matter of indifference, we must be understood to speak of such forms or ceremonies, as are consistent with the propriety and reverence, which reason and natural Religion dictate on such an occasion.

Now, whatever be the character of the Book which may be employed for administering an oath, it is manifest, that, if in the countries where this usage prevails, it be the general understanding of the Community, that the witness who gives his testimony, after having gone through the prescribed form of receiving in his hands or kissing a Book, does so under the sanction of an oath, he is, to all intents and purposes, bound to state the truth, as fully and faithfully, as if the Book were brought down immediately from Heaven and he were miraculously assured, that every line in it was dictated by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

Whilst we speak thus, we take leave to remark, that, although the conditions we have laid down fully suffice for the valid administration of an oath and for the incurring of all the moral and legal obligations attached to it, yet, we deem it of great moment for the upholding of the great reverence due to so grave a solemnity, that the whole Ceremonial connected with it, should be in accordance with the religious feelings and impresaions of the Individual, whose oath is required for the confirmation of his testimony. An oath is a solemn act of Religion, by which the Person taking it recognises the omnipresence, the infinite veracity and the omnipotent avenging justice of the Deity upon those who profane his Holy Name, by calling upon God to bear testimony to falsehood. Like every other act of Religion, it should therefore be accompanied by truth, justice and judgment, and every circumstance and ceremony attendant on its performance should be calculated to impress both on the person swearing and on all present a deep sense of the awful responsibility incurred by him, who thus invokes the Almighty to exercise mercy or vengeance upon him, according as he shall speak truth or falsehood. The justness of this reasoning was not long since felt and acknowledged by the Government of India. We publish today the interesting correspondence, which took place on the occasion, to which we have just made reference, and we annex to it an extract from the Dublin Review, which as it bears upon the same subject, will prove gratifying and instructive to our Readers :—

CRIMINAL COURTS.—At Westminster, Mrs. Eliza Denman was brought in custody of the police of the V. division, charged with knocking and ringing at the house of her husband, Mr. John Denman, 5, Beaufort-street, Chelsea, without lawful excuse.

The chief usher handed the New Testament, as usual, to Mr. Denman, who had entered the witness-box as complainant, but he refused to be sworn.

Mr. Broderip, observing the delay, inquired its cause.

The Chief usher replied—"This gentleman refuses to be sworn, unless upon a Catholic book. I have offered him the one with the cross upon it."

Mr. Broderip—Do you object to that? Mr. Denman—I don't object to the cross.

Mr. Broderip. What do you object to? Mr. Denman—To the contents of the book.

Mr. Broderip—How? Mr. Denman—This is the Cambridge edition, and it is not the same as the Catholic version.

Mr. Broderip—You are a Catholic. I presume? Mr. Denman—Yes, a Catholic—a Roman Catholic.

Mr. Broderip—What possible objection can you have to be sworn on this book? Mr. Denman—I have the greatest possible objection—that I cannot be bound by it.

Mr. Broderip—I never heard such an objection made before. It is the authorized edition of the New Testament, used in all courts of justice in this country, and I cannot see what difficulty you can have in the matter. You call God to witness that you are speaking the truth. Mr. Denman—My conscience must be satisfied. This translation is not in accordance with the Roman version.

Mr. Broderip—Can't you be satisfied by calling God to witness the truth on the ordinary book?

Mrs. Denman (with apparent astonishment) —Mr Denman, you were educated for a Protestant clergyman.

Mr. Denman—I am convert to Romanism. —Atlas for India, Jan. 7.

MANNER OF ADMINISTERING OATHS TO CATHOLICS.

To the Military Secretary to Government, Fort William.

SIR—I have the honor to forward to you, an extract from a letter which I lately received from a Catholic Commissioned Officer of one of H. M's. Regiments in the Bengal Presidency.

EXTRACT.

"About the end of last month a Catholic Officer of H. M.—Regiment was examined before a General Court Martial, as a witness for the prosecution.

After this Officer was sworn in the usual manner on the Bible, the Deputy Judge Advocate at this station, was told that he was a Catholic, and put the question to him whether he considered the oath he had taken binding? His reason I presume for asking as Military Judge so improper a question in an open Court, was, that there was not a paper cross on the Bible upon which he was sworn. I was subsequently examined as a witness on the defence and perfectly ignorant of what occurred with Lieut. ——, the Bible was handed to me in the usual way, a blue paper cross was suddenly thrust on it by the Deputy Judge Advocate; being quite unprepared for this, and moreover, being in the act of taking my oath, I was unable to object to that which I considered intolerant and bigoted." End of the extract.

"In reply to this communication, I returned an answer, a copy of which I have the honor now to enclose. I feel confident that Government will not sanction the continuance of a custom so offensive as that, now complained of, must be to Catholic officers and soldiers.

I may add, that although as far as regards the validity of an oath, it is in Catholic principles unimportant, what external rite be adopted in its administration, yet, that a due regard to the usage observed by Catholics, where it is customary to take an oath, by kissing the Bible or Testament, would dictate the propriety, of having a Catholic Bible or Testament, impressed with the sign of the cross, kept at each Military Station, for the use of Catholic witnesses. Such a mark of deference to their religious feelings would give in their regard, additional solemnity to the administration of an oath, and thus conduce to impress better on them, the awful nature of the obligation they incur, when they call upon God to witness the truth of the testimony, they are about to offer.

I have the honor to be, Sir
Your most obedt. servt.
✠ P. J. Carew Archbishop.
Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

Cathedral House.
Calcutta, April 28, 1847.

Cathedral House,
Calcutta, April 4th. 1847.

My Dear Sir,—The most brief enquiry into Catholic doctrine, on the subject of Oaths, would convince any one desirous to know the truth, that according to that doctrine, the substance if I may so speak of an Oath, consists in the person who swears, calling God to bear witness, that who he thus appeals to heaven, will in his testimony speak the truth. It is hence, that the solemn awful obligation of an oath is derived; as to the external ceremony used in swearing, that is different in different countries. In some places the ceremony of kissing the Bible is used; in others the person swearing, raises up his hand, or places it on his breast. The particular ceremony to be adopted is then of no real moment, and may vary according to the usages or customs of different nations; the object of it being merely to signify to those present, by the use of some conventional, apposite, outward rite, that the individual whose oath is required, binds himself in God's presence to speak the truth. It is hence clear, that whether the book used, be, or be not a Bible, whether it be, or be not impressed with the sign of the cross, it is wholly unimportant, as far as related to the validity of the oath. For this it suffices, that the rite employed be such, as imports conventionally, that the person swearing solemnly, calls God to witness, that he will speak the truth. It must be very painful to you, or any instructed Catholic, who knows all this from his childhood, to be offended when taking an oath, as you have been.

I remain, dear Sir,
Your's faithfully,
✠ P. J. Carew, Archbishop,
Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

(NO. 261.)

To the Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

Rev. Sir,—With reference to your letter of the 28th April, last, I am directed to inform you, that instructions have been issued by the Right Honourable the Governor General, for furnishing to each Station where European Troops are stationed, a Roman Catholic Bible, impressed with the sign of the Cross, to be kept there, under charge of the Deputy Judge Advocate General, or Station Staff Officer, for the purpose of swearing witnesses of the Roman Catholic persuasion.

I have the honor to be
Rev. Sir,
Your most obedient servt,
Wm. N. Sturt, Major.
Offg Secretary to the Govt. of India, Military Dept.

Council Chamber,
16th July 1847.

A recent occurrence at a Court Martial in Bengal has suggested to us, that it would be useful to call the attention of the parties concerned to the following extract from the 34th number of the Dublin Review May 1842. Note to the Article on "Southern Africa in 1840. Vol. xi. p. 14.

"Our attention has been drawn to the following observations contained in the Cape Town Mail, of the 29th of January, 1842. In giving insertion to this extract, we do no more than what is fair towards Chief Justice Wilde; but in expressing regret that we should have given circulation to what we (in common we are quite sure with the able writer of the article) rejoice to find to be an erroneous representation, we trust we may add that the explanation suggested in the report carries upon the face of it an acquittal of the writer of our article of any intention to misstate or misrepresent.—Ed. Dub. Rev.

"William Cassidy called.—

"When the oath had been administered to this witness in the usual way, the Chief Justice asked, Are you not a Catholic?

"The witness replied, Yes.

"The Chief Justice observed,—I take this opportunity of saying that I have been given to understand under very good authority, that it is not necessary to swear Catholics upon the cross in order to bind the conscience of the witness,

This mode of swearing Catholic witnesses in courts, has been pursued in conformity with general practice, as, for many years of my professional life, I saw it adopted towards such witnesses in the courts at home, and as it has long obtained in this colony. I was much concerned to find, however, that this practice had been considered in certain quarters, if not generally, as wanting something in the delicacy of feeling towards parties of the Catholic persuasion. I now eagerly, therefore, take this opportunity, in my place here, of abjuring the most remote intention of imputing any distinction as to conscientious obligation, between one or the other class of witnesses. The form did not originate here; but as the rules of proceeding in this court are, under the Charter, to be framed with reference to the corresponding rules and forms in use in her Majesty's courts of record in Westminster, the form of administering the oath to Catholics as there used was adopted. Under the explanation I have already alluded to, the witness in the box has not taken his oath on the cross, and no distinction whatever will be, in this respect, hereafter, most probably, made by the court."

THOUGHTS UPON THE PRESENT ROMEWARD MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND, IN CONNEXION WITH THE PAPAL SUPREMACY.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

For good or for evil we are living in times when popery is presenting a more formidable aspect in this country, than has been the case for the last century and a half. Turn where we will, the signs are apparent, we meet them in small matters and in great, in Sermons, in pamphlets, in tracts, and in the lives of Hermits and Saints. John Bull Newspaper.

Unless an early and a decisive revolution take place, the reformation will be first compromised, then abandoned, and then condemned. We go on dealing heavy blows upon popery, but every stroke seems to send ourselves back, as if we were floating on the bosom of a faithless buoy. Introduction to an essay on Luther's Life, by J. S Williams.

For myself then, I trust I may say that I fully recognise the Church of Rome as the mother and Queen of Churches. That I do not knowingly reject any part whatever of the authentic teaching, or condemn any practice expressly sanctioned by her. That as far as I am not prevented by positive restrictions, I make her system my guide both in public and private. And I ardently desire to be united to her, to pay in positive acts, the homage which I now offer in will and intention. Really I am not conscious of a single ecclesiastical taste, or religious aspiration that does not tend towards Rome, rather than in the opposite direction. Extract of a Sermon lately delivered by a Protestant Clergyman, as given in the London Freeman's Advertiser.

Sir,—Bright and cheering are the opening prospects of Catholicity in England: what a thrill of joy pervades the mind, at seeing Protestant England on the eve of becoming Catholic once more? Thus realizing the truth of Bossuet's prediction, that sooner or later she would return to Catholic Unity. Lately a dreadful storm of angry feeling swept over the land, threatening destruction to every surviving remnant of Catholicism, when all on a sudden, this mighty tornado subsides into a settled calm, leaving not a trace of its former impetuosity behind, save bitter regret that ever it was got up. And though deep and mournful are the lamentations of some, that this mighty hurricane of angry feeling has calmed down so very soon, yet all their wailings, cannot arrest the tide of public enquiry into the faith that is now so rapidly flowing into that hitherto benighted land. Truth is great, and must eventually prevail. It may be repressed for a time, and error take its place for a while. But sooner or later, the mistake will be rectified, since time, the true criterion for discerning what is right, from that which is wrong, will finally decide between them. As truth is ever opposed to error, there can be no compromise between them. For as well might one expect to see fire and water coalesce, as truth and error to reign together in peaceful harmony. Wherever then truth resides, error must quickly recede before it. And this is what we see exemplified at present in England, where Catholic truth is fast taking the place of Protestant error. Protestantism being an erroneous system, cannot long withstand the mighty lustre of truth, clearly visible in the tenets or dogmas of Catholicism. Therefore it is that we see that long proscribed creed, now taking the place of the former, merely because it has truth on its side,—having being founded by the author of truth itself who promised, that he would be its unerring guide unto the end of time.

On the other hand Protestants begin now to see and acknowledge, that either Catholicity must be true, or Christianity altogether quite an imposition, since it embraces, holds or teaches nothing at the present day, but what was clearly taught in those early times, when all agree that error was unknown; such are the acknowledged confessions at the present day of English Churchmen. If proof be required, it can be given; one of the extracts prefixed to this letter, will suffice clearly, to point out in what channel the tide of public opinion is rapidly flowing. But lest the prefixed extract should be considered as an isolated testimony, undeserving of much attention, at the present excited moment, I shall just give a few extracts from an address to His Eminence Cardinal Wiseman by certain Protestants of London, as they are given to the Record Newspaper. "We the undersigned Members of the Church of England, (says the address) beg leave to approach your Eminence with unfeigned expressions of respect for your person and office as Bishop of the Church of God, accompanied by that cordial disclaimer of the sentiments avouched by so many of our brethren and fellow-churchmen, which befits those who believe that the cause of religion is to be upheld by other weapons, than those of intemperate and uncharitable zeal. We venture to offer to your Eminence the tribute of our sympathy, or condolence under the painful disappointment of hopes unexpectedly thwarted and countenance unworthily withdrawn; yet this we do presume to suggest, that the opposition ostensibly directed against your Eminence, is really pointed at ourselves. At those amongst us, who trusting to the sacramental element of the Church, aspire after that oneness of heart and spirit which Christ our common master has enjoined upon us, and that charity which His blessed Apostles have bidden us to follow, to cherish and to maintain. We pray you, therefore, to accept of this simple avowal of our feeling, which the circumstance of the case, and our own convictions seem to call for, as an earnest that the clamour of the many is not to be regarded as the unequivocal voice of the Church."

I remain, Sir,

Your most obedt. servant,

C. C.

Calcutta, Feb. 18th, 1851.

WUZEERABAD.

Extract from a letter addressed by a Friend at Wuzeerabad, to a resident of Calcutta.

"I must send all my Pay Bills to Jullunder (150 miles hence) if I had a Pay-Master here I would receive Pay on the 1st of every Month, as it is I must wait till the 15th. Behold one reason, secondly I was near the Cashmere Hills, visiting Sealkote where a few of my people are. A visit to Sealkote is a serious thing, had I many worldly goods I would make my will, happily my riches will never set the Indus on fire, you run two risks, one from a sun stroke and another from a cut of a sword. For the Natives would most willingly give an European his Coup de Grace if they can find an opportunity There is no accommodation on the road, it is a Jungle indeed; Nature has provided a magnificent Canopy for the Night, you have the sky over you. Just imagine a civilized son of Erin arriving at a forest glade, about night-fall, see him selecting the highest Hill to pitch his Blankets on, and then imagine him examining the ground to ascertain if there are any snakes about the place, that is what I call comfort, perhaps a shower comes, and then you are wet with the dews of Heaven, rather unpleasant. At times, then your men refuse to move, then your provisions are consumed and you have your choice to dine on grass or on the leaves of the trees. If you will, you can live on good humour, the Natives will sell no food, some act thus from hatred, and some on the simple principle, no one gives what he has not. When you begin to move the sun is shining fiercely on your head an old Dolay or Palkee is a poor cover, if you take a fancy to light a cigar, down goes the Palkee, and all the bearers squat around to behold the phenomenon of an European—smoking—process. When you arrive at the place for changing bearers you have none to carry you, then you must draw out an old sword and enter the first village, if you meet the head man so much the better, take him by the back of the neck and attempt to pull him out; he will very soon find the New Bearers for you, thus you advance and in two days, you perform a journey of ten hours—see all these difficulties. Were it not for an old Faqueer I would be in a lamentable state, he has always something ready. I sit cross legged on the ground and eat while he is admiring the dexterity by which a Feringee can imitate a real Faqueer; little the old chap knows what pain I suffer from this elegant position; then he exhibits the Lions of this place. Amongst other things, he took me into the Forest to show me a spot elected as the Devil's special Punjab canteen-house, he says the Devil gives him three pice a day to live on, (I have met many such men from Meerut up to here) I do not know how it is, but these men live far away from villages and have no means of support. This same gent has very good Medicine and once saved me from a fit of apoplexy.

Let an European live four or five years up here and then go into civilized life. He would experience much the same sensation as if you marched an Ourang-Outang through Paris, or London; ah! dear me, this Punjab is a queer place truly, a human being must live in a clay Hut 12 feet square, then he considers himself alone, the ordinary race of mortals living under an old Blanket stretched out on two poles.

The women of 3rd Dragoon are living thus at the present moment, and lived thus when it rained heavily too.

I only wish my worst enemy to live a year or two in the Punjab at the end of that time he will be a kind of preserved living Mummy, for the air here is impregnated with saline particles, hence if you get a scratch take care of it in time."

Your obedient servant,

A SERMON DELIVERED IN ST. GEORGE'S CATHOLIC CHURCH, SOUTHWARK, ON SUNDAY MORNING, AUGUST 11TH, 1850, BY THE RIGHT REV. N. WISEMAN, D.D. BISHOP OF MELIPOTAMUS, V. A. L.

"BUT HE, WILLING TO JUSTIFY HIMSELF, SAID TO JESUS,—AND WHO IS MY NEIGHBOUR?" —LUKE X. 29.

These words are from the 10th Chapter of the Gospel of St. Luke, read in the Office of this Sunday. The answer to this question, my Brethren, appears to us now so natural and so simple, that we feel almost indignant at him who could thus interrogate the Son of God; and yet, when that question was put, there was but one upon earth who was capable of answering it. Had it been placed before the greatest of heathen sages, connected with the precept which has been just recited from the Old Law, he would have known no meaning that he could apply to the word concerning which information is asked, beyond its crude and literal meaning, which would not seem, even to him, to establish the commonest claim to affection. "Who is my neighbour?" he would ask. It may be, perhaps, he who lives in my immediate vicinity. It may mean one with whom I am in some way connected by ties of citizenship; but beyond some such narrow limit as this he could have no idea of what was meant by "neighbour," in a christian sense, who was to be loved as we love ourselves. Or, if the question had been put to the interrogator himself, to a man learned in the Jewish law, "Who is your neighbour" whom you are thus to love? he would have at once recurred to the mysterious lesson of his Law, that "Thou shalt love thy friend, and thou shalt hate thine enemy," and he would have drawn a line between those two classes of men, as caprice, or passion, or human interest might have dictated; though but a small sphere would have enclosed the one, while the great bulk of mankind would have been spread over a vast and unbounded extent, which is beyond that limit.

Then it was no chance, it was a providence that this question should have been put to Him, who alone could answer it, and who has made that answer so familiar, that now the least of christian children would know how familiarly to reply to it. Well may we thank him who was in some mode raised up to ask that question, that so we might have an answer; not merely because it brought forth from the rich treasures of our Saviour's wisdom that most beautiful, that most tender, that most divine of all his parables,—that of the good Samaritan, but because it led him to lay down that christian principle of charity which has become the very heart of christian society,—which has been the first great principle of all christian policy, and all christian civilization, and all christian enterprise,—thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. And "who is my neighbour?" With what deep wisdom did our blessed Redeemer answer this question, when he pointed out to the Jew, the Samaritan, in the character of whom was to be found all that was requisite to reply to this demand; for while he so powerfully and so touchingly reproved the enquirer, by giving the example of charity he desired in the Samaritan, he taught the Jew that as the Samaritan had included one of his race amongst his neighbours, so he likewise must learn to expand his heart, and to embrace all mankind in that new love, which was to be the great lesson, the great inheritance of the Christian race. For, my Brethren, the Samaritan was not an enemy of the Jew; he was worse than this,—he was his rival. He was looked upon with that peculiar feeling of low hatred which is a compound of contempt and of jealousy. The Jew might have been generous, and almost loving, towards the inhabitants of distant regions, whom he scarcely knew, who never came across his own path. He might, and did, no doubt, hate the Roman, who had usurped over him, and over the whole world, that dominion which the Jew claimed for himself and his race; but there was fear and awe mingled in that sentiment; and he felt, too, that under that mighty dominion of Rome he enjoyed security, and peace, and prosperity. But the Samaritan was one who had crept into the very heart of that land which should have been appropriated to him as his own inheritance. He had usurped a worship which the Jew considered as exclusively his own; he was the only one who presumed to offer sacrifices to God in a Holy place, and to despise the ordinances of Jerusalem; but at the same time, observed, even more strictly than the Jew, the spirit of the law. He was enterprising, and he was charitable, and he was kind, and known for his social virtues, and formed a reproach to those in the midst of whom he lived, and with whom he rejoyed that spiritual equality which the Jew considered exclusively his own.

Then when our Blessed Saviour thus taught the Jew that the Samaritan was to be included in the number of those whom he was to call his neighbours, he at once threw open the bounds of human love, and made it embrace whatever there might be among men which made them objects of antipathy to us, and made us most naturally shrink from loving them.

(To be continued.)

HISTORY OF THE LIFE, WRITINGS AND DOCTRINES OF MARTIN LUTHER

By J. M. V. Audin

THE TWO BULLS 1520.

LEO X—1521

(Continued from page 75.)

Take, for example, the character of a Roman prelate, whose name does not merit the oblivion in which it is buried. The cardinal Raphael of St. George, appears but once in the religious disputes of the sixteenth century. Under the thick foliage of the fine trees of his villa on the banks of the river Tiber, he revelled in dreams of antiquity, poetry and song, and opened his palace to every artist. In England, whither he went to seek for the gold which his friends had promised him*, Erasmus often remembered Rome and his Maecenas. "Indeed,"—writes he to the cardinal,—"the recollection of your villa haunts me. I think frequently on the sweet liberty, the bright sky, the promenades, the conversations,—precious as gold and sweet as honey, the rich libraries, and the amiable princes which I left there, and to whom I have bid adieu. Now that Leo has restored peace to the world, I burn with desire to revisit my old friends. Unhappy that I am, to have lost in you, a Maecenas, who made all his happiness consist in heaping favours and honours on me."

Listen to the answer of the cardinal Raphael.

"Come back then to the city, where you will find glory and gold. You ought not to despise gold; for it will be the support of your old age, and a compensation for the bitings of envy,—the inseparable companion of merit. Come back. All that are distinguished in literature fly to Rome, as to a common centre. We have crowns for men of genius, like you, and distinctions for those who wish to rise. Rome, and all the literary cities contend for you, as formerly the seven cities contended for Homer. In this struggle, Rome will not succumb,—Rome the country, the glory, the mother of all the children of literature."†

Scarcely had Erasmus rested after his long journey, when he received a message from Leo X., who gave him an audience on the following day at the Vatican. "I will never forget,"—says he in one of his letters,—"the grace, the beauty, the elegance of manners, which struck me on the first interview with Leo X. His noble countenance, the graciousness with which he received me, and the inexpressible charm of his conversation, delighted me. With all the gifts he has received from nature, Leo unites an ardent passion for the Muses, which he imbibed from Politian. In him shine forth all the qualities, that Plato requires in a prince: goodness of heart, and extensive knowledge. His predecessor was distinguished for his military disposition. Leo seeks his happiness in peace, and in the cultivation of the arts:—a glory which costs no one a sigh or a tear."*

During his sojourn at Rome, he seldom passed a week, without having an interview with the pope. On these occasions the discourse was on literature, and especially on Horace, whom the pope knew almost by heart. Erasmus quitted the capital of the Christian world, charmed with what he had seen. Then commenced between him and the pope a correspondence, which does honour to both.

"Why," says Erasmus to Leo, "cannot I cast myself at your feet, and offer you my homage†? The illustrious house to which you belong, like the Trojan horse, has given to the world in a few years combatants of a superior merit,—so many Ciceros, Virgils, Platos and Jeromes. Providence has reserved you for this world: you have caused morality and literature to revive."

It seems that Erasmus was dazzled at the sight of Italy. Let us imagine the Batavian philosopher, suddenly transported from his misty climate,—from his old books, from the narrow streets of his native city, into a bright and sunny atmosphere; introduced for the first time into palaces of gold and marble; traversing vast halls, crowded with mosaics, arabesques, paintings, and statuary,—vast museums which could scarcely contain all the masterpieces that the earth daily gave up. Let us follow him as he strolls under those arcades, adorned by the hands of Raphael and Julio Romano; or mingles with cardinals, whose rich robes contrast with the simplicity of his attire; or converses with artists, some of whom have pages in their train; or stands in the presence of the beautiful and majestic figure of Leo, who was the object of the

---

* Sed quid loquor? Mentes aureas, imo plusquam aureas hic literis pollicebantur amici. Ep. 184. Lugd. Bat. 1703. t. III.

† Epist. Card. Raph. 180. 18. Jul. 1515.

* Erasmus, lib. 5. ep. 2.

† Atque utinam liceat vere beatissimis istis advolutum pedibus oscula figere. Familia ex qua nobis, velut ex equo trojano, tot eximii in omni doctrinae genere proceres paucis jam annis exsiluerunt, tot Ciceriones, tot Maroues, tot Platones, tot Hieronymi. Ep. 174.

homage and affection of all who surrounded him. Leo impressed him more strongly than all!

(To be continued.)

FLOWERS OF HEAVEN.

Connexion between Religion and Morality.

CHAPTER XIII.

MODERATION.

(Continued from our last.)

Excess engenders satiety, which is still less capable of enjoyment than poverty. When Caligula ordered gold dust to be sprinkled over the dishes of his table, it is probable that he ate but little of them and when the son of the comedian, Esop, dissolved in a cup a pearl worth thirty thousand crowns, which had been worn by Metella, it may be presumed that he gratified his vanity rather than his thirst. There is more pleasure in drinking out of the hollow of the hand, the water of a bubbling spring, when the body is fatigued with exercise and heat, than to empty a golden goblet of Tokay or Shiras, when thirst is not felt. There is more pleasure in eating a morsel of dry bread after a long fast, than in overloading the stomach with food which is unable to excite our appetite.

Extravagance in dress is also an infraction of the laws of moderation Necessity and shame first introduced human clothing: tho one made them simple, the other, modest. But ambition, vanity, the desire of pleasing both one's-self and others, were not long in perverting a good and salutary institution, by making it the instrument of pride of caprice, and of corruption.

At the establishment of Christianity, luxury was a powerful auxiliary of idolatry, for which it combated with all its strength, as long as there remained a god on the pedestals of idolatry. More then one Greek and Roman matron remained in the darkness of paganism, rather than renounce those pearls of the East, the light sound of which, as they hung from their ears, was so much loved by patrician ladies, as a Latin poet remarks;—as also those Indian corals, which they would not have given, according to the sarcastic observation of a bishop and martyr, to save one of their own children from death. This particular want of moderation, to which females are most subject, insinuated itself like a serpent into the very cradle of the Church. "I fear," says Tertullian to the Christians of Africa, "lest those foreheads which are so thickly covered with precious stones, will not leave room for the sword, that may be unsheathed to shed your blood for Jesus Christ."

This love, or rather this habit, of adorning one's self was one of the causes of the slow progress of Christianity among the pagans. The great St. Cyprian himself acknowledges that it had appeared hard to him, to exchange his rich robe, embroidered with gold, for the common garments of the people, which his new religion was to impose on him.

(To be continued.)

CARDINAL WISEMAN ON THE PAPAL HIERARCHY.

Last night Cardinal Wiseman delivered his concluding lecture on the new Roman Catholic hierarchy, at St. George's Cathedral. The congregation was unusually great—a large overflow of attendants being accommodated in the aisle and along the passages. Nevertheless, the strictest order and decorum throughout the service were preserved.

The Cardinal began his discourse by stating that he had explained to his hearers in former lectures what the Catholic hierarchy is not and what it is. He would proceed that evening, in his concluding lecture, to explain any difficulties which might arise respecting the manner of its institution. As he would propose the question which it was his intention to answer in the following words: The institution of a Catholic hierarchy might have violated no one's rights—it might have been strictly legal—it might even be a measure of the greatest importance to them as one of Catholic organisation, but still would it not have been better to have waived those rights and to have foregone that advantage, rather than have produced that excitement, that clamour, that ill-will which had been so generally produced by what had been done? Now, to one only on earth was it ever given to know and to foresee the full consequences of His great undertaking, and with them all clearly before Him to begin His work. He saw that it would cause vast revolutions, the confusion and the destruction even of nations. Before Him was the temple of Sion in flames—Jerusalem rased to the ground, and Judea captive. He saw the Roman empire dismembered, its sumptuous buildings overthrown, its literature and arts for a time debased, its institutions—those of civilisation social, moral, and political, overturned, and yet he performed His work. He saw His followers despised, persecuted, denounced, as the very enemies of the human race; His deacons stretched on the gridiron; His priests distended on the rack; His pontiffs bowing beneath the sword; and yet He accomplished His work,

He saw as the very effects of His work himself reviled, blasphemed, stripped, scourged, thorn-crowned, and crucified; and yet inexorably He finished His work. What would have become of us if He had not? But with His appointed ministry he had dealt more mercifully. From them, as less wise, less holy, and not divine. He instructed them in their duties, promised them the assistance of the Holy Spirit, and then sent them forth to do their work in total uncertainty of all, save that their work was His, still He had been pleased to place before them, and they had treasured in their hearts certain tests and criterions whereby they should know at any time whether what befel them were the consequences of performing the work he had committed to them, or were the results of a departure from His divine will. The Cardinal then illustrated his remarks by reference to the persecutions which assailed the efforts of the Apostles to spread the knowledge of the Gospel, and the early history of the Church when the primitive Christians, taking advantage of the breathing time intervening between different periods of persecution to extend and complete their ecclesiastical organisation, began to excite the alarms of the state respecting the rapid progress of Christianity. A new series of persecutions and destruction then commenced; but the early Christians did not take blame to themselves because they had not continued still to burrow, year after year, and century after century, under the catacombs, or because they spoke plainly and boldly, and did not crouch and bend before the possessors of the wealth and the influence of the land. No; so long as their conduct was true and faithful to their duty—so long as it was lawful and virtuous—they did what they believed to be right, and left God in His own good time to relieve and reward them. So, in our day, it was their duty, then, to study the rules which Christ had given, and to ascertain whether the consequences of doing what appeared to them clearly to be their duty to the Church were chargeable to their own imprudence, or were only the natural and foreseen sequences of faithfully carrying out the will of the blessed Redeemer. Now, he did not place the acts of their present opponents on the same footing as the conduct of the persecutors of the early Church. But they must remember it was not with Jew or with Gentile that they had been told that the Church of God was ever to be in conflict. They had been warned that there was another visible and enduring power, which waged against it perpetual warfare, and this was what Christ, through Himself and his Apostles, had denounced as the world. Now, the world and the Church were like the two sides of an equation—they could not be together; but when you have discovered on which side the one is, on the other side must its opposite be. It was important then to inquire on which side was the Church and on which side the world within the last few eventful weeks. Christ had told us that His true disciples would be hated, and calumniated, and execrated by the world. Now, never in their memory, or in that of many preceding generations, had such intense hatred, such scurrilous misrepresentations, or such bitter execrations been again and again publicly expressed in regard to their religion, its rulers, its clergy, its ministers, and its members. The walls of that city and its very pavement had been blotted with curses invoked upon the heads of fellow-subjects and fellow-men redeemed by the blood of the same Saviour—curses which, had they been uttered, the law would have punished; which, had they been printed, every modest tongue would have faltered to repeat them; and they would be told, perhaps, that this was only the rude way in which untutored minds expressed their religious zeal How strange, indeed, must their religion be to take the name of God in vain, and thus violate one of the commandments. And who was it that urged on these minds to this unholy zeal, this un-Christian hristianity? Or who were they among those that were in duty bound who had ever thought of checking the evil: He had not heard of a bishop or a clergyman who had protested against it, and it bore all the character of a public and national violation of one of the clearest precepts of the decalogue. The Cardinal proceeded to draw a parallel in more minute detail between the insults and opprobrium used during the recent excitement towards Roman Catholics and the Roman Catholic religion, contending that all the coincidences to which he referred were only additional proofs that the work which they had in hand bore the seal and impress of Heaven Among his other remarks, he said, when they heard it pronounced from the judgment-seat of that city, 'that a little imprisonment would do the Cardinal good,' or when a greater jurist declared that a process by which the new bishops would be placed in the felons dock and disgraced by being committed a few days to the common gaol might be advisible, these things called up to remembrance how a judge of old said, respecting one whose venerable and thrice holy name must not be uttered in connection with such infamy, that a scourge would do Him good, and that He should be chastised and then let go. And when they heard that one belonging to that nation which in the coming year expects to gain its religious freedom in this country, an elder of this city, spoke before his fellow-countrymen that he would willingly, with his own hand, strike the mitre off the heads of the new bishops, oh! how one shuddered as he brought up the remembrance of the men who, in the Hall of Caiaphas were so ready to smite the head of the first Christian bishop. Nor has it been for want of right good will that they have not been brought before the civil tribunals, and visited with legal inflictions. For had there not been a sufficient cry that old and long-dormant statutes, if possible, should be put in force against them: that obsolete legislation should be searched in every nook and corner, to see if in some of its neglected folds there could not be found lurking some unrepealed clause that could be turned against them? Even those who called themselves Liberals had proposed to re-enact the old Draconian code of persecutions, and to restore the laws by which Catholics were sentenced to death as felons and convicts; but the eyes of every one must at length be opened in consequence of what had so lately happened from the familiarity of their opponents' minds with the idea of punishing with death the discharge of a religious duty. One may well thank God that the law-making is not left in the hands of the clergy—of the avowed ministry of the Gospel of peace. At a time when it is difficult to find twelve men honestly to bring in a verdict of guilty against the murderer of his fellow-man—when by a process of years we have been purging the Statute-book of its bloodstains until we have confined the extent of its vengeance to the cry of 'Life for life,' that we should have seen a minister of religion make known to us that religious fanaticism can even yet gloat over the death-struggle of its victim, that there still live men who believe that it is doing God service to put Catholics to death! English civilization was comforted and soothed for a few hours in the supposed retractation of these atrocious sentiments; but the re action of habitual thoughts soon overmastered the momentary thought of repentance, and the returning wave of revengeful feeling washed over the mind only the more completely to lay bare the remains of that bigotry which we thought had been shipwrecked and buried long ago on our coasts. Talk of the inquisition and persecution in the Catholic Church! Oh! there were plenty of Protestant hearts in England which would soon institute the one, and plenty of arms who would carry out the other, if the law would allow them. And how had this persecuting spirit been manifested by those orgies of cruelty which had been repeated, and continue even until now, at which the inhabitants of our villages and towns are invited to mock executions, and of which it might be said that it was indeed well for those who were their objects, that it was their effigies only and not their persons that were in the hands of the people? He did not wish to blame those who were always led away by any unwonted spectacle, whether it was a Lord Mayor's show or the hanging of a criminal; but what was to be said of those who were better educated, and who were, and who at least ought to be, of more refined feeling, and who had been indulging the idle and the youthful part of the population with such degrading pastimes? Had they forgotten that the falcon was trained to dart on its prey, and dash its murderous beak into its heart, by the stuffed lure which was thrown up to it; that the Knight of Rhodes was trained for his encounter with the fearful dragons by first fleshing his weapons in the body of an artificial antagonist? And was it wise or Christian then to occupy our people day after day with these scenes, in which the appearance of brutal torture was hailed with shouts of applause, and the semblance of a cruel agony excited only cries of derison? But when they learnt that these things had been contrived and paid for by the ministers of one religion against the dignitaries of another church, whose ecclesiastical rank they were themselves obliged to acknowledge, their astonishment knew no bounds. Did they not see that these tastes, once diffused and encouraged amongst the people, are not so easily repressed, and they could have their objects without much difficulty changed, and that if a bishop was to be burned in effigy, it was not much trouble to change the colour of his habits. But these things were long since forgiven, and God grant that they might soon be forgotten. Soon now would they intone again their Christmas hymn, and the angels would sing, 'Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace—peace among men;' that they might soon return to their neighbourly and friendly habits, and that the Church might be restored to her mission of peace. And oh! that He, who to his other glorious titles added that of Prince of Peace, might descend mutually amongst men, and teach them that it was not in the whirlwind or the earthquake that the whisperings of the Divine Word were heard, but in the soft appeal to the conscience and the heart. Oh! that he might make his advent, as it was before, an advent of peace—a day of joy and the dawning of universal harmony—of blessing to the people; and if cation to the ministry, protection to the Church, and salvation to the world!—Chronicle.

Selections.

CONVERSIONS.

A Lady, a Protestant of the Church of England born of European Parents, has been received in the course of this week into the Catholic Communion, by Rev. Mr. Mascarenhas, Vicar of the Dhurrumtollah Church.

Among the latest Conversions, we have to record the name of Mr. Scott, a candidate for Anglican Orders, studying under Mr. Anderson, of Leicester; this latter gentleman is a nephew of Archdeacon Manning.—Tablet August 10th.

Henry Worthington, Esq., of Fairfield, near Manchester, was received into the Catholic Church at the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, London, on August 12.—Ibid.

On Sunday last, forty Converts made public profession of their faith in the Church of St. Felix, Northampton.—Ibid.

Two distinguished Converts have been received into the Catholic Church by the Rev. Dr. Crowe, a native of Limerick, now attached to the English Mission and officiating in Bath; the Misses Woodward, highly respectable, amiable, and accomplished Ladies, nieces of Lord Middleton, and of the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Roderick, Rector of the Abbey Church, Bath, are the parties. The Rev. Mr. Crowe was presented about three weeks since with a splendid piece of plate by his grateful and attached Parishoners; and Converts are every day flocking into the Rev. Gentleman's fold.—Limerick Examiner.

The "Church and State Gazette," of yesterday, announces the Conversion of the following members of the two Universities:—Rev F. W. Trenow, B. A. St. John's College, Oxford; Mr. J. Maillard, Commoner of Trinity College, Oxford; Mr. T. Priggett, Commoner of St. John's College Cambridge: and Mr. J. Harper, M. A. Pembroke College, Oxford.

"Miss Yates, of Charlton-crescent, Islington, and several other Transitionnist ladies have been received into the Romish Church by Father Oakeley; and it is reported that several of the congregation of St. Margaret's Leicester (the vicar is Mr. Anderson nephew of Archdeacon Manning), are also about to join the Church of Rome.

Another correspondent reports,—"the conversion of Dr. Goltz, late Rector of Christ Church, Southwark, and Fellow of Christ College, Cambridge. He was received about a fortnight ago by the Jesuits in the Rue des Postes, Paris."—The Rev. F. Ballard, and G. N. Ballard Esq. late of Margaret chapel and Wadham and Worcester Colleges, Oxford, have become Oratorians.

It is said, that more than sixty persons have left Margaret chapel for the church of Rome since Father Oakeley commenced his Romanizing proceedings there, which have been so ably continued by his friend and successor Mr. Richard. No less than 5 of the licensed clergyman of that chapel have become Romanists, and a much larger number of those who occasionally officiated there, have gone to their own place.—Patriot September 23.

Amongst the recent perverts, says the Church and state Gazette is the daughter of a late Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, who has been for some years under the direction of Dr. Pusey.—Ibid.

"The Catholic Annual Register" for this year gives a list of seventy clergymen who have left the English Church and joined the Roman Catholic Religion—Ibid.

Captain Patterson, brother of the clerical pervert of that name, and George Bowyer Esq. D. C. L. of the Temple, Editor of a Tractarian News Paper, and (it is believed) one of the contributors to the late British Critic has been received into the Romish Church. T. A. Drinkwater Esq. (of Mr. Andersons Religious community at Leicester) who was on the point of being ordained, but will now become a Romish priest was received by Father Oakeley. Archdeacon Manning is going abroad immediately; he will be accompanied by other celebrated Tractarians.—Church and State Gazette.

Agra.—On the 29th September, and 6th October last, six Protestant adults, two children, aged fourteen years each, and a native woman, were received into the bosom of the Catholic Church.—Bombay Catholic Standard Jan. 20.

THE QUEEN'S REPLIES TO THE PROTESTANT ADDRESSES.

Her Majesty's replies are characterised, first, by great caution in what is said of the Catholics. There is no specific observation made as to the proceedings of the Holy See; and the words thrown in by the civic corporation about civil and religious liberty, appear to be taken up as if either to re-assure the Catholics, or to throw dust in their eyes for the moment. She concurs with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen in their "attachment to the Protestant Faith, and to the great principles of civil and religious liberty." She compliments the Common Council on their "tried and consistent advocacy of the equal enjoyment of civil rights by all classes of their fellow-subjects." She tells them she is resolved "to maintain unimpaired the religious liberty which is justly prized by the people of this country." She hints to Cambridge that it is "her earnest wish that complete freedom of conscience should be enjoyed by all classes of her subjects."

On the other hand, the Corporation are told that the Queen will "uphold and maintain them" (the Protestant Faith, and principles of civil and religious liberty) "against any danger with which they may be threatened, from whatever quarter it may proceed."

The Common Council are not even encouraged so far as this; but their indignation against Puseyism is noticed and encouraged:—"You may be assured of my earnest desire to maintain unimpaired the religious liberty justly prized by the people of this country, and to uphold as its surest safeguard the pure and Scriptural worship of the Protestant "Faith." The City Lieutenancy, whose address spoke passionately of "a foreign potentate arrogantly assuming to himself the power to introduce "into this country a Romish Hierarchy," and who had asked for measures "to prevent all further "encroachments and attempts at usurpation by the "See of Rome," &c., are told that "the Queen will maintain the independence, and uphold the constitutional liberties of her people against all aggressive "encroachment," avoiding any more particular mention. Oxford has asked that her Majesty should take measures "to repress all aggressions and "encroachments of any foreign Ecclesiastical power against the rights of the Crown and the independence of the people." The Queen replies she is determined to uphold such rights and independence against "all aggressions and encroachments of any foreign power," omitting the word "Ecclesiastical." But there is infused into the reply a very strong tinge of hostility to Puseyism. She will "maintain the purity of our Reformed Church." She notices that "the supreme government" of it is by law confided to her; and she hints to Oxford that their "earnest endeavour to train up youth in faithful attachment" to the truths of Holy Scripture will have a powerful effect in strengthening the defences of our "Protestant Faith." Lastly, to the deputation from Cambridge (in whose address much was said about "the Bishop of Rome's intermeddling with "the government of our country, and ignoring the "ancient Episcopacy of our Church") her Majesty contents herself with expressing her satisfaction at "the zealous and undiminished attachment of the "English people to the principles of the Reformation;" and adds, in general terms, that it is her "constant aim to uphold the just privileges and "extend the usefulness of the Church established by law, and to secure to her people the full possession of their ancient rights and liberties."

On the whole, these replies, taken together, constitute a cautious development of the policy that Government seems to have taken from the moment the immense risk of Lord John's attack on the "mummeries of superstition" was apparent. As little is said about the Catholics as could have been said on such an occasion; as much allusion is made to the Puseyites as could have been made with dignity. It was safe to attack them—eminently unsafe to attack the Catholics.—Tablet.

"HER MAJESTYS' CLERGY."

A most felicitous title has lately been found for the functionaries of the Crown, by them selves denominated the Clergy of the Church of England.

Hitherto we have been somewhat at a loss for a fit name for these gentlemen. We could not call them simply Clergy: "Clergymen of the Established "Church" is lengthy and, besides, does not express the source and limits of their jurisdiction; "Parsons" is a vulgar phrase; and the term "Ministers" confuses them with Presbyterians, Wesleyans, Baptists, and others. But "Her Majesty's Clergy" is a title which is most satisfactory. It cannot be by themselves rejected without their incurring the imputation of disloyalty. It marks them off from the Catholic Clergy, from the ministers of other Protestant denominations than the Established Church; in fine, from all else that are called "Clergy" in the known world; it shows "whose they are and whom they "serve," and leaves them "alone in their glory." By-the-bye, it is very humiliating to this body to reflect that they are the only officers of the Crown whose authority it is lawful to 'deride and disavow." "If the Queen," says Cardinal Wiseman, who has put the thing very forcibly, 'appoint an admiral, or commander in-chief, or governor of a colony, or judge, every one is bound to obey that person in all that belongs specifically to his office, and any one would be punishable if he refused. But in regard to a Bishop, it is exactly the contrary. Precisely in those very matters which appertain to his office we are not bound to obey him. No one is obliged to seek doctrine from his teaching, sanctification from his ministration, or grace from his blessing." His blessing! The Cardinal naturally cannot separate in his mind the ideas of Bishop and blessing. But not so is it with the Bishops of "Her Majesty's Clergy." One of them lately besought his Clergy to accept his "worthless blessing." Another, as we have been told, when a wretched apostate who sought his patronage knelt to him for a benediction, after some confusion, handed the suppliant a sovereign! Poor Bishop! blessing had he none to give, but such as he had he gave. As for the Anglican Primate, he honestly declared, as our readers will remember, to a gentleman—late one of "Her Majesty's Clergy"—that he had no power to bless—"he could n't do it."

Altogether "Her Majesty's Clergy" cut a very sorry figure at present. One of themselves—"A Presbyter of the Diocese of Exeter"—thinks that it is perhaps owing to Sir Robert Peel's police system that they and the Premier have not caused "plunder and conflagration."—(They have caused outrage in Cheltenham). It is true that the "Presbyter" lays to Lord John's charge the whole blame of the present agitation; but certainly "Her Majesty's Clergy" have been accessories to it. Seriously, we cannot see how this body contributes to the support and honour of the British Crown. In England they are by a vast number of the people unloved and unhonoured. In Ireland their position is regarded, not only by Catholics, but also by many sensible Protestants of the empire, to be a nuisance which justice loudly calls upon the British Government to abate: while to foreigners they are a subject of derisive wonder. Her Majesty's Navy and her Majesty's army (in great part Catholic) are the envy and admiration of the world; but "Her Majesty's "Clergy" are a reproach to the good sense of the English people. We think that her Majesty herself cannot set any great value on this lier "lot," expensive though they be, else why did she, on a recent occasion, dispense with their services in favour of Dr. Cumming, the apostle of the doctrine "every man his own Priest?" We may fairly conclude, that although Her Majesty be obliged by the Constitution to maintain "Her Clergy," she would not acknowledge them as "the Queen's Own,"—Tablet.

ALEPPO.

The Christians of Aleppo, we see by a short extract in the Telegraph, are to be compensated for the loss they have sustained by the insurrection of the 14th and 15th October. Another rebellion was excited, which ended in the total defeat of the rebels themselves.—"Their property," says the Correspondent of the Telegraph, "will be devoted by the Authorities to indemnify the Christians for their losses, and to rebuild the three Churches which were burnt. In this affray no Christian fell."

BOMBAY.

CHURCH OF N. S. DE SALVACAO.

No. 39 of 1851.
Ecclesiastical Department.
To the Rt. Rev. Dr. HARTMANN,
Roman Catholic Bishop.

SIR,—With reference to your letters dated the 5th and 7th November last, I am directed by the Right Honorable the Governor in Council to transmit to you the Copy of a communication which I have this day addressed to that Section of the Roman Catholic Parishioners of the Church of N. S. de Salvacão who have taken upon themselves to transfer the Church to the spiritual juriadiction of the Archbishop of Goa.

I have the honor to be,
Sir,
Your most obedt. servant,
J. G. LUMSDEN.
Secy. to Government.

Extract from the letter here referred to by Mr. Secretary Lumsden.

No. 38 of 1851.
Ecclesiastical Department.

To,—J. de Monte and others.
Roman Catholic Parishioners of the Church of N. S. de Salvacão at Mahim.

Gentlemen,—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th November 1850 and to communicate to you in reply the view which the Government has taken of the proceedings therein reported.

You observe that "having no confidence in either the ability or inclination of the Vicars Apostolic to govern the Churches here so as to ensure peace, it has long been in contemplation in this Parish to revert to the jurisdiction of His Grace the Archbishop of Goa."

In effect, Government are apprized by this letter that you have taken upon yourselves of your own and sole authority (whether constituting a majority of the Parishioners of Mahim or otherwise is at present unknown) to transfer the spiritual allegiance rendered since the year 1813 to the superior of the Carmelite mission by the Parishioners of the Church of N. S. da Salvacão, from Bishop Hartmann the present Head of the Mission and the acknowledged Roman Catholic Bishop of this Diocese, to a foreign Prelate between whom and the Government there are at present no relations, and whose pretensions to act independently of the Government in appointing Priests to your church, if ever advanced, cannot under existing orders be admitted.

It is therefore manifest from the foregoing recapitulation of the circumstances under which this transaction has taken place, that your declaration of the transfer of the church and Parish to the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Goa was highly irregular and that in taking this step you assumed a power which the Parishioners do not possess and which a mere section of them had unquestionably no right to assume.

I am further directed to avail myself of the present opportunity to intimate to you that should the opinions of the Parishioners on a scrutiny taking place be divided in the propriety of disclaiming Bishop Hartmann's authority the votes of a small majority in favor of that measure will not be considered sufficient to justify the disruption of the relations so long maintained between the superior of the old carmelite Mission and the congregation of this church. Unquestionably attention will be paid to the expression of a strong and general desire to sever the connection. But so serious an act as the transfer by the Parishioners of the spiritual authority over their Parish from their recognized Bishop to another Bishop of the same church is a measure which must more or less affect the interests and happiness of each separate member of the congregation, and ought not to be lightly resolved upon or without very general conviction of its necessity.

It must not be overlook that supposing you effect your purpose and withdraw yourselves and your fellow Parishioners from the spiritual government of the virtual and acknowledged head of your Church in this island—the act may reasonably be regarded by many of your fellow Parishioners as of questionable validity. It therefore involves them in a serious responsibility which they may be anxious to avoid and yet unable to avert—They may find themselves driven to the painful measure of separating themselves from the seceding congregation, or may incur the risk of being censured as contumacious by the highest ecclesiastical tribunal which your Church acknowledges.

Under the above circumstances I am instructed to inform you that Government are constrained to disapprove your late irregular proceedings, which I am directed to add are cancelled. Government cannot acknowledge that the jurisdiction over the Church and parish of N. S. de Salva-cese of Mahim is vested for the present in any other person than Bishop Hartmann.

If the Parishioners should still be resolved to refuse obedience to his authority, they will have recourse to the regular procedure which has been indicated in this letter. In the meantime you are not at liberty to deny him free access to the Church a right which is in incidental to his position as ordinary of the Diocese.

Government trust that no further measures will be required on their part in vindication of this decision.

Bombay Castle, 19th Jan. 1851. } I am, Gentlemen, Your obedient Servant, (Signed) J. G. Lumsden Secy. to Govt.

(True Copy.) J. G. Lumsden, Secy. to Govt.

THE ENCROACHMENTS OF ROMANISM.

We suppose that we may now assume the fact to be beyond a doubt, that Dr. Dodsworth has been, within the last few days, received into the Romish church. Both the Tablet and a Liverpool paper speak of the circumstance with decision, as having occurred at Dr. Wiseman's private chapel, about the middle of the last week. Two other clergymen, are stated to have taken the step at the same time. Serjeant Bellasis was 'received a few days previous. It is about a fortnight since—as our readers will easily recollect—that a couple of letters passed between Mr. Dodsworth and the Bishop of London, on the subject of a slight misudderstanding. The general impression which any one would have received from those letters was, that Mr. Dodsworth was one of the most loyal and obedient of the church's ministers. Yet in point of fact, as we now discover, he was, at that very moment, in heart a Papist! How many more—how many hundreds more—of the same kind have we among us. Who that knew the men would have drawn any distinction a week ago between Mr. Dodsworth Mr. Bennett, Mr. Richards, or Mr. Murray. All appeared to be of one mind. Nay, more we believe that they were and are of one mind still. There is a gentleman of the name of Sir J. E. Harrington, who has been carrying on the controversy in Mr. Bennett's behalf lately, and who is, we believe, Mr. Bennett's church warden. Well, a clergyman now in England met with a Sir J. E. Harrington in Rome last spring, and supposed that this 'church warden of St. Paul's, Knights bridge,' in the same person. But at Rome the Sir J. E. Harrinton who was there last spring prostrated himself before the Host, and even knelt in worship of 'the handkerchief of St. Veronica.' If there are not two gentlemen of the name, what else than a Papist is Mr. Bennett's church warden. But this is not the only circumstance connected with St. Paul's Knights Bridge, which has recently come to our knowledge. Romanism has been practised in a congregation for some time past in its most perverse points. We speak from very accurate information when we say—that parents have discovered that there sons were in the habit of frequenting haunts of dissipation, and indulging in habits of gross vice, and then of going to Mr. Bennett or his curates on each Saturday night to be confessed and absolved—then to pursue the same round on the following week. It is on the young that these delusions are generally practised. A gentleman of rank was recently living at a well-know watering-place in Devonshire where Tractarian practices, and especially those of the confessional, were rife. He had two daughters rather young. One of the curates succeeded in impressing these young ladies with the advantages of confession, and at last the habit became a settled one, that whenever their parent went out to dinner a note was dispatched to the curate, who came over and confessed his young pupils. A suspicion somehow reached the parent, and suddenly returning one evening he detected the whole affair, and quickly turned the rev. gentleman out of doors. The same system produced still worse results, very recently, we believe, in Bath. A priest of the Romish Church—we are informed on highly respectable authority—has recently been found to be 'missing,' under the following circumstances:—A gentleman, professing Protestant but liberal opinions allowed his lady to form an aquaintance with the said priest. The result was—first, her conversion to Popery: and then, by the facilities offered by the confessional, her corruption, and a breach of the seventh commandment! These horrors are fast multiplying around us. But they bring one antidote. They are producting a considerable reaction in the minds of the people of England.—Herald.

THE ALEPPIAN PERSECUTION.

The brigands who have caused so much slaughter in Aleppo, during the last ten days, have received the just award due to their cruelty. The Governor, Musapha-Zariff, having received an encrease of five or six millions of men to his force on the 5th November' caused the ringleaders in the affray to be arrested. The populace desperately demanded the liberation of the insurgents, when the Troops were compelled to fly to arms. The Governor then commenced the "bombardment," which lasted three days; the suburbs occupied by the rebels were destroyed and the regular troops, rushing in on them, succeeded, without risk, in driving them away from the Town, where order and peace were again restored, 1800 men fell in this enterprize. The Cavalry were sent in pursuit of the run-aways; the total of killed was 400. The goods of the rebels were confiscated, to indemnify the Christians for losses sustained by the destruction of their Churches; and to provide for the families of those who were massacred on the above occasion.

The French Consul M. de Lesaps distinguished himself by his admirable conduct on the occasion. Thanks to his energetic endeavors to harbor the destitute families who found an Asylum in the Consul's Mansion! Four Convents were supported by him; in which upwards of 2000 persons, including Jews and Turks, were sheltered and saved from the fury of the tyrants who would otherwise in all probability have put them to the torture.—Ami de la Religion.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 9.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, March 1, 1851.

THE RECENT MIRACLES AT RIMINI AND IN THE VICINITY OF AVIGNON.

"Dieu peut-il faire des miracles? c'est-a-dire, peut-il déroger aux lois qui'l a établies? Cette question sérieusement traitée serait impie, si elle n'était absurde: ce serait faire trop d'honneur à ce ui qui la résoudrait négativement, que de le punir: il faudrait l'enfermer." J. J. Rousseau, 3me lettre de la Montagne

"God cannot work miracles to deceive men himself, nor permit evil spirits to impose upon men, when the error would be invincible, which would be the very same thing as if he worked them himself." Clarke's Evidences of Nat. and Rev. Rel. p. 228.

We notice in our issue of to-day, an account copied from the L'Univers, of a miraculous occurrence, which is stated to have lately taken place at Saint Saturain les Apt, in the neighbourhood of Avignon. As the remarks we intend to offer on that occurrence, are equally applicable to the recent no less extraordinary events at Rimini, we have included these several singular Phenomena, in the heading prefixed to this article.

Before we enlarge upon the subjects of our present notice, we may observe, that, we feel it to be our conscientous duty, to treat of the grave matters under consideration, in such a way, as will, whilst satisfying the pious docility of Catholics, be also calculated to convince the well disposed of our separated brethren, that the credence, which Catholics render to narratives of supernatural events, is wholly in accordance with the dictates of reason and of religion.

If we may so speak, and we wish to do so, solely for the greater satisfaction of others not of our communion, the whole scheme or system of Christianity is one, whose claims to credibility repose chiefly on the truth of the miracles, or in others words, of those deviations, from what are called the laws of nature, which are recorded in the New Testaments, as having been operated by Jesus Christ in person, or by his Apostles or Disciples.

The same may be said of the religious dispensation to which Christianity succeeded. At every period of the ancient dispensation, until the arrival of the time, when it was about to give away to the New and Eternal Testament, miracles marked its career and proved its divinity, both in its origin and in its development, until its course was consummated, by the advent of the Redeemer.

More than once, the Saviour, in language unmistakeably perspicuous, solemnly assured the first Pastors of his Church, that the wonders, which his followers would work in times to come, would far surpass, even those, which he himself had accomplished.* It would be strange, indeed, if, notwithstanding such an assurance on the part of the Divine Founder of the Christian Church, her History, for eighteen centuries, should prove, in what regards miracles, a mere blank, destitute of any record, which would bear testimony to the fulfilment of Christ's prediction.

* He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved: but he that believeth not, shall be condemned. And these signs shall follow them that believe: In my name they shall cast out devils: they shall speak with new tongues;—

That such a void, which would justly be deemed so incongruous with the Saviour's promise, does not occur in the history of the Church, is testified by a countless succession of Catholic Writers, of every age and country, many of them illustrious for sanctity and learning. In effect, the testimony of those distinguished personages on the continuation of miracles in the Church is so powerful, that it would, in all probability have never been impugned, had it not been, that their evidence served, not only to establish the miraculous events recorded by them, but also to prove, that that religious communion, in which these wonders were operated, was alone the true Church of Christ.

In order to prevent a result so injurious to Protestantism in all its countless denominations, the advocates of the Reformation have had recourse to every species of sophistry, which could throw discredit upon the testimonies, adduced to prove the truth of these miracles. But, as the task of investigating the evidence in favor of each particular miracle was too onerous, and was also attended, in some instances, with consequences by no means expected or wished for, by the adversaries of the Catholic Faith, it occurred to the well known Rev. Doctor Conyers Middleton, to enter upon a new, and so far as regards professing Christian Writers, a hitherto untried course in the field of controversy, by means of which, all the pretensions of Catholics, to the continuation of miracles in their Church, were to be at once, and for ever, blasted and destroyed.

But alas! for the short sightedness of mortals. How often does worldly wisdom bring confusion upon itself, by the very counsels, on which it had confidently relied for success. So it unfortunately happened to Dr. Middleton,

'Incidit in Scyllam Cupiens vitare Charybdim.'

No sooner had his 'discourse concerning the miraculous powers, which are supposed to have subsisted in the Christian Church from the earliest ages' been published, than it was assailed on all sides, by his own brethren among the Protestant Anglican Clergy, as a production subversive of Christianity. And such undoubtedly was its open and perhaps not unintentional tendency. We repeat, that the subversion of Christianity was, perhaps, the real object of the author, although apparently his design was, by overthrowing the credibility of all miracles recorded in Church history and not in Scripture, to set aside and extinguish the pretensions of Catholics in favor of their creed, from the alleged continuation of miracles in their Church. The grounds, on which the imputation here made rests, are, not only the accusations preferred against Doctor Middleton, by those of his contemporary brother Clergymen, who undertook to answer his "discourse on miracles," but also those alleged, by the Anglican Bishop Pearce, who seventeen years, previously to the publication of the discourse on miracles, designated Middleton's remarks on Dr. Waterland's vindication of Scripture, as the work of an Infidel in disguise. Thus then, according to these distinguished authorities, the very argumentation used by one of their own Rev. Brethren, to cast discredit on the miracles recorded in the annals of the Christian Church, would, if applied to the Gospel miracles, lead to the subversion of Christianity, and would justly subject the person who would resort to such reasoning, to the imputation of being an Infidel in disguise.

(To be continued.)

They shall take up serpents: and if they shall drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them: they shall lay their hands upon the sick, and they shall recover.—Mark xvi. 16, 17, 18.

Otherwise believe for the very works' sake. Amen, amen, I say to you, he that believeth in me, the works that I do, he also shall do, and greater than these shall he do.—John xiv. 12.

MIRACLE AT AVIGNON.

Translated from the French Journal "L'Univers" for the B. C. Herald.

SIR,—I hasten to send you some lines concerning the wonderful fact which has lately been accomplished at Saint Saturnin les Apt, in the Chapel of Calvary, vulgarly called the Chateau. Here is the fact, at least the substance of it: blood has been seen to ooze from the different wounds of the Christ, represented extended on the knees of the Blessed Virgin in a picture of the descent from the Cross, fixed over the high altar of the Chapel. At different times and on different days, large drops have been seen to form on the wound of the right side of the Saviour, then upon the hands and feet. Without mentioning the first apparition of blood which took place on the 10th of November last, in presence of three persons only, I shall tell you, that on last Friday, the 13th of this month, between the hours of eight and nine in the morning, six persons worthy of credit have distinctly seen on the wound of the side, drops, in the form of tears, which Mr. Crement, a Medical Doctor one of the witnesses called in to prove the reality of the fact, collected in a white handkerchief, an operation which he repeated four times, the drops immediately succeeding each other after every application of the handkerchief. Mr. Crement published an account of this, on his return from the Chapel. This is not all, today, the 16th of December, about the same hour as on Friday, the miracle has been renewed not only on the wound of the side, but on those of the feet and hands. The fact can be proved by the whole parish more than five hundred persons having been eye witnesses of it. —— H. Foust.

The Editor of the L'Univers gives the following account of the miracle On the 20th of November whilst the sub-prefect and some other persons were examining the picture and collecting from it a notable quantity of blood; the Bishop followed by the clergy and the principal authorities took their places in the sanctuary. After the lapse of some moments, a piece of linen was presented to his Lordship who upon applying it to the picture obtained from it large drops of blood, this piece of linen was then shewn to the assistants. After this last application, the blood ceasing to ooze from the wounds of the Saviour, the authorities had the picture taken down for examination, when no traces could be seen of any liquid whatever. Then the visitors retired to make room for new comers. The whole day the Chapel was crowded with persons from all parts.—J. S. Jean.

An official letter announces that the miracle was repeated on the 21st of December and that the blood continued to flow for some moments. A Committee has been named by his Grace the Archbishop of Avignon to enquire about the nature and reality of the miracle. This Committee is composed of the Reverend Messrs. Barrúse Justamond Sermand, Caval and Barelle.

December, 1850.

VERY REV. DR. LANGLOIS.

The Catholics of Calcutta will read with pleasure the following letter addressed to the Archbishop by the Very Rev. Dr. Langlois, the Superior of the Seminary for foreign Missions at Paris.

My Dear Lord Archbishop,—I have the honor to send to your Grace a parcel of letters for Messrs. Rabin, Krick and Bernard, which I beg of you to forward to them: not long ago we received a pretty long letter from Mr. Rabin, informing us of his safe arrival at his new destination; and giving us an account of the great kindness he and his companions experienced from your Grace, also of the generous exertions of the Catholics of Bengal in favor of the Mission of Thibet. It would be impossible for me to express my gratitude and that of our community, for the signal services your Grace has rendered our dear brothers for the support of the Missions of Thibet. We continually beg of our Lord to be himself your reward, and to pour down upon yourself and your flock his most abundant Benedictions, recommending myself to the pious prayers of the priests, and religious ladies under your Grace's charge: I am with the most profound respect,

Your Grace's humble and obdt. Servt.
Langlois.

To His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew.

July 9th, 1850,

LETTER FROM J. B. RICHARDS, ESQ., OF CULNA.

To His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic of Western Bengal.

My Dear Lord Archbishop,—I have the pleasure of sending the accompanying donation,* from one of the Protestant Ladies who having visited the Orphanage at Moorgyhutta on Monday last, requested me to hand this sum to your Grace for the benefit of the Orphans there.

I take this opportunity of expressing the very great satisfaction we all felt on visiting your different establishments, and we must beg of your Grace to make our best thanks to the Clergymen of the College, and the Ladies of the Convent and Orphanages for their polite attention.

The Orphanage at Intally cannot fail of exciting the kindly feelings of all who visit it; how truly gratifying it must be to your Grace, to see the comfortable and happy Asylum you have provided for these otherwise destitute children: with respectful compliments and best wishes of my family and self to your Grace.

I remain,
Yours very faithfully,
J. B. Richards.

Calcutta, Feb. 22, 1851.

A SERMON DELIVERED IN ST. GEORGE'S CATHOLIC CHURCH, SOUTHWARK, ON SUNDAY MORNING, AUGUST 11TH., 1850. BY THE RIGHT REV. N. WISEMAN, D.D. BISHOP OF MELIPOTAMUS, V. A. L

"BUT HE, WILLING TO JUSTIFY HIMSELF, SAID TO JESUS,—AND WHO IS MY NEIGHBOUR?"—LUKE X. 29.

(Continued from our last.

Such, then, my Brethren, is the great principle which our Blessed, Saviour laid down and gave to His Church, and which has been the rule of her conduct from the beginning. And you will allow me, therefore, this morning to trace for you this principle in the action of the Church, to show you the influence which those words have exercised over the whole of the world, over society, and over all that has sprung from it in the whole of the world, wherever the Christian name has been known or heard. Whatever our Blessed Saviour undertook upon earth, whatever he did for man, whatever he bestowed upon him, he wished to imprint with two characteristics, —which to human ingenuity and human power would have seemed inconsistent one with the other. All was intended by him to be, at the same time, universal and yet one. He redeemed the whole of mankind. There was no exception to that great work which formed the object of his existence upon earth; but all men, of whatever race, of whatever country, and of whatever age, were to be redeemed by one single action, at the same instant. There were to be universality and unity in that act; and faith, which springs from this great mystery, and which seemed as intended to act upon that portion of man's constitution, which proverbially is supposed to be the most various in its action,—his mind; that faith which, therefore, it might have seemed impossible to impress with these peculiar characters, was in like manner intended to be universal, and yet one; one faith, one doctrine, was declared to all nations,—to all the world; and it was the wise and holy intention of Divine Providence that all mankind should believe the same faith, should possess the same faith,—the learned and the unlearned, the civilized and the savage. Whatever might be the variety of their ideas, and their thoughts, and their wishes, upon every other subject that interested them, they were intended to be placed at the same level in regard to that supernatural revelation which is communicated through His incarnate Word. All, whoever they might be, wherever they might be called into existence, were to believe the same; a oneness of Faith was to be as sure a characteristic of His teaching as universality. And so likewise with regard to His Church; He meant that society of the faithful united to Him to be as completely one, as are the members of the same body a part of the same being,—as are the scattered portions of the same kingdom subject to the same rule. And that kingdom of the Messiah, which was to extend to the bounds of the earth, was to be under one kingship, one headship, one rule, and one law.

Then in like manner with regard to charity; our Blessed Saviour, having given this as a great gift, as a new virtue, and unknown to the generations that had gone before His time, stamped it likewise with the same impress of His own power, and made the precept as to loving mankind universal, so as to embrace the whole of mankind, yet at the same time to be performed by one single act, centred completely in each individual; so that the whole of mankind should be thus as firmly knitted in complete and entire love as the various elements which compose one man are united in self-love within his heart; for all our neighbours must be loved even as we love ourselves.

Then how was this to be accomplished? For it would appear as if love of God's nature were diffusive rather than concentrated, as if we had in loving others, to love those who, as it were, went forth from ourselves, instead of gathering them unto us. Love, which had not been known upon earth as a virtue, but merely as an instinct, or a passion, was of earthly growth. Each plant gathered around itself the kindly influence of that which was immediately in its neighbourhood, and they might entwine their branches together, in close friendship, they might bask in the same sunshine, or enjoy the same congenial soil, and thus have a sympathy, as it were, a growth and an expansion; but rooted to the spot, fixed on that soil, how were they to partake of whatever was beyond their sphere, their reach, or their consciousness; This was the great problem to be solved,—to give to charity or fraternal love the same characteristic which belonged to every other great gift of the new Law—and thus it was done.

The concentration of love is naturally from earth to heaven, in the same manner as men, in whatever part of the world they are, naturally turn their eyes towards one and the same sun, and admire and glorify it; and as in return from that sun are shed forth over every part of the earth rays which come from itself with diffusive power, and thus may be said to form an intermediate means of communication between things which are most distant upon earth,—so God gives first the precept to love Him, to love Him with an intensity of love, to love Him with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our power; and all men thus loving God—(O! that they did so! but such is the design and the wish of His blessed love)—all men loving Him, who alone is the great, the one object of universal love, towards whom all, from every corner of the earth, may turn, and in whom they will find enough to love and to adore; all the affections of mankind being thus drawn towards Him and centred in Him; and He, manifesting to all that love Him that He is universal love, and loves all that He has made, and man, that He has redeemed above all; then from Him descend over the whole earth those rays of fraternal charity which make us perform that great mysterious act of love, unknown to men before the magnificent revelation of Christianity, but which is one of its most wonderful privileges, the loving all other beings—all other things in God, and for His sake; reading, as it were, in Him that love which He has for all mankind; and thus endeavouring to make a likeness to Him—the natural result and fruit of love seeking and striving to the utmost to love all as He loves them. And surely it is not too much, then, to ask that we should love them as we love ourselves, for He has loved them as He loved Himself, and more. for He has given Himself, and stripped Himself of His glory, robbed Himself of His majesty, abased Himself, and, as it were, declared Himself for man, and has even submitted to ignominy, and died to redeem him. Then, instead of having to strive for what is beyond the power of man, to feel the distinct and tender love for what we have neither seen nor known,—this love of God inspires us to love all other things, because it is through God that we love them,—our affections first rise to Him,—there all is concentrated, and thence all is dispersed.

Now what must necessarily be the working of a principle like this? the intense love, that is, of God, and, as a consequence, as intense a love of our neighbours? Why, that throughout the Church, in every age, in every place, all distinctions between men have vanished before the Church, because before God they are equal; and whatever of distinction or division there was of old has been broken down, and active charity has sought to pursue its objects everywhere, without reference to any natural, social, or domestic tie.

(To be continued.)

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE REASONS OF MY CONVERSION TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY A LATE CLERGYMAN* OF THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION, IN LETTERS TO A FRIEND. FIFTH EDITION. LONDON: JAMES BURNS, 1849.

The individuals for whom the following Letters were written, and at whose request they are printed, are now themselves members of the Catholic Church. They have desired their publication, partly as an answer to numerous inquiries and objections, and because they express, in a general way (although, of course, each one has, in some degree, his own special views and feelings), those grounds and convictions on which they have themselves acted. Also they are not without hope that some persons may be induced to read these Letters, who have not read other things on the same subject; and that something in them, coming at the right time, or falling on a more prepared state of mind, may, by God's blessing, convince those who have hitherto been unconvinced by abler writings.

At least, it is hoped that what is here said may be sufficient to prove that those who have submitted to the Catholic Church have not done so unadvisedly: that secession from the Anglican Communion is not that absurd and indefensible step which it is commonly represented to be; and that it is possible to adduce reasons in its behalf which not only relieve their authors from the charge of "mental imbecility,"† but really demand the grave consideration of earnest and thoughtful men.

Nothing has more astonished the person who put forth the present remarks, than such charges against converts as "apostacy from the Church," "renunciation of the faith," "desertion of their spiritual Mother," &c.,—phrases which have been very commonly used of late, and that too by writers professing high views of the unity of the Church, and a decided belief that the Roman is a part, and in some respects a better part of the Church than their own. It is hoped that in the following Letters it will appear that those who have yielded to the claims of the Catholic Church can in no sense be said to have committed apostacy, or to have renounced any one article of the faith. The present publication may therefore, it is hoped, be instrumental in preventing for the future all such unmeaning accusations.

It may not be amiss also to allude to the attempts now so commonly made to stifle inquiry,‡ by debarring persons from reading what is put forth by Catholics, and especially by converts. Surely this is quite indefensible on any fair ground. Surely nothing can be more unreason-

* The letters containing the account here noticed are ascribed to the Rev. Mr. Newman.

† ——"it cannot be alleged that this infatuation has in any case amounted to positive mental imbecility."—English Churchman, Aug. 36, 1847.

‡ To such a length have these attempts been carried, that it is now the policy of most of the Anglican papers to refuse the insertion of advertisements of Catholic publications! It seems scarcely credible that such shifts should be resorted to.

able or unfair than to make serious accusations against the motives and conduct of those who have thought it their bounden duty to act in a certain way, and then to refuse to read the statement of the grounds on which they have acted, and the defence of their conduct.

And not less strange does it appear, that persons insisting on the unity of the Church, and the essential oneness of the Roman and English Churches in matters of faith, should yet refuse to hold any communication, or to exchange thoughts and feelings, with members of that body which they acknowledge to be a true Church, on subjects of the deepest interest to both parties.

The writers of this Advertisement have only to add their most solemn testimony to the removal of all those doubts which for a length of time harassed their own minds, and to the complete satisfaction of all their expectations and needs, which they have experienced in the fulness of the grace, and in the living presence of the Holy Catholic Church. Knowing the slowness of their own hearts to believe, and the difficulties which impede the progress of inquirers, they would repress all too sanguine hopes in regard to the friends they have left behind. But they cannot cease to importune the Giver of all good, that He would lead them in His own time and in His own way, into that land, which, while they seem to be seeking for it, and it is close at hand, they will not enter. Oh, let them not repress thoughts and rising convictions; let them not resist the yearnings of their hearts; let them not allow worldly position or prospects to stop inquiry or stifle the voice of conscience; let them not turn away from books which only ask a fair and candid hearing; but with a solemn sense of their responsibility for rejecting truth, as well as accepting error, let them read, meditate, pray, and decide as those who must give an account for the course they pursue on this most solemn subject, and at this most eventful period of our history.

LETTER I.

My Dear ——

You have asked me to give you an account of the reasons which have induced me, after much consideration, and at the sacrifice of many feelings and some worldly advantages, to abandon the Communion in which I was brought up, and to join myself to the Church of Rome, as the one only Church, claiming in the name of Christ, and as His representative on earth, the obedience of all Christians in all nations. The arguments which finally prevailed with me are the same which have induced so many before me to act as I have done, and which have been so well and ably put forth in many recent publications, which are accessible to all. I might refer to these as containing all I have to say; and I am in the habit of doing so. Still you wish to have my own account of the way in which these arguments were brought home to myself personally. I cannot hope, nor do I wish, to say any thing new on these subjects; but since you express the wish that I should write, I will not refuse to comply with your request; and amply shall I be repaid, if what I shall say may influence but one person to do as I have done.

I shall not attempt any laboured or methodical argument, either of the whole controversy, or of any particular point; but shall just give a history of the manner in which the subject was brought before my own mind, the way in which I was convinced, and in which the prejudices and objections I had entertained were removed.

We all remember the time when little or nothing was ever said by the English clergy about the Holy Catholic Church, its visibility, unity, and authority as the teacher of the faith; of the evil and danger of schism; of the fallacy and mischief of saying that the Bible, and the Bible alone, was the rule of faith, &c. We well remember the time when these doctrines first began to be taught, and how rapidly they spread—partly from their own intrinsic truth and manifest importance, and partly through the ability, earnestness, and high character of those who first propagated them. They were received by many, and warmly and heartily embraced; among others, by myself.

The doctrines then chiefly insisted upon were these: that the Church was a visible society, set up by Christ Himself to teach the truth, to convey grace, to decide controversies, and to regulate all matters affecting its own welfare; that the Church was governed by duly ordained ministers, deriving their authority in succession from the original founders, the Apostles; that the continued existence and indefectibility of this Church was guaranteed by the express promise of Christ; that union with, and submission to, the Church was necessary to salvation; that heresy, which is denying what the Church teaches, is a deadly sin; that schism, which is separation from the Church, and rebellion against its legitimate authority, was also a deadly sin; that Scripture was not, and could not be, the alone rule of faith—for Scripture needed an interpreter; that men needed an authority in disputes and controversies, to which they might refer, and whose decree should be final; that Scripture and tradition was the true rule of faith.

These, it was said, were the doctrines of the English Church; by these she was distinguished from Protestants, both at home and abroad: she claimed to be Catholic and Apostolic, a part of the one true Church scattered all over the world, because she possessed a true succession in her Bishops, and held the true rule of faith—Scripture and tradition—and all doctrines which, by this rule, could be shewn to have been the doctrines of the Church from the first.

There was a common sense in the substance of these doctrines which ensured them a ready reception in the minds of many persons who had been wearied with the groundless theories, and hopeless disputes, and fanatical religion of former years. It came upon us like a new revelation for our comfort; and yet was so obvious, that we wondered how we had not seen before, that there must be a Church, a visible Society; that this Church must have authority; that if it had authority, it must be submitted to by individuals; that Christianity was an historical fact; that it was not now for the first time to be discovered; that we must inquire what it is, and not make it for ourselves. It was a comfort to be told that these were the doctrines of the English Church; that she claimed to be a part of the Catholic Church—one by legitimate descent, and unity of faith and doctrines in all essential matters with the Church of the Apostles, the Fathers, and the Saints; that she was our Church, the Church to us; that by union with her we were united with the Church Catholic all over the world, and with the Church of all ages from the Apostles.

The rule of Scripture and tradition was then used and applied to determine the Catholic faith. By the application of this rule, the rule itself was proved to be primitive and Catholic; by it the nature, constitution, and office of the Church were proved to be so likewise; by it also such doctrines as baptismal regeneration, the real presence of Christ in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the eucharistic Sacrifice, the power of the keys, or the doctrine of priestly absolution, were all proved to be primitive and Catholic; and all these doctrines, as well as the rule itself, were declared to be the distinctive doctrines of the Church of England, severing her, by a clear and broad line, from all sects and denominations of Protestants.

With respect to the Roman Church, we were told that it had abandoned this rule of Scripture and tradition, and substituted in its stead the modern dogma of the infallibility of the Pope; that, together with the rule, it had forsaken also the doctrines of the primitive Church, and had made unauthorised additions of its own, at direct variance with the old faith, and even destructive of it; and that it had imposed these additions on pain of anathema on all persons, as terms of communion with itself. Rome, we were told, dared not submit her teaching to the test of Scripture and tradition; and that this was at once the ground of dispute, and the key to the distinctive differences between Rome and England. we charged her with additions to the faith—additions which amounted to or involved contradictions of Catholic verities; as we charged Dissenters with denying the faith itself in regard to the Church, the rule of faith, and some most vital doctrines.

Thus the Church of England was clearly designated as a middle point, or via media, between the Roman Church and Dissent, or Protestantism. Against both it asserted the rule of Scripture and tradition, by which the one was proved essentially defective, the other glaringly corrupt. Much was written on this assertion, and the "via media" became a household word among Anglicans.* Mr. Newman's work on the prophetic office of the Church, and Mr. Dodsworth's sermons on "The Church of England a Protester against Romanism and Dissent," were among the most able and popular expressions of this view of our position and claims.

I embraced these views with sincerity and earnestness; the general principles laid down, and the great truths taught, commended themselves greatly to my mind. I seized almost with greediness upon the idea of the Church as a teacher and guide, and also upon her sacramental character, as the channel of grace, the medium through which individuals become partakers of the gift of the Holy Ghost, and members of the mystical Body of Christ our Lord. This was just what I wanted,—what my soul needed and craved for. In this view of the Church I found a basis for my faith, an authority above myself for my opinions and teaching, and in the Sacraments the connecting link between the visible and the Invisible, between God and the soul. A thousand difficulties were cleared up, and a connexion established between reason and faith, religion and ethics, which I had in vain searched for before and elsewhere.

These truths so occupied and engrossed me, that for a time I could only think of them in their simpler forms and consequences. I felt sure that they were true, whatever might be their consequences. I received and taught them, therefore, fearlessly and earnestly. They were most personal to myself and others, and carried us a long way beyond where they found us, without necessarily bringing us to any serious difficulties.

* I have adopted this term to describe the persons I allude to, as being the most expressive and characteristic I could find. It is difficult to fix on any word or name which comprehends all, and no more than, one means, and which the persons themselves will consent to allow to be used. I am fully aware of the difficulty and consequent ambiguity. No one, for instance, could confound Dr. Pusey's tone with Dr. Hook's, or Mr. Dodsworth's with Mr. Bennett's, or Mr. Williams' with Mr. Gresley's or Mr. Paget's; or these again with the Bishops of Exeter and Salisbury; and yet these are all, in a sense, "High Churchmen." I have even heard one High Churchman or Anglican call another a "mere Anglican." The difficulty is in the very state of the parties; but I think the word used is at once the least offensive, and the most distinctive and comprehensive.

Meantime I took very much for granted, that both this rule of faith, and the doctrines above mentioned, were indeed distinctive tenets of the Church of England; and also, that in the appeal to tradition and the primitive Church, the Romanists were undoubtedly wrong. You must remember, that all my prejudices and feelings were on the side of England, and against Rome—that, therefore, I the more readily believed what the former said against the latter. I had been educated, as most of us have been, in the strongest objections to the worst representation of Roman Catholic doctrines. It never entered my mind that Rome could be right; and I accepted, without much examination, the theory offered to me to account at once for the existence and errors of that Church. It was a new, and seemed a most plausible idea to me, that the errors of the Church of Rome were simply exaggerations and corruptions, not wholly false; that every one of her doctrines had a foundation in truth and in antiquity; and that the Church of England had simply renounced the exaggerated or corrupt form of the doctrines, retaining all that was true; that it had carefully drawn the line, by the measure of antiquity, between what was Catholic and what was Roman. I was not learned myself—I could not be a judge in such a controversy. I took the authority of my Church in the matter, and was glad to have so good and plausible an account to give of the fact of the existence and state of the Roman Church.

Thus I continued for some time, working deeper and deeper, into my own mind the idea of the Church as a living Body, inhabited by the Holy Ghost, the teacher of truth, to nations and individuals, our guide in all controversies, and the alone appointed channel of grace to our souls. I became more and more convinced that such a Body, with such divine gifts, was an essential part of Christianity; that without it the Gospel would be incomplete, if not unintelligible, and Scripture would point to that for which it provided no fulfilment. I also became more and more convinced of the truth and immense importance of what were called the Catholic doctrines,—baptismal regeneration, the Real Presence, the power of absolution, &c. I fed upon them myself, and enforced them on others.

During this time it had never occurred to me to enter upon the controversy, whether these doctrines were indeed the distinctive and authoritative doctrines of the Church of England, or whether it could make good its practice and theory against the rest of the Catholic world. On the former point, the arguments and assertions of the writers of Tracts for the Times satisfied me; on the latter, I took it for granted, that the Church of England was a Church and my Church, and that therefore the controversy lay not between Rome and me individually, but between Rome and my Church. I believed also at this time, what was assumed throughout by the Tract-writers, or Anglicans, that the Roman Church was a true Church, though a corrupt one; that it might be in some respects more Catholic and Apostolic in its doctrines and practice than our own; that, indeed, it was allowable to consider it, on the whole, as in a higher state—to prefer it as a matter of taste and opinion, although duty bound us to our own Church. The prerogatives of the Bishops of Rome were also acknowledged and admitted. It began to be admitted, that theoretically there ought to be a positive visible unity; and that the Bishop of Rome, as successor of St. Peter, was the proper theoretic head or centre of this theoretic unity; that if things were as they ought to be, the Bishop of Rome would be Patriarch of the West and Primate of the world; that the schism or separation between the Churches was an anomalous state, made necessary and inevitable, indeed, by circumstances, but much to be deplored.

Behold me, then, thoroughly imbued with Catholic principles and doctrines, and yet a strong, decided, and hopeful Anglican, irresistable against all Low-Churchmen and Evangelicals in the doctrine of the Church and the Sacraments; confident against Romanists in the appeal to tradition and primitive Christianity; and protected, as I thought, by the authority of my own Church, and by the learning and ability of some of the ablest and best men of the day. I felt sure that the "movement," as the recent rise and sudden spread of Catholic doctrines in England was called, was destined to exalt the English Church to the highest pitch of Christian truth, ecclesiastical order, and ceremonial chasteness and beauty; that time only was wanted to bring about these effects in us; and that then we should win and almost compel the Church of Rome to acknowledge our catholicity, and, perhaps, to put away some of her own corruptions—at any rate, to withdraw her anathemas and unwarrantable terms of communion.

In these opinions I was not singular. You well know that they were entertained at one time by many; and I could mention the names of the very highest authorities of Anglicanism, among those who suggested to me, or encouraged me in, these notions. It took me several years to arrive at this state of mind; at the end of which, by some little reading, by constant and habitual reflection, and by the progress of events, I was inevitably led to, and in some degree prepared for, the further questions, which had been in a great measure passed over, but which now met us at every turn, and were pressed upon us,—Was Anglicanism indeed the theory and doctrine of the English Church? and could the position of the English Church, according to this theory, be maintained on its own principles against the Catholic world? The progess of events, and the progress of my own mind, working out the consequences of the truths it had received, brought me at the same time to these questions. The same questions had gradually got possession of the minds of some of the principal persons of the "movement;" and some of its best advocates and brightest ornaments gave it up, abandoned their position as thoroughly untenable, and submitted themselves to the Roman Catholic Church, as that alone which corresponded to their theories, which really taught and sustained their principles, and was that very thing which, without knowing it, they had all along been labouring for and sighing after.

The progress of my own mind, the progress of events, and the secessions and written confessions of these men, was to me a summons which could not be resisted, to consider how far I was justified in my principles and theory, and how far those principles justified me in my position. The character, ability, and learning of these persons had been constantly urged both as a sanction for the opinions they held, and as a "note" of the Church to which they belonged. It is clear, then, that whatever was gained to the English Church by the personal character and abilities of the persons alluded to, was not only lost to it by their secession, but became in so far a note against it.

The questions, therefore, which began at this time to occupy and engross my attention, were these: Was that body of principles and doctrines which I had come to hold as the Catholic faith, and to identify with Christianity, the distinctive and authoritative teaching of the English Church? Had I the sanction and authority of my Church for my faith on these essential and fundamental points? And, next, in the disputes that existed between England and Rome (on Anglo-Catholic views and principles), could we justify ourselves from the charge of schism, and of having given up, obscured, or neglected Catholic verities? Could we maintain and justify both our position and protest against Rome, on Catholic principles?

It was no longer a question with me, you will observe, whether or not there was a visible Church; whether the Church had authority to teach; whether submission to the Church by individuals was a duty; whether schism was a great sin, cutting off from grace. All these points were settled and assumed on both sides. So also were many great doctrines, as the real Presence of our Lord in the sacrament, sacramental absolution, and others. These doctrines were admitted on both sides to be undoubtedly Catholic, the denial or rejection of which was fatal to any pretensions to identity with the primitive and Catholic Church. The controversy now was not about these principles and doctrines, but on the assumption of them, what was the issue? Further reflection and examination of these questions convinced me with a force I have never been able in any adequate degree to express or communicate, that Anglicanism, both as a theory and in its peculiar doctrines, is NOT, in any sense, the distinctive and authoritative teaching of the Church of England; and, further, that the Anglican theory, as such, is utterly untenable on its own or any Catholic principles; that according to all the principles and doctrines which I had embraced, and which I found it impossible to give up, either the Roman Catholic Church was THE Church and our Church, or that there was no longer a Church on earth; that Christ's promises had failed: and that we were inevitably left each one to his own private judgment as to what is truth and what is error. I will endeavour to show you how I arrived at these conclusions in my next Letter.

(To be continued.)

HISTORY OF THE LIFE, WRITINGS AND DOCTRINES OF MARTIN LUTHER

By J. M. V. Audin

THE TWO BULLS 1520.

LEO X—1521

(Continued from page 75.)

There were then no levées like those of the Medici, whom commerce had invested with sovereign power, and who were, at once, the bankers of Europe, and the patrons of literature. Those of Leo in the Vatican surpassed all the splendours of the most brilliant courts. Never before had such gifted minds met in the palace of a prince! A few words will prove this. There was Louis Ariosto, who came from Ferrara to Rome, to thank the pope for the excommunication he fulminated against whoever should publish his works, without his consent. This was a noble act, directed against the cupidity of certain sharpers, who systematically pirated every verse that fell from the bard of Rinaldo * Leo patronised Orlando, some of whose verses he was fond of repeating.†

Then came the bishop of Fossombrone, Paul of Middleburg, to present to his holiness the treatise De recta Paschae celebratione;—a work that would do credit to a Benedictin‡ of the seventeenth century; or Basil Lapi, the pupil of Vespucio, who came to dedicate to him his work, de aetatum computatione et dierum anticipatione;—for Leo turned his attention to the reformation of the calendar. He had written to the fathers of the Lateran council, to the learned of Italy, and required them to transmit to him the result of their researches on this reform, which was so long desired, but which could only be effected under the pontificate of Gregory XIII. There might be seen Celio Calcagnini of Ferrara, who, long before Copernicus, taught the rotation of the earth,§ notwithstanding the apparent opposition of the Bible; or, perhaps, a deputation of some poor religious of the order of St. Dominic, who came to lay at the feet of the common father of the faithful their remonstrances at the sufferings endured by the Indians, who were butchered, imprisoned, or sold as slaves, by the conquerors of the new world. The pope had stigmatized this horrid traffic in the name of humanity and religion.‖ On these grand occasions all ranks were confounded; and the black habit of a Dominican friar might have touched the purple robe of Castiglioni, the most accomplished courtier of his age, the frequenter of palaces and courts. He had written "the Courtier;" a work much more serious than its title would indicate, and in which may be studied the comic side of Italian society in the 16th century.* Near this writer, habited with such grace and splendour, might be remarked a dwarfish being, endeavouring to look big, and who, at the sight of Leo X., environed by his courtiers, gave a laugh of of satanic malignity. It was Aretino, who proclaims himself to be the scourge of princes, and who is only known as one overflowing with satire and irony. According to Bandello, Aretino attracted the stiletto and the club, as naturally as the loadstone draws to it the iron; and his back resembled a nautical chart, being marked with the numerous inflictions of those whom he had lampooned. Having been driven from Arezzo, his native city, on account of some sonnets, he came to Rome, almost in a state of destitution. Leo X. lodged and clothed him, and made him rich presents, Among other acts of his kindness, he once gave him a sum of money, that might have been offered to a prince,—not to bribe him into flattery or to secure his silence,—for Aretino had calumniated even his benefactor,†—but because the fame of his talents had preceded him to Rome. Follow Aretino, when he leaves the pope, to his residence in the Piazza del Popolo. Hear him describe his situation in his own hyperbolic style: "The great annoy me with their visits: my stairway is worn away by visiters, as the steps of the capitol by the wheels of the triumphal chariots. No where is to be seen such a melange of nations as my apartments afford:—Turks, Jews, Indians, French, Germans, and Italians. I need not say that the Spaniards are not absent from the general rendezvous. I do not speak of the people. I cannot be for a moment without being persecuted by soldiers, scholars, friars, and priests. I am become the oracle of truth: one man comes to complain to me of his prince: another of a prelate. I am a universal secretary. Fail not to give me this title on the back of my letters."‡

"Il gran lume Aretin, l'unico Accolti."§

---

* We read in Richardson, who copies Bayle, that, "Leo X. published a bull of excommunication against whoever would dare to criticise the works of Ariosto!" Richardson's Treatise on painting. t. III. p. 435. Bayle art. Leo X. Warton's history of English poetry, t. II. p. 411. The bull of Leo X. may be seen in the Orlando Furioso published in Ferrara in 1516, as also in the collection of the pope's letters, by Bembo, lib. X. ep. 40. It is thus seen how groundless the accusation of protestants against Leo, "who," says Blondel, "was not ashamed to publish a bull in favour of the profane poetry of Louis Ariosto, threatening with excommunication those who would blame it, or prevent the profit of the printer at the same time that he fulminated his anathemas against Luther." See Roscoe 336 t. 4. Chapter XXIV.

† Sermo illi erat suavis et blandus. Vita Leonis X. ab anonymo conscripta.

‡ Fabron in vita Leonis X. p. 275.

§ Quod cœlum stet, terra autem moveatur. Tirab. Storia della lett. Ital. VII. 3. 427.

‖ Requisitus sententiam pontifex judicavit non modo religionem sed etiam naturam reclamitare servituti. Fabr. in vita Leonis X. p. 227.

* "Yo vos digo que es muerto uno de los mejores caballeros del mundo," exclaimed Charles V. on learning the death of Castiglioni.

† In one of his letters, Aretino, vol. III. p. 86, acknowledges that he received a large sum from Leo X. "Della santa memoria di Leone, danari in gran somma." Mazzuchelli Vita di Pietro, Aretino, p. 19. And in another letter he says of Leo X., of Clement VII. and Julius De Medici, "Non d'altro lo pa. garono, servendo loro, che di strada ed injuria." Lettere del Aretino III. 16.

‡ Lettere vol. I. p. 206. Mazzuchelli. 57.

§ Ork. Fur. Cant. XLVI. st. 10.

There might be found there also another Aretino, whom Ariosto has celebrated,—

The son of Benedetto Accolti, author of a history of crusades,* which is yet read in Italy, and the brother of Pietro Accolti, who composed that magnificent specimen of latinity, the bull of excommunication against Luther. Bernard Accolti was a poet whom Rome, enchanted with his numbers, called the celestial. When he gave recitations, business was neglected throughout the city, and all descriptions of artisans and artists ran to listen to him. He was accompanied by a guard of soldiers, which Leo assigned to him as a mark of honour. When the name of Accolti was pronounced by the chamberlain of the Vatican, the holy father would rise and say, "Open the doors and let the crowd enter." The people would then rush into the palace of the pope. Accolti recited a sonnet in honour of the Virgin; the ears and souls of all would be enchanted. They would exclaim, "Long live the divine poet! Long live the heavenly Accolti!"†

(To be continued.)

CONVERSION.

Within the present week, a Hindoo lad was received into the Catholic Communion an baptised by Rev. John McCabe.

Selections.

CARDINAL WISEMAN ON THE PRESS.

(From the Daily News, Jan. 6.)

Our purpose in this article has been, before the closing of the year, the eventful year 1850, to record the impressions made upon our minds by the public mode of dealing with the hierarchy question. We have spoken of the establishment, though we have not expressed one quarter of our thoughts upon its unchristian mode of proceeding in regard to catholics. But the press, as it is called, has been the great instrument in provoking wrath and ill will, in a manner that will scarcely be credible in, perhaps, a few months. We could almost hope that some one would go to the distrustful trouble of collecting the articles of a great many papers on the opposition side; we believe that since the days of Martin Luther, and out of his works, the collection could not be matched in religious vituperation and polemical scurrility. We must do justice, however, to those papers which have fearlessly and consistently taken more just and temperate views. The Chronicle ever since Lord John Russell's letter, has been steadily the opponent of religious intolerance, and of the narrow policy of persecution. It has given freely admission to letters and paragraphs favourable to, or defensive of, catholics; and has, in fact, been the only fair organ for giving explanations of misrepresentations elsewhere gladly circulated. This has been our only ally in the daily press; and we trust that catholics, who take a daily paper, will know how to show their sense of this liberal course. The weekly press has been more just, with some exceptions. We regret, indeed, that the able articles in the Weekly Dispatch should have been sullied with irreligious language, which made it impossible often to recommend their perusal; but often this blot has been withheld, and then, indeed, we have been gratified by the bold, uncompromising, and truly masculine eloquence with which the charlatanism of Cumming and the "atrocities" of Mac-Neile have been lashed, and the hypocrisy of canting illiberality unmasked. The Leader and the Economist have been impartial and just. The provincial papers, too, have helped to enlighten the people, and keep down the ferment. The Hull Advertiser, for instance, the Liverpool Mercury, the Portsmouth Gazette, the Manchester Times and almost all the Birmingham papers, have done themselves honour by their independence of the London press, and by showing that they possess higher views, and more freedom from prejudice, bigotry, and servility, than the supposed genius and education, which pretend, through it, to rule public opinion. We hope that catholics who subscribe to local papers will have spirit enough to cast aside those which have pandered to the vile passions of religious agitators, and encourage such as have proved themselves friends in need.

But, after this scanty list of exceptions, the catholics, as well as their hierarchy, have now had to sustain, for more than two months, an unceasing attack. Almost every daily, and many weekly papers, have been, as the French say, a bouche de feu.

As to the latter, some are scarcely worth a notice. That "unscrupulous" compound (its own epithet to others) of bad drawing and bad writing, the Illustrated London News, which hitherto had been innocently amusing, must needs have its fling at catholics. We must not omit, however, one anecdote relative to it. There was given in it a view of the grand papal Guy Fawkes procession at Salisbury; but the artist, by way of showing what sort of gentry composed it represented one of the banner-bearers as picking a pocket. This was altered in the engraving. There is another weekly, the delinquencies of which have cost it dear. Punch was once the playful companion of everybody's railway journey. Those who did not wish to be crammed with often doubtful jokes, could glance with pleasure over the pages, richly dight with the "Manners and Customs of the English," or the adventures in travel of three early associates of our school-boy days. The practised eye ran eagerly through the sheet to catch a glimpse of that cocky little bird that perched on two twin letters; and where that the sight was sure to rest, for there was certain to be found a new and original combination of strong artistic skill, rare humour, infinite variety, delicate fancy, and deep observation of human nature and national character, the whole set forth by a masterly touch and an unerring pencil. Alas! the little bird, the very genius of Punch, which occasionally had been seen to hop down from its literary perch on to the ground, has now flown clean away, and has left a blank not easily to be filled up. And why? Because Punch had become old and drivelling, had taken to preach and be a saint, had lost all his good humour, had turned sulky and then pugnacious and ill-tempered; and, not content with this, had come down to his old street occupation of playing the hangman. Punch was before Mac Neile in wishing catholic bishops to be sentenced to death, and then mercifully transported as felons. Was not this gentle and sweet of him? But jesters seldom know, that, under real wit, and wholesome cheerfulness, and brilliant genius, there may lie deep in the heart a sacred honour, and solemn convictions, which, as they elevate and purify, in their exercise, those gifts, so are they prized more highly by their possessor. It was in a catholic breast that the bright talents of Mr. Doyle were lodged; and he has given the word a proof, rare in our generation, that there are principles, even in the young and aspiring, which can triumph, not only over considerations of honourable profit, but over the pleasure of pleasing, and the encouragements of early fame.

* Lettere di Pietro Aretino, v. 46. Mazzuchelli, Scritt. d'Italia, I. 46.

† Benedetto, Life of Lorenzo of Medici, t. I. p. 110.

The Examiner has played a strange and inconsistent part. We do not think it worth while commenting on it, because we cannot find what principle can have guided it in its changeful views. It may amuse a later age to reconcile with itself that liberality which deprecated judicial or legislative proceedings against catholics, and in the same page gently insinuated the propriety of a personal attack by the mob, as in the gallant assault upon the unarmed Haynau. "This illiberality of the illiberal press, as exhibited also in the Daily News, may appear surprising to persons not acquainted with a common experience, that none are less liberal than those who make a parade of liberality, so soon as their own ideas are departed from. Where liberal principles are only a stalking-horse or a sign-board, they may be, and often are, combined with most narrow selfish views, with ungenerous and sectarian judgments of others. Where especially scepticism is the basis of liberality, it contracts the affections so thoroughly in regard to the morally great, and the virtuously beautiful, as to make these objects of dislike. Hence whatever is mechanically powerful or materially grand is to it an object of adoration; but the sublime influences of religion, its exacted sacrifices, its spiritual rule, its unity of faith, its intentness upon the eternal future, are all to it unrealities and obstacles to worldly progress. Hence liberality generally excludes catholicism from its predilections. Liberality means freedom to all, with one exception.

There is another paper, which we should not care to glance at, but for one sad reason. When we have read, occasionally, articles of the Globe upon the late agitation, the brilliancy of illustration, the richness of apt quotation, the wit of reckless satire, and the inaccuracy of detail, confirmed what we have heard, that they are the productions of a pen once more innocently employed on the literary forgeries of Father Prout. It strikes us with a melancholy regret, to witness the prostitution of talents apparently destined for a nobler cause; to think of the heart, in which the convictions of early education and a sacred vocation, are day-by-day made objects of derision, and what has been taught as holy is scoffed at, as absurd. One so engaged we must leave to grace, acting perhaps through present remorse; we can only say, that though generally these have been the most telling articles against us, we have felt them the least. In other writers we saw that there was often the conviction of a hearty bigotry; in these there was the hollowness of the mere vanity to dazzle.

Passing over any claims to notice of more fashionable, and less influential, organs, we will confine ourselves to the Times, which boasts of a power somewhat imperial. And whatever that power may be, against us it has been all put forth. So unusual has been its virulence, so unsparing its language, so lawless its argumentation, that man have thought it worth while to enquire, what peculiar object it had in view, and what motive so powerfully guided it. For our parts, we believe that the solution of the difficulty would be probably best found in its ledger—the illiberal and violent line paid best. The Times is a speculation and a speculation has no conscience. Who that has followed its chequered career, seeing it now on the white, now on the black upon the board, sometimes shifted by the easy glide of queen or rook, now jerked equivocally by a knightly move, has not long known, that in every case it is playing a game, and is only intent on winning? We well remember when it was the organ of orangism, and in highest favour with the ultra-protestants of Ireland, how Mr. Hume read to the House of Commons, amidst roars of laughter, a secret letter of elder date, from a leader of that party, which spoke of "that filthy concern, the Times." We remember, too, when it patronised Puseyism, and wrote articles in favour of the semipopish recreations of young high-churchmen, till the effertory provoked its master's wrath, and it began after scarcely a few days' decent pause, to unsay what it had said, and refute what it had been inculcating. To study, therefore, the motives which may have impelled its editorial council to make catholics its present game, and hunt them down mercilessly, would be to throw good time and thought away upon a very useless pursuit. It will continue the same course so long as it finds it profitable; it will change its tack when another answers better. The line of argument which it has pursued has been each day contradictory of the preceding, it would be easy to make every assertion refute itself, were it worth while reproducing what is by most now forgotten. When argument had failen, the daily repeated lesson was: "it matters not how law or precedent may stand, the people of England wish for the extinction of the catholic hierarchy, and who shall gainsay this sovereign will?"

Sic volo, sic jubeo, stet pro ratione voluntas.

Against this argument, the principle of all tyranny, we have nothing to oppose. Is it, however, gravely thought, by the editors of that paper, that the English constitution is quite so near being brought to

The good old rule, the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can?

Once a great minister said that England had just been within a few hours of barter; are we now within a few days or weeks of barbarism?

Twice, of late, the Times has failed in a persevering attempt to crush; for in this lies its great power. Its constructed faculties are by no means great. It did its utmost last year, to annihilate Lord Palmerston; it struck out on its anvil, article after article; but it all proved a failure. Then came the effort to remove the Great Exhibition from Hyde-park; and this, too, proved unsuccessful. It has done all that violence, perseverance, and bitterness can do against us. It has admitted every thing that could be made to tell against us; but has denied insertion to our answers. It has kept no measures with us or with its own anger. We await calmly the result. Whatever legislative enactments may be preparing, however much they may be owing to the commotion so much excited by the press, we do not anticipate the slighest check to our religion, or the smallest disturbance to our ecclesiastical polity. We shall not be crushed.

ST. JOHN GUALBERTO.

He was a young Florentine noble, well educated according to the ideas of the time, and excelling in all manly exercises. While still young, his only brother, Hugo, whom he deeply loved, was murdered by a companion with whom he had quarrelled; and, urged by his own feelings, as well as the entreaties of his father and mother, Gualberto set forth to pursue the assassin. He was returning from Florence to the country-house of his father, on the evening of Good-Friday—

"Along the steep, narrow, winding road which leads from the city gate to the church of San Miniato del Monte. About half-way up the hill, where the road turns to the right he suddenly came upon his enemy alone and unarmed. At the sight of the assassin of his brother, thus, as it were, given in to his hands, Gualberto draw his sword. The miserable wretch, seeing no means of escape, fell upon his knees and entreated mercy extending his arms in the form of a cross, he adjured him by the remembrance of Christ, who had suffered on that day, to spare his life. Gualberto, struck with sudden compunction, remembering that Christ when on the Cross had prayed for his murderers, stayed his uplifted sword, trembling from head to foot; and after a moment of terrible conflict with his own heart, and a prayer for divine support, he held out his hand, raised the suppliant from the ground, and embraced him in token of forgiveness. Thus they parted; and Gualberto proceeding on his way in sad and sorrowful mood, every pulse throbbing with the sudden revulsion of feeling arrived at the church of San Miniato, and entering knelt down before the crucifix over the altar. His rage had given way to tears, his heart melted within him; and as he wept before the image of the Saviour, and supplicated mercy, because he had shown mercy, he fancied, that in gracious reply to his prayer, the figure bowed its head. This miracle, for such he deemed it, completed the revolution which had taken place in his whole character and state of being. * * He entered the Benedictine order, and took up his residence in the monastery of San Miniato. Here he dwelt for some time a humble penitent; all earthly ambition quenched at once with the spirit of revenge."—p. 127.—Mrs. Jameson's Legends of the Monastic Orders.

CONFESSIONS UNDER TORTURE.

(From the Delhi Gazette, Jan. 11.)

A circular paper of instructions to Mofussil Judges and Magistrates, and the Nizamut Adawlut, will be found elsewhere. The Court wishes to check the loquacity of crime, and notes the ignorance of young magistrates as to the prevalence of torture. "Few young officers," they observe, "are aware how often confessions are not spontaneous."

This is the first time that official mention has been made, at least to our knowledge, of the general belief on this subject. The practice spoken of extends over the whole continent of India, and in every case of imputed offence, where the criminals are numerous or not-wealthy, we may rest assured, that the "question," as it used to be termed by the reverend judges of England, has been applied. At Madras, though every thief confessed before the magistrates, and recanted in presence of the judges, it was the habit of the authorities to ascribe all the out-pourings of knavery, to the workings of the guilty conscience. The theory was, however, a little bit damaged, when a clear case of torturing was brought home to a very active policeman. A friend looking in at the window of his chowkie, saw him engaged in arranging the arms and legs of a prisoner, at right angles with his body, and asked what he was about. "He won't confess, and so I've got to tie him up," was the quiet and satisfactory answer.

The Court do right to caution young officers on this point. A confession of guilt shortens the labour of justice so materially, that hard worked assistants may be expected to receive it in most cases with thankfulness, and it may seem a needless insult to challenge the truth of what a prisoner has said of himself in the way of inculpation. Where the influence of torture is most felt, is in the cases which are decided by authorities having summary jurisdiction. The poor wretches charged before them are never out of the hands of their first captors, and the same compulsion which brought forth confession prevents them from attempting to deny it afterwards. In cases which are sent up to the higher tribunals, the examples of recantation are almost as numerous as the number of previous admissions of guilt.

There is another part of the circular referred to, which induced a wish in our mind that the writer would become a contributor to the Delhi. We allude to the paragraphs about incorrect plans, in which the gentlemen addressed are told, that "a house and a tree need not be represented by precisely the same diagram." It is a pity to see a playful vein of sarcasm like this, thrown away in judicial papers, which are expected to be drawn up in grave terms. The writer must have a strong fellow feeling with that essentric Puritan, who set psalms to horapipes, on the plea that Satan had no right to a monopoly of the best music.—Delhi Gazette, Jany. 11.

THE BIBLE! THE BIBLE! THE BIBLE!

"The Bible! the Bible only! is the religion of Protestants!" exclaims good William Chillingworth.—"Very true," says the judicious Hooker, in his Ecclesiastical Polity; "but then you must submit to receive the Bible from the hands of Church-of-England men"—"Certainly, the Bible, by all means," adds the learned Margaret Professor; "yet the Bible is nothing without the Book of Common Prayer."—"Nay, nay, the Bible is not the thing you want, unless you discover in it all the great and precious truths contained in the Assembly's Catechism, and can submit to the wholesome discipline of the Directory," replies the pious and sober Presbyterian. "No, No, No," says the zealous Methodist, "it is the Bible collated with Mr. Wesley's Sermons, and Mr. Fletcher's Checks, that is the religion of Protestants." "And thou mayest read the Bible and the Checks likewise till Doomsday, friend, to no purpose, unless thou hast the light of the Spirit," adds the modest Quaker.—"A truce with your spirit!" exclaims the Swedenborgian, "why don't you read the works of the highly illuminated Baron; wherein are answered all questions, be they high as Heaven or deep as Hell?"—"You all are right and all are wrong," rejoins the Rev. Dr. Sturges, the Prebendary of Winchester, "provided 'the magistrate chuses' to say so; for it is his province to decide which shall be the 'National Religion;' and if he take it into his head that all or any one of your sects are 'pernicious,' he will 'totally exclude you;' but if you be not very obnoxious to his views, he will kindly consent 'to merely tolerate' you; at all events, he will 'make a competent public provision,' by levying a tax on every soul of you, for those 'ministers' to whom he 'gives a decided preference."—Oriental Christians Spectator.

ARRIVAL OF THE NUNS FROM AGRA.—It is with the highest gratification that we announce to our readers, this day, the arrival of the four religious Ladies expected from Agra, as mentioned in our number of the 9th Ultimo. They are—Mesdames St. Leo; formerly Miss Maissat, from Ænnonay, (France); St. Thaddeus, formerly Mrs. Brissaud, from Grenoble (France); St. Francis, formerly Miss Eyre, (England); St. Peter of Alcantara, a Novice, formerly Miss Dalton—(Ireland). The Lady Superioress, Mme, St. Leo, though a foreigner, speaks English very fluently and correctly, and is gifted with very high qualities. They underwent every manner of hardships on the way; but, notwithstanding, they have arrived in good health and spirits. They belong to the Institute, called of "Jesus and Mary,"—lately established at Lyons with the approbation and under the patronage of the Archbishop, Cardinal de Bonald. Its branches have spread throughout France, and have been introduced in other countries, by their respective Bishops.—Bombay Catholic Examiner.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 10.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, March 8, 1851.

PASTORAL INSTRUCTION FOR LENT, A. D. 1851.

TO THE FAITHFUL OF BENGAL.

PATRICK JOSEPH, by the Grace of God and the favor of the Holy Apostolic See, Archbishop of Edessa, Vicar Apostolic of Western Bengal, to the Faithful under his care, wishes Health and Benediction.

BELOVED BRETHREN IN JESUS CHRIST,

The solemn duty of exhorting you, to prepare the way of the Lord, during the holy Season of Lent, has again devolved upon us. We enter upon this duty, with joy and confidence—With joy, because of the blessed fruits, which have already resulted from the pastoral exertions of the Clergy, who labour among you—fruits, attested as well by the encreasing number of the Faithful, who devoutly approach the Holy Sacraments, as by that of the youth of both Sexes, who now happily resort to the several excellent Schools, which Divine Providence has enabled us to establish, for the purpose of imparting to them the benefits of education, and of instructing them in the sound faith and pure morality of the Holy Catholic Church.

The faithful co-operation, which you have hitherto afforded us, in our efforts to accomplish these great blessings, fills us with confidence, Beloved Brethren, that, encouraged by the distinguished success, which has rewarded your generous exertions in favor of religion and education, you will continue with a great heart, and a willing mind, to assist us, in diffusing still more widely, among the poor of our Communion in this Vicariate, the same inestimable advantages, in which the Catholics of Calcutta so largely participate.

These advantages have been attained here, chiefly by the co-operation of those among our Community, who, though free from the pressure of poverty, depend upon their own honest industry and exertions for a competent subsistence. For, but few, very few of the wealthy among our Brethren, assisted in acquiring them—on the contrary, for the most part, they ordinarily remained, almost unconcerned spectators of the generous sacrifices, so perseveringly made by their humbler Fellow Catholics, as if the success or non-success of the grand enterprize we had engaged in, was to them a matter of indifference. What has happened here my Brethren in this way, is not of unfrequent occurrence, in other Countries. With hardly an exception, it will be found, that God chooses every where, from among the humbler and the less affluent, those who are to be his instruments, in raising up to his honor, temples of Divine Worship, and Institutions to provide for the moral, the educational, and the temporal wants of the destitute of every age and sex.

This being so, my Brethren, it is of the greatest moment towards the permanency and further diffusion of the Charitable and Educational Establishments, which have happily grown up amongst us, that, next to our reliance on the same benign Providence, which has hitherto prospered our exertions, we should hope for success, only from the cordial, unanimous and persevering co-operation of those classes of our Brethren, to whose zeal and charity we are mainly indebted, for the blessings, which, these Establishments confer so abundantly on our Community.

I need, not I trust, my Brethren, remind you, that it would be a just subject of reproach to us, to allow the burden of upholding the good work, which has been begun, to fall exclusively on those excellent persons who, have hitherto sustained it, by the exercise of a generosity, which whilst it fully accorded with their own noble disinterestedness, exceeded, perhaps, the limits, which worldly wisdom would have dictated to them.

In the success and permanency of our Institutions, every Member of our Community, whatever be his condition in life, is deeply interested. The rich are interested, not only because of the opportunity thus afforded to them, of obtaining a superior education for their own families, but also, because by means of our Orphanages, and Free Schools, numerous young Persons of both sexes will be trained up and qualified, to fill with credit to themselves and advantage to their Employers, the various subordinate offices of domestic and commercial life. The poor are still more concerned, because of the great benefits, which Parents of this class see conferred by them on their Children, and still more, because of the comfort they must receive, at the hour of death, from the assurance which these Institutions afford them, that their Children will find in them a Sacred Asylum, whose consecrated Guardians will wipe away the tears from the Orphan's eye and cherish him with an affection, as much exalted above that inspired by Natural feeling, as the Heavens are exalted above the Earth, or, as the enduring never failing Charity of the Gospel exceeds mere human foudness and love.

At the moment, in which we address you Beloved Brethren, nearly five hundred poor Children are receiving gratuitously in our several Institutions the blessings of a virtuous and useful education. Of this large number, about one hundred and fifty receive in our Orphanages, besides Education, a subsistence comfortable to a degree, which if equalled, is certainly not surpassed in any of the endowed Free Schools of this city. The truth of this statement has been so often confirmed by the testimony of Visitors of the first respectability, and of different religious persuasions, that merely to advert to it here, will suffice for our present purpose. Is it not for us, My Brethren, a just subject of honourable pride and exultation, that, Poor as our Community is, compared with every other denomination of Christians in Calcutta, unaided as it almost is by the Rich belonging to it, slighted and as it were ignored, as it is by Government, in all that regards the care of its religious and educational wants, and despoiled, as it has been, by bigotry, of any share, in the control of the chief charitable funds of this City, the bequests of Catholics and designed without doubt, primarily, for the temporal and spiritual succour of their indigent fellow citizens of the same Faith,—Yet notwithstanding, in spite of all these appalling difficulties, our Orphanages and Schools are a theme of admiration and edification to our separated Brethren, and from time to time, receive from many of their most respected associates in Religion, the tribute of the highest commendation, and sometimes too, the kind aid of pecuniary assistance.

But, whence, it may be asked, does this gratifying state of things arise? Are there not to be found here similar and infinitely better endowed Establishments among our separated Brethren? Unquestionably there are —but, reflect, for an instant, I pray you, My Brethren, on the vastly different spirit, which must ordinarily animate the conductors of these several Institutions? Without intending to disparage the zeal or the ability of the Functionaries, immediately charged with the direction of the Protestant Institutions now referred to, yet, it is evident, that engaged as they either generally are, or about to engage in the anxious concerns inseparable from the Matrimonial state, their hearts, truth itself declares, must be divided, they must be solicitous the Wife how to please her Husband and the Husband his Wife. —They must be naturally solicitous for their own worldly advancement, in order to be able to provide for the settlement of their children, and their anxiety on this point, must oftentimes oppress them with sorrow, and unfit them for the calm and uninterrupted discharge of the numerous duties, annexed to the care of a public School. I pass over the other countless anxieties, which must engross the hearts of Parents, and which in proportion to their very goodness and the tenderness of their love for their offspring, must embarrass and disturb them, in the unceasing round of offices, which they have daily and hourly to fulfil towards those under their charge.

The admirable and holy discipline of the Catholic Church, by exempting the Ministers of her Sanctuary and the Inmates of her cloisters, from all these perplexing and corroding cares, enables them to devote soul and body, all their energies of mind and heart, wholly to the faithful discharge of such duties of Religion or education as may be entrusted to them, and the same wise discipline instructs them, to labour with fidelity, and cheerfulness in the humblest, as well as in the Highest offices of their respective vocations,—remembering that they labour, not for this World or its sordid wages, but for God, who has promised to reward for all Eternity, even a cup of cold water given in his Name, to the least of the little ones of Jesus Christ.

Behold, My Brethren, and reflect with gratitude to God, on the admirable disposition of his Providence, which, whilst it provides for the Children of the Faithful, in the Priesthood and in our religious Institutions, the most devoted and gifted Pastors and Instructors, yet by means of the same heavenly Economy, enables us in the midst of poverty, to impart to the little ones of our Beloved Flock an education, in no respect inferior to that, which the great wealth of our separated Brethren, plentifully aided as they are by Government, can secure for the Youth of their Persuasion.

Is it not then your duty, my Brethren, to show, that you duly appreciate the singular advantages conferred upon you and upon your Children by our Orphanages and Schools, by encouraging and assisting, according to your respective circumstances, these invaluable Institutions; in order, that, by your co-operation, the blessings they impart, may be more generally diffused among our Community, and that the Institutions themselves may be established on a sure and permanent foundation, for the benefit of future generations.

We have chosen to address you, my Brethren, on this important subject, at the approach of the Holy season of Lent, because we cherish the hope, that the pious exercises and instructions peculiar to that sacred solemnity, may dispose you, to consider more maturely your obligations, as Christians and especially as Catholic Parents, to co-operate with us in the great work, we have so earnestly recommended to your notice.

With the particular duties of prayer, fasting, alms-deeds, and the devout frequentation of the Sacraments—all peculiarly incumbent during the season, especially consecrated to the commemoration of the forty days and of the sufferings and death of Christ for our Redemption, you must be sufficiently familiar, by the unceasing instructions of your Pastors. On these points therefore, we need not now dwell, confident as we are, that your exemplary compliance in the ensuing Lent, with your obligations, will prove that the labour and zeal of your Pastors have not been expended in vain.

Remember, my Brethren, that during His stay on earth, the Saviour, on every occasion, exhibited a pre-eminent tenderness and love for children. It was of them he said, "suffer little Children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven". It was when speaking of them, he declared, that it were better for a man to have a Mill Stone fastened round his neck and be cast into the midst of the Sea, rather than scandalize the least of these little ones, for, added the Saviour, their angels always see the face of my Father who is in Heaven. If the presence of these blessed Spirits before the Most High, should terrify any one from scandalizing the little ones of Christ, surely the same presence ought to be a powerful incentive to the faithful, to exercise the works of mercy, corporal and spiritual in their behalf. If the angels report to God the injury done to them by scandal, assuredly they will, for they are Spirits of charity not of vengeance, with unspeakable joy, cause the heavenly throne to resound with supplications in favor of those, who have not only suffered little Children to come to Jesus, but have themselves conducted them to him, by providing for their spiritual and temporal welfare, and thus entitled themselves, to participate largely in the glorious benediction, promised by the Spirit of God in the Holy Scriptures. "They that instruct others into justice, shall shine as the Stars, throughout all Eternity."

In the words of the Apostle Paul, we beseech you, in conclusion, beloved brethren, by the mercy of God, that you present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, pleasing unto God, your reasonable service, and that you make use of the different gifts which you have received from the Divine grace, according to the rule of faith. Loving one another with the charity of brotherhood, with honor preventing one another. In carefulness not slothful; in spirit fervent, serving the Lord; rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; instant in prayer; communicating to the necessities of the Saints; pursuing hospitality; being of one mind, one towards another; not minding high things, but consenting to the humble; providing good things not only in the sight of God, but in the sight of all men.

The Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

Given at the Cathedral House, Calcutta this 1st day of March, A. D. 1851.

✠ P. J. Carew.

Archbishop of Edessa,
Vicar Apostolic of Western Bengal.

J. McCabe.

Secretary to the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic.

 Copies of this Pastoral and of the Regulations for Lent, 1851, are affixed to the Doors of all the Catholic Churches, Chapels &c. of Western Bengal.

A SERMON DELIVERED IN ST. GEORGE'S CATHOLIC CHURCH, SOUTHWARK, ON SUNDAY MORNING, AUGUST 11TH., 1850. BY THE RIGHT REV N WISEMAN, D.D. BISHOP OF MELIPOTAMUS, V. A. L.

"BUT HE, WILLING TO JUSTIFY HIMSELF, SAID TO JESUS,—AND WHO IS MY NEIGHBOUR?"—LUKE X. 29.

(Continued from our last.

Look at that venerable man, who bears upon his countenance the clear marks of high and noble birth and refined education: nay, in whose solemn and austere, but at the same time benignant countenance, you may suppose that you behold the venerable features of some sacred Pontiff. See him bending over the rough labour to which his hands have not been accustomed, breaking with feeble and aged hands the soil that is committed to his cultivation. Who is that? It is the venerable Paulinus, one of the noblest of Rome's sons, one of the most learned of her Bishops, a man respected and revered by the whole of Italy and Africa. And wherefore do we see him thus changed from his natural condition? Because he has given himself as a slave to the conqueror,—to the devastator of his diocese, concealing his dignity that he may purchase the freedom of his flock, that he may ransom them from slavery.

See in latter times the meek and cheerful St. Peter Nolasco, even giving himself up to bonds, that he may free the slave; the slave who at the time when the question was asked, "Who is my neighbour?" would not have been accepted by the wisest and best of men, as an object of kindness or of love. And wherefore? Because he has, in his love of his God and in his love of his Redeemer, truly read the lesson, that He became as man, and that He humbled Himself, and suffered it other that He might rescue man, the captive of Satan and of sin; and thinks that he cannot better copy Him, than by imitating, in regard to man, that very example of charity.

And who is that? A poor, and, outwardly, a mean looking person, who has not in his countenance a trait of great or noble achievements, who, a short time before, had been followed by crowds of children mocking him in the streets—who had been treated by the wise of this world as no better than insane, and had been chained up among those who were suffering from mental malady. And now see that magnificent hospital which has been raised in the Royal City. A fire has broken out there—it is full of patients, without power to move themselves. Every one shrinks from lending them assistance, and he, who unaided, and despised, has contrived—God only knows how—to erect this first magnificent building, that was founded to receive the sick, is to be seen there, running to and fro, fearless of the flames, and carrying one after the other to a place of safety, so that not the hair of the head of one is scorched. This is the ignoble John of God, as he was before man, but now glorified in the Church, and who, because he was an instrument of Divine Providence, to manifest, and to bring to that magnificence to which its development has arrived at, charity, which regards the sick, and the feeble, and the decrepid. And how has he learned this, that poor and bookless man? By loving God above all things—by loving man with an intensity of that love, which takes in the whole heart, and soul, and strength of man, and learning that the love of his God is to be again diffused in the form of charity—upon whom? Upon those that first love us? Upon those whose great qualities, whose virtues, and whose amiable gifts, render them worthy of our love? No: upon the Samaritan or the Jew, upon whoever is in distress, upon every one who needs our help—that great and universal charity, without any distinction of colour or of race. (To be continued.)

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE REASONS OF MY CONVERSION TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH. BY A LATE CLERGYMAN (REV. MR. NEWMAN) OF THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION. IN LETTERS TO A FRIEND. FIFTH EDITION. LONDON: JAMES BURNS. 1849.

LETTER II.

My Dear ——,

I said, at the conclusion of my last Letter to you, that I became convinced, that Anglicanism was not, in any sense, the distinctive and authoritative teaching of the Church of England. Let us now consider this point.

That only is the distinctive and characteristic teaching of a Church which is taught authoritatively by the Church. Whatever other doctrines may be held within the Church by individual teachers, are not doctrines of the Church. Authoritative doctrines must be expressly and explicitly taught as such by the Church as a Church. They must be her ordinary recognised teaching; and obligatory, at least, upon her clergy.

Now can this be said, in any degee, of Anglicanism? Any of the doctrines distinctive of Anglicanism—and which, if the English Church were what Anglicans say it is, would be and must be enforced, and to deny which would be the heresy—may be taught, or most positively contradicted, indifferently by any or all of her clergy, from the Archbishop to the Deacon. As matter of fact they are so denied by the majority of the Bishops, and also of the other clergy. The doctrines are denied, and the theory or view of the Church by which the doctrines are themselves proved to be Catholic is denied also, and the very opposites asserted. The question is not, whether the doctrines be true or not—whether they be Catholic, and whether they ought to be and must be held by the Church;—but are they the doctrines of the Church of England? are they taught authoritatively by her? If they are so, how can I ascertain or prove it? If I ask the Bishops, they say, No. If I ask the clergy of any one distinct parish or diocese, I think I may safely assert that four out of five will say, No. If I ask the Ecclesiastical Court, it says, No. If I ask the majority of the members of the English Church, they say, No. If I ask the Catholic world if such has ever been or is its impression of the Anglican Church, it says with one voice, No.

If I am referred to the Prayer-book as containing these doctrines in an explicit and authoritative shape, this is the very point in dispute. The Prayer-book is accepted on both sides as a common standard; its meaning is the thing disputed. The difficulty is to reconcile the Articles with the Liturgy—to decide what is the teaching of both taken together as one authority. It is a dispute whether the Articles interpret the Liturgy or the Liturgy the Articles, and what is the proper interpretation on either hypothesis. Who is to decide all this? It has never been decided; and until it is decided, can there possibly be said to be any authoritative teaching in the English Church?

But if the matter be referred to my own judgment, then I must say I think that, on the whole, the evidence is very decidedly against Anglicans. I do not think that on any one point have they the documentary evidence clear in their favour, except on the one subject of Baptismal Regeneration; and even that has to struggle with very much that is also authoritative, and which militates against it. On every other point I think it literally impossible that any person or persons, thinking as Anglicans think, could have compiled, sanctioned, or tolerated the composition of such documents as those to which they appeal for proof that their opinions and theory are those of the Church of England. Observe, in order to prove his point, an Anglican must not only shew that his doctrines are true and Catholic—that they may be found, traces of them at least, scattered here and there—that he is permitted to teach them, and that many great divines and bishops of his Church have taught them;—but he must prove that they are the authoritative doctrines of his Church. If he only appeals to the rational evidence of the doctrines themselves and their confirmation in Scripture, this is Protestant ground. If he comes to me with his Prayer-book and Bible—still, these are but books, and he their interpreter, and I may dispute with him for ever. If he appeals to facts, facts are all against him. The majority of the present day are against him both as to the truth and as to the authoritativeness of the doctrines; the majority of the Church of England, taken at any one time since the Reformation, would be against him. Some divines have, indeed, taught one or more of his doctrines at almost all times; but many of these even have denied others of his Catholic list. Anglicanism as a theory, as a complete set of doctrines viewed in one, as a faith or creed, is absolutely a novelty. Some divines may have held some of the doctrines; but how many have held all? And how many have held all on the Anglican theory, and held that theory and those doctrines to be the distinctive authoritative teaching of the Church of England as such? And yet, even if this could be proved (which I utterly deny), it would fall short of any thing like the necessary proof, so long as the doctrines, the theory, and the claims of authority, had all along been denied by the majority of their own body and class, and had never for one single year been simply and naturally acted upon by the Church.

I beg you particularly to observe, that Anglicans profess to hold, and to urge on others, their doctrines, on authority,—on the authority of the Church as their Church. If they have not this, their whole theory falls to pieces; their doctrines are mere opinions matters of private judgment; nay, they are condemned by their own theory, because they have asserted the necessity of Church authority, they have proclaimed the insufficiency of private judgment; and they have not the one, and are forced upon the other. The Catholic faith, and dogmatic teaching of the Catholic faith, are, on the Anglican theory, essentials of a Church. That the faith, as understood by Anglicans, as taught dogmatically by the English Church, is believed only by themselves; the whole world beside themselves, the majority of their own communion, all the sects, and all the Catholic world, had never heard of such a thing, refused to believe it, condemned it, or ridiculed it; and yet are there found men gravely declaring that, notwithstanding all this, though no one knew it, or knows it, or believes it, but a comparative few, that Anglicanism is the authoritative and distinctive teaching of the English Church! May I not stand excused, then, my dear Friend, if, on consideration of all these circumstances, and many more which I cannot particularise or express, I came to the conclusion that I had been deceived or deluded, or had deluded myself, in asserting the positive authority of the English Church for Anglicanism in its doctrines and theory? I became convinced that we were only a sect or party within the Church, trying to impose our views upon the Church, urging them in an open field with much skill and energy, but certainly not learning them from, or supported in them by, the body corporate of which we were ministers. That is, in fact, while speaking in the name of a Church, and professing the necessity of Church authority and Church guidance, I found myself without a Church at all.

In this dilemma I held fast to my doctrines and my principles. I could not part with or disbelieve them; but, alas, I was obliged in honesty to acknowledge that I had no Church, no living Church, as a living guide to whom I could point and say, She taught me these doctrines; She is my witness and my authority. I could point to individuals and to books, but not to a Church. But it was a Church I wanted most; a Church was at the bottom of my whole theory; the foundation being knocked away, all fell to the ground. I must either give up my doctrines, or give up the idea of a Church, or give up the English Church. I determined, after some hesitation, to do the latter. I was as much convinced that the idea of the Church, as an essential part of Christianity, was true, and that the general outline and main doctrines of the Catholic faith were true, as I am now convinced that the English Church does not correspond to that idea or teach those doctrines.

Many arguments were used to dissuade me from this conclusion. I was told that the English Church held the true rule of faith, Scripture and tradition; and that therefore we might hold all the doctrines proved by this rule. But what avails a rule, if we have not a ruler? What avails it to have a standard, if we have not a judge and interpreter? I might as well say that I have the Bible, and all truth is contained in the Bible; and therefore I may hold that all is contained there. True; but the Bible needs an interpreter, it is said. And do not the Bible and tradition need an interpreter as well as the Bible alone? If the one is obscure, is the other plainer to an individual man? If the one is difficult, is the other easier? If the one rule is insufficient because it is a dead letter, does not the other too require a living voice? When will Anglicans perceive and admit, that no rule of faith, however accurate, is adequate to the wants of our case; but a living Church, speaking now, speaking to us, and interpreting the rule for us? This is the great fallacy of Anglicanism; it puts a rule in the place of a guide—a dead and past Church in the place of a present and living Church.

If it was said that the English Church did interpret this rule for us, I had only to say all that I have said above in disproof of any such authoritative interpretation as can alone satisfy the necessity of the case.

Dr. Pusey says, in a letter I have seen from himself: "The English Church does in her Liturgy, including the Creeds, teach definitely the deposit of the faith, so that any devout mind which used the Liturgy would, by God's grace, be guided into truth." But the fact is, that Dr. Pusey disagrees materially and essentially from numbers of his brethren and superiors in the Church of England as to what this deposit is. They positively contradict one another flatly, and he is in the minority. Will he deny this? or will he answer, that they cannot have used the Liturgy with "devout minds?" Is not this assertion of the "definite teaching" of the Prayer-book a reckless contradiction of facts, or an insinuation of want of sincerity and piety in those who differ from him? I know men whose piety I can no more doubt than I can that of Dr. Pusey, and whose character and sincerity I esteem as much, who seriously hold the very contradictions of Dr. P.'s opinions as taught by the Prayer-book. What, then, becomes of this assertion?

I was told also to "wait," and that Catholic doctrines would spread—they would become the recognised teaching of the Church. But I myself saw no prospect of this. I was fully persuaded in my own mind that Anglicans must either cease to be Anglicans, and become something else,—mere Protestants, indifferentists, or Catholics; or that they must sink into an ineffective neglected sect, a proved failure. But again I answered;—if we could, by our energy, spread Anglicanism all over the Church, this would not make it authoritative or permanent; the other theory might at any time be revived, and Anglicanism demolished, just as we see has been the case in many particular parishes. It is not what we may be able to effect or produce, but what is the authoritative teaching of the English Church, that is the question. Is there any? and is it Anglicanism? As I have said, my conviction is stronger than I am able to express, that there is no authoritative teaching in the English Church; since any one may teach or deny as he will, and as often as he will, any one of several doctrines considered by all to be either essentially false, or vitally necessary; and that if there be any authoritative teaching, it certainly is not Anglicanism.

So much, then, for Anglicanism being the authoritative or even authorised teaching of the Church of England. I must reserve for another Letter the consideration of the case of the English Church, even on the supposition that Anglicanism is its authorised and authoritative teaching.

(To be continued.)

FLOWERS OF HEAVEN.

Connexion between Religion and Morality.

CHAPTER XIII.

MODERATION.

(Continued from our last.)

When the Gospel was at length triumphant, and the pagan idols had given place to the true God, luxury laid aside its former timidity, and in the churches were seen women, dressed in garments of gold and silk, adorned with diamonds, and carrying on their ears as St. John Chrysostom says, the means of supporting thousands of the poor. These women slept on beds of massive silver, incrusted with gold; and walked, as Seneca remarked in the time of Nero, on mosaics of precious stones, where the rays of the sun dimmed by the lofty windows of variously painted glass, fell fantastically on walks, wainscotted with ivory, or on a group of brass or marble statues. This magnificence was not easily reconciled with the spirit of Christianity: and was accordingly decried by the sacred orators of that epoch, so fervent and so beautiful, albeit these shades of vanity.

"This is what the Lord says to the daughters of Sion, who are ladies and princesses," says St. John Chrysostom, applying to the women of Antioch the prophetic words of Isaias:—"'Because the daughters of Sion are haughty, and have walked with stretched-out necks, and wanton glances of their eyes, and made a noise as they walked with their feet, and moved in a set pace, the Lord will make bald the crown of the head of the daughters of Sion, and the Lord will discover their hair.'"*—The evangelical orator adds:—"your attachment to these vanities renders you so unwilling to give alms. It is now very rare to find a woman, who would wish to deprive herself of a gold chain, or diamond, to relieve the poor; and how, indeed, could she renounce the least of these ornaments in order to assist the wretched, when she herself would suffer any thing rather than part with them? How do you dare, women! to violate the sanctity of our temples, by making them the theatres of your extravagance? Do you not see that it exasperates the hunger of the poor, whose nakedness and destitution cry for vengeance against your rich clothing? How can you kiss the feet of Jesus,—of him who vouchsafed to be born in a stable, while you are arrayed in ornaments which insult him, and are destitute of those which are dear to his heart? Every woman who wishes to approach Christ must adorn herself with virtues, not jewels."†

This sacred eloquence dissolved the fetters with which vanity had for a time shrouded the Christian heart; and on returning from these celebrated homilies, many a patrician lady might have been seen distributing her ornaments to the poor she met with on her way;—sometimes even, abandoning all things to attach herself to Jesus Christ, she exchanged her gold tissued cloth for the dark coarse stuff worn by the humblest Christians, and transformed her gorgeous palace into an hospital for the sick. Paula and Melella did this.

These victories gained over the worldly pomp of the Christian females of the first centuries, were reproduced, from time to time, in the middle ages. St. Bathilda, queen of France, one day appeared in public, with garments covered with ermine and embroidery; she was observed by a Religious, who looked disapprovingly at her as she passed. "Father," said Bathilda, who had caused him to approach to her, "does this magnificence displease you?—But what can I do: I am queen, and must resign myself to my lot."—"These gold-covered garments," replied the monk, "weigh you down too much to the earth; you must have lighter clothing to ascend to heaven."—

* Isaias iii. 16, 17.
† Serm. 79.

"He is right," said Bathilda with a sigh; and on the following day, she put on the woollen garment of penance!

How these triumphs of moderation over extravagance are far removed from our manners!

(To be continued.)

Selections.

PASTORAL LETTER OF CARDINAL WISEMAN.

To the Clergy and faithful of the archdiocese of London and Diocese of Southwark Nicholas, by the Divine Mercy, of the Holy Roman Church, by the title of St. Pudentiana, Cardinal Priest, Archbishop of Westminster, and Administrator Apostolic of the Diocese of Southwark.

To our Dearly Beloved in Christ, the Clergy Secular and the Faithful of the said Archdiocese and diocese.

Health and Benediction in the Lord.—If this day we greet you under a new title, it is not, dearly beloved, with an altered affection. If in words we seem to divide those who till now have formed, under our rule, a single flock, our heart is as undivided as ever in your regard. For now truly do we feel closely bound to you by new and stronger ties of charity; now do we embrace you in our Lord Christ Jesus, with more tender emotions of paternal love; now doth our soul yearn, and our mouth is open to you—(2 Cor. vi. 2)—though words must fail to express what we feel on being once again permitted to address you. For if our parting was in sorrow, and we durst not hope that we should again face to face behold you, our beloved flock; so much the greater is now our consolation and our joy, when we find ourselves, not so much permitted, as commissioned, to return to you, by the Supreme Ruler of the Church of Christ.

But how can we for one moment indulge, in selfish feelings, when, through that loving Father's generous and wise counsels, the greatest of blessings has just been bestowed upon our country, by the restoration of its true Catholic hierarchial government, in communion with the See of Peter?

For on the twenty-ninth day of last month, on the Feast of the Archangel St. Michael Prince of the Heavenly Host, his Holiness Pope Pius IX., was graciously pleased to issue his letters Apostolic, under the Fisherman's Ring, conceived in terms of great weight and dignity, wherein he substituted, for the eight Apostolic Vicariates heretofore existing, one Archiepiscopal or Metropolitan and 12 Episcopal sees; repealing at the same time, and annulling, all dispositions and enactments made for England by the Holy See, with reference to its late form of ecclesiastical Government. And by a Brief, dated the same day, his Holiness was further pleased to appoint us, though most unworthy, to the Archiepiscopal see of Westminster, established by the above mentioned letters Apostolic, giving us at the same time the Administration of the Episcopal see of Southwark. So that, at present, and till such time as the Holy See shall think fit otherwise to provide, we govern and shall continue to govern, the counties of Middlesex, Hertford, and Essex, as Ordinary thereof, and those of Surrey, Sussex, Kent, Berkshire, and Hampshire, with the islands annexed, as administrator with Ordinary jurisdiction.

Further we have to announce to you, dearly beloved in Christ, that as if still further to add solemnity and honor before the church to his noble act of Apostolical authority, and to give an additional mark of paternal benevolence towards the Catholics of England, his Holiness was pleased to raise us, in the Private Consistory of Monday, the 30 h Sentember, to the rank of Cardinal priest of the Holy Roman Catholic church. And on the Thursday next ensuing, being the third day of this month of October, in public consistory, he delivered to us the insignia of this dignity the Cardinal's Hat; assigning us afterwards for our title in the private consistory which we attended, the church of St. Pudentiana, in which St. Peter is ungroundedly believed to have enjoyed the hospitality of the noble and partly British family of the senator Pudens. In that same consistory we were enabled ourselves to ask for the Archiepiscopal Pallium, for our new see of Westminster, and this day we have been invested by the hands of the supreme Pastor and Pontiff himself, with this badge of metropolitan jurisdiction.

The great work, then, is complete; what you have long desired and prayed for is granted. Your beloved country has received a place among the fair churches, which, normally constituted, form the splendid aggregate of Catholic communion: Catholic England has been restored to its orbit in the Ecclesiastical firmament, from which its light had long vanished, and begins now a new its course of regularly adjusted action round the centre of unity, the source of jurisdiction, of light, and of vigour. How wonderfully all this has been brought about—how clearly the Hand of God has been shown in every step we have not now leisure to relate, but we may hope soon, to recount to you by word of mouth. In the mean time we will content ourselves with assuring you, that, if the concordant voice of those venerable and most eminent councillors to whom the Holy See commits the regulation of Ecclesiastical affairs in missionary countries, if the overruling of every variety of interests and designs, to the rendering of this measure abroad necessary,—if the earnest prayers of the Holy Pontiff and his most sacred oblation of the Divine Sacrifice, added to his own deep and sedulous reflection can form to the Catholic heart an earnest of heavenly direction, an assurance that the Spirit of truth, who guides the church, has here inspired its Supreme Head, we cannot desire stronger or more convincing evidence that this most important measure is from God, has His sanction and blessing, and will consequently prosper.

Then truly is this day to us a day of joy and exaltation of spirit, the crowning day of long hopes, and the opening day of bright prospects. How must the Saints of our country, whether Roman or British, Saxon or Norman, look down from their seats of bliss, with beaming glance upon this new evidence of the Faith and Church which led them to glory, sympathising with those who have faithfully adhered to them through centuries of ill repute, for the truth's sake, and now reap the fruit of their patience and long suffering. And all those blessed martyrs of these latter ages, who have fought the battles of the Faith under such discouragement—who mourned, more than over their own fetters or their own pain, over the desolate ways of their own Zion and the departure of England's religious glory; oh! how must they bless God, who hath again visited His people—how take part in our joy, as they see the lamp of the temple again enkindled and rebrightening, as they behold the silver links of that chain which has connected their country with the See of Peter in its Vicarial Government, changed into burnished gold; not stronger or more closely knit, but more beautifully wrought and more brightly arrayed.

And in nothing will it be fairer or brighter than in this, that the glow of more love will be upon it. Whatever our sincere attachment and unflinching devotion to the Holy See till now, there is a new ingredient cast into these feelings; a warmer gratitude, a tenderer affection, a profounder admiration, a boundless and endless sense of obligation, for so new, so great, so sublime a gift, will be added to past sentiments of loyalty and fidelity to the supreme See of Peter Our venerable Pontiff has shown himself a true Shepherd, a true Father; and we cannot but express our gratitude to him in our most fervent language, in the language of prayer. For when we raise our voice, as is meet, in loud and fervent thanksgiving to the Almighty for the precious gifts bestowed upon our portion of Christ's vineyard, we will also implore choice blessings on Him who has been so signally the divine instrument in procuring it. We will pray that His rule over the Church may be prolonged to many years, for its welfare; that health and strength may be preserved to Him for the discharge of His arduous duties; that light and grace may be granted to Him proportioned to the sublimity of His office; and that consolations temporal and spiritual, may be poured out upon Him abundantly, in compensation for past sorrows and past ingratitude. And of these consolations may one of the most sweet to His paternal heart be the propagation of Holy Religion in our country, the advancement of His spiritual children there in true piety and devotion, and one ever increasing affection and attachment to the See of St. Peter. In order, therefore, that our thanksgiving may be made with all becoming solemnity, we hereby enjoin as follows:—

1. This our Pastoral Letter shall be publicly read in all the Churches and Chapels of the Archdiocese of Westminster and the Diocese of Southwark, on the Sunday after its being received.

2. On the following Sunday there shall be in every such Church or Chapel a solemn Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, at which shall be sung the Te Deum, with the usual versicle and prayers, with the prayer also Fidelium Deus Pastor et Rector, for the Pope.

3. The Collect Pro Gratiarum Actione, as Thanksgiving, and that for the Pope, shall be recited in the Mass of that day and for two days following.

4. Where Benediction is never given, the Te Deum with its prayers, shall be recited or sung after Mass, and the Collects above named shall be added as enjoined.

And at the same time earnestly entreating for ourselves also a place in your fervent prayers. We loving implore for you and bestow on you the Blessing of Almighty God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost—Amen.

Given out of the Flaminian Gate of Rome, this seventh day of October, in the year of our Lord MDCCCL.

(Signed) NICHOLAS,
Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster.
By command of His Eminence,
FRANCIS SEARLE, Secretary.

PASTORAL FROM THE ROMAN CATHOLIC PRIMATE.

(From the London Morning Chronicle, Dec. 9.)

The Tablet, in a second edition, has given the following resumé of a pamphlet preparing for publication, in the shape of a "Letter of his Grace the Lord Primate to the Clergy of the Archdiocese of Armagh." The subjects discussed in this manifesto are mixed education, the Queen's Colleges, the projected Roman Catholic University, and the letter of Lord John Russell on the "Papal Aggressions." According to the version of the Tablet, which is the only one yet available, no reference is made by Archbishop Cullen to the expected decision of the Pope on the questions of the Queen's Colleges, regarding which so serious a difference of opinion prevailed amongst the bishops at the Synod of Thurles, in September last. And the belief is gaining ground, on account of the long delay, that no unqualified condemnation of those institutions, amounting to a positive interdict as regards the attendance of the laity, is likely to emanate from Rome. Dr. Cullen is most earnest and energetic in his advocacy of a Roman Catholic university, which up to this time, has not received anything like the extent of support, in the form of contributions, which had been calculated upon. I now subjoin the Tablet analysis of that portion of the pastoral referring to the Queen's Colleges and Lord John Russell's letter:—

"His Grace next comes to the question of the Queen's Colleges. His Grace remarks, in opening the subject—'We have been several times asked, 'What has the Pope to do with the education of our people, or the establishment of our colleges?' No Catholic, who understands the nature or extent of the power of the successor of St. Peter, and of the Vicar of Jesus Christ upon earth, would ask such questions, or put in doubt his right to instruct Catholics, and direct them as to the system of education which they should adopt, as useful and beneficial, or which they should reject, as detrimental to the interests of the Catholic faith. He proceeds to quote the testimony of various holy fathers as to the spirit of the Catholic Church on this subject. Having, as we have seen, told the people of Ireland what they are to think of the decrees of the Synod of Thurles on the one hand, and of 'certain anonymous memorandums' on the other, the Primate goes on to show the actual evils that have arisen from the principles of mixed education on the Continent, and the results already showing themselves in the Queen's Colleges. Taking France first, he quotes the Nuncio's famous letter, the Pastoral of the Bishop of Viviers, and the late pamphlet of the Bishop of Langres, regarding which his Grace corrects the misconceptions conveyed in Sir R. Kane's address of October 25. The Primate rapidly passes in review the working of mixed education in Belgium, Germany, and America. He then comments, with great moderation, but overwhelming force, on the fact of the publication of an infidel work, dated from Queen's College, Cork, within a few weeks after its institution. 'If such things be done in the green wood, what,' asks the Primate, 'shall not be done in the dry? If these institutions, whilst they are yet green and tender, catch the unholy fire so quickly, how awful the flame they must emit when sufficiently seasoned by age for the action of the consuming element?' He shows that the fault is not merely in individuals, but that, as the prophetic wisdom of the Supreme Pontiff declared, they are intrinsically hostile to the faith. He then adverts to Lord John Russell's letter, and shows how it affects the question. This man has dared to talk of the 'mummeries of superstition' in connection with Catholicity. What, then, are we to expect of him as a guardian of Catholic education? Are we to place confidence in the teachers appointed by a man who avows his hatred and contempt for the Catholic Church? Let those who still doubt read over again Lord John's letter, and study it well. The Primate then recommends the noble undertaking of the Catholic University to the zeal and charity of the faithful, showing in a powerful manner, the dangers to which, in places of mixed or purely Protestant education, faith must necessarily be exposed by the heretical leaven infused in the works used in these institutions, in all the higher departments of human knowledge—ethics, political economy, history, metaphysics, and logic. The growth of a purer and sounder educational literature his Grace looks to as one of the noblest fruits to be hoped for from a Catholic university, combining at once all that is orthodox in religious teaching with all that is practically useful in the Provincial colleges. He exhorts us by the example of the splendid universities Catholic zeal has founded in the smallest European States—Belgium, Bavaria, and every little state in Italy, not to mention the great institutions which, in spite of all drawbacks, Ireland has already founded—Houses of the Presentation, of the Christian Brothers, of the Orders of Mercy and Charity, of the Foreign Mission at All Hallows, etc. The glorious work may then be achieved if we only set about it.

"The Primate concludes with some noble observations on the re-establishment of the hierarchy in England, remarking also with dignity on the attitude taken in this regard by Lord John Russell in the letter which the Premier has had such cause to repent."

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS ON PAPAL AGGRESSION.

(From the Weekly News, December 14.)

The daily press is unanimous in its approval of her Majesty's replies. Each journal, however, has its peculiar interpretation of the language employed, and that the unanimity must be of short duration. The Times, Herald and Post think that a pledge has been now given that the Crown will be advised to use its powers, executive and legislative, to vindicate its own rights and the constitution of the land from the encroachment of the Pope. The Times remarks that the exhortation contained in the reply to the University of Oxford to educate the youth entrusted to them in the truths of Holy Scripture, so as to be a bulwark to the Protestant faith, "is as marked a condemnation as the decorum of the occasion could admit of those Romanising teachers who profess shame at the Reformation, who avow their intention to unprotestantise the Church of England, and who regard the Bible as acquiring all its value from the imprimatur of an infallible Church." The Morning Chronicle rejoices inasmuch as nothing is said of penal enactments and the evident modification of No-Popery zeal on the part of the Premier.

"The only passage," we are told, "into which the Premier has succeeded in introducing objectionable phraseology is that portion of her Majesty's answer to the Oxford Address, in which she has been advised to refer to our Reformed Church, the Supreme government of which under God is by law confided to me"—a position which is erroneous so far as the legal supremacy of the Crown, in all causes concerning all subjects of the realm, is confused with a spiritual control over the English Church. The introduction of this subject is the more to be regretted, because it was wholly foreign to the subject-matter of the Address. Neither the Pope nor any other foreign prince or prelate has attempted any interference with the Reformed Church, for the purity of which her Majesty is so naturally solicitous.

The Daily News thinks that it is pretty certain now that we must have a reform in the Church. The royal replies "indicate an accord between the people and the sovereign that must result in something more than words and enthusiasm. Unless we have a thorough reform, "Lord J. Russell's letter would be worse than political insanity; it would be senseless bigotry."

"A thorough reform of the Church of England, we say, but not in a mere fiscal sense; not only in re-arrangement of its revenue; not only in a re-distribution of its parochial divisions; not only in an augmentation of its working clergy, and in a reduction of its episcopal pomp and revenues; not, in short, such a material reform as, three years ago, Mr. Horsman asked for and was denied by the Whig Government; even that would not now satisfy Lorn Ashley; for he, who then shrank from touching the fabric of the old building lest it should fall, now threatens it with destruction unless separated and cleansed from the mediæval weight that oppresses it. Greatly, as material, external reform was required, something more is now needed; for, at last, we have discovered that the Church, as it now exists in practice, is not the church which the Reformation founded in this land."

A singular letter signed "Carolus," one of of those who think "we have had enough and more than enough of anti-Papal agitation." appears in the Times, favoured with large type, and accompanied by a leading article of ambiguous comment. The general opinion is, that it proceeds from the pen of an "official," or has been put out from Printing-house-square, as a feeler; one or two orators at No-Popery meetings have declared the author to be a Roman Catholic in disguise! After so much has been said, "Carolus" wants to know what is to be done. "We cannot touch the Pope himself and we cannot unfrock his bishops. To wage war with the dioceses would be to fight the empty air; to put any restraint on the Roman Catholic clergy would be religious persecution; this all men eschew. Nothing that I know of remains nothing at least that is accessible, and tangible but to make a legislative attack on the episcopal titles either by an extension of the existing law, or the enactment of a new one. This would, indeed, be but a lame and impotent conclusion to an agitation which has shaken the isle from its propriety." Hence he thinks it is high time the subject should be allowed to drop, as he naturally regards with horror the prospect of a chronic state of religious discord and sectarian hatred.

SCENE IN A PUSEYITES CHURCH.

We copy the following from one of the Radical papers in Plymouth:—

On Christmas day we paid a visit to the district church of St. Stephen's Clowance street, Devonport. We had taken the precaution to drop a note-book into our pocket. After emerging into the street abovementioned, where this secluded church is situated, we observed in a dirty lamp a burner in the shape of a cross, fixed over the door as a sign of the entrance. Directly we entered we took a seat as near the pulpit as possible, and were glancing round at the smart things that met our eyes for they are placed there to be looked at, when we encountered the physiognomy of an old grey-headed man in spectacles, who said that, if we came there for the purpose of taking notes, it were better that we were absent. The next thing that attracted our attention was the meagre congregation; there being only twenty-six adults present, fifteen of whom were women. These included the male and female teachers of two or three schools, composed of a dozen children, or so, and these youngsters occupied the attention of the teachers in keeping them quiet. On the right and left, at the head of the chapel, were erected red screens, which were surmounted and ornamented with festoons of laurel. Within these screens were fitted reading-desks, and under them were ten boys, dressed in surplices with loose sleeves, who chaunted the whole of the responses. The branches of gas lights were hung with laurel, and bunches of evergreens were fastened to the side of the desks which the priests occupied. The officiating clergymen were the Rev. G. W. Proctor, incumbent, and his assistant, the Rev. Robert Heaviside. When the Nicene creed was being read, by Priest Heaviside, he faced towards the west, while Priest Proctor turned his back to the people, and looked against the wall. The bowings were without number, and the changing of places with the two clergymen just as numerous. The service having been gone through, Mr. Proctor, in his surplice, ascended the pulpit, and commenced his sermon, while we commenced taking notes, while so doing a thin spare man came and sat alongside of us, and pointing to the priest he desired us to look towards him. We complied with the strange request and we at once saw that his reverence had made a discovery. He eyed us most fiercely, and turning colourless, he discontinued his sermon, and amidst the full gaze of the congregation the following extraordinary colloquy took place:—Mr. Proctor (addressing our reporter, who sat very quietly in his seat): Sir, are you come here for the purpose of worshipping or not? Our reporter, was lost in astonishment at what he he heard, dropped his pencil, and looked round to see from whom this observation fell, but made no reply. Mr. Proctor: I see that you are writing? Reporter: I am. Mr. Proctor: Then do you think, sir, it is becoming for you to come into a place of worship and write on such a day as this? Reporter: I apprehend it is not unbecoming of me to put myself in possession of your sermon if I think proper. Mr. Proctor: What do you say? Reporter: I say, sir, that this is a public place of worship, and I can write if I choose. It so happens, sir, that I am a member of the Church of England, and I shall remain and write. Mr. Proctor: I desire that you will resist. It is annoying the congregation and this is a sacred place. The reporter then resumed his seat, all eyes being turned upon him, and he dotted the above conversation, his book resting upon down his knee. Mr. Proctor proceeded with his sermon, for a few seconds, and as we were making good the lost ground, he turned upon us again and said, 'You are still writing?' The Reporter bowed an assent. Mr. Proctor: Now, sir, I tell you in the face of God and this congregation, that if you do not desist, but continue to write, you are committing an offence, in the face of Almighty God. We were perfectly paralysed—our pencil refused to do its office—the leaves of the note book appeared as if unable to receive the cyphers—and our hands were not sufficiently strong to hold either.

The tawdry bombast at the close of this paragraph is quite worthy the writer, and his making a parade of his trade of a reporter in church. If there were any necessity for his reporting"—we do not see the slightest—the man might surely have done it privately, and without thus shocking the religious feeling of the congregation, or insulting the minister in the pulpit.—Exeter Paper.

THE CHURCH QUESTION STILL.

At Nothingham, a Major Coke thought proper to represent certain actual or supposed ritual peculiarities of which he disapproved as 'treason to the Church, and to the Queen.' 'To put down this treason' would, in his opinion, 'be no infringement of civil and religious liberty.' If civil and religious liberty consists merely in the right to maintain opinions which is not distasteful to any person, however narrow and bigoted, it is scarcely worth the boasting which has accompanied its supposed advance and establishment. Major Coke is by no means the first fanatic who has felt a monkish antipathy to doctrines of which he admits that he does not even understand the fallacies. 'The Tractarians had thrown a bridge over the gulf between Popery and Protestantism; and they had so skilfully disguised the dangers, that if a man once turned his eyes that way, he would find himself in another country before he was aware of it.' With the subject. But if dogmatists of his class were capable of reasoning on any question, we would respectfully suggest that ignorance and weakness, though a sufficient excuse for prudence and caution, furnish little ground for a pretension to guide others to the truth. After blustering about the 'treason' of suplices, and candles, the orthodox Major proceeded to prove his strict anglican orthodoxy by a sneer at the Prayer-book, which was, of course, greeted with 'enthusiastic' cheers by a calm and enlightened audience. If such exhibitions fail to satisfy those more rational members of the Church of England, who have been led to join in the recent clamour, of the inexpedience of continuing it, they will only have themselves to blame for the sectarian attacks which they will encourage. Deprecating all admixture of theological controversies with politics, we are willing to hope that the interests of religious parties will lead them to withdraw from the field of agitation before it is too late. There is only one sectarian interest which can be promoted by opening our hustings and county halls to the raving of intolerant fanatics. The destruction of the Establishment would inevitably result from the accomplishment of the wishes which are uttered and applauded by those who claim a monopoly of attachment to the institution. The meeting of the county of Oxford is pre-eminently distinguished by the speech of an orator well known in Exeter-hall, who professes to be a Protestant, and describes himself as a barrister, and who, we presume, calls himself a gentleman. After a grocer of Oxford had fitly amused the meeting by some dull buffoonery, ending in a demand for the separation of Church and State, Mr. Rochefort Clarke proceeded to give a definition of the law, from which, by some inexplicable process, it resulted that he had said 'enough to hang Cardinal Wiseman.' As it is evident that, in his capacity of agitator, Mr. Clerke, is as indifferent to law as a correspondent of our own, who maintains, in the teeth of acts of Parliament, the right of Roman Catholic prelates to take their titles from Protestant sees, and of Protestant dignitaries to dispense with statutable oaths, we feel as little disposition to discuss legal points with the Protestant persecutor as with the more peaceable and harmless Roman Catholic zealot. But it is to be regretted that an English meeting can be found to tolerate, and an Englishman of decent station to utter, the vulgar, and offensive ribaldry with which the Exeter hall brawler proceeds to express the personal animosity into which all religious feeling is often curdled in the veins of sectarian agitators. 'It was alleged that Dr. Wiseman was born in Spain of Irish parents. He (Mr. Clarke) had known an Irish reaper come into the parish with his wife, and they dropped a child. Was that, he asked, the origin of Cardinal Wiseman?—seeing the way in which the confessional brings the Catholic priest into contact with the female portion of their communion, he thought it just possible that Dr. Wiseman might be a Spanish male.' We owe an apology to Cardinal Wiseman for reproducing—even for the purpose of expressing the universal disgust which it will excite—this malignant and contemptible issue of indecencies. But no description which we could have given of Mr. Rochefort Clarke's style of argument could so adequately have represented the degradation of mind and of feeling produced by the indulgence of the bad passions which find their vent on the more extravagant no-Popery platforms. It is incumbent on more conscientious and scrupulous controversialists to disconnect their cause, as speedily as possible, from the immoral virulence of language such as that which we have quoted. Professed religious politicians almost always lose all sense of religious restraint or obligation. It is satisfactory to find that the Protestant meeting in Ulster was but thinly attended. The Protestants, as more in earnest and more practically interested, have of late displayed natural and laudable caution. When one of the speakers at Belfast reminds the Minister that he cannot keep the Irish question apart from the English, he indicates at the same time the true position of the controversy, and the reason for abstaining from carrying it any further. In England we may amuse ourselves by a dilettante persecution of a minority. But Ireland will not consent to be left out of consideration, even if it were possible to distinguished between the two countries. Lord Clarendon cannot continue to administer the Government impartially, if his chief undertakes the conduct of a mere sectarian agitation.—Chronicle.

[illegible] never [illegible]

PROTESTANT MISSIONS IN CEYLON.

Extract from Sir James Emerson Tennent's, K. C. S. LL. D. recent work on Ceylon—with illustrations, Murray.

In 1802 the nominal Protestant christians amongst the Tamils of Jaffna were 136,000; in 1806 Buchanan, who then visited Ceylon, described the Protestant religion as extinct, the fine old churches in ruins, the clergy who had once ministered in them forgotten, and but one Hindoo catechist in charge of the province.

The defection among the nominal converts from Buddhism was equally sudden and sweeping; and those who continued to exhibit even an outward conformity to the reformed religion, practised along with it all the ceremonies of Buddhu; and had no higher idea of the new form of Christianity than was expressed by their designating it "The religion of the East India Company." To the present hour every district of the island abounds with these anomalous Christians, or as they describe themselves, "Baptised Buddhists," who profess equally both religions. They bring their children in crowds to be baptised by the Protestant clergy, because the registry of their baptism is legal evidence in the courts of law to establish succession to property. The whole of the details in this part of the work as well as the reasoning founded on them, seem to us highly curious and important.

Prodigious numbers of nominal Christians who have been thus enrolled, designate themselves "Christian Buddhists," or "Government Christians," and with scarcely an exception they are either heathens or sceptics. There are large districts in which it would be difficult to discover an unbaptised Singhalese, and yet in the midst of these the religion of Buddhu flourishes, and priests, and temples abound. The majority ostensibly profess Christianity, but support all the ceremonies of their own national idolatry, and more or less openly frequent the temples, and make votive offerings to the idol. The rest are alternately Christians or infidels, as occasion may render it expedient to appear; and in point of character and conduct they are notoriously the most abandoned and reckless class of the community.

Sir Emerson Tennent recounts an amusing illustration of this facility of conformity, which is by no means confined to the lower orders of the Singhalese.

A Singhalese chief came a short time since to the Principal of a Government seminary at Colombo, desirous to place his son as a pupil of the institution, and agreed, without an instant's hesitation, that the boy should conform to the discipline of the school, which requires the reading of the Scriptures and attendance at the hours of worship and prayer; accounting for his ready acquiescence by an assurance that he entertained an equal respect for the doctrines of Buddhism and Christianity. "But how can you" said the Principal, "with your superior education and intelligence, reconcile yourself thus to halt between two opinions, and submit to the inconsistency of professing an equal belief in two conflicting religions? "Do you see" replied the subtle chief laying his hand on the arm of the other, and directing his attention to a canoe, with a large spar as an outrigger, lashed alongside, in which a fisherman was just pushing off upon the lake, "do you see the style of these boats, in which our fisherman always put to sea, and that that spar is almost equivalent to a second canoe, which keeps the first from upsetting? It is precisely so with myself: I add on your religion to steady my own. because I consider Christianity a very safe outrigger to Buddhism.

THE WEEK ABROAD AND AT ROME.

Even the anti-Popish ferment, which has so long embroiled the land, begins to grow as flat as thrice-boiled water. The second part of the Bennett correspondence, in which Sir John Harrington and friends are trying to convince the adder-deaf Bishop of London that Mr. Bennett has not resigned, fails to pique the attention; and the mind is too tired to relish that other correspondence, in which the Bishop of Oxford fences with a worthy gentleman who accuses him of winking at Tractarian observances among his clergy. Perhaps the most fatal contribution to the disquisition is the reply of the Times to the Earl of St. Germans. The leading Journal volunteers to lift the Ministry off the horns of the dilemma in which it had been placed. Lord St. Germans had asked how you could enforce in England an Anti-Catholic policy, unless you were to enforce it in Ireland too, equally in defence of 'the United Church of England and Ireland;' but how could you enforce in Ireland a policy which would undo the work of the last twenty years? The Times pooh-poohs this defence to Ireland—'the spoilt child of the empire.' The journalist cannot understand how you are to slight the 'feeling of sixteen millions of English Protestants, for fear the feelings of one-half the number of Irish Catholics might be hurt;' or how you are to waive defending the Established Church in England and the English Protestants, lest you should weaken 'the ecclesiastical position of a small number of Irish Episcopalians,' and 'render in the least degree more precarious the tottering position of the unpeopled Establishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland, which is notoriously 'not the church of the Irish people.' We will not pause to scrutinise the confusion of the Established Church with 'the Protestants of England,' as if they were convertible terms. The argument of the Times amounts to this—that you must obey the feelings of the majority, even though you abandon 'the unpeopled Church' in Ireland, heedless of destroying the unity. Very good; but in that case, if you protect and freshly establish the Church of 'the majority in England, by a parity of reasoning you are bound to protect and establish the majority in Ireland. That would indeed be equality: if you sacrifice the small number of Episcopalians in Ireland,' perhaps you earn the right to sacrifice a small number of Romanists in England; but if you are bound to maintain and establish the Church of the majority in England, you are equally bound to maintain and establish the Church of the majority in Ireland. Such is the new horn upon which the Times sticks its protégés the Ministers.—Daily News.

CONVERSION TO THE CHURCH OF ROME.

The Liverpool Mercury of yesterday says:—'A Roman Catholic gentleman, resident in this town, yesterday received the following letter from a late clergyman of the church of England, who has just gone over to the church of Rome. If the intimation conveyed in the letter—that Cardinal Wiseman's acts are approved of by the Holy See—be correct, it would seem to negative the statement which has been published to the effect that negotiations were pending likely to lead to a withdrawal of the hierarchy from England:—

'January 1, 1851.

'Dear Sir,—This morning, along with Mr. Dodsworth another Anglican clergyman, a curate of Manning's—Mr. Serjeant Bellasis—and one or two more, received confirmation from the archbishop. The sacrament was administered in the cardinal's private chapel. A large and agreeable party sat down afterwards to breakfast, when the cardinal was gladdened with letters from Rome of the most cheering nature; everything approved of there. Knowing how pleased you will be, I write you a line with the good news of the happy conversion of two more English clergymen.'—Daily News.

NEW POLICE FORCE—SPIES ON THE CLERGY.

The following document was written by the incumbent of a large parish, in answer to a circular issued by 'the Committee of the National Club' and addressed to his church warden:—

I learn that a body of persons under the name of the National Club,' with the Duke of Manchester as their president, has lately been formed in London. A new ecclesiastical detective force is to be established. His grace's ambition is not of a high order; he aspires to descend, and has accepted the office of chief inspector of the new police. The objects of this society are—to issue pastoral letters to churchwardens, to invite the laity to become informers against the clergy, to give instructions how they are to be proceeded against to watch and control their opinions, to denounce the suspected, to try, judge, and condemn before their own dark tribunal. Against the principles and acts of this society I now protest, with that indignation which every person feels towards whatever bears the appearance of treachery. Such a society is a modern self-constituted Star Chamber, of intolerable tyranny and irresponsible power. I protest against this offensive intrusion and anti-Protestant aggression on the liberty and independence of my opinions, and to the best of my ability will resist this and all other inquisitions, whether English or Roman. Towards yourself I desire to express my respect and friendly sentiments, but, through you, my disrespect for this society, and my contempt for its authority.—Chronicle.

VERAPOLY.

Ecclesiastical Statistics of the Vicariate Apostolic of Verapoly, for the year 1850, not including the Vicariates of Quilon and Canara.

Roman Catholic Population ..	216,000
Of the Latin Rite	76,000
Of the Syrian Malabar Rite ..	140,000
Paschal Communions	163,000
Annual Confessions	176,000
Persons who received Confirmations.	3,380
Parochial Churches	136
Subordinate Chapels	192
Houses of Catechumens	3
Hospitals for both sexes	3
Catholic Free Schools	182
Converslons from Protestantism ..	24
Do. from Syro Nestorianism ..	563
Do. from Heathenism	1,417
Apostolic Missionaries	2
Native Priests of Latin Rite	58
Minor Clergy do. do.	48
Native Priests of Syro Malabar Rite	383
Minor Clergy do. do.	208
Seminaries for do. do.	16
Native Mission's Press.	1

During the year were promoted to the Holy Orders 39 Priests; 38 Deacons; 51 Subdeacons; 23 Acolothi; 16 Exorcists; 16 Lectores; 9 Ostiarii; and 41 Tonsures conferred.

Bishop Ap. Missionary; 21 N. Priests and 9 Minor Clergy.—Bombay Catholic Examiner.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 11.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, March 15, 1851.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

LENT, 1851, A. D.

1ST WEEK—1ST WEDNESDAY.

It affords us much pleasure to lay before our Readers an outline of the first Lenten Lecture, delivered at St. Thomas' Church, on last Wednesday by His Grace, the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic:—

The men of Ninive shall rise in judgment with this generation and shall condemn it: because they did penance at the preaching of Jonas, and behold a greater than Jonas here.

The Queen of the South shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: because she came from the ends of the earth to hear the Wisdom of Solomon, and behold a greater than Solomon here. Matt. Chap. 12, Verse 41, 42.

My Brethren, just before the Saviour had put in contrast the docility of the Ninivites, and of the Queen of the South, with the perverse obstinacy of the Jews, he, notwithstanding the meekness of his character and his compassion for sinners, openly reproached them as an evil and an adulterous generation.

In this way our Lord would intimate to us, the true origin of their obstinate incredulity, and of their hatred of Christ and of the holy doctrine which he taught.

If we examine into the causes, which oftentimes keep men, at the present day, either estranged from the true faith, or from a strict compliance with the moral injunctions of religion, we shall be frequently disposed to conclude, that their alienation arises from very similar principles to those, by which the Jews were actuated during our Saviour's Ministry. For, as in the natural order, the eye that is unsound shrinks from, and is irritated by the light of the sun, so too, in the moral order, when the conscience is bad, the guilty party is agitated and provoked both by the presence and the principles professed by one, whose life and conversation are an unceasing condemnation of every thing evil, and, at the same time, a splendid illustration of the beauty and grandeur of perfect virtue.

If, moreover, we consult experience, we shall find, that this perverse hostility and blindness, of which we now treat, are ordinarily exhibited with greater and more inveterate bitterness, by those, to whom God had vouchsafed light and grace in abundance, than by others, much less favored by Divine Providence. The truth of this allegation is clearly intimated by the Saviour, in the comparison, which he makes in this day's Gospel, 1st, between the Ninivites and the Jews, and next between the Queen of the South and the same people also. The men of Ninive, says the Saviour, did penance at the preaching of Jonas, and behold a greater than Jonas here.

The Ninivites were a Gentile people, strangers to those great truths of Religion, with which the Jews were familiar. The Almighty had never raised up among them, as he had among the Jews, a continued succession of Pontiffs, Prophets, and other holy and distinguished personages, to incite, by word and work, their fellow-Countrymen, to the worship of God and the practice of virtue. To the Ninivites, Jonas was an utter stranger and his first entrance among them was unaccompanied by the performance of any miracle, wrought for the purpose of satisfying them of the truth of his Mission. He even went among them reluctantly, and only because forced to do so by the almighty power and command. His Message to them was one of terror, and not one of encouragement and consolation. He neither possessed, nor affected to possess any prerogative of birth, power, learning or eloquence, which might impart weight and authority to his Ministry—and yet, notwithstanding the concurrence of all these untoward circumstances, the Ninivites, from the Monarch on his throne to the lowest of his subjects, listened with reverence and docility to Jonas, did penance at his preaching, were converted, from their evil ways, and obtained pardon from God.

The Jews, on the other hand, were a people, every page of whose history was interspersed with records of the wonders, which the Almighty had wrought amongst them for ages, in order to uphold religion, to reward virtue and to punish vice. In effect, they were a Nation who lived in the midst of wonders, and who beheld on every side vestiges and memorials, which unceasingly reminded them, that they were a chosen people, called by a special Providence, to be the depositaries of the true religion, and of the types, prophecies and ceremonies, ordained by God, to prepare the way for, and foreshadow the promised Messiah, the expectation of nations.

Such were a few of the distinguishing prerogatives and Characteristics of the Jewish people. Let us now advert to the circumstances, which attended upon the Saviour's appearance among them and their rejection of his Ministry. At the period of the Saviour's advent, the general impression prevailed among both the Jews and Samaritans, that the time for the coming of the Messiah had arrived. The answer of the Priests to the wise men from the East, and the conversation of the Samaritan woman with the Saviour at the well of Jacob, suffice to establish this assertion. The place too of the Saviour's birth, "Bethlehem," was acknowledged to be the locality, where the Prophets predicted, that the Saviour should be born. The tribe, moreover, to which the Saviour belonged, namely, the tribe of Juda, was that, from which all had agreed, that the Messiah was to spring.

The arrival of the wise men from the East, the testimony of the Shepherds who assisted at the Saviour's nativity and listened to the Heavenly anthem, entoned by angels at his birth, the very massacre of the innocents by which the prophecy of Isaias was accomplished, the glorious testimony of the Baptist in favor of Christ, and the voice from the heavens, which at the Saviour's Baptism proclaimed his Divinity, all these great and illustrious events, joined to the splendor of the miracles, which Christ wrought during his public Mission, and to the sublime sanctity of his doctrine and virtue, all these great and glorious events and circumstances, I repeat it, imparted to his ministry and Mission, a refulgence of evidence, which it is hard to conceive, that even Jewish perversity or incredulity could resist. And yet, notwithstanding this refulgence of testimony in his favor, it is a melancholy truth, that the Jews not only refused to recognise the Saviour as the promised Messiah, but, further more, that they never ceased to persecute him, until by their outrageous clamor "crucify him," "crucify him," they, in spite even of the remonstrances of a Pagan Judge, consigned him to an ignominious death on the gibbet of Calvary.

No Wonder, then, that the Saviour should have declared, that the Men of Ninive should rise in judgment and condemn the Jews, for having remained perversely impenitent and insensible to the preaching, the miracles and the example of a God-made-Man, whilst at the preaching of Jonas, a mere stranger among them, and unaccompanied by any of the wonders, which encompassed the Saviour's Ministry, they did penance, in sackcloth and ashes.

The Apostle St. Paul, in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, enumerating the evils perpetrated by the Jews and the punishments they incurred in consequence, adds these remarkable words, "Now all these things happened to them in figure and for our correction." In his Epistle to the Hebrews, the same Apostle says, "a man making void the Law of Moses dieth without any mercy, under two or three witnesses. How much more do you think he deserveth worse punishments who ..... hath offered an affront to the Spirit of Grace." If then the Ninivites will rise in judgment and condemn the Jews, may we not also fear much more, that they will rise in judgment for the condemnation of bad Catholics, who, whilst in words they profess to believe, yet in their conduct contradict the faith, which with their lips they confess. Is there not reason to fear, least the kingdom of God be taken from them, as it was from the Jews, and given to others who will bring forth good fruit. Better were it, says St. Peter, never to have known the way of truth, than after having known it, to turn back from that holy commandment.

LENTEN PASTORAL OF THE RIGHT REV. DR. OLLIFFE.

THOMAS, by the Grace of God, and favor of the Holy See, Bishop of Milene, Vicar Apostolic of Eastern Bengal, and Coadjutor to His Grace the Archbishop in Calcutta; to the Clergy and Laity of his Vicariate, Health and Benediction in the Lord.

DEARLY BELOVED IN CHRIST,

We are about entering on that sacred season, which the Apostles, imitating the example of their Divine Master, set apart as a time of annual penance for the double purpose of inculcating the necessity of corporal mortification, and of making due preparation for the grand anniversaries of our adorable Redeemer's Death and Resurrection. Yes, it is an incontestable fact, that Lent was first instituted by the Apostles, because it is so attested by St. Leo the Great, and the celebrated Scripturist St. Jerome, (not to mention other ancient Doctors), both of whom flourished about 1400 years ago. The former thus writes: "It was THE APOSTLES, who established Lent, by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost." (Serm. 9. de Jejun.) And the latter; Following the APOSTOLICAL INSTITUTION, we observe a fast of forty days." And elsewhere he mentions the conscientious obligation of doing so: The Montanists fast three Lents in the year; we fast only one. That they observe three, is a voluntary act; but we observe one, because WE ARE OBLIGED." (Ep. ad Marcel.) Can anything be clearer? Nor is it difficult to discover the motive that actuated the first chief Pastors of the Church in appointing a periodical Fast; because they had witnessed a Man-God undergoing a similar penance, when He retired into a desert, and not only diminished the usual quantity of his parsimonious diet, but abstained from food altogether for the same lengthy period of forty long days, as is now prescribed for your annual observance (Matt. 4, 2.). And in truth so strict was His fasting that the Holy Ghost thought proper to record, that "He was Anhungry" at the end of it. (Ibid.) It ought not therefore to be a matter of surprise, or regret to any Christian, to anybody namely, who professes himself a follower of the abstemious Redeemer, that the Church should still enforce the observance of a practice, which was first established by the Apostles, as being so perfectly conformable to the conduct of their Divine Master. This motive alone should suffice to induce every Christian to adopt it with alacrity, as the pupil is not superior to his Teacher, nor the servant to his Master. (Luke 6, 40.) Hence it is that several other Christian Churches, though for centuries separated from ours, have retained this Lenten institution, at least in theory, if not in practice. Thus the Greeks and Armenians, especially in Constantinople and the rest of the Turkish empire, are so notoriously austere in this point, as to appear injudicious and indiscreet, by not attempering their fasting observances to their natural capabilities. Thus even the Protestant Church of England still officially prescribes this quadragesimal fast in her "Prayer Book," though her practice renders such an ordinance a dead letter.—Such is the firm persuasion even of our separated Brethren, that Lent is an Apostolical Institution!

Besides this first motive, there is a second, intimately concerning yourselves, dearly Beloved, that should induce you diligently to observe it. That is the victory of your corrupt passions. For if a PAUL who had been elevated to the third Heaven, and admitted to an insight of the Divine councils (2 Cor. xii.) considered it necessary to mortify his flesh, and even "to chastise" it, in order to escape the danger of everlasting perdition (1. Cor. 9. 27.), how can you flatter yourselves that such a step is superfluous, if not superstitious, and that eternal salvation can be obtained in an easier manner? For recollect that St. Paul acted thus, not whilst he was a Jew, and a persecutor of Christianity, but after his conversion, after the Lord of Heaven had descended from His throne to rebuke and pardon him! After his divine election as an Apostle, after having been supernaturally instructed in the ways of salvation, he still thought his soul would be in danger, unless he subdued the rebellious appetites of his flesh by fasting and other corporal austerities! —And you, my Brethren, do you deem yourselves more secure than St. Paul? Have you less violent trials, are you subject to less severe temptations? And if such were possibly the case, have you received as many heavenly gifts, as many celestial revelations? Oh! no, my Brethren, if you have hitherto deed bodily penance superfluous, dismiss forward that delusion from your minds, ember that your souls, being encircled by corrupt flesh, are always influenced by its vicious impressions, and therefore that its subjugation is absolutely essential for their present security and ultimate salvation.

But besides these two powerful motives there is a third, far more noble and sublime that should impel you to practise both spiritual and corporal mortification. We say spiritual, as well as corporal, for the latter would be nugatory without the former; it would be rather hypocrisy than virtue. That third motive is the preparation you should make for the two above-mentioned glorious anniversaries. For how can you contemplate (as you will on Good Friday) your blessed Lord hanging upon a gibbet; between two robbers, as if the most atrocious of the three; crowned with thorns instead of gold, as if he were not a real Monarch; profusely bleeding from every pore, as if his virginal and innocent body had been the instrument of the most heinous crimes; how can you behold Him in such a pitiable plight, and this for your sins, without feeling compunction for them, and without punishing your flesh in imitation of His bodily sufferings? Oh! yes, rest assured that if you do so, you will be beautifully disposed for the celebration of the other anniversary of His admirable Resurrection; for as it is infallible, that nobody enter Heaven without a requisite that Christ be cross, because it was in order to re-on the himself should carry one, and as it is Enter His glory (Luke, 24, 26), your self equally certain that the greater the mortification shall have been here, ample shall be your reward hereafter (1 Cor. 9, 6.), so it conclusively follows, that the stronger your love of penance shall have been during Lent, the better will be your preparation for the grand Solemnity of your Redeemer's glorification; that is, for EASTER SUNDAY.

To come therefore to the precise method of observing Lent, you are aware that it is far more lenient here than in Catholic countries, and every where at present, much more so than it was in ancient times. One great difference between the ancient and modern modes of observance is, that the former did not permit any sustenance on a fast-day till sunset, while the latter allows some in the morning, diminishing only its quantity. This very circumstance therefore should increase your strictness in the present observance, in proportion to the mitigation of the ancient severity. Flesh-meat being also permitted more frequently than anciently, in fact five days out of every seven, that also should augment your present exactness. For this purpose, be more frequent than usual in assisting at the awe-inspiring and propitiatory Sacrifice of the Altar; in visiting your divine Lord concealed thereon under the Sacramental veils; and in some daily devotion to His ever blessed Mother, such as the Rosary and Litany composed in Her honor; and rest assured that such devotions will be most acceptable to God, and beneficial to your own souls.

"Grace be with all them that love our Lord JESUS CHRIST in incorruption, Amen." (Eph. 6, 24.)

Given in Calcutta, on this 22d day of February, MDCCCLI.

✠ THOMAS,

Bishop, and Vicar Apostolic.

CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL.

ORDINATION IN THE LENT EMBER WEEK.

On Wednesday last the 12th Inst. the Rev. Mr. Stephenson, Deacon, was promoted to the Holy Order of Priesthood, at the Cathedral, by his Grace, the Archbishop, V. A. W. B.

Mr. Stephenson made his course of Studies for the Priesthood, in the Seminary of St. Vincent of Paul, Dublin, and after having received from His Grace, the Archbishop of Dublin, the order of Deacon, prepared, with the cordial approbation of His Superiors, to devote himself to the Catholic Mission of Western Bengal.

For the present, Rev. Mr. Stephenson is attached to the College of St. John, Park Street, in which Institution he has arranged, to deliver to the Senior Pupils a weekly Lecture on Mechanics—the weekly Lecture in Chemistry, remaining still in charge of the Rev. Mr. Kennedy, the Rector of the College.

On the same occasion, on which Rev. Mr. Stephenson was promoted to the Priesthood, an alumnus of St. John's College, Mr. M. Cornelius, received the Clerical Tonsure. This talented and promising young Ecclesiastic has gone through the ordinary course of Classics and Mathematics with great credit. He is at present engaged in the studies of Logic and Natural Philosophy. His remarkable proficiency, joined to his amiable and modest deportment encourage his Superiors to hope that he will be on a not distant day, a useful and distinguished Member of the Catholic Priesthood in Bengal: Mr. Cornelius is a Native of Calcutta.

A SERMON DELIVERED IN ST. GEORGE'S CATHOLIC CHURCH, SOUTHWARK, ON SUNDAY MORNING, AUGUST 11TH, 1850. BY THE RIGHT REV. N. WISEMAN, D.D. BISHOP OF MELIPOTAMUS, V. A. L.

"BUT HE, WILLING TO JUSTIFY HIMSELF, SAID TO JESUS,—AND WHO IS MY NEIGHBOUR?"—LUKE X. 29.

(Continued from our last.

Again, behold another simple-hearted, kind-featured old man, who is seated at the council board of his king, suggesting the wisest and the best measures for the government of a vast kingdom, at its very height of prosperity—a statesman and a general. Royalty itself listens with respect and veneration to every word he speaks. If you had gone forth early in the morning, you would have found him creeping through the silent city, covered with snow, and listening if he could hear the wail of a little one, abandoned by its unnatural parent, and you would have seen him take it into his arms, and carry it home with him, as though he had found a prize of matchless value; and, if you will follow him in the evening, you will find him, not seated at the banquet table of his sovereign, at whose councils he has attended, but you will find him sitting on the same bench with the galley slave chained to the oar, and you will find him whispering to him words of consolation, and bidding him be of good cheer, and reminding him of his Saviour, a prisoner for his sake, and encouraging him to love God, and to love those who were the cause of his misfortunes.

And what is this virtue which made the venerable St. Vincent de Paul that which he is in the love and estimation of the whole world? It is a knowledge of who was his neighbour; it is that charity which, learned again from the love of God, made him feel that there was no exception to the law of its action,—which embraced equally the object of human justice, and the innocent victim of human injustice, and which, (though it may appear a fable, is nevertheless a truth), extended itself from the infant, and from the culprit, even to the king, and made the saint not shrink from giving up his time to what it may be supposed a devout ascetic like him might have thought but a waste of what he had devoted to holier pursuits. This is the charity of the church; and see what must have been the effect of a feeling like this, which from the beginning of the church has been in its very heart; what must have been its influence upon society, and upon all those measures which have brought nations into their present condition? Can we imagine, my brethren, the state of ancient Rome, for instance, the city of palaces, the city of magnificence and grandeur on every side, where the wealth of the whole earth poured in, and was lavishly spent and displayed, where there were no limits to the enjoyment of luxury, and where, consequently—for this is a necessary consequence—crowds, multitudes of poor, must have flocked, armies of dependants must have worn out their lives; and yet, not a single charitable institution, not an hospital, not a word in the language for almsdeeds; not, in fact, the word charity, which is so familiar to our hearts, and which has no corresponding term in the rich vocabulary of ancient Rome? What became of those poor men and women, when they at last reached the years of infirmity, and when the failing vision, and the fainting step, enabled them no longer to earn their bread? What became of that host of slaves, who had been pampered in luxury by their masters, so long as they were useful; but who were flung away when they could no longer minister to their pleasures and desires? What became of that mass of proletarianism, which must have festered in ancient Rome? where not a hand was stretched out to relieve or assist, and where the claims of different castes were unknown? Oh! it is fearful to think in what frightful ways they made their ends;—how many snatched themselves, by their own acts, from a life of misery;—how many vanished under the compassionate assassination of their own friends;—and how many, when pestilence, or any infliction, visited that city, died in masses, and were put aside, and forgotten? Can we imagine a stronger contrast between the modern times and the ancient than this, that there should be a feeling in society which makes it acknowledge claims of poverty, of sickness and distr upon those who are themselves exempt from those evils? Sweep away at once all our institutions, and all our ideas and principles relating to this important matter, and we should soon see the whole of our social fabric crumble, and sink as rapidly as did that vast empire. But this shows how the principle laid down by our blessed Redeemer, had its action within that sphere that came within reach of each one's sensibilities breaking down in every instance those distinctions which the answer of our blessed Redeemer was intended to remove; but it would be a small portion of that charity which Christ bequeathed to His church. Turn your eyes, then, once more towards that city to which I have just now alluded, and there, upon the brow of one of her venerable hills, you see standing yet the edifice to which I wish to direct your attention. You see issuing forth from its portals a procession of holy men, clad in the monastic habit, bearing in their countenances deep marks of the painful thought which their present work has excited in them. They are men who have left the world, because they feared it, who had scarcely for years ventured beyond the threshold of that religious house which had been their home. They knew nothing of foreign travel, or of foreign tongues, in the days when scarcely the more powerful, the more rich, ventured far beyond the limits of Roman civilisation. And whither are those men going? and for what cause? They are going to an island in the northern seas, in which it has been announced, that there is a new race, a new people who had taken possession of the land, and who are still immersed in the darkness of heathenism. And what has excited this extraordinary desire to go and visit this distant land? Some poor captives from that race have been bought in the slave market of Rome, and the sight of them has excited the pity and the tender sympathies of the great and holy Gregory; and he has commanded his choicest disciples, his dearest children, to tear themselves from that city, from their homes, round which were circled all their affections, and beyond which they knew nothing, to seek, they knew not how, that distant land, and endeavour to convert its inhabitants to Christianity. And what again is this, but that same charity which was not encountered by acquaintance, by knowledge, by familiarity, but was felt in regard to utter strangers, with whom there was no connexion? And why? Because God has loved, and did love the souls that were His, perishing; and because the Son of God had died for their sakes, as well as for those of Rome. They felt that this principle of charity, which broke down all social, and even natural distinctions between the families of men, [illegible] them forward, not prompting them merely, but compelling them as a duty to undertake this great and noble task. And this is the history of apostleship from the beginning till now. The boldest things which men have done, the greatest discoveries which have been undertaken, have had this great principle of charity as their root, have emanated from it, and have only been the mode of manifesting it.

Thus I ask, my brethren, why is this? Whence this desire, this yearning, this longing wish to bring others, who are estranged from what the Church teaches, to a participation of its doctrines, and its holy institutions. O! my brethren, to understand this fully, it would be necessary to enter more deeply than time will permit, into a consideration of another and a most solemn truth; but I will briefly unfold it, for it will be a key to the minds, perhaps, of many, of what too often is misunderstood, and misrepresented.

(To be continued.)

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE REASONS OF MY CONVERSION TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY A LATE CLERGYMAN (REV. MR NEWMAN) OF THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION. IN LETTERS TO A FRIEND. FIFTH EDITION. LONDON: JAMES BURNS, 1849.

LETTER III.

My Dear ——

In the Letter of Dr. Pusey, to which I before alluded, he says: "The English Church, having the apostolic succession, has the sacraments; and, being neither heretical nor schismatical, we have their grace." And again: "Having the succession, we are the Catholic Church in England."* But consider it for one moment attentively, and you will see that either this is no argument at all, but a simple assertion of the fact in dispute, or else it is, as even Anglicans must know and admit, a most unsound or at least insufficient one. The assertion inserted parenthetically on which the conclusion is built is, that the Church of England is "neither heretical nor schismatical." But this is the whole question —the very point at issue;— it is begging the question absolutely and entirely. Who could possibly dispute that if the Church of anything or anywhere be "neither heretical nor schismatical," it is the Church? Who could think of disputing such a thing? Why, the propositions are strictly equivalent. It is as if one should say, "the Church is the Church;" or, "if a Church is neither heretical nor schismatical, it is neither heretical nor schismatical." The question about the Church of England is, whether or not it be in heresy or schism. On this all turns: this is the point

* I consider myself at liberty to [illegible] use of words and of Dr. Pusey's name, as he has put the very same argument, with his name, in the newspaper. "My argument" (he says) "is of absolute certainty that we have the apostolic. This is a fact which can be proved in a manner. Since, then, the Church of England has this, and true faith 'once for all delivered to the saints,' nothing to impair her authority over us, have the sacraments, and whatever else saved."

to make out, not the assumption to argue from.

But the second proposition, taken by itself, is, that, "having the succession, we are the Catholic Church in this country." But this, as every Anglican must know, is a most unsound conclusion. It makes the simple fact of the succession decisive as to orthodoxy and unity, which is absurd. For on this supposition, no portion of the Church which has the succession can ever be heretical or schismatical. A Church having the succession might in this way set the world at defiance. It would be as true a proposition to say that, "once a true portion of the Church, always a true portion of the Church." No; however much is made of the (assumed) fact of the apostolic succession in the English Church, every one must see that the fact alone cannot decide the catholicity of the English Church. Granting it ever so true and certain, the question remains, "Is this succession held in heresy or schism?" Anglicans know well enough that the succession alone avails nothing for their argument. In common fairness, then, this should be avowed; and the fact should never be put forth as if it were an argument, or as if it supported their conclusion. I must say, that when once this has been noticed, any one who repeats the proposition, "We have the succession, therefore we are the Catholic Church in this country," is guilty of a very great unfairness. And I am sorry to say, I have known persons who would repeat it many times, and yet give it up every time as an argument when its fallacy was pointed out to them.

The real question, then, for Anglicans to decide is, whether the English Church be schismatical and heretical, or not; and to this question it avails nothing to answer, "We have the apostolic succession," unless it be maintained that a body having the succession cannot be heretical or schismatical, which every one knows is false and absurd.

Now, as to the question of schism. Is there, or is there not, a schism between the Churches of Rome and England? If not, I should like to know what schism is. I should like to know what does or could constitute a schism. I should like to know what amount of hostility and antagonism, what length of time, or absolute separation of all intercourse of every kind, what degree or intensity of condemnations and acts of mutual anathema and excommunication, would constitute a schism. For my own part, I must confess that I am utterly unable to conceive of any criterion or tests of schism which would not find their parallel in that state of things, call it what you will, that exists between the Roman and English Churches. If this be not schism, then I think it would baffle any one to make a schism.

It is not easy, as I have already shewn, to find out what the English Church teaches, teaches, and decrees. The source of her authoritative teaching, was my first point. But if there be any one point that might have been thought clear and decisive in her favour, if there be one opinion in which there seemed a concurrence of divines in her communion, it is, that Rome is,—something very bad indeed,—antichristian, apostate, heretical, schismatical, idolatrous, blasphemous, or at least corrupt, to the very verge of having utterly denied or falsified the Gospel committed to her charge. Since the rise of Anglicanism, however, this question has become less easy to decide. Now it seems an open and undecided question, whether Rome be antichristian or Catholic, whether it be an apostate Church or an elder, nay, even a better sister. This was more the case at the beginning of the "movement." Latterly, since the secession of so many clergy and others, feeling has turned again; and I am at a loss to understand the recent language and conduct of Dr. Pusey and others on any other supposition, than that they think Rome is in so corrupt a state, and her language and actions so bad, that it perils salvation for one not born in her (and so excusable from ignorance) to join her communion.* On the whole, I think the evidence even amongst Anglicans is in favour of Rome being at least schismatical; and there can be no doubt what all but Anglicans think on this subject; schismatical would be the softest word in their vocabulary.

On the other hand, there can be no sort of doubt what is the opinion and view of the Roman Church on the position and claims of the English Church. On this as on other points it is not easy to mistake her authoritative teaching. If she does not, in express words, condemn the English Church as such, she condemns all who hold the doctrines it holds, deny what it denies, and act as it acts. It may be assumed, then, I think, that there is a schism. The Church of Rome charges it on England. The Church of England denies it; and if she does not retort it in express words, the denial itself is a retort, since he who causes schism is schismatical.

But it may only be granted that there is a schism, that the Church of England is charged with its guilt, and that she denies it. How is her case to be judged? She is only a part of the Church at most. She must — [illegible] by that of which she is herself a part, in virtue of being which, she is what she is. She must be judged by her fellows and superiors in the Church of which she claims to be a member. But if so, she is condemned. The whole Western Church, with her Patriarch at its head, who is also the acknowledged Primate of the world, condemn her. Numbers, authority, prerogatives, are all against her. By the highest actual, if not the highest possible, earthly tribunal she is condemned. What more can be said in such a case? If a process be lodged against such a sentence, where can the appeal be carried? It has reached the very highest tribunal; how can it be carried higher? If she is not to be considered guilty, how can guilt be proved? If a protestation of innocence, were innocence, who could be proved guilty? If an accused party may acquit itself, what is the use of a trial, or laws, or a judge? It is ridiculous to say that the case has never been heard or decided. Will any one pretend that the case is not known to the Roman Church? Does any one think that there is one theologian of any eminence, one authority in the Roman Church, who ever has or could pronounce her innocent? Is there the least appearance that, after three hundred years, opinion is changed in her favour? On the contrary, is not the reverse the case? are not even her own, and some of her admitted best theologians giving up her case? What more is wanted? The conclusion is inevitable: [illegible] can be schism, there is schism between [illegible] and England. If schism can be proved against one party, the Church of England is the guilty party.[*]

* Dr. Wordsworth, in his recent work, puts such strong things against the Roman Church as any I have ever read; and Dr. Wordsworth's work has been circulated and recommended by the highest of high Churchmen.

Anglicans say they make their appeal to Antiquity, to the Church Catholic before the separation of East and West. This leads me to repeat the observation I have already made, on the great fundamental fallacy of Anglicans in substituting the dead for the living Church. The Church is the judge of controversies.—THE LIVING CHURCH. If there be no living judge of controversies, there is no living Church. If there be a present living Church on earth, it is the actual living judge and the present ultimate court of appeal on all controversies. To appeal to scripture, to tradition, to the early Church, to the consent of the Fathers, to the Church before the division of East and West, against the living Church, is to appeal from the judge to the laws. It is to appeal to the past against our guide to the past. It is to give up the fact or the function of a living Church. This is what Anglicans do. If they may appeal to the past against the present Church, why may not any of themselves appeal to the past against the present English Church? If they may appeal to tradition against the guide to tradition, why may not any of themselves appeal to Scripture against the interpreter of Scripture? If because Scripture and tradition is the rule of faith to the Church, they may apply that rule for themselves why may not any of themselves appeal to the Bible against the teaching of the English Church, because the English Church says that "it is not lawful for the Church to ordain any thing contrary to God's word written?" This is what the Rev. Mr. Head of the Diocese of Exeter actually did; this is precisely the plea he urged for himself when accused of teaching contrary to the formularies of the Church of England: he urged the standard against the judge, the rule against the interpreter. And this is precisely what Anglicans do in the parallel case.

And is this what is to come of all the high and stirring teaching, the consoling vision of the Church visible and present as our guide to the faith? Is this what it is to evaporate into? Is this the practical issue of this great movement? Christianity is what the Catholic says it is; the Catholic faith is that which the Church Catholic holds. But what is that? It is what antiquity held. But what is that? It is the consent of Fathers. But what is that? Are we any nearer to a definite authoritative faith? Is it not vaguer and vaguer still, unless we have a living guide? Is Dr. Pusey that guide? Is Mr. Allies that guide? Is the Church of England that guide? Or is the Catholic Church that guide [illegible] present Church? Is [illegible] a judge of [illegible] Any theory which remits controversies to the judgment of antiquity, which appeals to no present authority, denies the existence of the Church. It asserts or implies that Christ's promises have failed, that the Church has erred, that in matters of highest importance it has gone wrong. If our National Church (so to speak) may appeal from the present to the past, why may not any other portion of the Church? According to this theory, any number of Bishops, of any province, have only to protest and appeal to antiquity, and to assert their own orthodoxy and Catholicity, to profess their innocence, and their readiness to abide by the decision of the "undivided early Church," and they cannot be proved to be, heretical or schismatical. Is not this a reductio ad absurdum? There is no Church but one, no theory but one, which provides for the necessity of the case. There is no theory which claims to do for the world what the particular Church does for individuals, which claims to interpret antiquity as well as Scripture authoritatively; there is no Church which claims to have all that the Church, Christ's Church, can have, to be as much the Church now as the Church of any other age which professes to do that which Christ set up His Church to do,—but the Roman Catholic Church. There is no theory which admits of the possibility of schism,* as distinct from difference of opinion, but that which asserts a Headship, which introduces the idea of authority and prerogative instead of assemblies and majorities; and this is the Papal theory. Once admit the indefectibility, visibility, and unity of the Church of Christ, and its authority to decide controversies—admit the possibility of schism, and the English Church must be condemned as schismatical. That is, according to its own acknowledgment on Catholic principles, Anglicanism is proved untenable.

[*] Mr. Allies says (p. 14): "It is the Reformation itself which is on its trial: it cannot appeal to itself as a witness; it must be content to bring its case before a judge, whose authority all will admit; and that judge, need we say, must be antiquity, and the consent of the undivided Church." But how can antiquity be "a judge?" Antiquity may be the law, or the rule by which judgment is to proceed; but where is the judge to pronounce sentence according to this law? Mr. A. despises himself; he has not given at all a fair account of the subject of his book, or the way in which he has treated it. It is clear to every reader of his work, that it is the Catholic Church as she [illegible] tried by the laws and precedents of [illegible] and that Mr. Allies as the [illegible] party, has pronounced sentence, as we [illegible] that the Roman Catholic is guilty of "anti-christian corruptions," and that "no one can now join the communion of Rome without admitting that very thing which Pope Gregory declared to be blasphemous and anti-christian" (p. 174). It is a satisfaction that Mr. Allies does not profess to be an infallible judge.

Anglicans quote the case of the Greek Church. The same argument applies to it. Is it not possible for even the greater portion of the Church to schismatize or be heretical? If possible, then where is the abstract impossibility in the case of the Greek Church? That may be, the question is, is it schismatical? Again, what is the rule, the test, and where is the judge? One is not to be frightened by numbers. Truth is of more consequence than numbers.† I have applied this argument all along to schism, but of course it holds equally good in the case of heresies in doctrine. I conclude, then, that there is no Church on earth, no living judge, none that claims the prerogatives and exerts the powers of Christ's Church, and therefore that Christ's promises have failed, unless the Roman be the one true holy Catholic Church.

(To be continued.)

---

* It is said, "May not communion between two different parts of the Church be suspended? If it may be for one year, why not for ten, fifty, or a hundred?" That is, once admit that separation is justifiable, and you cannot prove a schism. Or it may be put thus: "There is such a thing as justifiable separation." May not ours, then, be a justifiable separation? We say it is." What schism could be proved unjustifiable, if such a very simple process suspended judgment?

† Again, an argument of this kind is sometimes used or implied: "The Church ought to be one. Truth is promised to, and is an attribute of, unity. If there be a schism, there is no longer unity, and therefore no longer a judge of truth." Truth is divided because the Church is divided. But there is a schism, therefore—the consequences are obvious. That is, schism destroys not the schismatical body, but the very Church itself. Accordingly this unity is not an essential law of the Church, but an accident, which any portion of the Church, by making a schism and refusing to repent, can destroy. And yet it is an essential law of the Church: for when broken, the Church ceases to be able to perform its very highest and most important function—that is, ceases to be the Church! To what inconsistencies will a false position drive even able and good men! There is literally no other way of avoiding these inconsistencies, than the admission of a living head and centre of unity. Where is it? What does Scripture, what does history point to? Hear Mr. Allies: "The precedence of precedence of Rome was explicitly claimed by the Bishops of Rome themselves, and as freely conceded by others to him, as to a divinely-secure successor of St. Peter. From the earliest times, that the Church cannot believe or do in a body, the form at least of this pre-eminence is observable." (See the whole passage, p. 19.)

* All who may have been affected by the appeal made to the Greek Church in the arguments are bound to read what Mr. Palmer, in his letter to Mr. Allies, has advanced on the subject. The reply, both as to the question of facts and also in point of argument, is as complete as possible. Mr. P. shows also, from authoritative documents, that in all the controverted points of doctrine the testimony of the Greek Church is entirely against England, and in favour of what people call the peculiar corruptions and additions to the faith of the Roman Church.

HISTORY OF THE LIFE, WRITINGS AND DOCTRINES OF MARTIN LUTHER

BY J. M. V. AUDIN

THE TWO BULLS 1520.

LEO X.—1521

(Continued from page 123.)

But observe! The courtiers who surrounded and applaud Ascoli, become at once agitated and seem to listen. There is noise without: the stairs of the Vatican resound with the footsteps of men; the pope smiles, because he knows the cause. Raphael comes!—Raphael, such as he is to be seen in the painting of Horace Vernet; Raphael a great Signore—greater even than Chigi himself—before whom the guard of the papal palace bow, and who comes in all the glow of health and beauty, followed by many pages. On his appearance, a double file is formed; one of cardinals and noble Romans, the other of theologians and literati; between, whom the artist advances, with that grace which was peculiar to him. He bends the knee and kisses the ring of the Fisherman's Successor. It is but six months, that the pope expressed a wish to adorn the walls of the Vatican with tapestries, like to those for which Florence was so celebrated, and bade his artist sketch the subjects for the workmen. The work is finished. Sanzio brings twelve cartoons; in which he has represented the principal scenes in the life of Christ. Each of these cartoons is surrounded by a boarding in chiaro oscuro, in which the artist has represented some incident of Leo's life. On beholding these wonderful sketches on which the painter, to please his patron, expended all the treasures of his genius, there was a lengthened pause, in which the beholders were absorbed in thought, and animation seemed for awhile suspended. Suddenly their eyes turn from the cartoons to the painter: the pope exclaims, „Divine!" and all around re-echo the exclaimation. The history of these wondrous works, which, according to an excellent judge, Richardson, are the most magnificent of Raphael's productions, is curious. * They passed from the hands of the Flemish mechanics to those of Charles I., of England. On the death of that unhappy monarch, they were sold at auction, and knocked down to Cromwell, and then forgotten, like the memory of the martyr-king. On the accession of William III, they were sacrilegiously cut up, that they might be more easily copied. At length, under an enlightened prince, these precious relics of art were covered with glass, and exposed at Windsor to the artists, who flock there to admire these masterpeices of genius.

Among the crowd might be seen a bald headed figure;—one who lived by the efforts of industry, rather than by the inspirations of genius, and who, for awhile attempted to rival Sanzio, whose powers he particularly admired. This was Sebastian del Piombo, who came to present to the pope the sketch of the Lazarus which Michael Angelo had designed, and which Sebastian was to fill up with the tints, he borrowed from the Venetian Vercelli. Two men to contend with Raphael Michael Angelo and Sebastian del Piombo,—the one supplying the thought, creating the subject;—the other imparting to it life and colouring. We read in the history of painting, that Buonarotti was wearied with hearing Raphael loaded with praises, such as were never before given to man. As his own pencil was not able to compete with that of his young rival, and his hand trembled under the weight of years, he had recourse to Sebastian del Piombo, the rival, and, probably, the superior of Raphael in the art of colouring. The resurrection of Lazarus was the result of their united efforts,—the challenge offered to the favourite of Leo X. Sanzio was bold enough to contend with such men. He took his pencil, and confined himself for some days. He abandoned the Vatican, the pope, and even his dearest friends, in order to devote himself entirely to his work. The day came when both compositions were to be examined. At the sight of the Transfiguration, all Rome uttered an exclamation of astonishment and admiration. They all said with Menga:—"This is the type of the beau ideal the paragon of art the masterpeice of painting, the most sublime effort of human genius. *" Sebastian del Piombo acknowledged that he was out-done; but such a defeat was worth many victories. For a long time, France, to whom the cardinal de Medici presented the work of Sebastian, thought that she possessed the chef-d'œuvre of painting. Conquest had not then given us the possession of the masterpeice of Sanzio.

Say, now, what is your opinion of these papal receptions? Where will you find modern drawing-rooms in which poetry, history, painting, sculpture, grammar, eloquence, theology,—all the liberal arts down to music, have their representatives? Jean Maria, an Israelite, played on the lyre while the pope was at dinner,† and Leo often seemed to fall into an ecstasy, and forget the exterior world.‡ Thus was what Erasmus saw! We can, then, easily imagine how the idea of Leo haunted him in England.

Thomas More had invited him thither. Erasmus set out on horseback, agreeable to his custom, and traversed the Alps. "This long

* Richardson's Essay on Painting, t. iii. p. 459; Bottari note al Vasari. Anche in questi stravasi l'arte ha speso il suo segno, ne dopo che ha veduto il monde cosa veramente bella. Lanzi, Storia Pittorica, t. p. 191.

* "Il quadro della Transfigurazione è una chiara riprova che Raffaello aveva acquisto maggior idea del bello · poiche contiene assai più bellezze che tutte le altre sue opere unite." This picture was destined for the church of Narbonne by the cardinal de Medici, who, however, not being able to make the sacrifice, replaced it by that of the Resurrection of Lazarus. We know not how the work of Sebastian del Piombo passed over to England in the collection of M. Angerstein. The "Transfiguration" which was in the church of St. Peter in Montorio was ceded to France by the treaty of Tolentino, and placed in the Napoleon Museum. It was restored to the pope in 1815.

† Ad Joannem Mariam, quemdam Hebræum insperatis fidibus clarum complatis dignitate examavit. Angelo Colocci life of Leo X. Peter Aaron canon of Rimini dedicated to the memory of this pontiff, his learned treatise, entitled: "Trattatello della Musica." Burney's history of Music, vol. III, p. 154.

‡ Tanto studio, tantaque, ut ne plura quidem possent, laborabat, ut nostra ætate primum videatur quod non pretiosis suppellectilis exquisitis linguæ apparatus, librorum admissione destruxerit, ubi temperatum cum omnibus circumstantibus lepide cunctosque habilis sermonis genere, modo de inani, levique materia, aut de Deo, natura, morte, fatis, legibus, vita, manibus, aliorum gentis, celebratisque urbis, quæ summa gravitatis ac perpetuæ ingenii elegantiæ virtus fuerint. Matt. Herculi, apud Fab. in annot. 83.

journey over the mountains excited in me," says he—"many thoughts. I advanced, charming away the long hours of the day by dreamy imaginations,—by recalling to my mind all that I had seen, and all that I saw,—the remembrance of the friends whom I had left, and the thoughts of those whom I was about to meet. Delightful reminiscences of study and pleasure? Then occurred to my mind the idea of my eulogium on folly—Moriæ Encomium—which I dedicated to More, —its name suggesting to me the patron under whose protection it ought to come forth."

(To be continued.)

Selections.

CONVERSIONS.

On the Epiphany, at Hereford, Robert Biddulph Phillips, Esq., of Longworth, Herefordshire, a magistrate and Deputy Lieutenant, and formerly Sheriff of the county, was, after many years' study of the subject, received into the Church by the Rev. J. B. Morris, of Prior Park. We have this upon unquestionable authority.

The Rev. Edward Walford, M.A., late Scholar at Baliol College, Oxford, has been received into the Catholic Church, at St. Mary's, Rugby. Mr. Walford gained the Latin Verse Prize at Oxford, in 1843, and the Theological Prize both in 1848 and 1849. He was formerly Assistant-Master of Tunbridge School, and for the last three years has been engaged in tuition at Clifton.—Correspondent.

Christ Church, Regent's park, London, value £500 patron, the Bishop of London, is vacant, Rev. W. Dodsworth having resigned, and gone to Rome; also St. Mark, North Audley-st. London, value £700, patron the rector of St. George, Hanover-square.

Mr. Francis R. Ward, son of Alderman Ward, of Bristol, and of the legal firm of Osborne, Wards, and Co., of that city, with his lady, were last week received into the Roman Catholic Church, also the Rev. J. H. Woodward, incumbent of St. James, in that city.

The English Catholic Directory, just published, contains a list of the names of 25 ministers of the Established Church, 3 American Episcopalian ministers, one Scotch Presbyterian minister, one Genevese Protestant minister, who joined the Church of Rome during the year 1850. Also 2 lords, 3 countesses, 2 captains in the Army, one member of parliament, and one doctor of laws.—Limerick Chronicle.

Preface to the "Encomium Moriæ." (Eulogium of folly.)

PROVINCIAL.

LETTER OF FATHER IGNATIUS.

(HON. MR. SPENCER.)

[Deferred from Last Week.]

To the Editor of the Tablet.

Jesus Christ Passus.

Dear Sir—As I have seen in several papers the paragraph of the Liverpool Mercury giving an account of an attack on me at Liverpool, which you have inserted in the last Tablet with your own very just remarks appended—that the account is evidently incorrect, if not altogether false—I suppose it will be well that there should be one statement of the affair published, from which any one who wishes may know what the truth is concerning it; and I suppose I am the best authority to refer to. It seemed to me that the only thing correctly reported was the place where the circumstance happened. I was walking through Liverpool, about two o'clock on Thursday, the 26th of December, in my Religious habit, which I have worn constantly for a twelvemonth back, and was followed for some time by a number of children—some rather impudent, others simply curious. I must say for Liverpool, that it has a more troublesome set of children than I have met with in any of our other great towns; at least, my experience during the last year, even before the No-Popery movement began, gives me this idea. I am not, however, disposed to change my course on account of such annoyances, and the Liverpool children did not make me think of leaving off my habit. No wonder that, in these days of very extraordinary zeal for the Protestant religion, and on the day after the celebration of a modern English Christmas, they were somewhat more boisterous and impudent than usual. Soon after they had begun to gather about me, one Catholic woman begged me, again and again, to let her go and fetch a policeman. I refused as often, and told her, at last, that she was more troublesome than the children, and she let me go on my way. This is the only part of the narrative where the police need be named. One or two other Catholics, in spite of my remonstrances, were trying to drive away the children, when a man, standing before a public house, where I suppose he had been solemnising his Christmas, gave me two blows on the top of the head; it might have been two men, who each of them gave me one, but evidently without any thought of hurting me, which they did not do. I conceive that they were tempted by the sight of my Religious hat, and, with what remains they had of senses, concluding, from the company of children, and the people driving them, that I was fair game for them, took a fancy to drive it down over my eyes. I turned to the man who gave the last blow, and said, Thank you Sir; then went on with my procession of children, till I reached my destination, very well pleased that my self-constituted guards did not notice, as it appeared to me, what the man had done; as I should have feared, if they had, he would have received many blows, and much harder ones, for each of the two which he had given. This is the true account of that adventure. How, or why, it was transformed into the story which has reached the papers, others might explain; I cannot. Having related the facts, I will now answer some remarks which it may occur to some to make upon them. Some may say, why do I go about in my habit, and not put on secular clothes when I go out, as most other Priests and Religious do, and as I used formerly to do? I am not sorry to have an occasion to explain myself on this point. It has always been my wish, since I have been an Ecclesiastic, to wear the Ecclesiastical dress; and I have always done it, when I have found my superiors willing to allow me. I remember, about the year 1835, being delighted at gaining, for the first time, Dr. Walsh's permission to put on the Roman collar. In 1838, when I returned from France, after beginning the begging of prayers for England, I began wearing my cassock in public, and kept to it for six months, till I was advised by my superiors to leave it off, as others did not follow me. In 1843 I took to it again—I know not from what occasion—and wore it constantly for ten months, when, from the like reason, I discontinued it again. The example of the Oratories encouraged me to indulge my old taste, and to take to wearing my religious habit just one year ago, for my doing which no one is responsible but myself; though I need not say I am not acting in this against the orders of my religious Superiors. At their desire, should it be intimated to me, I am ready immediately to return to a secular dress, though I love to keep on my religious one. One objection is, that it will offend the Protestants. If that were likely, I think, during this year, I should have seen some symptoms of this. I have visited and conversed with many of the Protestant nobility, gentry, and Clergy, of the High Church and Low Church, tradespeople, and poor; I have travelled many thousands of miles in railways, omnibusses, and coaches, and have not the recollection of a single remark being made to me, expressing displeasure at my being thus dressed, by any persons with whom I have thus come in contact. One Protestant Curate accosted me in the street at Cork, and found fault with my wearing such a dress in that Protestant country, but as in England, which is more Protestant than Ireland, no one had ever found fault with me for doing it; I think I need not count much on the objection of this Reverend gentleman. I have no doubt many people in England have a dislike, and a very great one, to Priests and Monks; but I conceive it is their persons and not their dress against which this dislike is directed; and my opinion of the English people being that they are a straightforward people, and that they like to be dealt with themselves in a sort of straigtforward way, I conceive that they will be less displeased at a Priest or a Monk, who, being in England (where they must for the present make up their mind, grudgingly or otherwise he should be), shows himself [illegible] what he is, than at one who disguises himself, as if he had a mind to impose upon them, which everybody naturally dislikes, but particularly an Englishman. If it were desired, I could fill many pages of your paper with anecdotes from this last year's travelling, which would abundantly prove, I believe, that this judgment of the English people is correct. I reckon that the Oratorians would furnish a great many more proofs of the same position.

Others will say I expose myself to ridicule, and so dishonour my profession and my Order. I answer, that I think it would be wrong to exexpose myself to ridicule, by doing anything really ridiculous; but anything ridiculous in the religious habits of the Catholic Church I do not admit. This fashion of dress is the oldest fashion; the most unaltered; the least liable, therefore, to be charged with absurd caprice, which is the character of fashions in general; of any fashion which is to be seen in England. It is also the most becoming dress, at least for me. A Passionist habit would not befit a general officer, or a young or a young squire. But let any real judge of taste answer, whether a Monk looks as well in any dress as he does in his habit, particularly a poor Monk like me, who, if he tries to imitate the dress of the genteel people of the world has not the means to do it well? I could not hope, without any resources at my command to come up to an attorney's clerk; I might deserve to be laughed at if I dressed fancifully. Some have told me, I had better, at least, have another kind of hat. I answered, that then I might be charged with dressing myself fancifully; and so I choose to go as nearly as I can attired like those of my Order in Italy. If people will still laugh at me, ought I to care? Ought I not rather to rejoice? As long as laughter and mockeries come upon me, without my departing from the line of holy obedience, for my appearing like a Passionist in England or elsewhere, I have rejoiced, and I will rejoice, at them. My holy rule teaches me to do so. I am taught to do it by the example of our venerable founder, whom I ought to follow as he followed Christ. The example of my Saviour, above all, teaches it to me. He might have avoided ridicule, and He suffered it; and will any one who reads the history of his Passion in the Gospels, tell me that I, a Passionist, ought not to rejoice at meeting with some insults, and mockery, and even blows, from vulgar people and rabble, in the streets of London or Liverpool, for the sake of my holy habit, after what He suffered for me in the streets of Jerusalem? I hope, in fine, my Catholic Brethren will not be uneasy about me, but let me go on wearing my habit in peace. I have no fear of displeasing reasonable Protestants, and I believe there are enough of them in England to bear down the foolish ones.—I am, your obedient servant,

IGNATIUS of St. Paul, Passionist.

Ennis, County Clare, Ireland, Jan. 7, 1851.

THE PAPAL QUESTION.—ADDRESS TO THE CROWN.

It is understood that one of the chief ingredients to be thrown into the cauldron of religious confusion will be contributed by Lord Ashley, in the form of an Address to the Crown for an interference by virtue of any prerogative which it may possess, to reform and purify the Church. Whether the Ministry will give their support to the measure is a question which perhaps may not be decided until the feeling of the House and of the country has been ascertained; but it is possible that the sectarian zealots may achieve a triumph without the direct and visible concurrence of the Government. The protestant agitator has not forgotten the lesson in Parliamentary tactics which was afforded last year by the weak submission of the Minister to the ingenious device by which, for a time, the Sabbatarian fanatics enforced their dogma on the community. The precedent which placed the prerogative of the Crown at the service of any coterie which could scrape up a majority on a single division in the House of Commons, may be conveniently applied to carrying oppressive and impolitic measures, without submitting to the restrictions and the repeated discussions which form the security for ordinary legislation. Unless the friends of toleration and common sense, who wish to keep the political arena clear from interminable sectarian dissensions, unite to put down the agitation at the outset, the whole of England may be convulsed for years by struggles which will probably end in the disruption of the Church. The intentions attributed to a statesman more highly placed than Lord Ashley are, if true, even more rash than the violence of the philanthropist, and in their consequences they may be far more dangerous. It is said that the Premier, in a desperate attempt to conciliate the Roman Catholics, whom he has insulted, and to unite discordant colleagues in a course of policy against which they have not been openly pledged, is meditating an attack on the harmony of the Church, by proposing to undertake a modification of the Prayer-Book, with the aid of an excited Parliamentary majority. From the first commencement of the agitation, the organs of the Government have alternated between insults to the Roman Catholic community, and attempts to prove that the foolish vituperation of the Minister was really directed against that party within the English Church which has the misfortune to differ from his theological opinions. One day the Roman Catholics are told that their minds and bodies are degraded, and that their very blood is debased by circumstances connected with their social position. At another time they are assured that the timid advocates of their claims are still, as ever, attached to their cause, and that they are only bent on persecuting their supposed imitators in the English Church. Their 'mummeries are not mummeries to them, nor is their 'superstition' inconsistent with the truth. It is only an unoffending party which is approaching the brink of a precipice which is not a precipice to those who have already fallen over it. The 'non-natural' view of the latter to the Bishop of Durham is perhaps the favourite, though the varying, creed of the day. We fear that there is too much reason that Lord John Russell himself has repudiated the adoption of this ill and discreditable evasion. Embarrassed by the half-audible reproaches of his friends, and alarmed by the threatened opposition of his long-tried Roman Catholic adherents, he seems likely to give effect to a false interpretation of a rash manifesto by an unscrupulous act of factorious sectarianism. Unable to deny that a document which ought to have been exclusively political is chiefly devoted to the condemnation of theological doctrines, he may be tempted to prove that his denunciations of Romanist practices were but the expressions of an ecclesiastical claim of supremacy for himself within the precincts of the Establishment. Sincere Roman Catholics have neither forgotten nor forgiven an insult, which was the more inexcusable if it was unnecessary for the Minister's immediate purpose; but the agitating party among the priesthood will readily suspend their hostility, if their silence will facilitate an attack on the Establishment, which is their most formidable opponent. Opportunities enough will occur of pointing out the inexpediency and injustice of the threatened scheme. For the present it is sufficient to ask whether Lord John Russell believes that the country would be benefited by the disruption of the Church, and by the loss of perhaps two-thirds of her clergy and a large portion of the educated laity. It is on no theological grounds that we assert that there are thousands who never enter into ecclesiastical discussion, nor speculate on the respective provinces of the Church and the state who would renounce an Establishment that was openly regulated in the details of its doctrine by Parliament and who would abstain from using a 'reformed' Prayer-Book, though they might have no quarrel with the opinions which it represented.—Chronicle.

BE NOT SELF-DECEIVERS.

(From Tait's Magazine for January,)

Since we are in a plain-speaking mood, we shall say that the spirit and language in which this misdirected and exaggerated, [No Popery] agitation has been carried on have been discreditable and injurious to our character as Englishmen, whose motto is fair play, and as Protestants, whose doctrine is toleration. Protestants have got so thoroughly possessed with the idea that they are very liberal and tolerant, that they are never restrained by any fear of transgressing in the other direction; and so thoroughly imbued with the conviction that Papists are always intolerant, that facts to the contrary receive neither belief nor attention. Brethren, let us not be self-deceivers. All the liberality is not on one side, nor all the illiberality on the other. For one moment look and listen. Protestants often cry, "No-Popery!" Do we ever hear our Popish fellow-countrymen crying, "No-Protestantism?" The whole political or ordinary press of England has every morning for months been coming out with the strongest and most sneering abuse of the Roman Catholic religion; what would be thought if the press of Ireland came out every morning in the same style on the Protestant religion? The mobs of English towns have been amusing themselves with burning effigies of the Pope and Archbishop Wiseman; what would be thought of the mobs of Irish towns amusing themselves by burning the Archbishop of Canterbury, or any other personage whom Protestants regard with even one-hundredth part of the reverence with which the Papists regard their spiritual head? What do you think of the fact that these things are done by Protestants, and are not done by Papists? To glance at another class of facts.—Irish constituencies, nineteen in twenty Roman Catholics, return Protestants to Parliament without a word about their religion if their politics accord; we scarcely know a single popular constituency in Britain where a Roman Catholic, though in all other respects qualified and acceptable, would have the ghost of a chance? Four or five years ago, on a vacancy occuring in the representation of perhaps the most Liberal county constituency in Scotland, Kirkcudbright, a Roman Catholic gentleman (Mr. Constable Maxwell) of large possessions, high character, and great personal popularity, started as the Whig candidate, but found he might as well have started for the "Primateship of All England." Now, good Protestants reader, if the counterpart of this had happened, even in the most thoroughly Popish county of Ireland—if a candidate otherwise welcome had been repudiated because he was a Protestant—would we not all have shouted—"What vile bigots those Papists are!" And if Mr. Maxwell had slipped in for Kirkcudbright, would we not all have shouted—"How liberal we Protestants are!" But then, look how things have happened. The Protestant Mr. Herbert (we take the first instance that occurs to our mind) is made member for Popish Kerry, without a word about his religion; and Mr. Maxwell, solely on account of his religion, will never be membered for Kirkcudbright! What should we cry at this? Ah! "The case being altered, that alters the case." One instance more. At the very time (a few weeks ago) when we were all crying out about Popish bigotry, and heaping on the Roman Catholic religion every epithet of opprobrium and abhorrence, the Town Council of Dublin, five-sixths Roman Catholics, were unanimously electing a Protestant Lord Mayor. Are we likely soon to see a Roman Catholic Lord Provost of Edinburgh or Glasgow? And finally (we only finish for want of sufficent space), if a Popish Prime Minister wrote an official letter denouncing Protestantism as "slavery," "degradation," "superstition," and "mummery" he would scarcely succeed in keeping his head on his shoulders. Yet, when a Protestant Prime Minister so denounces Popery, he gets "three cheers" at a thousand meetings; and never did the Guildhall of London hear such thumping of tables and jingling of glasses! These are facts: look at them, think of them, and think especially, if, in the face of them, we ought to regard ourselves as superabundantly stocked with that Christian virtue which speaketh no evil, vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up.

GIBRALTAR.

Several letters having appeared in the Daily News from Gibraltar, signed a 'Manchester Man,' and from other correspondents, all complaining of the state of things in general on the Rock, a correspondent has addressed the following letter to the same journal on the other side of the question:—

[EXTRACT.]

'SIR,—There is in Gibraltar a fine charity which might be made available to a great extent for the relief of the poor. What is done with it? Who applies the revenues? Has any step been taken respecting it? The matter stands thus:—John Gavino, by his will, devised to John Breciano, Jeronino Quartin, and John Joseph Price, and their heirs, certain messages and lands upon trusts thereinafter contained, and gave the residue of his personal estate to the same persons upon trust to invest it in land to be conveyed to his trustees in fee, with power to repair and let; and then the trustees were directed to pay to the Governor, Deputy-Governor, and Treasurer of the Civil Hospital, for the use of the catholic poor in the said hospital, in Gibraltar, for ever, one-fourth part of the net rents of the said messuages and lands, and to pay and apply the remaining three-fourths of the said net rents for preserving and maintaining the Catholic Church of Gibraltar, particularly the nave and altar of the Virgin in cleanliness—for the relief of poor and necessitous persons of the catholic faith, resident natives of Gibraltar, and for the relief of distressed families, widows, and orphans, by clothing and otherwise. And he appointed the same trustees executors of his said will.' The statutes of Mortmain do not apply to Gibraltar—nor, I think, would the devise be effected in Gibraltar by the English enactments against superstitious uses. What is the remedy? Let the Secretary of State for the Colonies desire the Attorney-General of Gibraltar or file an information for the management of the charity—he can do this ex-officio without even a relator—but it would be very difficult, I should say impracticable, from technical and other causes, for any person other than the Attorney-General of Gibraltar [illegible] at present, say nothing about the vexation of Gibraltar—a very important point.'

I remain, Sir, yours obediently,
NOT A ROCK SCORPION.'

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 12.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, March 22, 1851.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

On last Monday morning, the Anniversary of the Feast of Ireland's Patron Saint, was celebrated with great solemnity, at the Church dedicated here to God under the patronage of St. Thomas the Apostle of India.

At an early hour, a considerable number of the Catholic residents, especially of Chowringhee and its Vicinity, had assembled together to join in the devotions of the day. The service had hardly begun, when a body of about six or seven hundred of H. M. 18th Royal Irish Regt., entered into the Church, to assist also at Divine Worship. The favor of being allowed to attend, on this interesting occasion, was cheerfully granted with his usual courtesy, by their Commanding Officer, Colonel Reignolds. And, indeed, judging from all that we have heard of this distinguished Regiment, we believe, that it would not be easy to find in any other Corps, so many Privates, as in the 18th, so well entitled by their exemplary conduct, to all the indulgence, which can be given, consistently with a due regard to Military discipline. The Choir, we need hardly add, was conducted with the wonted taste and efficiency of the Religious Ladies of the Loretto Institution; many of the Congregation appeared to be particularly struck at the exquisite manner, in which the Antiphon at the Offertory and "the Agnus Dei," were sung. The Rev. Mr. Tracy, the Celebrant was assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Sardi, and Stephenson, as Deacon and Subdeacon. Immediately, after the Gospel had been sung, the Archbishop ascended the Pulpit, and addressed the Congregation in a discourse adapted to the Solemnity. We have much pleasure, in subjoining the following sketch of His Grace's Sermon:—

"The memory of him shall not depart away, and his name shall be in request from generation to generation. Nations shall declare his wisdom, and the Church shall show forth his praise." Ecclesiast. Chap. xxxix, 13, 14.

More than fourteen Centuries have rolled away, since Patrick entered on his Apostolic career in Ireland. During that long interval, nations have arisen and have passed away, and the fame of thousands, who in their day, took a leading part in the erection or downfall of thrones and dynasties has been consigned to deep and impenetrable oblivion. How is it, that amidst the wreck of worldly fame, glory, and grandeur, Religion always survives, to embalm the memory of her sainted Children in the affections of a grateful posterity, so that whilst Kings and Conquerors are forgotten, the Faithful assemble together on each returning anniversary, in every quarter of the universe, to renew their recollection of the humble Missionary, to whose holy labors, their country is indebted for the knowledge of the Gospel.'

How is it, to apply the reflection just offered to ourselves, that we, my brethren, separated from the life time of St. Patrick, by the lapse of ages, and by the distance of thousands of miles from the scene of his Apostleship, should be found convened together today, in the temple of Religion in this remote region, in order to thank God for the blessings bestowed on a country, which many of you never saw, and with which but few of you have any connection. Do you not behold in this occurrence, how admirably, how strongly, and yet how silently and sweetly, the Almighty thus accomplishes with respect to St. Patrick, the promise announced in the opening text of this discourse. "The memory of him shall not depart away, and his name shall be in request from generation to generation. Nations shall declare his wisdom, and the Church shall show forth his praise." Ecclesiast. Chap. xxxix, 13, 14.

In this way too, does the Providence of God manifest itself, in order to impress upon us, that we are all Members of the same great family of mankind, and that Religion orders us to sympathise and rejoice in the sorrows and the blessings of our Brethren!

On an occasion like the present, some account of the history of the Patron Saint of Ireland will be naturally expected.

Britanny in France was, it is probable, his birth-place. His Father was of Roman Origin as Calpurnius his name indicates—His Mother Conchessa, is stated by some writers, to have been Sister to St. Martin, the illustrious Bishop of Tours.

His youth, owing to the then unsettled state of the country where he resided, was chequered with misfortunes of a trying nature. Twice during that period, he was carried into Captivity, into Ireland; on the first occasion, his captivity lasted for about seven years; on the second, it was but of short duration.

God is wonderful in his Saints—Wonderful most especially, in the mysterious way, in which his Providence conducts them first to that position in life, which he has marked out for them here, and next in the means he employs, to fit them for their calling and prepare them for Eternity.

In the history of the Old Testament, we read, that when God wished to exalt Joseph to the highest honors, and enable him to be the Saviour of Egypt and of his own brethren, his Providence accomplished these wonders in a way, the very opposite to that which human wisdom would have followed.

The victim of his brothers' jealousy, he is sold by them into slavery, and the heart of his fond father wrung with bitter anguish at the report of his having been slain by a wild beast.

One would suppose, that so severe an affliction would have been deemed by God enough for the humiliation of Joseph, enough to detach him from himself and the World, and to qualify him to become the chosen Minister of God for the accomplishment of his hidden designs—But it was not so—To be fitted for the high purposes for which he was destined, he must drink still more deeply of the cup of tribulation. He must suffer from the false accusation of his mistress and in prison undergo that punishment, which was due to her guilt. "He sent a man before them: Joseph, who was sold for a slave. They humbled his feet in fetters: the iron pierced his soul, until his word came. The word of the Lord inflamed him—The king sent, and he released him: the ruler of the people, and he set him at liberty. He made him master of the house, and ruler of all his possession. That he might instruct his princes as himself, and teach his ancients wisdom. And Israel went into Egypt: and Jacob was a sojourner in the land of Cham. And he increased his people exceedingly: and strengthened them over their enemies. He turned their heart to hate his people: and to deal deceitfully with his servants. He sent Moses his servant: Aaron the man whom he had chosen."—Psalm civ, v. 17, to 26.

It was only when thus tried, as gold in the furnace, that Joseph was deemed by God, qualified for the high vocation to which he was called.

From the verses of the Psalm which you have just heard, you are reminded, that after Joseph, Moses was the chosen deliverer of the Jewish people.

He too began life a cast-away on the waters of the Nile, and this very misfortune, the power and wisdom of God employed, to prepare Moses to be the deliverer of his people from the bondage of Egypt.

In the history of the Apostle of Ireland, the Almighty appears to have exercised a similar providence, in order to fit St. Patrick for the conversion of the Irish people.

The long captivity of the Saint, and the various severe privations he had to endure, whilst in slavery in a foreign land, forced him, as it were, to look to heaven only for consolation in his sufferings, for he was separated on earth from every friend and acquaintance. The duty of tending Sheep was that assigned to him by his Master. The discharge of this duty caused him to pass his days and nights in solitude and in retirement from the paths of men. Even in the arrangement of this particular office, we see how God, who disposes all things for his elect, provided, that the very duties assigned to the Saint in captivity, should be such, as would oblige him to enter into himself and invite him to prayer and contemplation. He had now leisure, to think upon the holy maxims and counsels, which were impressed upon his mind in his tender years—he tells us, in his confessions, that whilst a mere boy, he had committed some fault, the nature of which he does not describe—over this fault he mourned with sincere sorrow, and he assures us, that a hundred times in the day, and as often during the night, he sought God in fervent and humble prayer.

At length, the period fixed by God for his probation in captivity was completed, and he found his way back to his own country and friends. In a short time after his return home, the Saint resolved to prepare himself for the sacred ministry. At that time, it was about the close of the fourth century, the modern idea of a self constituted Missionary was unknown. Long probation in an approved religious institution, a severe ordeal of study and religious discipline must have been then undergone by the Candidate for the Priesthood, and even when these conditions had been all faithfully complied with, it was only by the imposition of the Bishop's hands, that any one however otherwise recommended, could be introduced into the Sanctuary, and allowed to assume the sacred dignity of the Priesthood.

In thus preparing himself for the ministry, St. Patrick spent several years in study, prayer and retirement, and after his ordination as Priest, he entered first on the exercise of his ministry in the Diocess of Boulogne. The period now approached, when the counsels of the Divine Wisdom ordained, that Patrick was to abandon for ever his native home. The merciful designs of Providence in favor of the Irish people were, the Saint informs us, revealed to him in a vision, during the silence of the night. It was in a similar way, that St. Paul was invited to preach the Gospel in Macedonia "and a vision, says the Holy Scripture was showed to Paul in the night, which was of a man of Macedonia standing and beseeching him and saying. Pass over into Macedonia and help us." The narrative of what occurred in a like manifestation to St. Patrick, the Saint relates in the following words. "and I saw, says the Saint, in a nocturnal vision, a man whose name was Victorinus, coming as if from Ireland, with numberless letters, one of which he handed to me; on reading the commencement of it, I found that it contained these words, " The voice of the Irish." And while reading, I thought that I heard, at the same moment, the voice of persons from near the word of Foclut which adjoins the sea on the Western Coast of Ireland, and they cried out, as if with one voice: " We entreat thee O holy youth, to come, and walk still amongst us" and I was greatly affected in my heart, and could read no longer; then I awoke." Soon after this occurrence, the exemplary character of St. Patrick attracted the notice of Saint Germanus, who having resigned the Ducal dignity had become Bishop of Auxerrois. This Prelate having been ordered by the Pope to proceed to England, in order to suppress the Pelagian heresy in that country, chose St. Patrick, as one of the Companions of his journey. On their return to France, our Saint was sent by the Bishop to Rome, to make a report to the Holy Father of the state of religion in England. During Germanus's stay in England, he had inquired also into the religious condition of the Irish people and from what he had learned, he was induced to recommend to the Pope, to send a Bishop and some Priests to the Irish Mission. Of these, he advised that St. Patrick should be one. Palladius was the first Bishop selected for the proposed undertaking. Death having removed this Prelate, in a short time St. Patrick, who was in France, when the news of Palladius' death reached that country, received Episcopal Consecration there, and thence passing through England, soon after reached, in the year 432, the Island of which he was the destined Apostle. Here for 33 years, the Saint labored by preaching, prayers, tears and holy example to gain the people to Christ. Happily his hearers were not insensible to these graces. To Irish National just and honorable pride, it is not a little gratifying to recollect, that though before the conversion of their country to Christianity, their ancestors were estranged from the knowledge of the true God, yet the prevailing worship of fire or water, was of description far less revolting, than the superstition which prevailed in other countries of the Western Hemisphere. There was a spirituality in the Irish Worship, erroneous though it was, which at least indirectly disposed its votaries for the pure and holy worship of the Gospel. But whatever the obstacles were which opposed the Apostleship of St. Patrick, the power and grace of God dispensed through his ministry triumphed over all, so that at the close of his holy career, he had the happiness to know, that the faith of Christ was that of his adopted country, and that none but the true God was worshipped in that Island, afterwards justly styled by the rest of Europe, the Island of Saints.

At the completion of this glorious achievement, the Saint having fixed, the Primatial See at Armagh, died full of good works, and was buried at Down, then as now an Episcopal seat in Ireland. I will not here trespass on your time by dwelling at length on the great and glorious prerogatives of the Irish Catholic Church—Its Hierarchy unbroken from the days of Patrick to the present time whilst that of England and Scotland has failed—Its people still as firm in the Faith, after centuries of persecution as they were in the days of Patrick—Its Priesthood as untainted, its Females as illustrious for spotless purity as they then were and its children known throughout the earth for their characteristic benevolence,—bravery and high honor.

A reference to modern distinguished Characters would prove, that whilst in the senate and the field numbers of her Sons have emulated and often outstripped the more favored Children of England, in the thrice sacred cause of Christianity, countless others of them have nobly carried the standard of Redemption, into the most distant and inhospitable climes.

In the unsearchable ways of Providence, God has permitted the Irish Nation, as, he did formerly his own chosen people, to drink deeply of the bitter cup of suffering. But as in spite of Pharaoh's oppression the people of God multiplied, as it were miraculously, and became too strong for bondage, so have the Irish people too, encreased in numbers to such an extent, that not only humanity but policy dictates to their rulers the wisdom, of trying to conciliate those, whom the tyranny of centuries could not crush. Yes, thanks to God, better times and more wise counsels have at length begun to exercise a salutary influence on Ireland. Let our united prayer be, that this amelioration may improve daily more and more, and that under our present gracious Sovereign, Ireland may again take her place among the Nations of the earth, and become once more in sanctity, in learning in arts, and arms the light and the glory of the Western world.

PARLIAMENTARY.

THE PREMIER'S MEASURES AGAINST THE ENGLISH CATHOLIC HIERARCHY.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

Dear Sir,—I have just read in the Friend of India, what purports to be an accurate statement of the resolution, and address to be presented by Parliament to Her Majesty for the purpose of repressing, what is absurdly termed the 'late Papal Aggression,' in the restoration in England of the Catholic Hierarchy.

You will I am sure, agree with me in opinion, that, if the report I have referred to be authentic, there never was an occurrence which more fully illustrated the well known Fable of the Mountain in Labour.

Call to mind for an instant, I pray you, the events, which for the last four months have agitated the public Mind in England, and which have been so much enlarged upon by the Press. The first too memorable letter, which ushered in the agitation, was that of the Premier. Who, that read that singular and unworthy production would not have anticipated, that some very decisive and effectual proceeding, against the Catholic Hierarchy in England, was about to be resolved upon. It is true, that one or two distinguished public characters regarded the letter in question, partly, as a tub thrown to the Whale, to stop the clamourings of bigotry, and partly, as a mean political artifice, resorted to, by the leader of the Whig-party, for the purpose of prolonging the term of their continuation in office. Yet notwithstanding, it is certain, that the rash, insulting and illiberal sentiments, to which, in an evil hour, Lord Russell gave expression, unfortunately for his own fame, were echoed throughout the land, not only in words but in actions, in such a way, as to disgust every man who took an interest in the character of his Fellow-Countrymen for good sense and liberality. Assuredly, the statesman who calls up the bad passions and the bigotry of one class of the community against another, and thus seriously endangers the public peace must, in order to free himself from grievous guilt, be able to prove satisfactorily to his fellow-subjects, that the danger, he apprehended from those against whom he had excited such hostile feelings, was both real and alarming, and in fine, such as could be counteracted, only by the course which he had adopted.

Now, Lord Russell has neither thus vindicated himself, nor has he submitted to Parliament any proposal, from which it can be inferred even by his greatest admirers, that he ever really regarded the restoration of the Catholic Hierarchy, as a measure, which either trespassed on the rights of the Sovereign, or, which jeopardized in any way, the Civil or Religious rights of Englishmen. For had he viewed that measure, as dangerous in either of these respects, he would, doubtless, have submitted some proposition to the Legislature, which when carried into effect would remedy both the existing evil of which he complained, and guard against its recurrence, or perpetuation. Let us then enquire, if the course, which Lord Russell is stated to have adopted in Parliament, in reference to the English Catholic Hierarchy, have any of these recommendations! Undoubtedly, not one. Does even the Proceeding ascribed to him, remedy any one supposed previous defect in the Code of British Legislation on the subject of Catholicity. Again, I answer, not one.

In effect, his Lordship's proceeding leaves the laws, on all that appertains to Catholicity, just as they were, and wholly abstains from any new legislative enactment whatsoever upon it. I have then a right to assume that no new law was deemed by his Lordship necessary to uphold the legal rights of the crown or of its English subjects, and I am further warranted to infer, that, as no attempt has been made to prove the restoration of the the English Catholic Hierarchy to be a violation of those rights, neither those rights, nor the laws by which they are upheld, have been transgressed against by the newly constituted Prelates. For, if the law as it now exists, had, indeed, been violated, assuredly, enough has taken place in England to show, that, neither on the part of the Premier, nor of the majority of the people were the ability and the disposition wanting, to enforce against them, all the penalties, to which they could have been legally subjected.

Were I to be asked, what then is the meaning and the worth of the measure said to have been submitted to Parliament by the Premier, for, surely it cannot be supposed, that so great a statesman would come before the British Legislature with a proposition, which would be found on consideration to be "Vox et præterea Nihil" a mere empty sound. Were I thus interrogated, I am free to confess, that my judgment would dictate the answer, that extraordinary as such conduct may appear in the Prime Minister of England, yet it is but too true that his proposition, on this occasion, was but as a mere bubble, devoid of substance, and intended only to supply for a moment a pleasing illusion. In order to prove this, I will subjoin a summary of the proposition in question.

The Premier proposes* an address to the Crown, praying Her Majesty, to cause a Proclamation to be published, informing Her British Subjects, that the Episcopal titles, lately assumed by some Persons in England in virtue of a certain document issued by the Bishop of Rome are to be deemed invalid, —that She recognises no right in any Foreign Power to interfere with her realm—that her subjects owe no obedience to any such Power, and that, if in virtue of any document, emanating from a Foreign Power, those who have lately assumed in England certain Episcopal titles, presume by force or compulsion to exact obedience, they are to be prosecuted in the Courts of Law. Now, in the name of Common sense, what Catholic, whether Lay, or Ecclesiastical ever dreamt, either that the Protestant Sovereign of Great Britain would recognise as legal the titles of Prelates appointed by the Holy See, or that those Prelates would, because of their titles, be enabled by force or compulsion to exact obedience to their Episcopal authority. Yet this is the whole gist of the Premier's proposition and this proposition is to be carried into effect merely by a Proclamation, which, as every one knows, can have no authority except what it derives from Law.

Your's &c.
A CATHOLIC.

A SERMON DELIVERED IN ST. GEORGE'S CATHOLIC CHURCH, SOUTHWARK, ON SUNDAY MORNING, AUGUST 11TH., 1850, BY THE RIGHT REV. N. WISEMAN, D.D. BISHOP OF MELIPOTAMUS, V. A. L.

'BUT HE, WILLING TO JUSTIFY HIMSELF, SAID TO JESUS,—AND WHO IS MY NEIGHBOUR?"—LUKE X. 29.

(Continued from our last.

The Catholic then believes that whatever gifts God has bestowed upon man, whatever blessings of a temporal character, whatever

---

* "Resolved—That such pretended Bishops of English sees have no lawful authority over sees in this country, and that persons acting under such instrument possess no power or authority whatsoever, and that no obedience is due from any of her Majesty's subjects to any such pretended Bishops or persons so acting; but that if any such pretended Bishops or persons, acting under such instrument proceed to exercise authority by force or compulsion, such proceeding will be illegal, and will be punished on due prosecution of the offenders in the courts of law.

"That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, embodying the foregoing resolution, and requesting that her Majesty will graciously make known the same by her royal proclamation to the people of this realm.

advantages of a more accidental nature, whatever gifts of a spiritual or intellectual character He may have given to individuals, to nations or to the whole world, they are all as nothing compared with the gift of Faith, the true, the saving faith. And hence the Catholic feels that if the greatest of charities consists in bestowing upon man that which is the most precious and valuable gift that can be given him, that then the charity which knows no bounds, the charity of the good Samaritan, the Charity of Jesus Christ, our Lord, can in no way be manifested and paactised so truly as this, in teaching to those who know it not, the word of truth, in communicating to nations in darkness the true Faith, or in bringing those who are by circumstances estranged from it, into its full and complete participation. And hence, however great that charity may be, which, breaking down all social distinctions, ministers to the poor, to the sick, to the captive, to the slave, these are all as nothing in the sight of a Catholic heart or before the Church of God,—they are nothing in comparison to this charity which immediately directs all its thoughts and energies to the soul that is to be saved, and does in regard to the spiritual and immortal part of man, in which is really stamped God's image, that which those other, lesser, external, visible acts of charity perform in regard to the body that will perish.

Then it is not wonderful that the Church at all periods should have considered this as a great exercise of its charity; and I will go a step further, and ask is it wonderful then that the Church of God, with a principle like this, should at all times have been either fiercely attacked, or jealously viewed, for what is called its proselytising spirit, its desire, its earnest wish, its zealous efforts to gather all, if possible, unto a unity of faith!

O! my Brethren, if there be any doctrine upon earth that has been more sadly misunderstood and misrepresented as to Catholic teaching, it is this, that salvation belongs to only one system of teaching, or to only one Church. I mean represented, for so it constantly is, as a narrow and uncharitable view. O! my Brethren, that doctrine is the very main spring of the most magnificent charity of the whole earth. No apostle would have gone forth to teach nations, and have faced persons, racks, and death, if he had not believed in his soul that it was necessary that men should believe as he did, that they might be saved. For what motive less than this could induce one to trample upon all that human nature takes delight in, and this for the sake of others? Can any one for a moment imagine that we, or any others who act upon this Catholic principle, being ready even to die if necessary, that all might be like ourselves except our bonds? Is it credible, that we would do all this for a foolish, vain, stupid, and unsatisfactory motive, which some think sufficient to account for it, a desire to domineer over the minds of men, or bring them into a captivity similar to our own? Whatever has been done in the Church, from the time of the Apostles until now, in regard to the conversion of nations, one and all have had their conversion undertaken and accomplished solely as the result of this great conviction, that the true Faith was the greatest of God's blessings upon man—that that faith it was of the utmost importance, and even necessary, that all, if possible, should have brought to them, and all who once had learned it should embrace it, and all who had embraced it should keep it. This, and this alone, has animated the Church, and this, and this alone, has led to the acomplishment of the last great development of this teaching of our Blessed Redeemer, that the neighbour whom we are to love, whom we are to love not merely with a bare, speculative inward love, but whom we are to love with active, with zealous, and generous love, is a stranger and a foreigner, and one even on the shores of the most distant islands of the ocean, but how much more the neighbours, in every sense of the word, who though our side in the body—who though living in the midst of us, and we in the midst of them, as one people—yet look upon us as aliens in creed, in that which should form the strongest bond of union, and consider us as not belonging to themselves, as almost out of caste, because we hold those doctrines which we consider more precious than our lives. And truly, my Brethren, this will be reason enough, not merely now, but for ever, for the Church in this country to continue her untiring efforts, not satisfied, whatever may oppose her course, till she sees, if God reserves such a blessing for us, the whole of this country bound together in one tie for charity and true faith. For see you not, that love men as we may, there is no bond so straight, so tight, and at the same time so tender, as that bond of charity which is intertwined likewise with community of faith, which unites not only hearts, but intellects also, in a common belief, which makes them partakers of the same spiritual consolations, breathes of the same divine life that is in the Church, closely knitted together, as parts of the same plant, or of the same body, and united to the same root, our Lord Jesus Christ. For this is the triumph of that charity which our Saviour inculcated, that it rests not until it establishes likewise this additional, and this most important bond, and brings her into perfect unity by that which alone can constitute it perfectly, a unity of faith and religion. And this shows that the charity which our Blessed Redeemer inculcated in those words, was a charity truly catholic in every sense of the term, a charity universal, that excludes none, a charity which binds them together by every indissoluble tie. And, my Brethren, I own that if I were called on to express the blessing which of all others I would wish to this our country, it would not be greater political influence, and dominion over the world, it would not be an increase of its already exuberant wealth, it would not be the advancement of science and of literature, already so vastly developed, it would not be a still greater display and expansion of its innate forces which astonish the world, in the creation of works requiring almost unbounded enterprise united with unlimited wealth. No,—it would be none of these. I speak it boldly and without disguise, it would be that the Catholic Faith should be the religion of this land; because, I see so many elements of human greatness, wanting only the spiritual life added to them which investing them with the divine principle, would make them magnificent works, not only for this our earth, but magnificent also for the records of another and a better world. If commensurate with this there were also a display of that intense and truly sincere energy that is shown in regard to other things, in respect to religion; and if mens' minds were as active about the other world as they are about this earth, and, turning themselves to the proof and explanation of spiritual things, were to be brought, as of consequence they must infallibly be, to unity of thought in regard to these most important truths; then, indeed, we should see an example of what the world never before has contemplated, an example of what would appear almost to be so great and so divine a work, that there would be nothing left for earth afterwards to do; a combination of all that is magnificent, and glorious, and noble upon earth, with all that is sacred, and all that is honoured, and all that is divine in heaven.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE REASONS OF MY CONVERSION TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY A LATE CLERGYMAN (REV. MR. NEWMAN) OF THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION, IN LETTERS TO A FRIEND. FIFTH EDITION. LONDON: JAMES BURNS 1849.

LETTER IV.

My Dear

It was Anglicanism that led me to the Church of Rome. I thankfully acknowledge it. It first taught me all those principles and doctrines, in their germ or elements at least, which are fulfilled and harmonised only in the one holy Catholic Church, of which the Bishop of Rome, as successor of St. Peter, is the head and centre. It first gave birth in my mind to the glorious vision of the Visible Church; one organised Body, inhabited by the Holy Ghost, the one great sacrament of grace, from contact and union with which flow all spiritual blessings to individual men. It first taught me the essential importance of of unity in this sacred Body, and the consequent evil and sin of schism. It first taught me to see the importance and necessity of a creed and authority in matters of faith. It first turned my attention to the theology of Christianity as an historical fact, as well as a spiritual philosophy. It first brought me acquainted with the writings of the Fathers, the Saints, and Doctors, of the Catholic Church. How can I ever be sufficiently grateful to it for these benefits and their results? As an instrument to bring men to Rome, it is invaluable; as a resting-place in itself, as a consistent system, it is, to my mind, the most unsatisfactory and delusive.

Having created in my mind certain wants, having given birth to certain ideas, and sown the seeds of certain doctrines, it failed in every respect to satisfy the needs it had created. I looked for authority in matters of faith, and there was none, but the utmost license and licentiousness even on the most sacred and essential doctrines;—doctrines which (as Mr. Allies says), "if not God's very truths, are most fearful blasphemies." I had been taught to consider ourselves one with the holy Catholic Church all over the world; I found that we were isolated, condemned, excommunicated, with every appearance of difference in most important matters of doctrine and practice, and as much in the wrong, as it seemed to me, according to our own principles, as if three of our own Bishops should differ and separate from the rest, and make a sect or so-called Church of their own, perpetuating the succession of their order. I saw no possibility of settling our own disputes; for the English Church had no living voice, unless it was the voices speaking through Bishops and Ecclesiastical Courts, and these all condemned us. I saw no possibility of settling our disputes with the Catholic Church; for, according to us, that had no living voice; the Church had ceased to have authority in controversies since the separation of East and West. I had been led to see the folly and evil of referring to the Bible as the alone rule of faith, because it was a book, a dead letter, and books could not interpret themselves; and I was referred to the Bible and Prayer-book—two books instead of one; or to the Bible and the Fathers—a whole library instead of one inspired book! Still books, dead letters! but where was the Church to interpret them? I had been beguiled by words, and was as far off as ever from the thing talked of and needed. Anglicanism had done all it could, it had done its work on me; it had brought me as far as it could on my way, and there it left me in sight of the holy Catholic Church, and pointed to it as that alone which could fulfil its own theories, and satisfy my wants.

But Anglicanism had taught me doctrines also, as well as Church principles. From it I had learnt the elements and outlines of that wondrous system of divine truth, which, both as a theory and as a living system, is the possession of the Catholic Church, and of it alone, and which it alone can rightly expound, exhibit, and unfold. I had learnt to understand and believe the nature of the Christian sacraments; I had learnt especially to believe, with entire faith, the reality of the Presence of our Lord in the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist; I had learnt to reverence the very crumbs which were the sign of a Presence so inconceivably sacred. I had learnt also to believe and understand, in some faint degree, the doctrine of the communion of saints, not merely of the living with the living, but of the visible with the invisible, as one and the same company or Body in Christ. I had learnt also to believe in the forgiveness of sins, not merely as an abstract doctrine, but as a gift in the Church, communicated sacramentally, with circumstances of protection against the fanatical, and of consolation to the penitent.

While these doctrines were (to my mind) a new world opened to me. Christianity was no more the same thing. The mystery of the Incarnation was no longer a mere notion; it was perpetuated, embodied, and multiplied on earth. The real Presence of Christ in the eucharistic elements, or Transubstantiation, seemed almost a natural consequence of the Incarnation, as it is a perpetual symbol and witness of it, and a mean of communicating its great treasure. It seemed clear also that there must be an intermediate state, occupied by "the spirits of the just made perfect," and of those not yet perfected. It seemed almost self-evident that they could not be indifferent to us, nor we to them; but that we should still communicate with, and minister to, each other. How could I ever have thought of the Blessed Virgin, and St. Peter, and St. Paul, and others as dead? How should they not find the chief blessedness and occupation of their enlarged souls in serving their Lord and God? How should they serve Him but in His members and their fellow-members, for whom He had shed His blood, and over whom He still watched, and for whom He still presented and pleaded the merits of His death? If they interceded for and ministered to the saints while they were on earth, why not still? What more strictly in analogy with God's dealings, and with the complex system of mediation and mutual dependence in which we already believed and lived?

Here, then, were the germs and outlines of a great and supernatural system of doctrine which I had actually embraced, which Anglicans had told me was Catholic, which I had myself seen ample testimonies to in antiquity,* and in the writings of those saints whose names we all revered. But such truths as these cannot dwell long in the mind without expansion; nor can we see their context, their harmony, their manifold relations and consequences, all at once. They expanded within me by time and reflection; and as they did so, I found myself continually drawing nearer to the apprehension of the Roman Catholic theology and practices, until at last the Catholic Church stood before my eyes in exact correspondence to all these truths. It seemed but the natural and proper embodi-

* I ought to say, that the more I became acquainted with the writings of the Fathers and the history of the early Church, the more impossible I felt it to recognise any real resemblance between the primitive and the Anglican Churches. Early Christianity, on the contrary (whatever view we choose to take of the question of development), bears at least a very striking resemblance to "modern Romanism." All but Anglicans feel this. There seems no alternative but to believe that the Church was "corrupt" from the first, or that "Romanism" is in the main the same as early Christianity. Surely none but the most blinded can imagine that if ancient Christianity is to be our standard, the English Church is infinitely more removed from that standard than the Roman Catholic. Many persons have been converted simply by this fact. They felt it to be monstrous for a body so defective by this standard, to condemn another body so nearly approximating to it. If primitive Christianity has a representative on earth, as all, the impression on any candid and well-informed mind must surely be, that the Roman, and not the English, Church is that representative.

ment of these ideas and of this system. And, on the other hand, I found it daily more and more utterly impossible to persuade myself any longer that this was indeed the theology, the faith, of the English Church. And yet this I was called upon to believe. This was the theory of Anglicanism,—not that these doctrines were true, not that they were Catholic, not that they might be held within the Church, but that this was the Catholic faith, and that this faith was held, taught, and witnessed, by the English Church! Oh, how utterly and inexpressly unreal did I come to feel such language to be! What a mockery of facts, documents, and history! I felt that I could believe any thing rather than that. I felt that nothing could be more unreal, more untrue, than to say that I believed this religious system to be the authoritative system taught, or intended to be taught, by the English Church.

What was my position, then, at this time? On the one hand, I saw all this great body of doctrines, all this sacramental and mysterious system, all but lost sight of, obscured or denied by the English Church, nay, actually denied by the vast majority of her communion in every period of her existence, and never for one single year really acted out in the least degree; never in any sense the religion of her clergy or her people; never by any exaggeration of language, by any effort of imagination, to be called the faith of the English Church. And, on the other hand, in the Catholic Church I saw all these doctrines taught and enforced as essential truths, forming an essential part of the whole system of worship, woven into it, spreading all over it, having possession of the minds of all her people, and expressed naturally in their ordinary language. Could I hesitate for a moment,—if this were the Catholic faith, and if the Church was to teach the Catholic faith,—which was the Church? The English Church could no longer be a Church to me in any sense. It stood condemned in my eyes in every way. It had not taught me the faith. It did not embody or enshrine it for me. It did not support and sustain me in it. I dared hardly utter it, or any small portion of it. A few around me thought with me; but whatever they might occasionally say, it was evident they only hoped, in the course of time, to teach the Church—the Church had not taught them. They talked of making the Church Catholic; of waiting to see if it would receive Catholic truth. I am quoting expressions of the highest Anglicans. What mockery, what condemnation of themselves and their theories was in these words! Could any Catholic speak so of the Catholic Church!

I do not know which is the better hypothesis for the character of the English Church on Anglican views, that she does or does not hold the Catholic faith as authoritative. I think it is almost more shocking to believe that she has all along believed this faith, and yet so obscured it, trodden it under foot, frowned to oppose it, and deny it, and protested against it so successfully as to deceive the whole world, Catholic and Protestant, into thinking her Protestant, than to admit at once that, through ignorance she gave up and rejected the faith. It would take me a long time were I to attempt to give expression to the manifold ways in which conviction flowed in upon my mind, that the English Church was in no sense, and according to no criteria, a part of the Catholic Church, when once the suspicion had entered my mind, and doubt had led to inquiry. Suffice it to say, the delusion was gone for ever. I marvel that it could have deceived me so long. It was gone, however; and now I stood before the Roman Catholic Church as that alone which corresponded to my principles and idea of a Catholic, and which taught and embodied the Catholic faith. Why should I not at once submit myself, and join it?

According to all, Catholics and Anglo-Catholics, the Roman Church is a Church. It possesses an undoubted succession. It embraces the whole Western communion, England only excepted. It is the Church of our Patriarch. It is the Church of which the see of St. Peter is the centre, and the successor of St. Peter the head; that see to which, Mr. Allies being witness, so many mysterious and divine privileges are attributed by Scripture and antiquity; that see with which, according to Bossuet (with whom Mr. Allies seems to think he agrees), it is practically necessary to be in communion. According to Catholics themselves, it is the Church, the one Church founded on Peter, and continued on in his successors, and claiming the obedience of all Christians in all nations. It holds, teaches authoritatively, and embodies every Catholic doctrine, Anglicans themselves being witnesses. It has preserved its traditions unbroken, and its Service-book unmutilated. It comes before us, in fact with every positive note, and answers to every test of a Church, and challenges our faith and obedience with the most awful sanction. Why, then, should I not join it? Because I am told it has corrupted the faith, added to it, and imposes unwarrantable terms of communion. I will consider this point in my next.

(To be continued.)

CONVERSIONS.

We have the pleasure to announce that a respectable young man, an East Indian, who for many months had been instructed by the Christian Brothers, has been received in the course of last week, into the Catholic communion, by the Rev. J. McCabe.

The same Clergyman a few days ago baptized conditionally a very respectable young man, a native of Scotland, who, for some years past, was anxious to become a member of the Catholic Church.

Selections.

A LETTER, ADDRESSED TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD JOHN RUSSELL, ON THE PAPAL AGGRESSION, BY THE REVEREND HEBER PLAYFAIR, D. D.

[We very slightly abridge this admirable letter.—Ed. Tablet.

My Lord—Many years have elapsed since I had the honour to address you. You were then pleased to favour me with no inconsiderable notice. Whether a similar honour awaits me, I know not; but this I know, that in thus publicly addressing you, I do no more than an act of duty.

My lord, we are told that "the recent divisions of England into various di by Papal authority, of Churchmen their with
sees, the Roman Catholic Bishops have acted in opposition to the Church of England." There is a magic power in every measure that emanates from Rome, for it awakens effectually the energies of Protestants, who look upon it as an aggression upon their spiritual franchise. I am not, therefore, surprised that the establishment of the Papal Hierarchy should have excited the passions of those whose promotion in the Church is not unfrequently commensurate with their hostility to Popery. But that you, my lord, with the memory of your illustrious ancestors fresh upon you—that you, the unwearied advocate of civil and religious liberty, who aided in the glorious work which threw open the portals of the constitution to a proscribed race—that you should have thus acted, unrestrained alike by the responsibility of your station and the feelings of millions, is a proceeding as much above all comprehension as it is degrading to the character of a British statesman. If however, there is no elevation of mind, there is, doubtless, much political tact in your lordship's conduct. You labour, unshrinkingly, as the champion of the Church of England, to preserve her from the encroachments of an ancient foe, and under this ingenious device you endeavour to support your waning popularity. The Church of England, my lord, requires no such subterfuge, and, as one of her Ministers, I disclaim all connection between her wants and your political tactics. Already will your lordship have anticipated my theme—the establishment of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy in England. Since the Emancipation Act there has been no subject so little understood, or productive of so much polemic virulence. The obloquy and threats that have emanated from it, remind us of the dark era that preceded our enactments against the Roman Catholics. If misrepresentation and persecution be characteristic of the followers of Christ, most unquestionably we cannot deny it to the Roman Catholic Church. In every age, in every country, she has excited the worst passions of the worst men. Intrigue, treachery, and anarchy have alternately been imputed to her. My lord, I presume not to constitute myself her apologist. I am unequal to the task. Moreover, she requires it not. The nations she has raised from the savage state—the fetters she has struck from the slave, rusted by the tears of ages—the myriads she has enkindled with the fire of religion—the uniform tenor of a benevolent policy, as exalted for wisdom as it was profound in judgment—display to the world an assemblage of learning, and religion, and benevolence to which no institution under heaven can afford a parallel. This, my lord, is the evidence of impartial history, and it affords a supreme refutation to the bigotry and intolerance that disgrace our country.

My lord, in your memorable letter to the Bishop of Durham, you declare that "no foreign Prince or Potentate will be permitted to fasten his fetters upon a nation which so long, and so nobly, vindicated its right to freedom of opinion—civil, and religious;" "that the liberty of Protestantism has been enjoyed too long in England to allow of any successful attempt to impose a foreign yoke upon our minds and consciences;" and that the religious practices of the Catholic Church are "superstitious mummeries." Let us, my lord, calmly look into these assertions; and first, that the Pope shall not fasten his fetters upon us. My lord, I for one do not dread the attempt. I know of no one individual—lay or clerical, learned or unlearned, noble or ignoble—that does dread it. I have not even heard of one. Do you yourself, my lord, really dread it? In other words, do you really believe in what you have written to the Bishop of Durham? Will you forgive me if I say it is the wretched subterfuge of a more wretched fear of losing office? No one fears that the Pope will attempt to fasten his fetters upon this country. The act would be worse than madness. The Pope has no temporal power in England; no, not one iota. And you know it, my lord. Were he to attempt to assume it, the Catholics would rush to arms, and drive him from our shores. This is their avowed andacknowledged doctrine. And, my lord, you know it. I pass by the cruel and withering doctrines which the perusal of this portion of your missive suggests. It would not become me to dwell upon the fiendish Vandalism you have provoked, nor the wretched distinction you have acquired by the sacrifice of political principle. Turn we then, my lord, to your assurance that "the liberty of Protestantism has been enjoyed too long in England to allow any successful attempt to impose a foreign yoke upon our minds and consciences." It were truly an exercise of charity to believe that you were profoundly ignorant of the meaning of what you have written, for a knowledge to the contrary could not fail to attribute to you the most discreditable motives. The government of the Catholic Church is essentially Episcopal. Her Bishops are to day, in England, precisely what they were seven years since—with this simple distinction, that now their titles are derived from the towns in which they reside—recently they were derived from places which probably they had never seen. Until lately they were termed Vicars-Apostolic—now they are termed Bishops in Ordinary. By the late system they were removeable at the will of the Pope—by the establishment of the present system he has resigned that authority. No Roman Catholic Vicar-Apostolic ever assumed, to officiate in this country, until he had first been authorised by the Pope; but every Vicar-Apostolic up to the present time has been authorised by the Pope; therefore, according to your lordship's doctrine, they were aggressors. Many have been appointed within my remembrance. Yet had there come forth no Prime Minister to parade his fanatical rhodomontade before the public—no starving Curates and hungry adventurers to vituperate with their unmeasured invectives. The Papal Hierarchy is purely a spiritual government. It does not, because it cannot, affect the government of our most gracious Queen. The Catholic Bishops are as far removed from all interference with the secular government of our Queen, as our Protestant Bishop at Jerusalem—our Protestant Bishop in France—nay, our Protestant Bishop in Italy itself, are removed from interference with the government of those respective countries. In name, then, only, is the difference between their Hierarchical and Vicars Apostolic form of government.

What then, means your threat, my lord, that on this subject "the law shall be examined?" In one breath you boast that "England vindicates the right to freedom of religious opinion;" in the next declare that because of its exercise, the establishment of a Roman Catholic Hierarchy, "the law shall be examined!" By what process of reason are we to reconcile these contradictions? My lord, it is neither wise nor prudent to talk of "examining the law" in reference to the Roman Catholics. They are composed of matter equally inflammable with ourselves; and desperate must be the man that would fling the sparks of a fearful ignition amongst them. Conjointly with us they pay the same taxes, obey the same laws, live under the same constitution, and fight the same battles for its preservation. If France were to invade our shores, would you talk of examining the law in reference to Roman Catholics? Shall they who man our fleets and fill our armies, whose bravery and fidelity have never been surpassed—shall they whose Bishop, at the solicitation of our English Government, went to Newfoundland and preserved his people from a general disaffection to the mother country, and for which our Government awarded him a palace and an income—shall they, who furnish the best magistrates and most peaceful citizens, be thus wantonly and ignorantly insulted? My lord, I know of no crime so black, no villany so atrocious, as the work of religious persecution. Beware, I beseech you, how you fulfil the prophecies of those who confound the inspirations of a merciful Deity with the sectarianism of a base sophistry; who trade upon the credulity of the flocks "committed to their charges," and convert the principles of the decalogue into a nefarious commerce. Beware how you give signal success to the rampant bigotry of our Irish Clergy, who gangrene society to its depth and its extremities with the poison of their vulgar prejudices. Beware how you extend the panoply of obsolete Acts of Parliament over that living mass of vice and corruption—the impassioned followers of wild fanaticism. Beware, my lord, I conjure you, lest you disinter the ashes of the worst characters of human nature—lest you, infuse a fiendish ferocity into their renounciated spirit—lest Smithfield should again blaze out in fires of persecution, and our best citizens and most learned men be immolated upon the altars of our Protestant prejudices. Already has your letter disturbed the framework of our social condition, and the absorbing topic of the day, the Hierarchy and penal enactments, has deprived us, as a nation, of the character of religious freedom. It will be well for yourself, my lord, if you are able to restore tranquillity to the country. Your conduct is the experimentalism of a wretched policy, aggravated by the positive worthlessness of your political career. How keenly do we now feel the great loss sustained in the death of Sir R. Peel. Never was contrast so glorious to one statesman—so humiliating to the other. It is more than Julus by the side of Æneas.

My lord, at the conclusion of your letter, you think proper to designate the religious practices of the Roman Catholic Church a "superstitious mummery." Unfeignedly, my lord, am I sorry that you have done so. On the subject of the practices and doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church the greatest and best men have differed. With reverence, and judgment, and learning, have these points been examined. Still was there difficulty—there was still disagreement. But with you, my lord, it is otherwise. You seem to experience no difficulty in determining the practices of the Roman Catholic Church to be a "superstitious mummery." Give me leave to ask, by what authority do you sit in judgment upon so momentous a subject? What power has constituted you a tribunal of appeal? What are your lordship's qualifications the office? An aptitude for the employment of political stratagems that libel the religion of the largest body of Christians in the universe—an aptitude which concentrates into a common focus the incarnate bigotry of the country, and the mindless warfare of your favourite Scotch Presbyter. But your qualifications end not here. In the dramatic world you are known for the signal failures of laboured bombast, and in the political world for the dismantlure of a "finality" policy. In the one not even your name and position could command success—whilst in the other, you are tolerated by the satellites, that revolve around you for place and emolument. There is scarcely an index in the political thermometer at which you have not arrived, from the burning heat of reducing the number of our Bishops to the frigid policy of "Bibles and claymores." Yet you are the man, my lord, who presumes to judge the religion of two hundred millions—that has in hostility arrayed class against class—that has termed the religious practices of our Jeromes and Austins, of Charlemagne and sainted Edward, of the heroes of Poictiers and Cressy "a superstitious mummery." My lord, Protestant though I be, and sincerely attached to my Church I scruple not to avow that you have grievously injured her. The intolerant spirit evoked—the angry feelings aroused—the persecuting power and assumed infallibility of our Church, which are the direct consequences of your letter, will lead to greater defection from the Church of England than the writing of the Tractarians, or the preaching of Rome could ever effect. How have you, my lord, strengthened the argument of the infidel, who believes the differences of Christian Churches to be the inherent weakness of their religion! How have you encouraged the latitudinarian policy which inundated France at the close of the last centuary! It is true, my lord, that infidelity is nobly combatted, and that the results are evident in the progress of Christianity. It is no less true that the honour of the struggle belongs not exclusively to us. If the practical results of infidelity be no longer visible amongst us—if we no longer behold the results of that system of ethics which, superseding the evidences of revealed truth, compiled from the rocks, and floods, and fields, its standard of moral rectitude, we must thank the Roman Catholic Church equally with our own. If that edifice of every unclean passion, of learning without religion, and genius without principle, be razed to the ground—if the name of its architect, the greatest genius of modern philosophy, revive the remembrance of the conflict of Christianity with the infidel school of Voltaire, D'Alembert, and Diderot, we must thank the Roman Catholic Church equally with our own. An undivided glory is not ours; but, be ours the moral courage to acknowledge it.

How is it, my lord, that for years and years, from boyhood to manhood from the tracts published by religious fanaticism, to the volumes written by hireling defamation, our minds have been filled with the stratagems and horrors of the Papacy? The human mind was said to be enslaved by it, and the freedom of the Gospel to have shrunk at its approach. And, even now, in the middle of the nineteenth century—in the full blaze of science and literature—these monstrous calumnies are believed, and even amongst those who know better the instances of a generous defence are exceedingly rare. And, notwithstanding all this, the Papacy is on the increase. From her persecutions and her blood Missionaries have sprung up, carrying her doctrines, per ignes et hostes, over the whole earth. And how is it so? This is a question, my lord, which, as Churchmen, we should propose to ourselves, but which neither misrepresentation, nor bigotry, nor intolerance can answer. However painful may be the acknowledgment, it is only an homage due to truth to declare that the Priesthood of the Papacy has long since shamed the general conduct of our Clergy. Be their religious practices "superstitious mummeries" or not, they wield, for the most benevolent purposes, the greatest engine ever wielded by human power. Their regularity of life, their abnegation of self, their general development of the most refined humanity, their attendance in the sick chamber, undismayed by the most fatal disease, where they frequently inhale the incipiency to their own death, the instinctive resignation under which they fall victims of the sublimest charity, entitle them, in a supreme degree, to the sanctifying virtues of religion, and illustrate their excellent conservatism of peace and order. I do not, therefore, marvel at the hostility arrayed against a movement that presents, in prominent relief, the unquestionable superiority of the Papal Priesthood over the Clergy of the Established Church. My lord, although I am firmly attached to the principles of the Church of England, I cannot deny my testimony of respect and veneration to the virtue and excellence of the Roman Catholic Church. I do not understand the prevalent doctrine which attributes exclusive excellence to its own little community. If I correctly understand my own Church, this is not the character of her teaching.

My lord, I am no friend to the Pope of Rome, beyond the admiration of an enlarged humanity and heroic benevolence. Deep penetration, profound judgment, and gigantic grasp of intellect, will not be denied to Pius IX. by the most superficial observer of the age. A man of this stamp will always command respect; and I would presume upon your lordship's concurrence in pitying the stunted intellect that is unable to appreciate him. If the Pope has acted in strange departure from these great guides—if he has usurped the authority of our Church—surely his Bishops are amenable to the law, who are already found obeying his behests. They are within reach, with Cardinal Wiseman at their head; and if they have violated constitutional rights, why not arrest them? Arrest them, my lord, by all means. But they will cheerfully endure it! Enact new laws, impregnated with the spirit of judicial murder, and try these spiritual aggressors by them. This also, they will endure. Pack a jury, secure a verdict, and let a religious Lord Jeffreys pronounce sentence. Good, my lord; but stop not here. Strike down the power of a free press, choke the channels of justice throughout the country, convert England into an Ecclesima, and let the atrocities of the French Revolution grow pale in the contrast of Protestant exterminators of Christianity. Nay, my lord, hesitate not, but let the work be accomplished, and the spirit of the rabble and the pickpockets of the country be gratified. Let the greatest conservatism of peace and order be prostrated to the ground, and the Moloch of infidelity triumph in its ruins. But, my lord, these men will not falter. They will endure all you can conceive, and your extremities inflict. With the example of their martyred ancestors before them, they will resign themselves without a murmur to the sacrifice. It may, however, be prudent to pause even at the threshold of the act. My lord, this is not the age for persecution. We are an intelligent people, and are sensitively alive to all injustice. To attempt persecution on account of religion may gratify a party, but the gratification may be purchased by the stability of the empire. Measures of this character stamp the country where they are perpetrated with eternal infamy. They are the materials with which history builds her great edifice. Pause, then, my lord, I beseech you, before you prove to the world that in England the freedom of religious opinion is checked—that the liberty of conscience is penal, and that her Church is sustained by the elements of fulmen brutum. Let us not forget our dignity as a nation, and a Church, by any act unworthy of one or the other. If the Papacy be instituted by human wisdom, she will fall within her own bosom she will bear the seeds of dissolution and decay. If our Church is of God and truth, what can we have to fear from such an establishment?

Really, my lord, the idea is so absurd that it would indicate an absence of respect were I to attempt to refute it. The law benches are Protestant—the Parliament is Protestant—the army is Protestant—the navy is Protestant—all England is Protestant—and yet our Prime Minister states that, because a handful of Bishops have taken their titles from their places of residence, "the law shall be examined." Is this madness or meanness, or what is it? My lord, I am bold, but I cannot help it. The cause more than justifies me. See you not that your threat will strengthen the Church of the Papacy; that, notwithstanding the wealth of the country, the influence of our Church, and the power of the State, the Papacy is progressing so rapidly, that you find it is necessary to enact laws to arrest her progress? My lord, the Church of England is not in danger; and if the ark of truth were to totter, it should not be sustained by the unholy hand that has written, it may be, the proscription for millions. O! how have you fallen from your high state! O! the narrow dimensions to which a wretched fanaticism has reduced you! You have done what neither Fox nor Pitt would have dared to do; what the eloquence of Burke would have clothed with awful responsibility; what the judgment of Canning would have shunned, and the genius of Peel would have spurned as a mindless ambition. Supported by an active bigotry, and the refined ingenuity of Episcopal malice, you thus stand isolated from everything that dignifies the character of a British statesman. The base minds that cheer you, and the speculating sycophants that do your beck, will die with the cause that produced them. But with you, my lord, it is not so; An unenviable distinction is yours. Already has history claimed you for her own, and she will transmit you to posterity as the man who entered the temple of the constitution, and dared to snatch from her hallowed altar the fire of "civil and religious liberty."

I have the honour to be, my lord, your lordship's obedient and humble servant,

HEBER PLAYFAIR.

Tyrrington, near Durham, Dec. 1850.

RESOLUTIONS ON THE SUBJECT OF THE RECENT ROMAN CATHOLIC PROCEEDINGS.—To be moved by Lord John Russell in the House of Commons, and by Lord Overstone in the House of Peers, on Monday, February 10.

"Whereas an instrument executed by the Bishop of Rome, pretending to constitute her Majesty's realm of England a province of the Roman Church, and to divide the same into sees, and to appoint Bishops thereof, has been published extensively.

"And whereas this country is by its constitution subject to no authority except that residing in and emanating from the lawful Sovereign and of the United Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, and will ever maintain its independence against all foreign intervention whatsoever.

"And whereas the Bishop of Rome has no lawful authority or power in this country, and no person can lawfully exercise power, authority, or jurisdiction in England on his behalf, or in his name, or under his control.

"And whereas great disquiet has been occasioned to her Majesty's loyal subjects and made known by petitions to this House, because of the invasion of her Majesty's royal prerogative and supreme authority, and great indignation because of the outrage on the constitutional rights and prescriptive usages of England and the Protestant feeling of the people of this country, and of the public insult to her Majesty's crown and dignity.

"Resolved—That such pretended Bishops of English sees, have no lawful authority over sees in this country, and that persons acting under such instrument possess no power or authority whatsoever, and that no obedience is due from any of her Majesty's subjects to any such pretended Bishops or persons so acting; but that if any such pretended Bishops or persons acting under such instrument proceed to exercise authority by force or compulsion, such proceeding will be illegal, and will be punished on due prosecution of the offenders in the courts of law.

"That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, embodying the foregoing resolution, and requesting that her Majesty will graciously make known the same by her royal proclamation to the people of this realm.

"Also stating, that this House ever holds itself bound to co-operate with her Majesty's Government in the framing and the enacting of measures that may be from time to time most suitable to secure full liberty of conscience and free exercise of religious observances within the law to every denomination of Christians, and to render the ecclesiastical institutions of this country as by law established more efficient, so that they may continue more firm, under Divine Providence, in the affections of her Majesty's subjects."—Friend of India.

THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY.—The University Committee held its usual monthly meeting on Wednesday. The members present were:—The Lord Primate in the chair; the Lord Bishop of Meath, the Lord Bishop of Waterford, the Lord Bishop of Clogher; Rev. Dr. O'Hanlon, Rev. Dr. Cooper, Rev. Dr. Leahy, Rev. Dr. O'Brien, Waterford, Rev. Mr. Brennan, P.P., Rev. Mr. Maher, P.P.; Michael Errington, Esq. W. Nugent Skelly, Esq., Thomas Meagher, Esq., M. P., James Ferrall, Esq., and Thomas Boylan, Esq. The amount collected was nearly 1,700*l.*—a sum which bears a most encouraging testimony to the zeal which is generally awakened among Catholics for this noble undertaking. The subscriptions raised in different parishes amounted, some of them, to 130*l.* or 150*l.* A penny subscription in one parish, that of the Rev. Mr. Maher, had raised 100*l.* It was determined to have simultaneous meetings next St. Patrick's Day for the purpose of raising funds throughout Ireland. The subscription list is being prepared, and, we understand, will be ready for Tuesday.—Tablet.

Cardinal Wiseman's reply to the address of the Roman Catholic Bishops and Clergy of Cork, says:—"In my own name, and in that of my brother Bishops, I beg to offer to your lordship and your Clergy our warmest thanks, and the expression of our sincerest affection, strengthened by the new proofs which we are now receiving of strong and generous friendship. The violent excitement which has been caused by the just and salutary measure of the Holy See is fast subsiding; and I trust that more reasonable views will soon succeed to the misapprehensions which have been too industriously raised upon the subject."

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 13.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1851. [VOL. X

BENAGL CATHOLIC HERALT

Calcutta: Saturday, March 29, 1851.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

WEDNESDAY—2ND WEEK.

We have been favoured with the following outline of the Lenten Lecture delivered at St. Thomas' Church by His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, V. A. W. B:—

"Say that these my two Sons may sit, the one on thy right hand, and the other on the left in thy kingdom. And Jesus answering said: You know not what you ask."—Matt. XX. v. 21.

In calling the world into existence, the Almighty Wisdom assigned to every iota of creation, both the place it was to occupy and the function it was to fulfil. This admirable arrangement, we see fully carried out and beautifully exemplified in the human body, that mysterious compendium of all that is great and wonderful in the universe.

In this way, in all that concerns the physical or material world, the disposition of its parts, and the enactment of rules or laws for the government of even its minutest details, the Almighty would intimate to us the still greater importance, and necessity, of upholding a like economy in the moral order. In effect, as the whole material world, together with its laws was created for Man's use and benefit, all its rules and arrangements must be necessarily regarded, as only of very secondary moment, if compared with those, established by God, for the preservation of the moral order. If this be so, and that it is so, human reason alone suffices to demonstrate, then, it is easy for us to infer, from the alarming temporal consequences, which would inevitably ensue to mankind, if, even for an instant, the system of laws ordained for the government of the material universe, were disturbed, how infinitely more disastrous to the best and most enduring interests of the human race, must be the effects of any violation of the moral relations, by which Man, is bound towards that Almighty Being, from whose purely gratuitous bounty and love, he received both his existence, and his reason, as well as all the other exalted attributes, which elevate him so much in the scale of creation, and mark him out, unmistakably, as made to the image of God, and as the destined inheritor of a never ending immortality.

If therefore, in calling the material world into existence, the Almighty Wisdom assigned even to the least portion of it, its particular place and function, from either of which it could not deviate without violating the end of its creation, and rendering itself an anomaly and a species of monster in the Natural Order, it is still far more evident, that the same Almighty power, must have assigned to each rational creature, to each individual Man, the particular state and calling, he was to occupy, during his career upon earth, and that it would be a grievous deordination for Man, to disregerd this appointment of God in his behalf, and from human motives, considerations or interests, to choose for himself in life, a path, different from that, which had been marked out for him by his Creator. In effect, the rational Being, who would act thus disorderly, would, by doing so, render himself in the moral order, what in the natural or physical order a material being would become, if it deviated from its appointed path or course, viz., an anomaly, which by departing from its fixed place and functions, not only ceased to be useful, but became the perverse occasion of disturbance and confusion in the order to which it belonged.

It is then of the utmost importance towards Salvation, that each person should choose that state or vocation in life, which God has appointed for him. For, if he conform thus to the Will of his Creator, he will have reason to expect from Divine Providence, the graces and helps his infirmity may stand in need of, to enable him to fulfil the duties of his state and thus work out his salvation. Whereas, if disregarding the Will of his Creator, he follow only the suggestions of caprice or ambition or worldly interest, in his choice of a state of life, he will forfeit the lights and helps, which the Providence of the Creator had prepared for him in his appointed vocation, and thus be exposed to difficulties and dangers, which, may prove fatal to his virtue here and to his happiness hereafter. What happens thus in the order of Religion, may be readily illustrated, by examples taken fr— the familiar occurrences of life. The Na— tor, who before he enters upon an uncertain and perilous voyage, prudently and deligently enquires from experienced Seamen, concerning the open and concealed dangers of his proposed enterprise, concerning the prevailing winds and currents, which he may have to encounter, will thus enable himself, to provide against many mishaps, and inauspicious occurrences, which might prove fatal to an unskilful mariner, who, without any like precaution, might rashly engage in an undertaking for which he had made no suitable preparation. What has been said of the Mariner, may be also affirmed of the traveller, who, instead of pursuing the path fixed upon as secure, by the wisdom and experience of preceding wayfarers, decides, imprudently and, unadvisedly, to adopt a course hitherto untried and beset with dangers, against which he can at best but very inadequately defend himself, on account of his ignorance and inexperience. Now the passage from the womb to the grave, is, at once, a voyage and a journey, entered upon for the first time, by each Child of Adam. The perils and difficulties attendant upon it, we can learn to appreciate, only from the lessons of wisdom, inculcated by those, who have gone before us and who by their own experience, have qualified themselves, to instruct those, who are to follow them in the same career.

In order then for each person to ascertain the state or vocation appointed for him by God, the counsel of a prudent adviser is ordinarily necessary. But the prudence here required, is that which dictates to the enquirer, to seek in the first place the kingdom of God and his justice, and which values the world and the things of the world, only in subordination to their compatibility with the pursuit of the kingdom of God and his justice.

"The soul of a holy Man, says Ecclesiasticus discovereth sometimes true things, more than seven watch-men, that sit upon a tower to watch. Chap. 37." But besides seeking counsel, mark also, what the Spirit of God enjoins in the same place.

"But above all these things pray to the Most High, that he may direct thy way in truth."

Another condition necessary to be attended to, in order to know the Will of God in our regard, is designated by the Saviour, in the 14th Chapter of St. Luke, in the parable of the Wise Man, who, before he begins to build a tower, sits down to enquire if he hath means to finish it. St. Gregory Nazianzen declares that on the right choice of a state of life depends the prospect of a Man's good or bad career in time and eternity. The truth of this assertion cannot be better illustrated than by referring to the unhappy results of inconsiderate marriages. &c., &c.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

Lecture on Mechanics.

In addition to the Lectures on Chemistry hitherto delivered on every Tuesday in St. John's College, arrangements have been made as stated in a former number of the Bengal Catholic Herald for the delivery of Lectures on Mechanics, every Thursday morning, by the Rev. Mr. Stephenson. The following is a brief outline of the first Lecture. The Lecturer having dwelt at the opening of his discourse for some moments, on the many advantages arising from a knowledge of the principles of this branch of Natural Philosophy, and also on the pleasure which the mind feels in a study of such great practical utility, proceeded to explain the terms of most frequent occurrence in treatises on Mechanics. Natural Philosophy, he defined to be a science which investigates the laws of nature, or in other words a science, having for its object the investigation of the properties and the motion of matter. Of this grand science, Mechanics (a term derived from a Greek word signifying a Machine,) was but a branch, which in particular investigated the nature, laws and effects of force on solid bodies. By a body we are to understand, in general terms, every thing that is the object of our senses, such viz. as we can either feel or see: here the Lecturer noticed the Philosophical destinction between the terms, matter and body. Matter was that of which a body was composed, while the term body was applied to the thing itself. This he exemplified by a reference to a block of wood, the matter was the wood which composed the block and the block itself was the body. The properties of matter next came under consideration, and of these four in particular were explained.

Extension, solidity, inactivity, and susceptibility of motion. Extension comprises length, breath and thickness. Solidity is that property by which one body excludes all others from occupying the same place which itself holds. The porous nature of bodies by which they are hindered from occupying in reality all that place which they seem to fill was then adverted to.

This porosity was exemplified by a reference to the extraction of air from the bodies of the hardest metals. The inactivity of a body was its incapacity to move of itself when at rest, or to stop when in motion. Here the Lecturer took occasion to remove the erroneous impression, that bodies when ceasing to move, ceased from motion of themselves. The cessation was stated to be altogether attributable to the influence of external agents, always either accelerating or impeding motion. These agents were the air, friction and whatever else served to oppose it and motion. The fourth property or susceptibility of motion was too apparent to need explanation. All bodies were capable of being put in motion by the action of some external agent, the Lecturer concluded by a brief statement of the properties to be explained on the following day, of which we shall give the details in our next.

STATE OF MORALITY IN PROTESTANT COUNTRIES.

SWEDEN.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

Sir,—I beg to call your attention to the accompanying article, on the recent execution of two Murderers in Sweden. In thus inviting your attention to the painful and disgusting details described in that article, I declare to declare solemnly and conscientously, that my object is, by no means, to give pain to Protestants of any denomination, but to try to induce them to take occasion from this and such other statistical accounts compiled by persons of their own persuasion, to enquire and reflect impartially upon the causes, to which they are to ascribe the melancholy and humiliating moral degradation of the people, to which these narratives may have reference.

The man, indeed, who could read over or refer to such narratives with any other feeling, than that of charity and compassion for the weakness and corruption of human nature, and of a sincere desire, to co-operate, according to his ability, to apply a healing remedy to the evils they describe, would hold, in my estimate, but little claim, to bear the honorable appellation of "a good Christian."

Neither does it seem to me, to be worthy of one, who glories in that honorable epithet, to read over narratives such as I now speak of, with apathy and unconcern, heedless alike of the grievous injury done by sin both to God and to Society, and to the temporal and eternal welfare of thousands of our fellow-creatures.

But it may be asked, is it not true, that if we view impartially the moral condition of the several states of Christendom, we shall be disposed to conclude, that on the whole, there is but little reason, to give to any one, more than another of them, a preference, for that, in truth, the difference, if any, between them, in virtue or in vice, is occasioned, only by some accidental transitory contingency, and not by reason of the different religious creeds, which they may respectively profess.

To such an observation, I would answer, that, even though I were to admit, which I by no means do, that in point of fact, its justness was vindicated by the actual state of the several Christian nations of the Universe, yet, there would still exist weighty reasons, which should urge those concerned in the promotion of virtue, to ascertain, which are the countries, where the predominant vices may be legitimately traced to the prevalence of dangerous and irreligious principles, and which are those, where the pre-railing crimes may be justly ascribed, not to the influence of erroneous or corrupt maxims, but, simply, to the practical disregard of moral tenets, which, though recognised in theory as Divine, are nevertheless either forgotten, or disregarded in the hour of temptation.

It requires but little reflection, to enable any one to appreciate as it deserves, the distinction I have just drawn between those countries, in which, vice luxuriates, because of the bad seed which has been sown in them, and others, in which vice predominates, because, through the unholy influence of the bad passions of the human heart, the good seed, not being cultured as it ought to be, is prevented from fructifying.

The distinction I have drawn may be illustrated, by referring to the case of two persons, each of whom I suppose to have been guilty of the same species of crime. Let me suppose that one of these parties was led thus astray by the adoption of certain dangerous and erroneous principles. With respect to this person it is clear, that under the influence of a misguided conscience, he will without remorse persevere in crime, until he be first convinced of the error of the principles, by which his conduct has been governed. Now, if the false principles, by which his erroneous conscience has been occasioned, be such, as to teach him, to rely wholly on his own lights in all that regards religion, there is every reason to fear, that not being disabused of his wrong notions, he will become habituated to guilt, so that, even, if perchance, he should be at length, informed of his error, yet, he will have been, by this time, so confirmed in crime, that indulgence in it will have acquired all the force of nature in his regard, and that nothing short, as it were, of a miracle of Divine Grace will suffice to bring him effectually to repentance.

Contrast now, with the enduring and almost incurable evils, which must hence ensue to [illegible] and to Society, the comparatively minor [illegible] more transitory injuries, which may [illegible] from the misconduct of the man, who, [illegible] the erroneous [illegible] has been misled, [illegible] the Sinner's conscience has strong incentives to arise from insensibility, both in the remorse and the reproaches, which the sound principles he acknowledges, will suggest to his conscience, and also in the obligation imposed on him by his religion, of having immediate recourse to sacramental confession. It is certainly true, that notwithstanding all these considerations, the Sinner although he may fully admit their great importance, may still continue to sin. But then, he does so, in direct opposition and contradiction to truths of faith and morality, which he firmly believes to be Divine; and does so, in spite of the worm of remorse, which ever gnaws his guilty conscience, and hence, however imperceptible it may be to human eyes, a terrible war rages in his interior, which forces him to try to conceal himself from himself, in order thus, if possible, to mitigate the suffering he endures from the harrowing and festering wounds, which sicken and lacerate his soul.

In these circumstances, it is not too much to hope, that after some interval at least, this unhappy man will be brought to repentance. But, whatever be the period, at which the Grace of God may visit him, the same principles, which left him no rest whilst he was impenitent, will with redoubled energy, incite him when visited by the Divine Mercy to bring forth worthy fruits of penance—to imitate the penitent David who mingled ashes with his bread, and his drink with his tears—to copy the example of Zacheus and make restitution, four-fold if necessary, to those whom he may have defrauded, and to distribute, from the rest of his earthly goods, alms abundantly to the poor.

The preceding instances, I have selected, in order to show, that though the same species of crime was admitted to have been perpetrated by the two persons referred to in these illustrations, yet, that, whilst in one case, the moral evil committed was often rendered incurable, by the unsound dangerous principles of the guilty party, in the other, there existed great reason, justified by experience, to hope, that the sinner would be brought to repent, however [illegible] age sin, to have recourse without delay to a minister of religion, to confess contritely [illegible] his sin, and receive, with humble docility, the injunctions, which his Pastor may prescribe, for the purpose of enforcing due reparation for his fault to God and man, and [illegible] ding him against the danger of relapse [illegible] similar offence. In this second case,

[illegible] conversion improbable, as [illegible] the same bad principles, when even, in spite of their influence, the unhappy man may have been made to see his error with all [illegible] taint the character of his repentance, and cause him to mistake the hallucinations of fanaticism, for that profound contrition and change of heart, which the history of the Ministers, of David, of Magdalen, of Zacheus, so beautifully illustrates. It would be easy to sustain the justness of what I have just now intimated, by a reference to the conduct of several recent criminals in England, both after their conviction and at the place of Execution—on the other hand, even at the worst of times, and when there was question of characters stained with grievous crimes, yet so long as they retained sound religious principles, their death scene, whether on the scaffold or on their bed, was ordinarily one, which proved to the world, their heartfelt sorrow, and if they were rich, their earnest desire to compensate, as far as they then could, for the disedification they gave during their lives, by generous alms to the poor, and by the establishment of Holy Institutions, whose Inmates should be always devoted to the service of God and of their neighbour.

The records of every country, where Catholicity once prevailed, supply abundant testimony, in support of the statement, which I have here advanced.

On the other hand, I am grieved to affirm, that, as far as my opportunities (and they have not been rare) enable me to speak, I am reluctantly obliged to say, that the death-bed of Protestants, in similar circumstances, ordinarily exhibits a cold, heartless scene, in which, if the service of their clergy be at all introduced, for frequently, if not generally it is not made use of, that service consists of a mere rubrical routine, devoid of unction on the part of the officiating minister, and listened to, or joined in listlessly and apathetically, as well by the Spectators, as by the party chiefly concerned in the solemnity. On such occasions, who has ever heard of the dying sinner openly confessing and bewailing his sins? Who has ever heard of him imploring to be raised from his soft couch and laid on ashes, in testimony of his penitence? Who has ever heard of his making substantial reparation for the injury done by him, to the character, or property of his neighbour? And, if the great wealth, Protestants so often possess, be considered, what signs have they of whom we speak ever given, in token of their repentance, which for a moment, could be compared, with the magnificent comprehensive, gigantic foundations raised in similar circumstances, in the case of Catholic opulency? None, certainly None.

As far as regards the welfare of Society, the estimate to be formed of the two persons whom I have contrasted in the preceding part of this letter, must, then I think, be greatly in favor of him, whose misconduct arose, not from his deliberately acting a bad, or dangerous principles, but from the infirmity of human nature. If this be so, it is obvious, that, according to the same reasoning, there may be found in distinct Countries, classes, equally numerous, of transgressors, of which these two individuals may be deemed types, and that still, the moral condition of the country represented by those of that Class, to which he belonged, in whose favor we have inclined, should be pronounced, to be far superior to that of others in a different Country, whose perverted principles shut out almost every hope, either of their being brought to understand the iniquity of their ways, or of their being taught, even after they had been made sensible of their misconduct, sound doctrine, as to the reparation they owe to God, to Religion and to Society.

Hence, it may be deduced, that the criminal tubular Statistics of different Countries ordinarily furnish only an imperfect medium, for enabling us to form a contrast between the moral conditions of their respective inhabitants. For, besides the numerical data which these supply, a thousand other minute circumstances, with which long and familiar acquaintance is necessary, are to be taken into consideration, before an accurate conclusion can be established.

But, if, on the other hand, it can be satisfactorily proved, that the majority, or a very large proportion of the people of any country, are either grossly ignorant of the principles, by which they should discern between vice and virtue, or what is far worse, if it can be shown, that, they are imbued with perverse dangerous tenets, and that they are in this unhappy condition, although, they enjoy besides peace, and prosperity, all the benefits of a well ordered Police, and of the ministry of a numerous, and, in a human point of view, an influential and a richly endowed State Clergy, then, indeed, may we lawfully infer, that the moral condition of that people must be truly deplorable, both in itself, and because, it leaves no reasonable room to hope, for any amelioration, under the existing state of things.

Still further, if the state of things, as regards morality, in any Country be found on enquiry to be such, that the criteria, both Civil and religious lead to the same conclusion, and if moreover, the evidence supplied by these criteria be borne out, by important public occurrences participated in by a numerous portion of the people, then, nothing is wanting to that conclusion, to entitle its allegations to be believed by the public.

Nothing more therefore remains for me to do, on the present occasion than to lay before my readers, in a subjoined appendix, satisfactory evidence, drawn from the various data I have just enumerated, in order to prove that the moral condition of Protestant Sweden is unhappily in as degenerate and degraded a state, as it almost possible for any Country to be reduced to, whilst it remains even nominally Christian. It will be easy for those, who may wish to do so, to decide by means of similar Criteria, to those here adduced, how far the moral condition of Germany, England, Scotland, or other Protestant Countries differs from, or approximates to that of Protestant Sweden.

I remain Sir,
Your's &c.
A CATHOLIC.

Calcutta: March 27, 1851.

EXECUTION IN SWEDEN.

The following extraordinary statement is made in a letter from Ystad, in Sweden, dated the 28th ult.:—'This morning having been fixed for the execution of a journeyman butcher, named Marcusson, and a woman named Botilla Nilsdotter, for having murdered the husband of the latter, a vast number of persons of all ages and both sexes, and especially of peasants in their national costumes, arrived last evening and bivouacked in the town all night. Although for upwards of 60 years no execution had taken place in the province, and for upwards of eight years none in all Sweden, it was not so much curiosity which attracted the multitude, as the desire to swallow a drop of the blood of the criminals at the moment it should spurt from beneath the axe of the executioner; it being a popular belief in Sweden that it renders the weak strong, cures all sorts of maladies, and secures a long life. When the scaffold was erected the people assembled round with cups, glasses, bowls, some even with large saucepans, to catch the blood. The soldiers had the greatest difficulty in forming and maintaining an open space. The two culprits, who were very penitent, arrived on the ground at seven o'clock, and after listening to the exhortations of the priests*, gave themselves up to the executioner. The woman was first beheaded—then the man. The anxiety of the spectators was very great, and the moment the man's head was severed, they broke through the line of soldiers. The soldiers to drive them back lustily employed the butt ends of their muskets (the muskets were not loaded), and a desperate conflict ensured. At last the crowd succeeded in reaching the scaffold: but in the meantime the police had placed the bodies in a cart, and had sent them off under a strong escort of cavalry. They had, however, to take the precaution of removing by spades and pickaxes the portions of the road on which drops of blood happened to fall, to prevent the people from lapping up the blood. When the bodies had got fairly off, the crowd gradually dispersed; two hundred of them were grievously injured, and a greater number had received severe contusions. —Galignani's Messenger, February 8.

* Lutheran Ministers.

APPENDIX TO THE LETTER OF A CATHOLIC ON THE MORAL CONDITION OF PROTESTANT SWEDEN.

The authorities on which the statements advanced in this Appendix are exclusively Protestant and we may add very bigoted writers in all that concers Catholicity:—

[DUBLIN REVIEW, No. XXVIII.]

"In no country in Europe is the Church establishment so powerful and perfect. In Sweden there is not merely an union of Church and State—the Church is a distinct component portion of the State, equal in its constitutional share in the legislature, to the whole body of the aristocracy, or of the representatives of the people, and possessing extensive authority and influence, besides its share in the legislature, through the department of government for Church affairs. It has but one religion—its own—to deal with in the nation; there being no Catholics, nor Calvinists among the Swedes, and is undisturbed by sectarianism or dissent of any note, from its doctrines or forms.

"Notwithstanding this powerful, effective, and complete Church establishment, and notwithstanding this very wide diffusion of education and religious instruction, by parental and clerical tuition, and by an extensive and efficient national establishment of public schools suitable to all classes, the Swedish nation stands among the lowest in the scale of morality. No other three millions of moral beings in Europe appear to commit within a given time so large an amount of crime and moral transgressions."—Notes of a Traveller &c. by Samuel Laing Esq.

Sweden being such a "true Protestant" country, the right of private judgment must, as a matter of course, be allowed in all its latitude. But Mr. Laing says:—

"The Swede has no freedom of mind, no power of dissent in religious opinion from the established Church; because although toleration nominally exists, a man not baptized, confirmed, and instructed by the clergyman of the establishment, could not communicate in the established Church, and could not marry or [illegible] exercise any act of majority as a citizen—would in fact, be an outlaw." "Hadelos Medfind, or contempt of God, is a crime for which, from 1830 to 1836 inclusive, 14 [illegible] condemned to death, or to slavery in quarries. In this crime, as in treason, poverty, institute the proceedings: that is, the ecclesiastical department, the Minister of State for Church affairs, orders the prosecution. It is not, therefore, an old remnant of monkish law, working unobserved by government in rare cases; but it is inquisition law, working in the hands of a Lutheran State-Church, as thoroughly as in Spain or Portugal, in the hands of a Roman Catholic Church. The undefined nature of the crime which may be twisted so as to comprehend all sorts of religious dissent; the immoral nature of the evidence which generally must rest upon the espionage of servants or guests, as in the case I heard of; and the guilt itself, which religion takes out of the hands of man and punishes here or hereafter in its own way, makes this no object for human law to deal with in enlightened times." "The crime of 'mockery of the public service of God, or contemptuous behaviour during the same,' is the first in the rubric of the second class of crimes: that is, it comes after murder, blasphemy, sodomy, but before perjury, forgery, or theft. It is, evidently, a very undefined crime but is visited with punishment in chains for various terms of years, as a crime against the Church establishment. Between 1830, and 1836, not fewer than 242 persons have been condemned to chains for this crime in Sweden. Who will say that the Inquisition was abolished by Luther's Reformation? It has only been incorporated with the State in Lutheran countries, and exercised by the Church through the ecclesiastical department of government in the civil courts, instead of in the Church courts. The thing itself remains in vigour; Lord Molesworth was right when he said, that the whole of the northern people of Lutheran countries, had lost their liberties ever since they changed their religion for a better."—p. 325-6.

General State of the Lutheran Church.

"It is the consequence of this inherent contradiction in Lutheranism, and of its false position, from retaining a ceremonial shorn of all that gives it weight in the sister Church of Rome, a material external splendour, and a spiritual internal meaning, that in every country the Lutheran church is dead."

Religious belief of the people.

SWEDEN AND DENMARK.

"The faith of the people of Sweden was very much overturned by the 'Preachers of Humanity,' sent forth by the Infidel University of Copenhagen. At present one may travel through these countries and perhaps not find anything like the gospel in twenty parishes."—Robert Haldane p. 61.

Criminal Statistics in Sweden.

"In that year the number of persons prosecuted for criminal offences was 29,983; convicted 25,013. In the country courts there were tried 28 cases of murder, 12 of child-murder, and 7 of poisoning. In the town courts: one of murder, 1 of incendiarism and murder, and 1 of robbery, incendiarism, and murder, united, for all which 62 persons were condemned. In the country courts, there were also 6 cases of violent robbery 16 of perjury, and 4 of incendiarism, for which 35 persons were convicted. In the town courts there were also 112 cases of forgery. In both courts there were 3196 cases of theft; 21 suffered under the northern inquisition for contempt of public worship. The divorces in the year were 147; the suicides 172. Of the 2714 children born in Stockholm in that year, 1577 were legitimate, 1137 illegitimate, making only a balance of 440 chaste mothers out of 2714, and the proportion of illegitimate to legitimate children not as 1 to 2, 3-10, but as 1 to 1½."

Female Morality.

The proportion of illegitimate to legitimate births was, according to Mr. Laing, for all Sweden, 1 to 14; for England and Wales, 1 to 19; for Stockholm (population 75,000), 1 to 2, 3-10; Paris, 1 to 5; London and Middlesex 1 to 38. But, as Mr. Laing well observes:—

"Figures do not bring home to our imaginations the moral condition of a population so depraved as that of Stockholm. In such a society, the offspring of secret adultery, and the births merely saved from illegitimacy by the tardy marriage of the parents, must be numerous in proportion to the general profligacy. If it were possible to deduct these from the one side of the account, and add them to the other to which they morally belong, what a singular picture of depravity on a great scale this city presents. Suppose a traveller standing in the streets of Edinburgh, and able to say, from undeniable public returns—"One out of every three persons passing me is, on an average, the offspring of illicit intercourse; and 1 out of every 49 has been convicted within these twelve months of some criminal offence." The remarkably low moral feeling in this community appears from the following fact. In all large cities in the present age, houses of ill-fame—brothels where they do exist—are silently tolerated by the local authorities, as evils which the police must watch over, and which the growing sense of decency, of religion, of morality, among the lower classes, their better education, their greater temperance, and higher civilization can alone remedy. But to openly establish them where they did not exist before, under the authority of government, and as one of its public institutions for the health or morals of the people: to hire a hotel for such a purpose in a principal street; collect unfortunate females to live in it, and give out a code of regulations for their conduct towards the public, appears a trait scarcely credible; yet this was done within these three years here, and the establishment was only abandoned because the wretched inmates fell victims to the barbarity of the regulations."—p. 115.

Mr. Laing frequently intimates an opinion that the Reformation has not been beneficial to Sweden. But surely this must be a mistake. One of his reasons for this odd and unaccountable fancy is, "that the change was the act of government, connected apparently with the policy of the new dynasty, and supported by an enlightened few, and by the inferior resident clergy, not averse to be relieved from celibacy and other restraints."

General Morality of the Swedish Population.

On the moral condition of Sweden, Mr. Laing throws considerable light. He observes:—

"It is a singular and embarassing fact that the Swedish nation, isolated from the mass of European people, and almost entirely agricultural or pastoral, having, in about 3,000,000 of individuals, only 14,925 employed in manufactories, and these not congregated in one or two places, but scattered among 2037 factories, having no great standing army, or navy, no extended commerce, no afflux of strangers, no considerable city but one, and having schools and universities in a fair proportion, and a powerful and complete Church establishment, undisturbed in its labours by sect or schism, is, notwithstanding, in a more demoralized state than any nation in Europe—more demoralized even, than any equal portion of the dense manufacturing population of Great Britain. This is very curious fact in moral statistics. It is so directly opposed to all received opinions and long established theories of the superior moral condition, greater innocence, purity of manners, and exemption from vice or crime of the pastoral and agricultural state of society, compared to the commercial and manufacturing, that if it rested merely upon the traveller's impressions, observations, or experiences, it would not be entitled to any credit."

"According to the official returns published in the Swedish State Gazette, in March, 1837, the number of persons prosecuted for criminal offences, before all the Swedish Courts in the year 1835, was 26,275, of whom 21,282 were convicted, 4915 acquitted, and 98 remained under examination. In 1835, the total population of Sweden was 2,983,144 individuals. In this year, therefore, 1 person of every 114 of the nation had been accused, and 1 in every 140 convicted of some criminal offence. By the same official returns, it appears that in the five years from 1830 to 1834 inclusive, 1 person in every 49 of the inhabitants of the towns, and 1 in every 176 of the rural population, had, on an average, been punished each year for criminal offences. In 1836 the number of persons tried for criminal offences in all the courts of the kingdom, was 26,925, of whom 22,292 were condemned, 3688 acquitted, and 945 under trial or committal. The criminal lists of this year are stated to be unusually light, yet they give a result of 1 person in every 112½ of the whole population accused, and 1 in about every 134 convicted of criminal offence; and, taking the population of the towns, and the rural population separately, 1 person in every 46 individuals of the former, and 1 in every 174 of the latter, have been convicted within the year 1836 for criminal offence. There is no rebellion in the land, nor resistance to obnoxious laws, as in Ireland on the tithe laws; nor are artificial offences created to any great extent by iniquitous legislation, as with us, by the game laws, and excise laws. These are all offences involving moral delinquency greater than the simple breach of a regulation or a conventional law of the state. Among the crimes in the rural population, there were 28 cases of murder, 10 of child-murder, 4 of poisoning, 13 of bestiality, 9 of robbery with violence—and this rural population is only 2,735,487 individuals; and, as appears by the official returns, the criminality among them is only in about the proportion of one fourth of that of the town population of Sweden. Now let us compare this with the state of the criminal calendar in other countries."

Mr. Laing then gives the returns for Norway and Denmark in 1835, Scotland in 1836, England and Wales in 1831, and Ireland in 1834, which we compress into the following tabular form. The fourth and fifth columns express the proportions of the accused and convicted to the entire population.

	Population.	Accused.	Convicted.	One in every	One in every
Sweden..	2,983,144..	26,925..	22,292..	112 1-3	134
Norway..	1,194,610..	2,616..	..	457..	663*
Denmark.	1,328,807..	1,806..	1,223..	673.	943
Scotland.	2,365,114..	2,922..	2,152..	809..	1099
England & Wales	13,894,574..	19,647..	13,830..	707..	1005
Ireland..	7,943,949..	21,381..	14,253..	371½	557†

From this return, it appears that in 1834, when three or four countries were in rebellion, and the Coercion Bill was passed, there were among our 8,000,000, 5614 fewer committals, and 8039 fewer convictions, and among the 14,000,000 of England and Wales, 7278 fewer committals, and 8462 fewer convictions in 1831, than in the 3,000,000 of Swedes in 1836. In the five years from 1830 to 1834 inclusive, the average yearly number of committals in this country was 1 in every 455, and of convictions, 1 in every 723 of the whole population, while we have seen that for the same five years in Sweden, the ave-

* 1439 of the convictions were for police transgressions which reduces the proportion of convictions for criminal offences, to 1 in every 1402.

† By the last Parliamentary return of the comparative amount of crime in in this country, and England and Wales, which was published in 1838, and noticed in No. 14 of this Review, it appeared that of the more heinous class of crimes (those punished with death, transportation, or imprisonment for more than six months), the gross numbers were, in 1834, for England and Wales 6757
For Ireland 2429

Being one heinous crime for every 2056 inhabitants in England and Wales, and 1 for every 3184 inhabitants in Ireland.

And in 1831, for England and Wales 6259
For Ireland 2327

Being one heinous crime for every 2220 inhabitants in England and Wales, and 1 for every 3293 in Ireland, and that for the 3 years 1835-6 and 7, the total number of convictions for burglary, simple larceny, and larceny by servants was—

	Ireland.	Eng. & Wales.
Burglary	67	1,034
Simple larceny	6761	27,209
Larceny by servants	179	2,303

The population of Ireland to that of England and Wales, in those years, was as 4 to 7.

rage of committals was 1 in every 114, and of convictions, 1 in every 140. In London, in 1834, with a population of 1,918,640, the committals for criminal offences were 3547, or 1 in every 540 persons of the population; while in the town population of Sweden, it was 1 in every 46. At the close of 1836, the county gaols of Sweden contained 13,209 prisoners, of whom 547 were debtors. Great Britain and Ireland, with their 27,000,000, would, at the same rate, have in prison 118,000 of their population—that is more than the peace establishment of the army and navy. Five murders in a population of 95,822, "with no peculiarity, favourable or unfavourable, to their moral state," was considered a light criminal calendar in 1837, for the remote province of which the small town of Gefle is the head. Among the 40,671 isolated rural inhabitants of the island of Gothland, with 93 clerical charges, or 1 clergyman to every 435 individuals, the number condemned in 1837 was 147, or 1 in every 277 of the whole of the men, women, and children on the island; "41 for crimes of great moral magnitude, and 5 for crimes equivalent to murder."

Benefits of the unrestrained Publication and Sale of Bad Books. Preston house of Correction.

Rev. Mr. Clay the Chaplain, to this Institution states that out of 1,636 Prisoners in the Preston House of Correction, 674 were wholly unable to read, but 713 were well acquainted with the adventures of Turpin and Jack Sheppard.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE REASONS OF MY CONVERSION TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY A LATE CLERGYMAN (REV. MR. NEWMAN) OF THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION, IN LETTERS TO A FRIEND. FIFTH EDITION. LONDON: JAMES BURNS, 1849.

LETTER V.

MY DEAR ——

The Church of Rome, it is said, has added to the faith, and imposes unwarrantable terms of communion; and this is an independent reason of itself why we should not join her.

This is indeed a definite reason to give. It looks well, and sounds well, at least for a little time. But consider it a little closer, and it brings us back again to the old questions and the old line of reasoning, and the same conclusions as before. As soon as we attempt to sift this ground of objection, we are met at once by the old question of a guide and authority in matters of faith. For what is "the faith" which has been "corrupted?" And how do we know that it has been "corrupted?" Who says so? And what is his authority? Is it the English Church that says so? But what is the See of Canterbury superior, or equal in prerogative to the See of Rome? Or can she, who, as I have shown, does not even hold and teach the Anglo-Catholic faith,—who admits its most sacred doctrines to be indifferently taught or denied,—who, to apply Mr. Allies' strong language, has become "a lurking-place for omnigenous latitudinarianism," whose origin and history is defaced and blotted with every thing that can make it suspected and distrusted (to use no stronger language),—can she be the admitted guide or authoritative judge in such a momentous and delicate question? Can she, who cannot tell me what the faith she herself holds is, who cannot even settle its simpler and most essential doctrines for her own members,—can she determine the limits between the faith and the corruptions of the faith for the world?

I beg you seriously to consider the origin and history of the present body corporate called the Church of England; its awful deeds at the Reformation, its sacrilege and blasphemies, its ever-varying, never-settled theology; the extreme opposites of doctrine that have existed and struggled within its pale; the open questions at this day on the most sacred truths; its fraternisation with Dissenters at home and abroad; and tell me, can one possibly imagine, can one with decent gravity propose her as the glass of faith, the mould in which one may see the primitive faith reproduced with fidelity? Can one pretend that she has discovered the true via media, or is likely to be a safe guide in such a path? Consider also her position in the controversy. Consider what that position drives her to. She is the accused party:—accused of heresy, and schism, and sacrilege, and spoliation. If Rome has not "corrupted the faith," she is unquestionably guilty of all these. If Rome has not corrupted the faith, she has denied it. If Rome does not impose unwarrantable terms of communion, she is schismatic, and her schism utterly unjustifiable; and if not justifiable, she must repent, and undo her bad deeds as far as possible, and make restitution and satisfaction. No wonder that she says that Rome has corrupted the faith, and imposes unwarrantable terms of communion; no wonder that she acquits herself, appeals from the judge to the laws, defies sentence, and retorts accusations. When we are told, then, that the Church of Rome has corrupted the faith, let us only ask, Who says so? and we shall at once see, in a great measure, the weakness of the accusation.

It is often said, that Rome is committed to theories, that she cannot retreat, that she must go on, that her divines are prejudiced, and judgment forestalled. But may not the same things be said of the Church of England, and with infinitely greater truth and force? In the question, Who has corrupted the faith, Rome or England? let both parties be supposed commonly good or commonly bad, the evidence is sadly against England What, then, becomes of such easy phrases and round assertions as these of corrupting the faith which, when examined, amount to nothing more than the abuse of the judge by the culprit in self defence?

I ask again, then, Who says that Rome has corrupted the faith? If Anglicans and Anglican divines, what is the weight and value of their authority in this case? They have not even the sanction of their own Church for their own view of the Catholic faith; rather they are themselves commonly considered to be "Romanisers," and to have corrupted the faith by human traditions. They can have no more than the authority of a handful of individuals, the best of their body, far better than their Church as theologians, still nothing more than individuals, and in a most awkward position for authoritative teachers, suspected by their own Church of being Roman Catholics, and condemned by Catholics as Protestants and schismatics, with a theory of faith and rule of faith in many respects quite recent, even in their own Church, and to which many of them have been converts only within a few years. What is their authority in this question? They can have no more weight than what their own personal character and ability and their numbers give them, with the serious drawbacks I have mentioned;—and what is this against the weight of evidence on the other side? against the host of saints, and martyrs, and doctors,—prodigies and marvels of sanctity, ability, and learning,—teaching one consistent doctrine, and backed by the authority of the whole Catholic world in communion with the See of Peter? Who could hesitate for one single moment, if the issue is to be placed on such a balance of authorities? If it is said that all these are prejudged witnesses in favour of Rome; as I said before, this may most fairly be retorted, and with infinitely greater force, on the other side. It is not charitable to impute bad motives; and in Anglicans, against whom appearances are so strong, it certainly is not wise. Let both parties, I repeat, be supposed as clever and good as they have the credit of being; let the best be supposed of each, and then let the comparison be drawn. It must inevitably tell against Anglicans; the weight of probability is immensely against them. It is most absurd, therefore, and suicidal in Anglicans to appeal to authority. Authority is against them. It is vain, and a most palpable fallacy, for them to shelter themselves under the authority of tradition, when the thing wanted is an authority for the witness of tradition, as I have shewn before. We cannot escape from a present authority, from the Church of the present day. It is a mockery to affect humility and submission to our own interpretations of a rule—a dead letter. To protect ourselves from present judgment by appealing to past and dead authorities, or to books, is essential Protestantism, come under what form it may, and however much of the Catholic faith the appellants may accidentally embrace. If I admit and believe just so much as I myself see to be true and reasonable, or authoritative, and no more; if I am at liberty to reject as unauthoritative what there does not seem to me to be authority for; then, in the name of common sense, I ask, What is faith in the Church? what submission to it? What is the Church, and what authority, according to such principles and such proceedings, but mere words, respectable names for our own private judgment, things which we use for our justification when convenient, and discard when they no longer fall in with our own notions of what is authoritative, and what the Church ought to say?

Authority therefore being, as I have shewn, clearly against me, again I asked, Why must I not accept the teaching of the Roman Church? Why not submit myself to it? It alone has all the criteria of a Church, as laid down by Anglicans, and embraced by me. It alone teaches that faith which Anglicans first taught me; and which my own reflection, my experience, my spiritual judgment, and my reading, such as it is, convince me must be true, if Christianity be a truth and a reality at all. The essential and visible unity of the Church; the primacy and prerogative of the See of St. Peter; the real evil and sin of schism (and the practical possibility of it); the real Presence of Christ's Body and Blood in the sacrament of the Eucharist; the offering of Christ in the same for quick and dead, as a propitiatory sacrifice; the communion of the militant with the glorified Church; the intercession, mediation, and patronage of the saints; the lawfulness and utility of invoking them; prayers for the departed dead; forgiveness of sins sacramentally through the priest; and the practice of sacramental confession,—all these doctrines and practices admitted by Anglicans, and which must be admitted by all to have been actually and always the doctrines and practices of the Catholic Church since it had a history, are as plainly and naturally taught, and necessary to be believed, in the Roman Catholic Church, as they are to all intents and purposes, practically, if not actually and formally, rejected, protested against, and denied by the Church of England. In all these points, to go no further, the two communions present an appearance positively hostile and antagonistic. To all appearance, and practically, the Church of England as much discountenances this system of doctrine, this idea of the Catholic faith, as the Church of Rome most certainly maintains and embodies it. A man might live a hundred years in the Church of England, he might have been Archbishop of York for fifty years of his life, and yet never once have mentioned one of these points (or more than one or two, perhaps); or if so, only to protest against and denounce them; millions of the members and clergy of the Church of England live and die thinking this system of doctrine as essential to "Popery" as the Pope himself. And yet I was called upon to believe that this is in the main and substantially the Catholic faith, and that the Churches of Rome and England agree in it, and differ only in some extreme consequences from these common doctrines; I was called upon to suspect and renounce, without examination or inquiry, that Body which teaches all the Catholic faith heartily and really; and to trust implicitly to that Body which, to all appearances, as heartily rejects and opposes it! I was called upon to distrust the teaching of the Catholic Church about itself and its doctrines, and to accept the teaching of a few persons in the English Church as the true interpreters of the doctrine of the Church of England, the true interpreters of antiquity, and the true interpreters also of the present teaching of the Church of Rome! All the teaching of all antiquity, and of all present bodies, was to be judged of according to the representation of a small body of men, who are a small and suspected section of their own Church, which Church is a small and rejected portion (at best and on their own theory) of the Catholic Church! With an ambiguous teaching of their own, and a worse than ambiguous sanction of an uncertain Church (under the authority of which sacred name they shelter themselves), they call upon me to reject the all but overwhelming authority and evidence of the Church of Rome against the Church of England, and for the Catholicity and essential truth of her own authoritative teaching.*

Thus, then, I came to the conclusion, that the assertion that Rome imposes unwarrantable terms of communion, was only another way of saying that the English Church is accused by the Roman Church of heresy and schism, and did not plead guilty. It is precisely the assertion which every heretical or schismatical body must make in self-defence against the Church which excommunicates it. It proves nothing, therefore. Rather it served to convince me, as I have shewn, more clearly than ever, that the Church of England really is a schismatical body.

I had now rid myself altogether of the unsatisfactory, delusive, and contradictory theories of Church-of-Englandism and Anglicanism. Anglicanism had condemned, first, the Church of England, then itself. It was nothing better than a sham, a thing of words and phrases, that could not stand examination; Protestantism, on a larger and more ambitious scale, more deceptive, because of the use of Catholic words in an un-Catholic sense, and therefore more injurious. After all, I saw that it was the old question of Church or no Church, authority or private judgment; only private judgment exercised on tradition and the Fathers, instead of on the Bible. The only Body in which the principles and doctrines which Anglo-Catholics taught as Catholic were fulfilled and embodied, was the Roman Catholic Church. It was literally the only Body which professed to teach, and taught authoritatively as a Church, the Catholic faith as I had embraced it. It was now that or none. Church principles had shivered the Church-of-England theory and position to pieces, and left me standing alone, without the imaginary protection of any actual Church authority for the faith I held, to contend with the Church of Rome. It was now simply a question between myself, or myself and a few others, who happened to agree pretty much with me, and the Catholic Church.

* Dr. Pusey's recent advertisement to his "Adaptation" of the Paradise of the Soul, is one of the most remarkable instances of the manner in which a person can escape from the authority of all living bodies under the veil of submitting to antiquity. In this advertisement Dr. P. does not seem to be aware that he is determining, on his own authority, some of the most difficult and most disputed questions, and then on this, his own view, judging all persons and bodies, and even the Saints themselves. He thinks it not at all presumptuous to assume, or indeed to say, that he has mastered the very mind of antiquity—that "her thoughts, her faith, her exposition of Scripture, are his;" not at all presumptuous to say, that his own Church is defective according to this standard, and to supply what she has omitted; not at all presumptuous to say, that the Saints have erred by excess, and that, having "lived in a system partly unsanctioned by Scripture and antiquity," they will be glad to see the errors that clave to them here removed by this standard! He cannot see that his opinions on all these points are disputed; that he has the authority of the wisest and best against him, and the majority of all bodies against him; he cannot see, in fact, that, while professedly "submitting to antiquity," he is actually constituting himself the judge of Churches and Saints.

(To be continued.)

ROME.

The following interesting Article has been translated from the French Journal L'Univers for the B. C. Herald. The "L'Univers professes to have copied it from the Giornale di Roma;—

On the 1st of January 1851, General Gémau Commander of the French troops, stationed in Rome, at the head of his chief Officers, presented himself before his Holiness, to offer him his Services and best wishes. The Pope was seated on his throne. The General's address was as follows:—

Most Holy Father,

"I feel happy and proud to be the interpreter of my troops, in presenting to the Sovereign Pontiff, the expression of our profound respect and entire devotedness. A French army has had the glory of shedding its blood, to replace the Pope in the capital of the Christian world, the glory of the troops quartered in Rome will be to maintain him there. To effect this they will always maintain a firm, calm, and persevering will; and in the time of need, that strength and energy, which religion bestows upon the hearts of French and Christian Soldiers. For so great a cause, we beg of God to bless our efforts, and, to receive the wishes we all form, at the commencement of this year, that the Church may long preserve, in the august Person of Pius the Ninth, a Head so worthy of governing it."

The Holy Father's reply was as follows:—

"I always embrace with eagerness, every opportunity of expressing my gratitude to France and its army. The opportunity you now offer me, General, is most pleasing to my heart, and renews all my sentiment of paternal affection towards the generous Nation, to which you belong, and which has so powerfully contributed to the re-establishment of order, in the capital of the Catholic world. These sentiments, the greater number of the Romans, share also with me. Yesterday, after having more fervently than ever returned thanks to the Lord, while passing through the crowd, which filled the Church of Gesu, in which the French troops were assembled I, was greatly moved to hear a woman cry out: Holy Father bless the French, who have delivered us from the Sword, anarchy and death. To yield to the feelings of my own heart, as well as to comply with the just desires of my people, I bless you, General, I bless the army, I bless the French Nation and its Head."

FLOWERS OF HEAVEN.

Connexion between Religion and Morality.

CHAPTER XIII.

MODERATION.

(Continued from page 133.)

In our days, extravagance in dress is no longer an evil, which may be overcome by eloquence and severity; it has become incurable, and infects those of the humblest, as well as those of the highest ranks of society. If it glides into the saloon of the richly endowed wife, it may be seen, despite of cold and hunger, in the grearer of the seamstress: to satisfy this desire, the poor female will sometimes stifle the voice of nature. There are women, among us, who, in this respect, are not only ready to imitate the pagans, but are capable of giving them lessons in this art, if such were required;—women, who would be as ready, as Tarpeia to deliver our fortresses to the enemy, for some bracelets of gold, and who would, like Tullia, drive their chariots over the dead bodies of their own fathers, to seize on a crown of jewels. O vanity of woman!—idol, decked out with gauze, tinsel, and fopperies of a thousand hues!—where hast thou placed the limits of thy desires?

Fashion is the lovest idol to which many women sacrifice, as formerly the Jewish women to Moloch, their very children. These fine ladies, who are always occupied with gauzes, ribands and such fooleries, are generally speaking, bad wives and worse mothers. The duty of a mother is important and ennobling: it demands time and care: but where can that time be found, when one half the day is passed the toilet, and the other half in the drawing-room? The empress Hildegarde, wife of Charlemagne, was accustomed to inspect the domestic operations of her family: she paid the great officers of the empire, took on herself the education of her children, and still found time to devote to the duties of a Christain. But it may be said: this was a princess of the dark ages!—She was a model whom many others, in humbler stations, would do well to imitate.

The wordly female will, doubtless, reply —"Society imposes duties on us, and we must dress, according to the exigences of our state!"

Doubtless: but extravagance is forbidden to you. You must always appear with that reserve and modest of dress, which indicates a pure and Christian heart. But moderation requires from you not to ruin your husbands, or your children, to comply with the carprices of the ever-changing fashions of the day. You must not sacrifice honour on the altar of vanity; and, in certain situations, less opulent than influential, sell the consciences of your husbands, that you may carry on your shoulders the shawls of India, or have clusters of dimonds suspended from your ears.

(To be continued.)

Selections.

PUSEYISM.

We call the attention of Protestants generally, more especially those of the Anglican Communion, to the manifesto of Bishop Grey and his Clergy in this day's publication. If the premises they argue from be true, there is but little doubt that they ought, if they acted according to the rules of sound logic, to join the Catholic Church. Upon a careful perusal of this document, our first impulse would be to ask these gentlemen whether they are really in earnest? Supposing the Queen granted the prayer of their memorial, and licensed that favoured portion of English christianity, which they in their modesty call the "Church," to assemble in virtue of Her Royal Prerogative in Lawful Synod, and there and then to deliberate, as long as the most patient among the divines and disputants could feel any interest in the subject, how would this better their condition, or obviate the evil they complain of? The Queen, in virtue of Her Royal Prerogative, calls the Synod. Supposing the Bishops to be unanimous, supposing the convocation voted unanimously that "Baptism regenerated infants"—both suppositions being about as probable, considering the state and temper of "the Church," past and present, as the existence of the celebrated metaphysical absurdity, the "Flying Ox", How could they lawfully promulgate that decree? Previously they must have the "express consent of Her Majesty," and supposing the decree were illegally published it could not be legally executed without the "express consent of Her Majesty," under the penalty of "imprisonment, and fine to be imposed at the Queen's pleasure." In virtue of the Laws passed in the first year of Elizabeth, the "Clergy shall not assemble in any Synod on letters and mandates, other than the royal letters and mandates, neither shall they pass or execute any canon, law, synodal, or provincial constitution, without the express consent of Her Majesty, and her licences, for making, promulgating, or executing of such canons; under the penalty of imprisonment, and fine, to be imposed at the Queen's pleasure." It was decreed also, "That Bishops shall not be created by the nomination or choice of any person, or by any authority, other than the Royal authority, neither shall they hold or exercise Episcopal jurisdiction and authority, unless at the pleasure of the Queen, neither is their authority derived otherwise than through Her and from Her Royal Majesty—anno primo Elizabethæ Reginæ. The question then is simply this, has the Queen exceeded her lawful power and authority, as head of the church, in delegating to a certain number of laymen, the authority which she in virtue of the Statute Law possesses, which includes "every privilege, pre-eminence, prerogative, spiritual superiority, which can be enjoyed or exercised by any human or ecclesiastical right appertaining to visitation, correction, or reformation of the whole clergy, or of any particular ecclesiastical persons, to the cognizance, and even to the punishment of all errors heresies, schisms, abuses. We order that the same shall for henceforth be for ever annexed to the Royal sceptre." What lawyer, what man of candour and common sense, when he has read these most ample powers, vested in Her Majesty by the laws made at the time of the change of religion in England, can for a moment doubt that she could delegate to the judicial committee of her good and trusty, and well-beloved Privy Council, the right to examine and adjudge the question which has been the cause of such a fierce and angry controversy between the two parties, who, holding opposite opinions upon the most vital points, still contrive to remain within the pale of that most expansive of all religious societies, the Anglican church? We don't wish to speak lightly of so many learned and respectable clergymen as we see have affixed their names to this memorial, but really it is rather odd that they have not yet found out, that in the first year of Elizabeth, a sweeping change was made in the doctrine and discipline of the English church, that all the spiritual power formerly believed to exist in the Roman Pontiff, was by an act of Parliament transferred to the Queen, and that since that time this act (the glory and boast of Protestantism) still exists in all its primitive integrity. After this, to talk of rights and liberties as confirmed by "Magna Charta," is to talk like children. If, gentlemen, you insist upon finality, deny progress, and invoke Magna Charta—remember, you must be prepared to obey the Pope say Mass, read the Breviary, and live in a state of celibacy, and these are "rights and liberties," which, if you be anxious to attain to, we can assure you, gentlemen, the shortest road is not an appeal to Buckingham Palace, Osborne, or Balmoral, but a return to the Church of Langton, and the Barons whose love of rational liberty and hatred of tyranny, achieved that noble and truly Catholic charter. We are sorry to be obliged in criticising this address, to point out a sophism which prevails through the greater part of it. In paragraph 2 it is laid down "That to the Church of God alone has been entrusted by her Divine Head, the keeping of the Faith once delivered to the Saints, and consequently authority in controversies of faith." Now this, taken in the plain and obvious sense, is a Catholic truth. But we are afraid our memorialists don't mean it in that sense, for if, in despite of the first of Elizabeth, such were their meaning, they ought not to remain a day outside the church, to which this definition or description truly, really, and exclusively applies. But in all candour, when Anglicans speak of the church, they cannot exclude the Queen, who in their faith is the head of the church, and who being according to them divinely appointed, when she delegates her power to the Law Lords of the Privy Council, with Bishops as their assessors, does nothing more or less than her utmost to keep the faith once delivered to the saints, and to decide on controversies of faith according to the utmost of her ability. The paragraph, therefore, either proves too much, or proves nothing. In the event of the first being true, they ought instantly become Catholics; in the second case they ought quietly submit to the decision of the privy Council. With regard to the novelty of the erection of the Privy Council into a Court of Appeal final, everybody knows that the Queen, in virtue of her headship of the church, and without the consent of the convocation, but with the assent of the Lords and Commons, could erect this into a lawfully constituted tribunal, and that being so constituted, it represented her delegated authority, and that its acts and decisions are binding upon those within the pale of the establishment. That if they imagined that this letting the matter of the Law Lo ng were not prepared to by their decision, they ought like Lord ling (the last convert,) announced by the , turn their faces towards Rome, declaring that they did not find in the English Church

"That living definite authority conclusive and infallible, which it claimed and exercised by the Church of Rome."—The Cape Colonist.

constitution of civil right of our Sovereign have been invaded by the late Papal aggression, as it is called, why then no one would object to their being taken cognizance of; no, certainly not; if there be any individual, if there be any British subject—for instance, Cardinal Wiseman is a British subject—and if he has invaded the prerogatives of the Queen, why he is guilty of high treason, and there is the law of high treason to deal with him. Well, if the Pope, as a potentate as a Sovereign of independent territory in Italy, having 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 of inhabitants, and having an army and a navy, such as they are—if he has invaded the civil privileges of our Queen as a casus belli, the law of nations has provided a remedy for that, and it would be justifiable if our Government were to declare war with the Pope, without coming to us in Parliament to discuss anything about it. (Loud applause.) Now, above all things, what I want to do is, that you should draw the distinction between civil matters and religious questions. (Applause.) We are told that there is to be something done at the opening of Parliament, but that it is to be very little. It is to be something that no body will object to, it is to be so small. (Laughter.) Well, now, I think those who wish anything done at all will be inclined to say, the smaller the measure the worse it will be.

Schisms Expected.—Mr. Cobden, at a late eduction meeting in Manchester, said :—'When I speak of religious discord, I do not mean merely the dissensions between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants I will not allude to them expect so far as they lead to schisms and controversies in the internal state of other religious bodies. But I think there is, no doubt, at this moment looming in the distance, though not in the very remote distance either, a schism in the Church of England itself. You have two parties in that Church, the one perhaps stronger than the other in numbers, but the other far more strong perhaps in intellect and logic, which are going to divide the Church. Then I see the Wesleyan body also torn as under by a schism which the most sanguine can hardly hope to see healed. I do not think several other religious bodies are perfectly tranquil in their internal organisation. Now, while we have the prospect of these great internal dissensions in religious bodies, and while we are all agreed that secular education is a de-it is not—that our national system of education should be one united and bound up with the religious organisations, and by which the schisms which prevail in the churches must necessarily be transferred with increased virulence to the schools? To this formidable list of schismatics Mr. Cobden added another, later in his speech—'there is in certain districts reason to fear that a large number of the working classes are not in communion either with dissent or church, he feared it would very much alienate them from those who took an impracticable course—a course which should prevent the diffusion of education amongst the working classes by setting up obstacles which it would be impossible for rational men to remove.'—Home News.

POLITICAL INTELLIGENCE.

Cobden and his Constituents.—Mr Cobden, at a meeting at Stockport on Monday last, said:—'My friend, Mr. Kershaw, had said that if the

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism."

No. 14.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENAGL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, April 5, 1851.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

3RD WEEK.—WEDNESDAY.

The following is an outline of the Lenten Lecture delivered at St. Thomas' Church by His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, V. A. W. B.

"Let them alone, they are blind and leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, they both fall into the pit."—Matt. xv. v. 14.

These words were uttered by the Saviour, in order to prevent his disciples from being influenced, by the scandal, which the Scribes and Pharisees unjustly took, at the above beautiful exposition, just given by Christ, of the true principle, by which human actions are to be adjudged to be either virtuous or vicious. This judgment the Saviour says is to be regulated, entirely, by reference to the human heart, to its intentions, motives, its good or its bad, its pure or impure state, or disposition. Human actions, to this standard, external actions of themselves, indifferent or harmless, if they proceed from a corrupt heart, or design, become sinful, not certainly from any thing intrinsically bad in them, but from this circumstance, viz., that the agent, from whom they emanate, who, as a rational, accountable being was bound to perform them in such a way as would accord with his moral obligations, violated that duty, by performing them with an evil heart or intention. Again, things otherwise indifferent or innocent, may be rendered evil, also by a person making use of them, in a forbidden time, or in a forbidden place, or in forbidden circumstances. Thus, for example, certain kinds of industry or labour are not only permitted on week days, but are often commanded, as necessary for public and domestic welfare, yet on Sundays and Holy-Days of obligation, the same occupations would be primarily sinful, because of their being forbidden at these particular times. In this case, it is clear, that these employments in themselves commendable and lawful, are sinful, solely because of the perverse heart or intention of the person who engages in them, in those or on days on which he is prohibited to do so. The exceptions or dispensations referred to are granted, simply, by reason of the dispositions of the party applying for them, and not by any native or intrinsic goodness, which they, or any happening, that can occur, when might be done elsewhere, innocently and lawfully, may become sinful, from its not being performed in a suitable place. Thus, the conduct of those who sold victims for sacrifice in the porches of the temple of Jerusalem, was reprobated by the Saviour in the strongest language, because of the, irreverence it evinced towards a holy place, the temple of God, and yet, the same conduct, if exercised elsewhere, would not have merited censure. Thirdly, an action or proceeding, which in its own nature, and in the time and place chosen for its performance may be lawful, may be rendered sinful, by a disregard of the other circumstances, which should accompany its performance. Thus, for illustration sake, to take an oath, is to exercise an act of religion, by which the person who swears acknowledges the omnipresence of God, and also that God is the Sovereign Truth, and the supreme avenger of falsehood. And yet, if this act of Religion be performed without due attention to the circumstances in which it is lawful to swear, it may become grievously sinful. For, in order to swear, or take an oath, a reasonable cause or necessity for doing so is required, and, moreover, the person taking an oath must, according to the Holy Scripture, swear to the Lord, in truth, justice, and judgment. Without these conditions or circumstances, his oath will be displeasing to God and therefore sinful, even though he may not be guilty of perjury.

The grounds of the doctrine, here laid down are in substance similar to those on which that doctrine of St. Paul rests in which he teaches. 1st Ep. Tim. Chap. IV.

"That every creature of God is good, and nothing to be rejected that is received with thanksgiving: For, the Apostle adds, it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer." In these words, the Apostle pronounces that every creature of God is good, that is considered in itself absolutely, and as to its intrinsic essential qualities or attributes. But mark the words that immediately follow. "And nothing is to be rejected, that is received with thanksgiving: For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer." Hence it follows, that though in its creature or the substance, of which it question, be good, intrinsically and absolutely, yet to be received by us profitably, and lawfully, it must be received with thanksgiving, and sanctified by the word of God and prayer. Now, in order that it be thus profitably received and sanctified, the time, the place, and the circumstances, in which it is made use of, must all be in accordance with our respective moral obligations, for, if tions be violated, then, however good in itself, the creature received may yet, in our regard, it will become, through our abuse or excess, the cause or the occasion to us, of a sinful deordination.

Thus in the case of Eve eating the forbidden fruit, it is clear, that that fruit was a creature of God, and therefore, good, in the same sense in which St. Paul says, that every creature of God is good. In the principles of the same Apostle it ought not therefore to have been rejected, if it could have been received with thanksgiving, and sanctified by the word of God and prayer. But the prohibition of God, by which a total abstinence from it was enjoined, would have rendered thanksgiving in the use of it, and any attempt to sanctify it by the word of God and prayer, a blasphemous outrage, and a mockery of the Divine Ordinance, which forbad it to be eaten. By eating of it then in these circumstances, Eve grievously sinned, not because the fruit itself defiled her, for it was good, being a creature of God, but because in mind, in heart, in intention, she, in eating of it, transgressed heinously against the solemn injunction, which the Almighty had imposed on her, to abstain from it. It was not therefore what entered into her mouth that defiled her, but it was the deliberate consent which she gave in her mind and heart, to the sin of disobedience, and which she, as it were orally and externally expressed, by eating of the forbidden fruit.

Further illustrations of the principle here developed, may be derived as well from the prohibitions, which forbad the Jews to eat of certain meats, as from the prohibition issued by the Apostles in the Council of Jerusalem, under the declared guidance of the Holy Ghost. Previously to this prohibition of the Apostles, the first Christians might have lawfully eaten of meats sacrificed to Idols, of blood and things strangled, but after that prohibition, they were bound to abstain from them, not surely because the meats thus forbidden, were in themselves evil, but because they could not partake knowingly of them without having first resolved in their heart, to disobey the command enjoined by their lawful Pastors, for their Spiritual welfare and for that of Religion.

Thus, from the very outset of Religion in the Earthly Paradise we find, that the rule of abstinence from certain things, in themselves good, was enforced under most rigorous penalties by Almighty God himself. the Patriarchal dispensation, the very injunction laid by God on Noah, immediately after the waters of the flood had subsided, was a precept of abstinence.

At the introduction of the Mosaic law, numerous precepts of fasting and abstinence were enjoined, and in the very first Council held at Jerusalem by the Apostles, after the establishment of the Christian Church, the same principle was, as we have seen, promulged and declared to be dictated by the Holy Ghost.

It is but little short of an insult to the understanding of Catholics, to be obliged to listen to ignorant adversaries, repeating to disgust, in opposition to Catholic doctrine, the Saviour's words. "Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man."

Do not these very men, who argue thus ignorantly, recognise gluttony and drunkenness as crimes, which exclude those guilty of them from Heaven? And is it not into the mouth, that the meat and drink pass, by the intemperate use of which, these crimes are committed? Are the words of the Saviour then false? Assuredly not! But the example just adduced, shows the imperative necessity of some means, to ascertain the true sense of the Saviour's language, both on the occasion here alluded to, and on other occasions also: in other words, it proves the necessity of a Church divinely secured from error in the interpretation of Scripture, in order to save Revelation from profane ridicule and the unjust imputation of contradictions and inconsistencies. Without the interposition of a living, speaking authority such as I have referred to, what will result but a scene similar to that now exhibited in the several sects engendered by the miscalled reformation? —A scene in which, the very congregation assembled in each place of worship will be known often to dissent from their Pastor and amongst themselves, on the doctrines, even of Baptism and of the Eucharist. On the subject of Fasting and abstinence allow me to lay before you the historical account given by the Protestant Bishop Collier of the principles, by which Queen Elizabeth and the Heads of the English reformation regulated the Discipline of Protestantism :-

"The perplexity of mind, Elizabeth laboured under upon these accounts, she frankly imparted to the French ambassador, then residing in London; adding, that those about her teazed her continually to carry on the reformation. Yet, she never was so hearty in the cause, as to yield to all the opinions and practices that were set up by the party, particularly, concerning images, the real presence, the clergy's marriage, &c. her thoughts, as the reader has seen, seemed to be different. Indeed, as to fasting, and abstinence from flesh at certain times, she was pleased to reinforce the ancient practice. But then, it was in a strain altogether human and unevangelical, as it appears by an order of council, issued out, and directed to the archbishops and clergy on that subject; part whereof runs thus: "And further declare unto them, that the same is not required for any liking of popish ceremonies heretofore used, which utterly are detested; but only to maintain the mariners, and the navy of this land, by setting men a-fishing." "Now," says Mr. Collier, "with submission, to lay the whole stress of embering and abstinence upon reasons of state, is somewhat singular. For, to say nothing of Ember weeks, the fasts of Lent, and those of Wednesdays and Fridays, reach up to the earliest ages of christianity. Now, this restraint of appetite was always imposed with a prospect upon the other world. It was enjoined to reduce the senses, and make the mind more absolute. And is it not somewhat a misfortune, that the apostles' canons, the authority of the fathers, and the practice of the primitive church, should be struck out of all consideration? And must all this discipline be only for the benefit of navigation? Have we not sins to fast for, and temperance to guard? Are we not bound to distinguish times upon spiritual motives, and prepare for the solemnities of religion? But, when secular men prescribe to the church, when those, who are strangers to antiquity, give laws for discipline, it is no wonder if they mistake in their direction."* From these remarks of Mr. Collier catholics will be apt to infer, that, as the substance of the reformation was carried on, upon human consideration, viz., to secure the queen's title and possession of church lands, so the same spirit is discoverable in every branch of it. For why do they fast, and abstain from flesh? To promote fishing, and increase the number of mariners for sea-service. Why do they make use of sacraments? Not as the channels of grace, but only as outward tokens of their inclinations. Why do they frequent the church, pray, and give alms? Not that these performances are capable of effecting any thing towards appeasing God's wrath, or procuring his favour, but merely for the sake of outward discipline and church economy. Why do they admit persons to exercise the ministerial function? Not that they look upon them qualified by any divine power or character, but only by deputation from the civil power, to which they are subject in every branch of their office. By this means, the church is not only on but lost and melted away in the state, to whose political ends both preaching, praying, fasting, alms, and the use of the very sacraments are become subservient upon every occasion."†

* Collier, ii. 557, 558.
† Dodd's Church History vol. 3.

CATHOLIC MISSION AT ASSAM.

We have great pleasure in publishing to-day an extract from a letter addressed by the Very Rev. Dr. Rabin, superior of the Mission of Assam and Thibet, to His Grace the Archbishop V. A. W. B. We give publicity the more cheerfully to the subjoined extract, because of the gratifying mention made in it, of the kind and liberal encouragement, given on this occasion, both by Government and by the respectable Protestant officials, referred to by Dr. Rabin, towards the permanent establishment of the Catholic Mission at Assam. On the part of our Catholic Brethren we beg to join Dr. Rabin and his revered Associates in the expression of great gratitude both to Government and its officials, for the generous act which we now record with sincere delight.

We may add, that in this as well as in other such acts of liberality, there is evinced not only good feeling, but also sound policy, the carrying out of which, uniformly and consistently, cannot fail to promote, together with the advancement of the Gospel, the best interests of civilisation, and also of the British Empire.

We have had the opportunity of knowing, that, so far back, as the period of Lord Macartney's embassy to China, the machinations of other European powers to frustrate the objects of that Mission were defeated, mainly by the friendly interest taken in the success of the enterprise in question, by an Irish Catholic Priest, who held then the rank of a High Official in the Imperial Court. —The Priest we rejoice to add, was a Convert from Protestantism, who by his Conversion forfeited, through the Bigotry of His Father, a rich temporal inheritance.

In the early relations too of the British Government with the Burmese Empire, it was owing to the kind offices of a Catholic Priest towards the official representative of that Government, that that personage survived the dangerous sickness, which he had contracted, whilst residing near the Capital of ——. The important services, thus rendered, were acknowledged and rewarded with his characteristic generosity, by the Marquess Wellesley, then Governor General of India.

Some interesting particulars, of a similar nature to those just recited, have been communicated to us respecting the Catholic Mission of Madras, and the services rendered by it to the British Authorities there, at a remote period, whilst the British power, then in its infancy in India, was yet very weak and stood greatly in need of assistance.

The Catholic Church at Madras, at the period we refer to, was situated in a part of the area, now occupied by Fort St. George. It was obviously a matter of great moment, then, when the power of the Native Princes was so great, and when the incipient progress of the British Settlers was viewed with very hostile eyes, especially by the French and Portuguese, that the site occupied by the Church in question, should be profited of, for the erection of a Fort, its position being most favorable for that purpose. The site was at once cheerfully yielded by the Catholic Missionaries to the British Authorities, and the erection of Fort St. George was immediately commenced.

About the same period, or not long after, it was deemed of importance by the British Authorities, towards the advancement of the commercial prosperity of the English Settlers at Madras, that a large number of the Native Christians, who resided at the Portuguese settlement then established at St. Thomé, a place about four miles distant from Madras, should be induced to transfer themselves and their families to Royapooram in the suburbs of Madras. The project encountered much opposition, partly from the jealousy with which the Portuguese at St. Thomé viewed what they looked upon as the intrusive encroachments of the British, and partly, because the Native Christians of St. Thomé were very unwilling to abandon a locality, which was endeared to them by the circumstance, that their Christian Ancestors, the first Converts to the Gospel in India, were interred there, for they could not endure the thought, that when dead, their own ashes should not be mingled with the same earth, in which the mortal remains of those whose memory they revered were entombed.

The holding out of the hope of superior temporal inducements, might indeed enable the British Settlers at Madras, to triumph over the jealous opposition of the Portuguese at St. Thomé, to the proposed transfer of the Christian Natives from that locality. But how was the deep rooted and strongly cherished feeling just described to be overcome, yet it was indispensable for the prospe- of the English Settlers, that it should by no means be subdued.

The Native Christians whose services the English Settlers required were Fishermen, who by their avocation, were daily habituated to guide their boats in safety through the dangerous surf, which prevails along the Madras Coast. Without their co-operation, the work of shipping and of landing Merchandise would have been most perilous, if indeed it would be at all practicable, at least to any extent, for any others less accustomed than they were, to endure the scorching rays of the Sun at Madras, or less skilled in the dexterous management of the very peculiar kind of Boats, which are there necessary for the safe transportation over the surf both of goods and Passengers. Recourse was again necessary for the Settlers to the [illegible] good Men at once saw, that the most successful mode to remove the serious difficulty now spoken of would be, not openly to run counter to a feeling, imbedded in the moral and natural constitution of the Native Christians. Without therefore attempting to correct it by the heartless argumentation, which a cold and calculating worldly policy would suggest, the Missionaries wisely commended the principle on which was grounded the affectionate veneration, in which the Native Christians held the Cemetery where their ancestors reposed, but they intimated at the same time, that whilst the motive which actuated them was commendable, yet, that the feeling which it prompted, ought to be moderated.—That, their desire to commingle after death, with the ashes of their Fore-Fathers in the same parent earth, might, even though they transferred their habitations to Fort St. George, be sufficiently gratified, by the reverend translation of some of the superior strata of the Cemetery at St. Thomé to Madras, where these could be spread over the surface of the place of Burial, which was to be there, set apart for the Native Christians—that thus all their pious wishes would be sufficiently complied with, and every reasonable objection to the proposal of the British Settlers happily removed.

f

This reasoning satisfied the scrupulosity of the Native Christians. A portion of the consecrated earth was removed from the sepulchres of their ancestors and diffused over the New Cemetery assigned to the Colony about to settle at Madras. The piety of the New Settlers now devoted itself to the erection of a Church in their own vicinity. This was soon effected on a most respectable scale by a voluntary arrangement on their part that each boat should pay weekly a fixed sum towards the proposed undertaking. Not only did these good people adhere to the arrangement, but, they further more raised an additional sum, quite adequate to the decent support of their Pastor and of Teachers in the schools established by them. But to return to the point whence we set out, namely, the happy prospect of the permanent establishment of the Catholic Mission at Assam, by means of the recent grant of land, made by Government and by some liberal Protestants, in favor of that undertaking. It suffices to mention this fact, to show what the impression is, which has made on the British Authorities and also on respectable private persons, by the edifying and amiable deportment of the Catholic Missionaries lately sent to Assam. Their Catholic Schools and of those other beneficial Institutions, which always mark auspiciously the progress of Catholicity in the wilderness of the Savage, as well as in the often more corrupt, although more refined places of resort, of what is termed civilised Society.

It deserves some notice, that, perhaps, nearly a century since, a large body of Native Catholics emigrated, for some cause or other, from the neighbourhood of Sylhet to Assam. It would seem, that at least, some of the Emigrants were well instructed in their religion and took care to impart to the rising youth of their Community the saving knowledge of the truths of the Gospel. A few years since, we met with an adult descendant of these emigrants in Calcutta, who, until he had come hither, had never before seen a Catholic Priest. He stated, that his fellow Catholics in the vicinity of Assam, were most anxious to enjoy the benefit of having a resident Priest among them, and we have reason to know, that Major Jenkins, the worthy representative of the Indian Government there, was also desirous that their pious eagerness should be gratified. No time was accordingly lost by the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic of Western Bengal, to find out an opportunity to correspond with the laudable wishes of all, who took an interest in this important matter. By the intervention, it would seem, of a particular Providence, it so happened, that soon after the occurrence just alluded to, the Heads of the Seminary for Foreign Missions at Paris were led to select Assam, as one of the most practicable routes for Catholic Missionaries, to form a communication with Thibet and China, and the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic of Western Bengal at once ceded to those Apostolic Men, with the approval of the Holy See, the spiritual care of Assam and its neighbouring territory, which had been previously confided to the Chief Pastor of this Vicariate.

The following is an Extract from a Letter addressed to His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop, V. A. W. B. By the Very Rev. the Superior of the Assam Mission.

My Dear Lord Archbishop,—"I have had the honor to receive your letter, dated November, in which your Grace with so much kindness, assures us of the great interest you take in our Mission of Assam and Thibet. The Government has put us in possession of the hill I mentioned in my last letter. It belonged to several Officers stationed at Gowahatty, when I petitioned to Government for this land I was under the impression that it belonged to no one; as soon as the owners of it heard of my petition they either wrote to Government to obtain permission to resign it in our behalf or sent us a transfer of all their rights over this piece of ground, it is with pleasure I embrace this opportunity of making known the disinterestedness of these generous Officers. I am happy to hear that Mr. Krick accompanied the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe, in his visitation of the district of Jessore in your Grace's Vicariate."

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your Grace's humble & obedt. Servt.,
J. Rabin.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

2nd Lecture on Mechanics.

At the opening of the second Lecture on Mechanics, on Thursday the 27th inst. the Rev. Mr. Stephenson, after a brief recapitulation of what had already been explained, proceeded to interrogate the pupils on the subject matter of the preceding Lecture. The answering on their part, was satisfactory and gave clear proof of their attention. During the examination, the Rev. Lecturer occasionally excited the attention of his students by introducing some interesting facts, illustrative of the points in question. Amongst these we noticed one, in which he stated, that, by the aid of the Microscope, the 50 millionth part of a grain of gold could be made visible to the naked eye. This he brought forward as illustrative of the wonderful divisibility of matter. The next subject brought under consideration was the property of attraction. This principle existed in all bodies and might be considered as five-fold. The attraction of cohesion, of gravitation, of electricity, of magnetism, and lastly Chemical attraction; for the present, however, he stated, that he would confine himself to the two first mentioned kinds of attraction namely, of cohesion and gravitation. The attraction of cohesion he defined to be that principle, by which the minute particles of matter are held together when actually joined, or by which they are disposed to unite when within the sphere of the action of each other. This property was found in fluid bodies as well as in solid, although in the former it was necessarily weaker. It was by this principle, that the particles of the several bodies around us were held together, viz., of metals, of wood, of water, and even of the human frame, and when these particles were separated from each other, the force of attraction was overcome, or the particles were placed beyond the reach of action on one another. Having occupied some time in developing and illustrating this principle, the Lecturer next directed attention to a species of attraction styled capillary attraction.

This was a property existing in tubes of a very small bore, which caused a fluid, water, for example, to stand above its level; this property might be illustrated in tubes the one tenth of an inch in diameter. The effect just alluded to, would take place until the weight of the column of water was equal to the force of attraction in the tube. The Lecturer concluded by a brief statement of the subject matter for the next Lecture.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE REASONS OF MY CONVERSION TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY A LATE CLERGYMAN (REV. MR. NEWMAN) OF THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION, IN LETTERS TO A FRIEND. FIFTH EDITION. LONDON: JAMES BURNS, 1849.

LETTER VI.

My Dear ——

After the conclusion I had come to in my last Letter, there was no other body to represent the Church to me but the Roman Catholic. It was therefore simply a question between myself as an individual on one side, and as the Church on the other. On Church principles I ought to have submitted at once. I ought to have submitted at once and entirely to that which I believed, on an almost overwhelming evidence of probability, was the Catholic Church. But I confess that I did not. I had still some further difficulties to get over. My mind had another stage to go through. It seemed to me one thing to admit that the Roman was the Catholic Church, and another to connect myself with it, and throw myself into its system. The old Protestant and Anglican prejudice hovered about me still in a degree. Certain popular practices and forms of expression among Catholics startled me; and a vague fear of the unknown land into which I was about to enter kept me back.

Then, again, the consequences of such a step as joining the Catholic Church were very serious to myself personally. It involved the loss of much that is dear to us all; parting with friends, the breaking up of old ties, estrangement, and many secret and unknown trials. All these things served to increase my hesitation.

These considerations are felt very keenly at such a time, and weigh with us more than we know. They clog the first movements of our minds, and impede our progress according to mere abstract rules and principles. No doubt it is well, for some reasons, that they should act in this manner; for so they form a barrier against hasty decisions, and become a test of deep conviction and true faith. It is hard at such a time, when faith and conviction are struggling with natural feelings and human fears, to be taunted and reproached with rashness and presumption, and other improper motives. It is hard, when we feel we can scarce find strength to do what conscience tells us it is our duty to do, to have every action exposed to the most unjust perversions, and the smallest misconduct in circumstances of peculiar difficulty, or even a difference of opinion as to what is one's duty, magnified into great sins. All these things operate as checks and impediments in the course of an Anglican, from the time that he begins to feel that the Roman is the true Church. Yet over all these obstacles has it triumphed many times, through God's great mercy. May its conquests, so blessed to the vanquished, be multiplied a hundredfold! But I must now speak of those considerations by which my remaining difficulties and scruples were overcome.

First, then, I considered that in whatever degree it was probable that the Roman was the true Church, just in that degree was it probable that in any case of difference on point of doctrine, it was right and I was wrong. I considered that this was the very essence of the relation of an individual to the Church, viz. that of a pupil to a master, and that in the highest degree.

Next, I considered that we are bound to approach what is only probably a revelation from God, the supernatural manifestation of His will or truth, with the greatest respect and deference, and with a disposition to believe it, not in a rude, scrutinising, sceptical spirit. The temper of faith which Scripture praises is certainly a disposition to believe, and that of unbelief a disposition to doubt. Faith is both something more and something less than mere understanding, than intellectual comprehension, although there must be an element and basis of reason in faith. The evidence on which faith acts, on which it is bound to act, on which if it does not act, a man acts faithlessly, is less than the evidence on which we demand assent to a demonstration. The convictions of faith, which are parallel or analogous to the convictions of the understanding, are the consequences of acting towards and on truths that are in the beginning only probably true, only reasonably commended to our faith. Such conviction is the result and consequence, and not the condition of believing.

If there be truth in this, what a dilemma do we place ourselves in if we will only believe what we thoroughly comprehend, and yet can, strictly speaking, only thoroughly comprehend by believing! How could any one ever enter the Church (any how considered) if he should insist on understanding all things, in its creed, theology, and devotional practices, previous to entering it? Can any thing be more extravagant, more presumptuous, more irrational, than for an individual thus to measure and virtually put himself above that body which he approaches as a catechumen? which if it be what he supposes it to be—the depository of a divine faith and supernatural philosophy—must be immeasurably above him? Is it possible that a body can thus be at once so infinitely above, and yet so level to his comprehension? Can any thing be more irrational than, to suppose that a man can by the mere effort of his intellect be able to judge of all the practical consequents and harmonies of divinely revealed doctrines and principles, before he has himself received and acted on those principles? Can any thing be more presumptuous than for one outside the Church, or brought up in a miserably defective system, to dictate to those within the Church, to its doctors and saints, and to the Church itself, what they must say and do; what is consistent, and what not, with their principles; what is allowable, and what not, in the freedom of devotional language, and other such things? It became, therefore, obvious to me that it was a positive duty, as well as the dictate of common sense, for one situated as I was in regard to the Roman Church, not to carry my investigations and scrutinies too deep into the remoter consequences of Catholic doctrines; nor to judge the expression of feeling and devotional practices by what I myself had been accustomed to; but to take the doctrines in their simple and more elementary form; to remember that these were all that I was asked to accept, that these were all that I could (on the supposition of being outside the Church) understand, and that these were commended to my faith by an overwhelming amount of evidence in their favour.

The difference between what is of faith and what matter of opinion is clear enough for all ordinary purposes, and the difference is a most important one even for those within the Church, and is fully acted on. All are not saints, all are not of a high order of intellect. It would therefore be both absurd and cruel to make the experience of saints and the conclusions of high intellect matters of faith to common minds and ordinary Christians. The Church is a kinder and a wiser mother than to act so. But the difference is of still more consequence to catechumens and aliens to the Church. The Church can only offer them the elements of the faith. To invite their opinion on the remote consequences of theological doctrines, before they have accepted the first principles, and received the sacraments, and lived upon their grace in the living system of the Church, would be to admit that its whole divine and mysterious system was subject to the mere human intellect.

What would be thought if the Church required converts to subscribe to the theological opinions of Bellarmine and the doctrinal writings of St. Alphonsus? Yet this is precisely what many impose upon themselves. If the Church required it, they would be the first to see the absurdity and tyranny of the proceeding; and yet they absolutely refuse to separate, in their consideration, the symbols and symbolical books of the Church from the writings of theologians and the devotions of saints; and seem to consider it dishonest, unfair, or cowardly, if a Catholic refuses to be tried at their bar by such a standard. I know persons who on no other grounds refuse to [illegible] the Catholic Church. Talk to them of the creed of Pope Pius, and of the decrees of the Council of Trent, and they have no difficulties; but they go on to mention doctrines which not one man in a thousand, perhaps, among Catholics has ever heard of, and which none are required to believe. And at these same persons will subscribe to A [illegible] les and [illegible] nities to which they have the strongest objection, which they cannot possibly be said believe, which contradict rather than express their faith; and will continue active agents in a communion with which they have [illegible] or no sympathy, whose whole atmosphere [illegible] of her sies, and the majority of whose [illegible] ical and doctrinal works they positively condemn. They think themselves sincere in the rejection of the Catholic Church; they think it proceeds from a love of truth and conscientiously, and from fear of the responsibility of subscribing to a system; and yet they adhere to a communion, and serve it, whose work and witness is, on the whole, the very contrary of their faith and their wishes!

Surely there is an extraordinary inconsistency here. In fact, no two things can be more opposite and contradictory than an Anglican's mode of dealing with the Roman Catholic Church, and the way in which he requires that his own communion should be dealt with. In his mode of acting towards the former, he reverses all those sound ethical principles and rules of conduct which it is the chief glory of his party to have revived and infused throughout the popular theology of the day. The Church of England tried by the rules by which Anglicans try the Catholic Church, must be utterly overwhelmed with condemnation. And if any one should approach it from without in the spirit in which an Anglican approaches the Catholic Church, it would be literally impossible that he should ever enter it, or indeed any theological and ecclesiastical Body whatever.

These considerations had great weight with me, and disposed me more than ever to approach the Roman Catholic Church with humility and partiality—dispositions with which I contend it is a duty to approach whatever may probably turn out to be divine truth. With these dispositions, the more I dwelt on the truth and principles I had already embraced, the more I endeavoured to realise them personally, the more they commended themselves to my mind, the more they expanded with me, the more did I see the possibility of consequences and practices which I had heretofore only suspected as corruptions, the more did difficulties vanish; until at last none remained but such as arose from the consideration of remote results of doctrines, and practices, and expressions, founded upon or connected with them. But of these I was now persuaded I could be no proper judge. Brought up in a communion which had in no sense even adopted, much less embodied and acted upon, the very simplest form of the doctrines we had only lately heard of, an Anglican and Catholic, how could I presume to judge what would be the proper consequences and appropriate expressions of such doctrines when [illegible] and devoutly acted on for a length of time by individuals, and still more by the [illegible]? In what condition was I to constitute myself a measure of degrees and consistencies, and that for the Church or for saints? What more can a mind only moderately human and religious require, than to have the elements and essential doctrines of the faith commended to the mind by reasonable considerations, and on the authority of the Church? Surely nothing can be more uncatholic, more unreasonable, than for one external to the Church, admitting the authority of the Church, and believing all the essential doctrines of the Church, to refuse to submit to the Church from objections to some difficult questions of theology, or some popular practices.

In these dispositions, then, and on these grounds, I submitted to the Roman Catholic Church; and I may say, almost instantaneously every doubt as to the wisdom and rightness of the course I had pursued, and the step I had taken, vanished from my mind. A settled conviction, beyond the power of words to express, that every doctrine before held as probable was essentially true and full of consolation, has ever since gained upon my mind. No effort of mind, no intensity of thought and reflection, no ingenuity in attempting to work out consequences or combinations of religious truths, could possibly have done for me what one month of practical devotion did within the Church. Had the doctrines been false, or the practices injurious, I am confident that the attempt to act upon them must have ended in disappointment and disgust. And now I am equally confident that there is no other way of gaining this kind of inward and immovable conviction than by submission, on probable evidence, to the authority of the Church, and by living communion with her in the enjoyment of her peculiar grace and privileges. Those, therefore, who will not act on such evidence can never by any possibility attain to this conviction. They must for ever go on doubting and disputing, demanding intellectual demonstrations for spiritual truths, which it is impossible to convey to them, except, as I have said, in their simpler forms. If the Roman Church be that which it declares itself to be, then admission into it must always and necessarily involve submission to it; and this submission must ever partake of the nature of a conversion. If it be only probable that the Roman Church be what it declares itself to be, then the conduct of Anglicans,—of some, at least,—in dealing with it, is both irrational and irreligious because it excludes altogether the exercise of submission or faith, and would subject the whole Church, with all its doctrines and all its practices, in all their extent, down to the minutest details, to the reason and experience of the individual; and irrational, because it is literally impossible that the less, i. e. the one mind, should be able to measure and comprehend within itself the greater, i. e. the divine and sublime mystery of the Catholic Church, in all its manifold expression of doctrines and spiritual experiences. That which is the Church must be higher, deeper, wider than we—beyond us in every way. That which, while yet external to it, we can measure and comprehend; which we judge, examine, approve, in all its parts and details; to which we, or our ideas of truth, are the standard by which it is to be tried; which we accept or join because it agrees with us,—cannot be the Church.

How hard it is to get rid of the Protestant mind in which we have been educated! It has frequently struck me in conversing with Anglicans, or reading their writings, that they have not got hold of the idea of a Church in the sense in which I am now speaking of it. The Bible and the Fathers is their rule of faith, as the Bible alone is that of some Protestants; and "the Church" is that which (provided only there be bishops, priests, and deacons in it) most nearly embodies, or allows them to teach, their notions of Catholic doctrine according to their rule. They are above their Church: they teach and inform the Church, not the Church them. Their Church is their creature and instrument, rather than their divine superior; something which they use to propagate their doctrines, rather than one at whose lips they learn what doctrine is. Nay, if their Church will not allow them to teach, or should contradict what they have concluded is the Catholic faith, it would cease to be their Church; they would no longer obey it; and if no other bodies would allow them to teach the faith, or if they should compel them at the same time to accept more than their own precise limits to the faith, then I join no other body; they would, and must (as one of themselves has actually said), go out and form a separate body by themselves. They have not the least idea of submitting to any living body as an authority; that is, they have no real idea of a living Church at all. In the English Church, as yet, they can say what they like and do what they like; and though appearances are against them, they do not despair of making it what they wish it to become; therefore they continue in it, they will not "give it up," they will not abandon it; but if it should ever condemn, or declare more than what they believe to be the Catholic faith (you may hear them say themselves), that then they must leave it. And can this be that they are thus watching and anxious about as their child or pupil, be their Mother and their Divine Guide? Truly it does seem to me, and is forced upon me by their conduct and their language, that "the Church" is a sacred name under which they shelter, and with which they dignify, their own opinions; but not in any sense a living reality to which they submit. No wonder, then, that such persons should find it difficult to submit to the Catholic Church; they have yet to learn what submission to a Church is. This is the essential defect of the Anglican mind. When once they come to feel this, then doubtless see the impropriety of their con-will see the duty and necessity of ubmitting instead of judging; they will bene Catholics indeed, and experience in their n souls the full blessedness of being so.

ice having got rid of the objecting mind from without, and looking from within with the dutiful and loving eye of faith, all things will appear different to them. "Objections" will no longer occupy the imaginary prominence in which they have been placed by disputants, who see nothing else, or nothing else vividly, except "objections." The truth, the living and glorious truth of the Catholic Church, will fill the heart and subdue the nd; and objections will either cease to be objections, or disappear into their pro place, as questions on which it becomes u speak with reverence, while we may sp with freedom, within the holy Catholic Church, as children of one mother, undoubtedly loyal to the one God and one Lord, and devoted only to His glory and the good of souls. May God of His mercy hasten the time when the eyes of our dear though separated friends shall be purged from the film of prejudices and objections, when, to our great joy and their own unspeakable happiness, they shall be united to us again in the bosom of their and our true Mother!

(To be continued.)

Selections.

A LETTER TO THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY, WATERFORD AND WEXFORD, ON THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF THE HIERARCHY OF THE ENGLISH CATHOLIC CHURCH, AND THE PRESENT POSTURE OF CATHOLIC AFFAIRS IN GREAT BRITAIN BY AMBROSE PHILLIPPS, ESQ. OF DIEU MANOR.

"Render therefore unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's."

My Dear Lord,—

The great event, for which we have all so so earnestly beseeched
most prayers h
throne of Grace,
last holy Father, Pope Pius the Ninth, has his Apostolical power, and in His great wis-and goodness, restored the English Catholic se centuries were constantly sighing for, what they prayed for in their dungeons and on the scaffold, we have at length been permitted to behold; surely our hearts should expand with joy and gratitude, our voice, should be lifted up to thank and to glorify the Successor of St. Peter, and to invoke upon His sacred head the choicest blessings of our Lord whose chief vicar on earth He is.

If any thing were wanting to convince us, and all men, of the magnitude of this event, and of its immense importance not only to England but to the whole civilized world, it would surely be supplied by what we are now witnessing of its first effects upon the principal organs of public ion in this country. The "Times" and the Morning Chronicle," to say nothing of other nals conducted with less talent and exercising inferior influence, have devoted to it their leading articles, and have poured out upon the Spiritual Chief of Christendom all the vials of their wrath and sectarian prejudice; and not content with uttering their impotent threats against the Holy Father they make a vain appeal to what they call the more moderate portion of the Catholic Laity, and invoking the memory of the immortal Bossuet they call for a resistance to this undue encroachment of the Court of Rome.

At such a moment as this, and under such circumstances, it appears to me the sacred duty of the English Catholic Laity to speak out at once, and to support with all the energy of the most dutiful allegiance the authority and the act of our Chief Pastor. I for one, my dear Lord, feel specially bound to take this course, after having devoted myself for so many years to the advancement of the Catholic cause in England, and having at your instigation communicated some years ago to the Holy See itself my own ideas upon the importance of the restoration of the lish Catholic Hierarchy. And this consider-alone, if there were none other, would form sufficient reason for my addressing these remarks to your Lordship, whose illustrious station, no less than wonderful zeal for the advancement of Catholicism, has long placed you at the head of the English Catholic body.

And now, let me ask, to what does all this violent outcry of the Protestant press tend? What is the end the most im duty, member would be found to listen to such an appeal, so insulting as it is to all that he holds dear and sacred? still less, that it could exercise the slightest influence upon that august Pontiff, who inherits from Peter the duty and the right to feed all the lambs and all the sheep of Jesus Christ, and whose ecessors for eighteen centuries have shown that neither the threats of tyrants nor all the powers of Hell could ever deter them from the fulfilment of their Divine Mission. What then is its
It is a base attempt to kindle once more the expiring sparks of ultra-Protestant bigotry, and to convulse this empire by raising, if it be possible, at the present hour, that vilest of all popular clamours, the No Popery cry.

Let us hope for the honour of Englishmen and the safety of Her Majesty's dominions that his vile and unnatural attempt may signally fail.

And now, after all this bluster and stupid violence of the press, what has the Pope done?

He has simply abolished the office of Vicars Apostolic, and has placed the English Church under the government of what we call ordinary Bishops. The "Times" and the "Chronicle" write as if our Holy Father the Pope had by this act attempted to become something to the Catholics of England, that he was not before. That hitherto we had held to the Chair of Peter by some less stringent tie: and that now we were to be bound to it by the chains of the most absolute and unconditional slavery. How little do these writers know of the real facts of the case. Why it is the very reverse. Vicars Apostolic, if you will, are the mere representatives of the Pope, removable at His good pleasure; and their appointment has ever been significative of the secession of the independent character of the local branch of the Church Catholic. The appointment of ordinary Bishops is on the contrary the very recognition of the character of that local Branch. How then can such an institution in any way make us more subject to the Pope than we were before? What our Catechism taught us concerning the Pope before, it will continue to teach us now, neither more nor less, and what the Church teaches us by our Catechism we shall continue to hold without quailing at the threats of Protestants.

But say the authors of this outcry, the Pope by this act has offered a solemn insult to the Protestant Established Church of this kingdom and to the Government of the realm. How so? let us hear their reply, though there never was a reply more absurd. They say that the appointment of Catholic Metropolitan for the Catholics of this country denies and tramples under foot the claims of the Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury. Now what do they mean by this? Do they mean to say that the Pope ever recognized, or that the English Catholic ever submitted to the sway of the Protestant Primate over anything beyond the discordant body of his own nominal subject? For if that had been so, to what purpose did the predecessors of the present Pope send Vicars Apostolic into England to govern us in His name, to ordain Priests, to administer Sacraments to us according to the rite of the Universal Church; No, these writers know very well that they are insulting the common sense of their readers, when they make such an assertion as this. From the moment that the Holy See excommunicated Queen Elizabeth and all her adherents, they know as well as we do, that the Popes and every member of the Catholic Church from the rising to the setting sun anathematized the claims of the Protestant Church of England, and that hundreds are now numbered in "the noble army of martyrs" for having sealed their testimony to this Creed and Divine Truth with their blood. In what respect then, let me ask, has the Bull of Pius the Ninth altered the relations of the Catholics of England to the Established Church? However in what does the claim of the Lord Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster ignore or annul the claims of the Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury to the Allegiance of his own divided flock? If Englishmen still choose to venture their souls to the guidance of a Royal Supremacy, they will naturally look up to a Prelate who holds his See by the grace of Queen Victoria, and who refuses to give an answer, when he is asked concerning the authoritative teaching of his own Church upon an article of Faith. It is not for such as these, that the successor of St. Peter has erected the Metropolitan See of Westminster; but unless the people of England be prepared once more to decree death against those, who are determined to witness, even unto death, to the Divine Mission and universal authority of the blessed St. Peter, and his successors, let them not think it strange, now that our persecuted Church is emerging from three centuries of cruel oppression, now that multitudes of all ranks and ages, are flocking into her bosom, that the Sovereign Pontiff should deem the time come, to place his English children on the same footing with the rest of the Universal Church, and to restore in favour of the Catholics of England that primitive form of Church government which the Apostles of our Lord instituted over the whole earth, the interruption of which in this country during the last three centuries has unceasingly called forth the tears and groans of all faithful Catholics. If the people of England are not prepared to tolerate the exercise of the Pope's power in governing his own children according to the usages and Canons of the Universal Church let them no longer boast that they have learnt the lesson of toleration; they do not tolerate the Catholic Church, they are the advocates of persecution and intolerance, and they would fain force the Pastors of the Catholic Church to govern their flocks not according to the maxims of her own divine teaching, but according to those of Erastian Statesmen ignorant of Theology and destitute of Faith. But of one thing let them rest assured, there will be no flinching on the side of the Catholic Church; come peace and good will, or fierce articles in newspapers followed by persecuting acts on the part of the State or by popular violence, the decree of our Holy Father the Pope has gone forth, and it will be upheld by every faithful Catholic from the greatest to the least, though Protestant violence should convulse England to its very centre. We know how to prove our allegiance temporal Sovereign, and we are ready to share with the rest of Her Majesty's subjects the legitimate burdens that the constitution of the Realm imposes upon us: but in Religion we own no other chief but the Successor of St. Peter, and his voice, we hold to be the voice of Christ himself. If an attempt be made to concentrate against us the conflicting motives of hatred and disobedience that actuate the various sectaries of this land, the Catholics of England will not forget the high and providential position they have been called to occupy, nor will they shrink from the burden God has imposed upon them.

But how absurd this outcry is! If the Wesleyan Conference were to divide England into new circuits, we should hear of no remonstrances: when the Free Kirk secession in Scotland set up Presbyteries in opposition to those of the Establishment, we heard of no one invoking the interference of the Secular power: we did not hear that the Secretary of State for the Home Department was summoned to her Majesty's presence in consequence. Why then is it that such an outcry is raised at this act of the Catholic Church? Is she alone to be excepted from the general toleration or that general indifference? What is this but a tacit acknowledgment on the part of the Protestants, that their only argument after all is force; and that when the Catholic Church comes before us with no other weapons but those of sound reason and common sense, the advocates of the unlimited right of private judgment have no reply but a significant point to the Statute Book and the obsolete annals of Persecution.

God grant for the sake of England that these black annals may be obsolete! but when we see what criminal injustice and what flagrant violations of the sacred principles of Religious Liberty are being perpetrated in the neighbouring kingdom of Sardinia against the legitimate Pastors of the Church on the part of those, who boast themselves to be the exclusive votaries of Freedom; and when it is more than insinuated that the influence of England is prostituted to encourage this violence, it may be, alas! that here at home we may still have storms to encounter, and bitter troubles to endure. May the will of God be done, but the faithful Catholic Laity of England I am convinced will be true to the cause of Holy Church, and we know that our Pastors, the Catholic Bishops of England, will lead us on to the combat with unflinching energy, no matter what the risk or how great the cost.

And yet I cannot bring myself to believe that Englishmen in the nineteenth century are so inconsistent, or that they are so bigoted in their adherence to the supposed rights of the Established Church, as to rush on blindly to violate the right and liberties of another communion, merely because its Pastors have made a new arrangement of their own internal discipline, and in so doing have assumed titles for their own prelates, that exactly corresponded with their actual position and relation to their own flocks. If we are to be governed henceforth by an archbishop, it is because after three centuries of persecution we have grown up to the number of two millions; and if that archbishop is to be placed within the precincts of the metropolis, it is surely not without reason, when it is known that there are nearly three hundred thousand Catholics in London and its suburbs. Both the "Times" and the "Chronicle" admit that we have violated no statute of the realm in taking these titles; what then is our offence? is it one against law, of merely against the feelings and the prejudices of a few of our fellow-subjects? if it be merely the latter as much may be said of every other act of the Catholic Religion; there is not one that does not shock the prejudices of some of our separated followers of various sects. Why should it be more offensive to Protestant feeling for Cardinal Wiseman to call himself Archbishop of Westminster, than to officiate as he has hitherto done with mitre and crosier and all the other insignia of episcopacy in St. George's Southwark? Surely the man in his official capacity is after all something more than the title he wears, be what it may; if then Protestant prejudice could endure the greater, where is the wisdom or the common sense in bristeling against the less? But says the "Times," the Pope should have asked the permission of the British Government, or at least, He should have sounded their feelings on the subject. The Pope tells us He did, and that when Lord Minto was sent (as Mr. Baillie Cochrane affirms in his Young Italy) to undermine the Pope's government, His Holiness was assured by that statesman, that the English Government would have no objection to these titles. And why should it? They give the Pope no new powers in England, all that they do is to put an end to an anomaly. Henceforwards our Bishops take their titles from the flocks they really govern, not from distant sees, where they never reside. Surely there is common sense in what the Pope has done, but where is the common sense in making an outcry against it? I should understand the meaning of this outcry, if it went a little further, if it said boldly at once, we feel that Protestant argument cannot stand the force of Catholic argument, only gives Catholicism fair play and Protestant must fall before it, therefore keep it down by main force; do not let them call their Bishops by their true names, lest peradventure the people should one day take them for the real Bishops and look upon ours as the sham: in a word, we thought in 1829 that we might safely tolerate Catholicism, and that removing from it the prestige of persecution it would die a natural death, but events have baffled our theory, the progress, this obsolete superstition has since made proves that nothing can withstand its arguments but main force. If we do not wish England to become Catholic once more, we must somehow or other crush the Catholics; per fas et nefas we must do this, or we shall do nothing; now a glorious opportunity has come to stir up the bigotry of all the anti-catholic sects, let us once more raise, if we can, the old No-Popery cry.

Let them raise their No-Popery cry, let them fan up the smouldering embers of Protestant bigotry, we shall continue the course from which as a body we have never swerved, exhibiting a stainless pattern of loyalty to our Sovereign and Constitution, practising the duties of Christians and aiming at the blessed virtues inculcated by the Catholic religion. In return for the insults of our enemies, we shall pray to God for them, that their eyes may be opened to see the perilous state in which they are placed, and to acknowledge the authority of that one Universal Church, which alone has been commissioned by Christ to "teach all Nations," and to which alone has been committed "the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven." But while we compassionate the lot of those, who are without, we shall not fail to lift up our hearts in grateful thanks to God, who without any merit on our side has so graciously placed us on "the Rock" of Safety. We have signs enough from every quarter to cheer and to console; and amongst these, is there one more admirable or more cheering than the restoration of our own long lost Hierarchy?

The very name chosen by our Holy Father for our Primatial See is one of Catholic and happy omen. It was in the month of January in the year of our Lord 1066, the King of England, the Blessed Saint Edward the Confessor, lay sick of his last illness in his Royal Palace at Westminster, and as it is related by Saint Ælred, Abbot of Rievaux Abbey, in Yorkshire, the holy king a little before his death fell into a trance, in which he beheld two pious Benedictine Monks of Normandy whom he had formerly loved in his youth when an exile in that country. These Monks foretold to the King, what was afterwards to happen in England, they declared that the wickedness of the English nation was exceeding great, and that it provoked the wrath of God, but that when it should come to the full, He would send in his anger a Mission of wicked spirits into the land, who should grievously punish it, and sever the green tree thereof from its stock, for the space of three furlongs distance, that at length God would have mercy upon Englan when this same tree should return again to its own root without the help of any man's hand and bear fruit and flourish. On hearing these words King Edward opened his eyes and awoke from his trance and then related the vision he had seen to his Queen St. Editha, who stood by his bedside along with Harold his successor, and Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury. This vision of our great and holy king St. Edward has ever been dear to the Catholics of England, and the interpretation given to it by our Catholic ancestors is very remarkable. They understood the Mission of wicked Spirits to signify that of the Protestant Innovators who in the 16th century pretended to reform the English Church. The cutting down and severing from its roots the green tree signified the separation of English Church from the centre of Unity, the Root of the Catholic Church, the Holy See, which had been in a special manner more than to most of the other nations the root and source of Christianity in England. But this tree was to be removed from its root for the space of three furlongs. This was explained to me by a venerable English Catholic Peer, now no more, to signify that England should remain severed from Catholic Unity during three centuries, after which as the words of St. Edward testify it will return again to its own stock without the help of any man's hand, and bear fruit and flourish.

And what more marvellous sight, than what we now see in England? What human hand has wrought the great change that we see each day rapidly advancing amongst us? How is it that the ablest, and most learned and most pious of the Anglican Clergy come one after another, and sacrificing all, that men value and seek after on earth, confess that they cannot any longer resist the force of Catholic argument? How is it that we see this movement spreading like the flames of a mighty fire through all ranks so that there is hardly a family in the Realm to which the claims of Catholicism are not brought home in a way that none of them ever dreamt of a few years ago? and that would then have seemed a dream indeed, had any one foretold it? Surely when we witness this return of Protestant England to the unity of the Catholic Church, we cannot but call to mind the words spoken by our holy King St. Edward the confessor, nearly eight hundred years ago, as he lay on his death-bed in the Palace of Westminster, that very Palace which Queen Victoria is now so gloriously rebuilding in a style worthy of the most Catholic period of our history, and the sacred bones of Saint Edward are still enshrined beneath the Gothic vaults of Westminster Abbey! Surely there is something in the name of Westminster to make every Catholic heart beat with joy and hope!

My dear Lord, you are on your way to the Holy City to thank our most Holy Father for His gracious regard for our English Church, pray Him to bestow again and again His apostolic blessing upon His children here, who are ready to combat for His sacred rights and those of the Holy See, and the Catholic Church. The Holy Father may count upon us, we are the children of the Crusaders, we will not falter before the sons of Cranmer and John Knox.*

I am, my dear Lord,

Most faithfully and truly yours,

AMBROSE LISLE PHILLIPPS.

THE VICARS-APOSTOLIC AND THE NEW HIERARCHY.

CONSISTENCY OF THE PROTESTANT BISHOP OF ST. ASAPH. TO THE EDITOR OF THE TABLET.

December 24th, 1850.

SIR,—The following extract is from the "History of the Church of England," by Dr. Short, the present Protestant Bishop of St. Asaph.

He says, vol. ii. page 344 (Note)—"A Vicar-Apostolic is an officer vested with Episcopal authority by the Pope over any Church which is the case of a Bishop, but which, for some reason, cannot have one of its own." The Bishop is consecrated to some See in partibus infidelium, which had formerly a Bishop, but has now no church. The real difference between a Bishop of a See and a Vicar-Apostolic is, that the commission of the latter is only during the Pope's pleasure. Ireland has Roman Catholic Bishops of her own, who are independent of Rome as far as Roman Catholics can be; and the members of that communion in England have much reason to complain that they have never been allowed this privilege."

It will be curious to see how the Bishop himself will maintain his consistency in joining the present insane cry against the English Catholic Hierarchy. Two of his friends have already attempted it, each in his own way, but without success. The extract which I have given you above was sent by some Catholic to the London Guardian. Immediately a friend of the Bishop's signing "Cymro," wrote to say, with the usual garnish of abuse of Popish falsehood, that there was no such passage in the Bishop's book, for that the words occurred only in a quotation from Charles Butler's "Roman Catholics in England." The editor of the Guardian had the honesty to look for himself after he had published the letter, and announced next week that this statement was untrue. In fact, it is needless to say the words themselves could not have been written by a Catholic. Last week another friend of the Bishop writes to the Guardian, to say that the Bishop's answer to the address of his Clergy is perfectly consistent with the words of his history—a bold attempt. The Bishop now says:—

* "Nous sommes les [illegible] des croisés nous ne reculerons pas devant les fils de Vol[taire]." The Count Montalembert in his famous address to the Catholics of Lyons June 7, 1845.

"The ground of offence does not consist in the Pope's authorising a Bishop to superintend the welfare of the people of his communion; but in his pretending to create new Sees, and to give the Bishops appointed by him a territorial authority in spiritualities over the people of a kingdom over which he has no right, &c.

This will not do. Will the Bishop really pretend to consistency when he maintains the right of English Catholics to the same Ecclesiastical constitution now enjoyed by their brethren in Ireland, &c., now when he professes indignation against the erection of Catholic Sees in England? Are there, then, no Catholic Sees in Ireland? or is he ignorant that the Irish Catholic Bishops do, and the English Catholic Bishops do not, violate even the existing iniquitous laws of Protestant England?

Why not at once confess that he is in fashion following the stream (a very muddy one) in defiance of consistency?—Your obedient servant,

R.

EXTRAORDINARY SCENE IN AN ENGLISH PROTESTANT CATHEDRAL.

On Monday se'nnight, the ceremony of baptizing the female African infant, born in the New Hall, Leicester—the mother being one of a party of Africans exhibited about the country—on the thren entrance to the Cathedral, containing the African woman, the two godmothers and the godfather viz., Mr. and Mrs. Edwards, of the Paul Pry, Worcester, and Mrs. Tyler, the wife of the exhibitor; one of the women bearing the little ebon infant who was the innocent cause of all this ceremony and wonderment. The guardian and exhibitor of the Africans, Mr. Tyler, was also with them. The mother was conducted by her attendants and the vergers to a seat between the pulpit and the chancel, and they were no sooner seated there than the Cathedral began to fill, while two or three hundred persons vided themselves into that confined part of the oir where the attraction presented itself. Presently the bishop arrived also Canons Benson, Wood and Cooke, and occupied their usual stalls. When the service commenced, as also when the organ struck out, Macomba (the mother) evinced some surprise, but on the whole her conduct and demeanor was decidedly a pattern for the worse than barbarians by whom she was surrounded. After the services in the choir were concluded, the rush towards the font was terrific, there being upwards of 2,000 persons present. With great difficulty the Bishop arrived at the spot, accompanied by Canons Cook and Benson, Macomba Faku and her friends with the baby, the choristers and vergers, &c. The pressure was now terrific; the canons and Lord Sandys (the latter of whom was obliged to do battle with the multitude) were nearly taken off their legs. The Bishop however, proceeded with the rite, which, it is needless to add, was a dumb show to all who were not close to the spot. The woman, who stood resting against the font, and occasionally testified her annoyance at the crowd behind her, behaved in the most exemplary manner, eyeing the Bishop at times with some curiosity; the infant, also (which was dressed in a long white robe, that contrasted curiously with its little black limbs), proved itself to belong to a right royal, well-bred race, by preserving the utmost decorum, and not allowing even a whimper to escape its lips. On its being sprinkled with the water, the mother looked with great surprise and concern, and held an eager conversation with her guardian and the women: his Lordship hastened this part of the ceremony, as though fearful of the consequences, and soon put down the child, which had the effect of restoring confidence to the poor woman. The name given to the child was, 'Leicester England.' The party then moved through the dens throng towards the chapter-house, where the names were duly entered in the register, and, after a little delay, they passed through the cloister to the college-green, where their carriage was waiting. Here a band of music, posted in a carriage, commenced playing some popular pieces of the day. In this way, and with the bells of St. Helen's Church ringing, the procession, accompanied by an innumerable crowd passed through the principal of the city.—Nonconformist, Feb. 5.

Convocation of the Clergy.—Yesterday the two Houses of Convocation met at the Jerusalem Chamber. Many other clergymen made their way into the Council Chamber, only, however, to be summarily removed. The Bishop of Chichester presented a petition from the clergy and laity of Canterbury to the Archbishop and Bishops of the Province, on the revival of synodial ..... It was ordered to lie on the table. Archdeacon Thorp presented a similar petition to the Lower House. A long discussion arose as to whether the House was sufficiently constituted to receive the petition. Upon a wish being expressed, through the Prolocutor, that the Archbishop's opinion should be ascertained prior to any further proceedings, the Lower House was summoned to an interview with the Upper House. The Archbishop said, the Lower House was legally constituted, and was in a position to receive the document. The Members of the Lower House withdrew, and on re-assembling, the Petition was received, and the House was proceeding to other business when the Members were summoned to the Upper House. The Archbishop directed the Registrar to read a document proroguing the Provincial Synod or Convocation until Thursday, the 28th day of August next ensuing. The reading of this document created considerable surprise among the Members of the Lower House, who were, of course presented from entering upon any further topics of discussion. There was, of course, no alternative, and both Houses were then formally adjourned.—Patriot, February 6.

THE BENGAL HOLIC H

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.

No. 15.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1851. [VOL. XX.

IMPORTANT LETTER, ADDRESSED BY HIS EMINENCE, THE CARDINAL PREFECT OF THE SACRED CONGREGATION TO HIS GRACE, THE ARCHBISHOP OF EDESSA, VICAR APOSTOLIC OF WESTERN BENGAL. THIS LETTER WAS RECEIVED BY THE LATE MAIL.

POPE PIUS IX.

R. P. D. Patricio Josepho Carew. Archiepiscopo Edesseno Vicario Aplico Bengaliae Occidentalis, Calcuttam.

Illmé. et Rme. Dne,

Quamvis per litteras Apostolicas in forma Brevis iterato datas tum a Ssmo. Dno. Gregorio XVI, tum a Ssmo Dno Nro Pio Divina Providentia PP. IX, sive nimirum per eas quae incipiunt Multa praeclare et sive per alias dein editas, ac respectivis regionum istarum Vicariis Apostolicis missas apprime patent quaenam iisdem in regionibus tamquam unice legitima spiritualis auctoritas habenda sit, et ad quos in Catholicae Religionis rebus plena jurisdictio pertineat Sanctitati tamen suae mirum ac dolendum accidit percipere complures non deesse qui licet Catholicae Fidei et unitatis nomine gloriari videntur, legitimae tamen auctoritati ut sese subjicerent, et S. Sedis mandatis parerent nondum adduci potuerint. Quod vero in aliis etiam Indiarum regionibus factum novit Ssmus Dnus Noster, idem in Bengaliae Vicariatibus evenire aegre sane cognovit, et quosdam ita pervicaciter egisse intellexit ut non solum canonicae potestati contraire, sed in jus quoque vocare Apostolicos Vicarios ausi fuerint, litesque contra eos movere. Ad omnem porro turbulentis ejus modi hominibus praecludendam excusationis rationem, ac si fieri possit, ut ad saniora consilia eos revocari contingat mandante Ssmo. Dno. Nostro per hanc nostram Epistolam eis, et quibus opus fuerit ostendendam, notum facimus, ac solemniter declaramus a Sanctitate sua prout in aliis Vicariatibus rite etiam

To the Most Rev. Patrick Joseph Carew, Archbishop of Edessa Vicar Apostolic of Western Bengal, Calcutta.

Most Illustrious and Most Reverend Lord,—

Although, by Apostolic letters in the form of a Brief repeatedly given both by Gregory XVI, of holy memory, and by our most holy Lord Pius IX, by Divine Providence, Pope, that is to say by that, which begins "Multa praeclare" and by another afterwards edited, and sent to the respective Vicars Apostolic of those places, it is clear what spiritual authority should be held as alone legitimate in the same places, and to whom full jurisdiction in the affairs of the Catholic religion belongs, his Holiness is surprised and pained to perceive, that notwithstanding there are many, who, although they seem to glory in the name of Catholic Faith and unity, cannot still be brought to subject themselves to the legitimate authority, and to obey the commands of the Holy See. But that which he knew to have been done in other places in India, our most holy Lord has learned with sorrow to have occurred in the Vicariates of Bengal, and he has understood, that some have act perversely as not only to dare to resis the canonical power, but to go to law with the Vicars Apostolic, and to institute suits against them. To take away, therefore, from those turbulent men every pretext for excuse, and, if possible, to recall them to better counsels, by the command of our most holy Lord, I make known and solemnly declare by this letter, to be shewn to them, and to those to constitutis Vicariis Aplicis, ita in Bengallae istis tam Orientali, quam Occidentali Vicariatu omnem auctoritatem, jurisdictionem, et potestatem Amplitudini tuae (nempe in Occidentali) et Episcopo Milensi (in Orientali) tributam, ac traditam esse, ita ut in respectivis iisdem Vicariatibus tibi ac memorato Milenis Antistiti unice, ac solummodo, et exclusive spectet omnimoda Ecclesiarum tum spiritualis, tum temporalis administratio bonorum scilicet, ac reddituum ad easdem Ecclesias pertinentium. Hinc est quod nonnisi ab iisdem Vicariis Apostolicis exercendi sacri muneris facultas iis regionibus eis creditis petenda sit, ac propterea omnes tum Regulares, tum saeculares Presbyteri ab eis dependeant necesse est, ut valide ac licite ministrare valeant. Sciant proinde nullam a Sancta Sede auctoritatem, ac jurisdictionem agnosci in eis, qui Vicariis Apostolicis obedientiam, ac dependentiam praestare recusant. Deceas itaque eos hortamur, contra Catholicae Ecclesiae unitatem ac fidem facere, qui non sunt cum Apostolica sede nedum verbis verum etiam factis et animis conjuncti qui que cum ea non colligant omnino dispergere, et qui ut adhaerent legitimae auctoritati ab Apostolica sede constitutae Divinae Ordinationi resistere. Confidimus autem futurum ut dissidiorum, ac perturbationum finem hujusmodi decepti homines tandem faciant, conjunctique viribus ex in vineae Domini in excolenda Dominica vinea tecum adlaborare literatis monitis adducantur, ac rei Catholicae istis in regionibus plena restituatur quies. Quod a D. O. M. adprecamur enixe etiam rogantes ut amplitudinem Tuam Diutissime servet ac sospitet.

Romae ex aedibus S. Cognis. de Propda. Fide Die 31 Januarii 1851 Amplitudinis Tuae.

Ad Officia Paratissimus,

J. Ph. Card. Fransoni Pref.

Al. Barnabo.

A Secretis.

(True Copy.)

J. McCabe,

Secy. to the Archbishop, V. A. W. B.

whom it may be necessary, that all authority, jurisdiction and power in the Eastern as well as in the Western Vicariate of Bengal, is by his Holiness given and conferred to your Grace in the Western Vicariate and to the Bishop of Milepo in the Eastern, just as it is to the Vicars Apostolic in the other legitimately constituted Vicariates, so that to you and to the aforesaid Bishop of Milene, in the same respective Vicariates, belongs simply, solely, and exclusively the entire administration of the Churches, both spiritual and temporal, that is, of the goods and income which belong to those Churches. Hence the faculty to exercise the Sacred ministry in the places entrusted to them is to be obtained from those Vicars Apostolic alone, and therefore all Priests both regular and secular necessarily depend on them that they may minister validly and lawfully. Let them know then, that no authority and jurisdiction is acknowledged by the Holy See in those who refuse obedience to and dependence on the Vicars Apostolic. We therefore exhort you to teach them, that they act contrary to the unity and faith of the Catholic Church who are not united with the Apostolic See not only in words but also in deed and in heart; and that they, who do not gather with her, scatter; and that they, who do not adhere to the legitimate authority constituted by the Apostolic see, resist the divine ordination. We hope however that these deluded men will at length put an end to those disturbances and dissensions, and that by reiterated admonitions they may be brought, to labour with you, united in the bond of charity, in cultivating the Vineyard of the Lord, and that entire Peace may be restored to the Catholic body in those places, a blessing we implore from Almighty God, earnestly praying also that he may prosper and preserve your Grace for many years.

Rome, from the Chambers of the S. Congregation de Propaganda Fide 31 day of Jan. 1851.

Always at your service,

J. Ph. Card. Fransoni Pref.

A. Barnabo.

Secy.

(True Translation.)

J. McCabe,

Secy. to the Archbishop, V. A. W. B.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, April 12, 1851.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

4TH WEEK—4TH WEDNESDAY.

This evening, His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, delivered a most impressive Sermon at St. Thomas' Church, on the miracles wrought by our Saviour: His Grace spoke with eloquence so singularly impressive, that we do not feel, that we can do justice to the discourse of the Most Rev. Preacher. We listened to him with breathless attention: the following is a sketch of the Sermon.

Why herein is a wonderful thing, that you know not from whence he is, and he hath opened my eyes."—John Chap. 9, Verse 30.

The words just rehearsed, my Brethren, contain the answer returned to the Pharisees, by the blind man, to whom Christ had restored sight, in the miraculous manner described in this day's Gospel. They are the simple unsophisticated effusion of a poor unlettered man, in which he bears testimony to the truth of the splendid fact, which the enemies of the Saviour sought, dishonestly and by threats, to render equivocal and dubious, in order thus to defeat the conclusive argument it supplied, in favor of Christ's Divine mission.

Alas for the weakness, the inconsistency and the perversity of human nature!

Unless an authority, like that of the Gospel, assured us of the truth of the various instances, in which the Jews afforded so many melancholy illustrations of the infirmities and faults I have alluded to, the imputation I have cast on human nature would seem incredible. For, however imperfect human reason may be in particular circumstances, yet fit to itself, it is, when unclouded by passion or prejudice, ready to acknowledge, that miracles are to be regarded as the voice of God, sent forth either to unfold truth or to crush error, to reward virtue, or to punish vice.

In effect, all the records of history, both sacred and profane, prove, that in every Age and Country, both among those who worshipped the true God, and among those who were deluded by superstition, the indelible impression universally prevailed, that it was by means of miracles, that the Almighty spoke, on occasions when he wished to interpose the exercise of a special Providence for the welfare of Nations or of Individuals. And in truth, what mode can be conjectured more worthy of the God, from whom Nature and its laws received existence, than to derogate openly from or suspend the order established by him, when for any wise or salutary purpose, he may wish to make his holy will known to men, for whom that order had been created.

And assuredly, if, notwithstanding such extraordinary interposition on the part of God, they, in favor of whom that interposition is employed, remain, nevertheless, insensible and unconverted, the consequence, however dreadful, must be imputed to their own perversity, and by no means to Divine Providence. Much more, must the same observation be true with respect to those, who not only remain unconverted, but who even treat with contempt and blasphemy the wonders supernaturally wrought by God, in order to bring them to know the truth and to confess it.

And yet, were not the Jews habitually guilty of these outrages, during the three years of the Saviour's public Ministry? At one time, they impiously exclaimed, "In Beelzebub the Prince of devils he casteth out devils." At another, they accused him of profanation, because he healed the sick on the Sabbath.—on a third occasion, after the Saviour had raised Lazarus from the grave, they, blinded by malice sought to kill Lazarus, least the multitudes persuaded of Christ's Divine Mission by the continued presence and conversation of one who had been four days in the grave, should acknowledge Christ as the promised Messiah.

See, to what excesses a depraved heart will conduct man, when it will even lead him to war against the Almighty himself, and reject, with open insult and irreverence, the clearest manifestations of his Divine Will. Could the Jews have alleged any pretence, which would have enabled them to cast doubt on the miraculous facts wrought by Christ, they would most certainly have done so. But as this was impossible, their malice at once profited of the only means left them, of defeating the grand end for which these miracles had been wrought, first by ascribing them to the prince of darkness, secondly by charging the Saviour with Sacrilege for working them on the Sabbath, and lastly, by conspiring to murder Lazarus, in order thus to destroy every memorial of the stupendous prodigy, which was accomplished in raising him from the dead.

The miracles wrought by Moses in Egypt were evidenced by the Jews and Egyptians, and yet Pharaoh and his court were not converted. For forty years the Jews witnessed miracles in the desert and yet they continued a stubborn and rebellious race.

In the parable of Dives and Lazarus, the Saviour explicitly declares in the person of Abraham, that if the Brothers of the Rich Man did not hearken to Moses and the Prophets, neither would they hearken, even though one were to rise from the dead for their conversion.

The reasoning employed by the Saviour in that parable implies, that the Brothers of Dives professed to believe in the ancient dispensation, but did not regulate their conduct by their religion. It is then, unhappily, but too true, that even among those who profess the true Religion, there may be found many, who are habitually blind and insensible, in all that regards their practical conformity to the rules laid down by their Faith. And if we assent to the Saviour's Words, we must also admit, that this insensibility and obduracy are sometimes so inveterate and incurable, that even one raised from the Dead, would not effect the conversion of such believers.

Let us give to this consideration the importance it deserves, and enquire how it happens, that even they who profess the true faith may unhappily fall into a state so deplorable—a state in which salvation seems almost hardly to be hoped for.

The first ordinary cause of the evil we treat of, is inattention to the daily duties of Religion. When these duties are either neglected, or performed carelessly and irreverently—when their exact, regular, edifying performance is under-valued or not duly appreciated, then to use the language of the Psalmist, the great "truths of religion are decayed from among the Children of Men." The incipient decay of these truths soon leads to the oblivion of them, and in a short time, in consequence of this oblivion of them, the illusive and deceitful maxims of the world are preferred before them—In this state, it but too ordinarily occurs, that the Christian unhappily engaged in it, will be unwilling to understand aright, that he may do well. From an unwillingness to see the truths of religion in their just light, the transition to a dislike or an aversion to them is easy. This is exemplified in the conduct of Herod and Herodias to John the Baptist. St. Paul seems to have experienced something of this hatred, from those to whom he announced the truth. Inimicus factus sum, vobis verum dicens.—Galat. 4.

Hence a state of spiritual blindness ensues, which may be described in these words of the Psalmist—"My iniquities have overtaken me, and I was not able to see."

This blindness of the soul causes all distinction between good and evil to be readily confounded—"They shall, says the Scripture walk as Blind Men, because they have sinned against the Lord." Sophon. i. 17.

Let us now enquire whether the reasoning hitherto employed, will not also go far to explain, why it is, that so many of our separated Brethren remain estranged from the light, the peace, and the unity of the Catholic Church, and pass their lives, in an unaccountable indifference and insensibility to that subject. And yet, it would seem to a person possessed of ordinary understanding, that it would be only necessary for them to open their eyes and ears, to what is going on, on all sides around them, in order to be aroused from their torpor, and induced to give at least some consideration to a matter of so much importance: assuredly, it is not too much to expect, that a rational Being, like Man, should, in the concerns of Religion, take an interest, and evince a solicitude equal, at least, to that, which actuates a Prudent Person, in the regulation of those pursuits, on which his welfare in life depends. Now to one outside the Catholic Communion is not the great fact deserving serious attention, that after eighteen Centuries of probation, that Communion still includes two hundred millions, that is more than two thirds of the Christian World. Is not also, to the same person, the fact worthy of reflection, that in a country such as England, where, in many parts, even in our own time, Catholicity had so dwindled away, from the persecution of three Centuries, as to be, in whole districts, utterly unknown to the mass of their inhabitants, yet that it should now rise up, with all the vigor peculiar to the Church in the Apostolic times, and induce hundreds of the most gifted and distinguished of the English Protestant Clergy and Laity to trample under foot—Friends, riches, honors and preferments, and to proclaim aloud their former error and accuse themselves openly, those of them, I mean that had belonged to the English Clergy, that their Protestant ordination was invalid—that in truth they had been but mere lay Men, intruders into the Ministry, and that in proof of their present sincerity, they now willingly exchanged all that this world holds dear in rank, emoluments and the relations of Domestic life, for poverty, humiliation, and the scorn and contempt of those, whose esteem and affection they had hitherto valued more than life itself. Our Saviour, as you have seen, describes Abraham as hav-ng said to the Rich Man, that if the Rich Man's Brothers did not hearken to Moses and the Prophets, neither would they be converted, even though one were to rise from the Dead to speak to them. Now if this reply were founded, as it certainly was, in justice and truth, in regard to the Rich Man's Brothers, is there no reason to fear, that the principle it contains, may not be, in our day, but too applicable to those of our separated Brethren, who not only do not hear the Church which has succeeded to Moses and the Prophets, but remain listless and indifferent spectators of the moral wonders daily wrought by God in testimony of his Church, in the Conversion to it of so many, who like Paul, had once been its persecutors, but who now like him, through the Divine mercy, have become its Doctors and Defenders, burning and shining lights, to show forth the truth to the ends of the Earth. Compared with the miracle of raising a Man from the Dead, how much more wonderful are these miraculous triumphs of Divine Grace, in delivering from the darkness and shadow of spiritual death, the illustrious Converts of whom I speak, and in imparting to them the light and life of the true faith, the seed of a blessed immortality. Would those of my separated Brethren who now hear me, share in the like Blessings. Let them then diligently keep in mind the causes I have this evening assigned for Spiritual Blindness in faith and morals and make use of the means I have pointed out for the cure of this evil.

Mark now, my Brethren, some of the leading characteristics, which distinguish spiritual from mere corporal blindness, and see how much greater an evil the blindness of the soul is, than that of the body.

For, first, corporal blindness is a mere physical defect, which however inconvenient and painful in a temporal point of view, yet of itself includes nothing, on account of which, the person afflicted with it, should either feel remorse, or be subjected to censure or reproach.

Secondly, another important distinction exists between spiritual and corporal blindness. In the latter case, the person deprived of sight, fully understands the nature of his misfortune, and exerts all his ingenuity to mitigate it and to guard against the difficulties and dangers to which it may expose him. Not so with him, who is spiritually blind. One of the most dreadful evils of his state is, that, like the sinner who is given up to a reprobate sense, he is insensible to his misfortune and therefore indifferent as to the means he should make use of, in order to be delivered from it. In the Book of Proverbs, the Holy Ghost describes thus the evil I have just mentioned "The way of the wicked is darkness they know not when they fall": a fatal result of this moral insensibility is, that it occasions all distinction between right and wrong, good and evil to be confounded, and thus exposes the Christian afflicted with it to that malediction, pronounced by the Prophet Isaias, when he says "Wo to you, that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light and light for darkness: that put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter. Wo to you that are wise in your own eyes, and prudent in your own conceits." "The Prophet speaks thus, in order to point out pride and self sufficiency as the ordinary sources of spiritual blindness. The angel restored sight to Tobias by the application of the gall of the fish; compunction and humility joined to prayer will give sight to the spiritually blind.

SINGAPORE.

Persecution of the Chinese Catholics in the Vicinity of Singapore by the Pagan Chinese of the same Neighbourhood.

We publish to-day a letter from a learned, and amiable French Catholic Priest, Rev. Mr. Barbe, a Clergyman known and much esteemed by several Protestant Members of the Asiatic Society in Calcutta. In that letter, the Abbé Barbe describes in a most feeling manner, the grievous wrongs inflicted on the Resident Chinese Catholics under his care, by a ruffianly gang of certain heathen Chinese, attached to some secret Societies, established in the same Vicinity.

We need not inform our Catholic Readers, that the Church holds Secret Societies in the greatest abhorrence, even in cases, where these may consist of Members of her own Communion. In every shape and form which they may assume, and under whatsoever pretence, even if ostensibly for her own defence, she repudiates and condemns them, and excludes their adherents from the Sacraments, until they shall have sincerely and totally renounced all Communion with them and their Members, collectively and individually.

"To all such secret Societies, she deems the words of Christ to be applicable to the letter.

"Every one that doth evil hateth the light, and cometh not to the light, that his works may not be reproved. But he that doth truth cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest, because they are done in God."

But to return to the immediate subject of this notice, unless the truth of the startling details, narrated in Rev. Mr. Barbe's letter were vouched for by an eye witness of his unquestionable respectability, we could not but incline to the conjecture, that they were too highly coloured and greatly exaggerated either by the fears or the too vivid imagination of the Narrator.

Only a few Months have elapsed since the Crew of one of H. M. Ships of war was employed to rescue forcibly from Prison at Macao, an insolent fanatic, who, after repeated admonitions persisted in showing his bad breeding and his disrespect, at a public procession of the Blessed Sacrament. Assuredly, if this proceeding were proper, it cannot be denied, that it is much more imperative on the British authorities to adopt promptly strong measures for the protection of the numerous unoffending Catholic Christians living under their protection in Singapore and its vicinity. Indifference or torpor in the discharge of so imperative a duty cannot fail to suggest, however unwarrantable the suspicion may be to those of the same Communion with the sufferers, that the rescue of an ill bred Protestant culprit at Macao is deemed a matter of much greater moment, than the protection of some hundreds of Catholics, against the violence and robbery of ruffianly Bandits, incited to crime, by their hatred of the Gospel.

A Letter addressed to His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop, V. A. W. B. By the Rev. Mr. Barbe.

My Dear Lord Archbishop,—I beg to introduce to your Grace, my friend Captain Steward, a Roman Catholic, commanding the Hooghly Steamer going to Calcutta to be repaired.

I embrace this present opportunity to forward to your Grace a box of preserved Birds, &c., for the College Museum; I am sorry that it is not in my power now to send some things more precious, but my time is so much taken for the present, that I cannot. I hope that next year when in Malacca, I will be able to make a better collection.

I suppose your Grace has heard of the persecution raised against our Chinese Christians by secret Societies of their Countrymen; 26 houses have been plundered of every thing in the day time by gangs of 60 or 70 robbers; Plantations destroyed, and all the Christians obliged to abandon their houses, for 20 and some days—a small force of Peons were sent to arrest these persons was attacked by some hundred Chinese with their Flags, and this for three consecutive days, and it was only when all the Christians had lost all they had in their Plantations, which amounted to above 3000 dollars, that our wise people sent some Sepoys to the interior of the island, and of these wise people there are some who think that it was improper to send them, for such a small matter, and consequently, it is expected that they will be recalled: the Government does not appear inclined to take strong measures, to put a stop to these Societies, or, as the Chinese think it is not in their power to do so. But there is no doubt that one day or other, Singapore will feel the consequences of it; for the present I have no other means for securing the safety of the Chinese, but to make some arrangement, or compromise with the heads of the secret Society; but that such compromise should be necessary under an European and Christian, is most shameful. But I have no other means, to which I can resort; and if there is any blame attached to it, the Local Authorities will be answerable for it. For they have not framed proper regulation for the Malacca settlements. The Grand jury in their address to the Recorder have several times represented in strong terms, the doings of the Chinese, and suggested some means to put a stop to their daring conduct, but no attention has been paid to their representations, and the regulations passed last year, by the Supreme Government, are to be enforced only next year, what will be the result I dont know, but many respectable persons of the place expect very little good from them.

I remain, my dear Lord Archbishop,
Your Grace's most humble and affectionate servant,
J. Barbe.

P. S.—Your Grace will oblige me by sending one of the Siamese Grammars, I now forward to the Asiatic Society.

J. B.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

Our readers will perceive by the perusal of Rev. Mr. Barbe's letter to the Archbishop, which we publish to-day, that arrangements have been made for establishing a Museum at St. John's College. A spacious well lighted and well ventilated Hall, fifty feet long and 25 broad has been set apart for that purpose in the Institution. A limited but very choice collection of Birds, Insects, &c. &c. has just been received for the New Museum. The College is indebted for this valuable kindness to the Rev. Mr. Barbe of Singapore who has kindly promised to send a secon supply from Malacca in a little time. A small collection of Shells, gathered in the Philippine Islands was lately presented to the Indian Museum by the Rev. Chaplain of the Spanish Corvette which left Calcutta a few weeks ago. From Mr. Purdon who is Punjaub, some interesting Mineralogical specimens are soon expected, and as applications has been made to Catholic Missionaries, stationed in different remote regions for their co-operation towards the undertaking we speak of, there is every reason to hope, that before long the New Museum will contain a large and valuable collection. Due care will be taken, according as the collection progresses to initiate the Pupils of the Institutions in the Natural History of each object.

 Contributions towards the Museum of Birds &c. &c. will be gratefully received.

CATHOLIC MALE ORPHANAGE AND DAY SCHOOLS, CALCUTTA.

In compliance with the request of his Grace, the Archbishop, we the undersigned visited* the male Orphanage, on Sunday, the 6th inst. We were particularly struck with the healthy appearance of the children, whose cheerful looks plainly indicated their comfortable and happy condition. There are at present fifty five Boarders, and nearly one hundred and forty day Pupils, who are attached to the Institution; upwards of seventy, also attend the Christian Brother's School at Bow-Bazar, numbering on the whole upwards of two hundred and sixty boys. All these children are placed under the care of Brother Francis and his excellent colleagues whose zeal and activity in the discharge of their onerous duties cannot be sufficiently appreciated. These truly Christian Brothers place the Catholic community of Calcutta under a debt of gratitude, which can never be [illegible] Their universal exertions have been directed in the right channel, for there can be [illegible]ing which is more conducive to the interest of Religion and of Catholicity, than to train [illegible] of children early imbued with [illegible]ciples and sound doctrines; a course [illegible]ry successfully pursued by [illegible] fraternity. There are [illegible] children of both sexes attached [illegible] is under the control of [illegible] hands of whom are [illegible] these very large [illegible]dge [illegible]

Cæsar D'Cruz.
C. R. Lecknerstein.

[illegible] Monthly Meeting on last Sunda[illegible]

* 1st Quarterly Visitation for 1851.

of the General Committee, at the Cathedral House, the Select Returns for March 1851, of the several Catholic Educational Institutions in Calcutta exhibited a total of [illegible] Pupils attached to these Establishments.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE REASONS OF MY CONVERSION TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY A LATE CLERGYMAN (REV. MR. NEWMAN) OF THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION, IN LETTERS TO A FRIEND. FIFTH EDITION. LONDON: JAMES BURNS. 1849.

LETTER VII.

MY DEAR ——

I HAVE now given you some account of the manner in which, by the application of certain principles, and the force of certain considerations, I was led gradually to see that the communion in which I was born and educated was not a true portion of the Catholic Church, and to submit to that which, by the same principles and on the same considerations, was demonstrated to be the Catholic Church, that Church to which all along I had in intention desired to submit myself and to belong.

I have pursued a mere general line of argument, and have not noticed those common "objections" which perhaps, more than general principles affect people's minds and influence their conduct, and which are so vehemently urged, when any one inclines to join the Catholic Church, to dissuade him from such a step.

It is not that I have not carefully considered these objections, both before and since I became a Catholic, nor is it because I think they cannot be fairly and reasonably answered, so far as their subjects admit of being made matter of pure reason, that I have not noticed them. On the contrary, I am fully persuaded that on Anglican principles, and by reasons and analogies drawn from admitted Christian truths, all these objections can be fairly answered. That is to say, the doctrines or practices objected to may be made so antecedently probable and lawful, that this, taken in connexion with the authority for them in the Church and among saints, is sufficient to commend them to any humble mind, or at least to deter him from condemning them, or making them the ground of a schism.

And this is all that can possibly be expected in regard to doctrines and practices which in their nature can only be thoroughly understood and appreciated by those who have realised and acted upon them, which the objectors have not. It is not, I [illegible] have not considered, or fear to consider, these objections, that I have not noticed them, but because I think it is far safer and nobler to determine our conduct by general principles, in faith that these cannot lead us far wrong, than to limit the application of our principles by our own understanding and experience which are very likely indeed to be imperfect and deceitful guides. If, by general principles and on general grounds I am convinced that a Body is the Church, it is my duty, on Church principles, to join it and submit to it at once. And surely it is far safer, wiser and more religious to do so, in spite of difficulties and objections, than to refuse to do so on account of them. In the one case, I subject myself to the Church, which it is reasonable and religious to do, in the other, I subject the Church to myself, I judge it according to the measure of my own capacity and experience, which I contend is neither reasonable nor religious.

Many persons, I know, reverse this rule. Admitting the Roman to be the true Church, on "general principles,"—admitting that the "mere abstract argument," as they say, is against them, they stand upon objections. They will not join any Body, ever so clearly proved to be the Church, against which there are such and such notes or objections; or, as they might say, no Body can be the true Church which does or is so and so. They will not hesitate to hold to and apply this rule (or rather their own private judgment), although it should issue in demonstrating that there is no longer a Church on earth; that this is idolatrous, that is heretical, the others schismatical, and all fatally corrupt; anything rather than accept what they cannot understand, or submit when they cannot exactly approve. They remain in their own communion simply because they are there; but they could no more join or justify their own communion on their own principles than the worst of the bodies they condemn. They seem alive to every difficulty every inconsistency, but one, that of belonging to and supporting and extending, a communion in which they are condemned, and which their own principles condemn.

I will now endeavour, as you particularly wish it, to shew what may be said in explanation of some of those difficulties and objections which are urged by those who refuse to join, and would dissuade others from joining the Catholic Church.

One principal, perhaps, of these is the Catholic doctrine and practice of the invocation of saints, as it is called, of the Blessed Virgin and Saints.

The Catholic doctrine is simply this: that "the Saints reigning together with Christ are to be honoured and invocated, and that they offer prayers to God for us;" and this is but an expansion and consequence of the articles of our Creed—"the holy Catholic Church the communion of Saints." A Catholic believes that the holy Catholic Church is literally one organised mystical Body united to Christ its Head by the indwelling of the Spirit; that the Body consists equally of those who have departed this life as of those who are still its members on earth; that the visible and the invisible are not two but one Body,—two portions of one and the same Body under different conditions. Every member is united in the most real and intimate fellowship with every other member from the Blessed Virgin in heaven to the latest or lowest Christian on earth. This one Body, and none other and nothing less, is that "holy Catholic Church," in which we believe, and in which we are. We are certainly in it, and of it. As the Apostle says, "YE ARE COME to the city of the living God" and to its blessed company, to "God the judge of all" to "Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant," to an "innumerable company of angels," and to "the spirits of the just made perfect." Into their company we "are come" A Catholic, therefore, lives, or strives to live, as in the presence of the whole mysterious company—all his prayers and acts of worship are performed as in their presence. Hence the public form of confession, "I confess to Almighty God, to Blessed Mary ever Virgin and to all the Saints &c" is a simple recognition and expression of this fact.

Again a Catholic believes that between the members of this Body visible and invisible there is the most intimate "communion;" this is if there is the exercise of every loving, gracious, and blessed office of mediation, intercession and assistance, between all the members according to their capacity and dignity, the greater from the greatest and highest. He cannot possibly consider the Blessed Virgin or St Peter, or St. Paul, or the other Saints as distant, or ignorant of, or indifferent to the condition, progress, or fortunes of the Church on earth, some of their sons, their flesh, their own part of the one Body of which with themselves; but, as [illegible] living and present, and more deeply interested in all the affairs the interests of the Church militant and the salvation of souls. He views them as assisting in that great work of which much God is glorified in every [illegible] God permits His creatures to [illegible] assist each other; in every way in which Christians and saints can be "fellow-workers with God" in His plans—by prayers and intercessions, and manifold ministrations; by which service they are most honoured, and in which alone is the very happiness of the blessed.

This, I say, is the presence in which a Catholic lives; this is that blessed company by whom he knows himself to be surrounded, and who are his brethren and fellow-members in Christ. This is the context of his words and expressions as known to and criticised by Protestants. It enters as naturally into his thoughts as does the visible world and the visible Church. And this view and vision of the Saints no more obscures the view of God and of our Lord Jesus Christ, than does the presence of the visible Church on earth, or the visible means of grace, whether persons or things, on which we are made dependent, and to which we habitually have recourse. Soon it comes to take its place in our minds easily and naturally, as does the rest of that vast complex system of mediation and dependence in which we are placed, and of which it is but a more glorious extension. And any Catholic of the most ordinary intelligence and education could no more confound God with His creatures, or neglect Christ for His saints, than a Protestant could do the same with the visible Church, its ministers and members. Nay, I should almost say less, since none but a Catholic can know the way and degree in which the doctrine of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Person, Work, and Passion of Christ is pressed upon the hearts and minds of Catholics by the wonderful offices and devotions of the Catholic Church. The degree in which the doctrine and service of the Mass alone affects the mind, and distances and diminishes by its unapproachable importance even what looks, and what else might be, great, is incomprehensible to those who have not believed and realised it (as they can or do not of the Catholic Church) in a similar degree.

It may be worth observing here, that precisely the same objections are brought by Low Churchmen, and Dissenters against the prominence given by High Churchmen to the Church, priesthood, and sacraments, and to the place assigned to them in our salvation, as are brought by others against the Catholic doctrine of the mediation and invocation of the Saints. Low Churchmen do not believe that it is possible to speak and think of the Holy Spirit, His sacraments, in any way in which the Church speaks of them, without "robbing Christ" of His glory. Without "robbing Christ" of the glory of Christ, and the claims of Christ, and efficacy of Christ, they do not believe that it is possible to speak of the Holy Ghost, and of "baptismal regeneration," or "forgiving sins," or "sanctifying sinners," or "forgiving sins," sounds to them as absurd or impious as similar expressions of the Saints "giving us grace" or "saving us." Each school of High Churchman only smiles at these charges; he has the evidence of experience that the means and ministers of grace obscure not for one moment the Author and Giver and Inexhaustible Source of all. He has no difficulty in transferring language that seems to rest in man, by an easy and almost unconscious movement of his mind, to God. But if put upon his defence by an ultra-Protestant, he could no more justify himself than a Catholic could justify his conduct and language. To be justified, he must be understood; and a Protestant cannot understand, because he has not lived in and realised the Church system. And just so it is with the Catholic and the High Churchman. A High Churchman would only smile at a Protestant who should accuse him of deifying the Church and the sacraments; the accusation sounds to him absurd. Not less absurd does the charge sound to a Catholic of deifying—that is, of confounding with, or substituting for, God—the Blessed Virgin and the Saints. I contend, and I speak from experience, that this parallel holds strictly in these two cases. A person must be a Catholic, and have lived in the Catholic Church before he can possibly understand the Catholic system.

Thus much on the reasonableness of this doctrine and practice, from its analogy with admitted Christian truths and principles. But in addition to this, consider the nature and amount of authority in its behalf. It is a certain fact, that the whole Catholic Church of this day, and even the schismatic Eastern Church, fully adopts and is committed to it. It is equally certain, that the whole Catholic Church has been committed to it. The wisest, the best, the most holy, the most conspicuous for their devotion to our Lord and His passion—men who would have shed their blood a thousand times every day of their lives for their Lord and God, and rather than derogate one jot or tittle from His honour—these are the men who, of all others, have given the most express sanction to the practice in question. Can it for one moment be thought, even by the most bigoted Anglican, that these men were idolaters, or idolatrous in the faintest degree? or that they did not know what idolatry was, or when they were guilty of it? Can it be thought even that Catholics of this day are not as wise, as good, as holy and devoted, as intellectual and spiritual Christians as any Anglican? Do they not understand the charge of idolatry? Would they not plead guilty if they were guilty? Have not many, in their own persons, first felt the difficulty urged, and then proclaimed that it arose entirely from their own misapprehension? Is it more credible that all this host of witnesses should be mistaken—deceived or deceivers—about a fact of which they could not be ignorant, than that Anglicans should err by measuring all men and things by their own very limited experience? Why will Anglicans go on urging this point? Why will they not touch it with reverence, and leave it as something which is simply beyond their own experience, seeing that it is sanctioned as it is? What good can their protests and objections do? They can only serve to impress upon the minds of ordinary persons that the Catholic Church and the Saints are idolatrous. They insinuate a charge which, if they asserted, I should say they were almost guilty of blasphemy. And what good can it do to Catholics? They might as well attempt to persuade Catholics that they are Mahomedans or Heathens, that they do not know the difference between virtue and vice, that the Saints were thieves and murderers as to persuade them that they are idolaters or idolatrous, or do not know or observe the distinction between God and His Saints as well as any Anglican.*

Thus, then, this practice is not unreasonable; it can be commended by analogies to those who have not even tried it; it is declared innocent and wholesome by thousands of intelligent, honest, devout Christians (many of them converts from the opposite opinion); it is sanctioned by the whole Catholic Church, East and West. With what face, then, can Anglicans, on any but the most Protestant principles, affect to treat this practice as unscriptural and unlawful, or make it the ground of objection and refusal to submit to the Catholic Church?"

In the same way, the doctrine of transubstantiation may be shewn to have similar à priori considerations and analogies in its favour, and to be supported by the authority of the whole Catholic Church, East and West. It is remarkable that all the objections against Transubstantiation are very similar to those which might be brought against the doctrine of the Incarnation. They avail as much against the one as the other doctrine. The objections also against the defining on such a subject, are very similar to the objections against defining on the subject of the Trinity. Professions of holding the doctrine, while objecting to definitions, are and were made in both cases. Also it is very striking that in both cases, where the Catholic definition has been given up, the doctrine itself (as here in England) has been lost. Whatever may be said of the essence of the doctrine being the Real Presence, certain it is that the practical consequences of the differences of doctrine are widely different. There is nothing in which so great a difference is felt in the two communions as on this one point. The imitation is as different from the reality, and as marked, as can possibly be Let these things be considered: and further, can any one doubt for one moment what would be the decree of the whole united Church, East and West, in Council met, to hear all that Anglicans could urge in behalf of their opinions and conduct in regard to these two doctrines of Transubstantiation and the Invocation of Saints? Is it possible even for an Anglican to affect to have any doubt as to the issue of the fairest and fullest hearing of their case before this much talked-of General Council? How extraordinary is that self-deception which can hide the arrogance and presumption of standing out alone against the united testimony of the whole Catholic world for the greater number of the centuries of the Christian era, under the pretence of humility and reverence, in submitting to (one's own interpretation of) the Primitive Fathers!

The same might be said on behalf of all Catholic doctrines in dispute between Rome and England as has been said on these two. The subject is exceedingly interesting, and I am convinced that all Catholic doctrines might be so commended to the Christian mind from Christian analogies, as to leave every one perfectly inexcusable for not accepting them, with the authority of the Church to support them. But this is not the place for entering at large on such an extensive subject. I can only indicate what I mean, when I say that all objections to Catholic doctrine in themselves may be fairly met and reasonably answered on Catholic principles. And it seems to me a practical abjuration of faith as a principle of action altogether, if we will demand sight, certainty, or demonstration for every step of our course, and every form of opinion in the Church.

* Dr. Pusey, in his advertisement to the Paradise of the Soul, appears to the writer responsible for giving impressions of a most serious kind against the Saints. It was not, it is hoped, intended to give those impressions. One can hardly believe it possible that, while taking from their writings those most moving and touching devotions to our Lord and God, the like to which can be found no where else, any one could even dare to insinuate that these same men were guilty in the faintest degree of a sin so fearfully unnatural and heinous as that of idolatry. Instead of extracting some sentences in a naked and abrupt manner—passages the very strongest of their kind—and familiarizing minds unprepared for instruction, and not guilty with the whole subject, with the nature of the devotions to the Saints;—would it not have been a far wiser, fairer, and more respectful course in Dr. Pusey, to have given the Church's own view of her own devotions, as in the second Part of the Paradise of the Soul?

With regard to the question of the Papal Supremacy, it is required of no one to be believed as an article of faith or term of communion, but in such a sense as Mr Allies himself admits it. If Mr A. were within the Church, he might employ his learning and abilities, if he so pleased, in the defence of Gallicanism until that question be settled authoritatively. If he considers that the fate of the Church is involved in this question, he would fight to much more advantage within it as a son, than without it as an alien. If he might side with Bossuet against Bellarmine, what more could even he require? Mr A justifies the schism of the English Church simply on this ground that the Roman Church makes a certain view of Papal Supremacy an article of faith. I would most gladly bring the matter to this issue, and I assert most positively that the Catholic Church does not make the ultramontane doctrine of Bellarmine or De Maistre an article of faith. What can be more unjustifiable than first to make an opinion of the Roman Church into an article of the Church's faith and then to make this an excuse for not submitting to it? What can be said of that mind and temper which demands that even open questions shall be settled according to his views of antiquity before he will consent to join the Church, or to lay down the arms of rebellion against an acknowledged authority?*

Much is made of the subject of practical corruptions in the Roman Catholic Church, but it seems to me that nothing can be more unfair controversially than for Anglicans to use this as an argument against it. No body of men have ever more insisted than they—as, indeed, none had ever so much occasion and interest in insisting—that practical corruptions do not affect the vitality of a Church. It is absolutely necessary to assert this in order to defend the English Church from the worst heresies. And yet these same persons will use the argument of practical corruption, in the most ultra-Protestant fashion, as a weapon against Rome. Is this fair and honest? If practical corruptions destroy the vitality of a Church, the Church is destroyed and lost. If they do not, why urge it as an argument against the very truth of a Church, and our duty towards it as being the Church—a duty which cannot in the least be affected by the existence of any practical abuses however great, for which not the Church but individuals are responsible?† But I must conclude here for the present.

(To be continued)

---

* On this subject of the supremacy of the Pope Lord Acton refers to Mr Thompson's most valuable and curious work. Mr. Thompson's view of the subject is not de fide, but it completely removes all those objections commonly brought against the ultramontane theory of the Papacy, and which have been repeated and brought together by Mr. Allies. It would really seem impossible for any one, after reading Mr Thompson's book, to repeat the assertion that the Papal supremacy is destructive of Episcopacy. Mr. Thompson shows clearly that the objectionable consequences are deduced from a false idea both of the supremacy and of episcopacy, and that no such consequences can follow from the true idea. Mr Allies' passages from history and the Fathers do not militate against the false idea of the Papal claim with which he has encumbered himself.

† On this point, see Manning's 'Catholic Morality,' in reply to Symonds.

Selections.

LORETTO CONVENT.

We take from the Englishman a letter from some muddle headed correspondent, who is unable to write the English language, upon the Loretto convent at Darjeeling. We have heard so much in praise of this institution, as one of the very few schools in this country in which young females are educated in purity, that we feel it our duty to warn our readers against the mischievous design of our contemporary's correspondent. Any one who sends a child to be educated by Roman Catholics must be well aware of the almost certain consequence that the child will embrace the faith of Rome. Those Protestants therefore who have daughters at the Loretto Convent must, we presume, have elected to choose between two evils, a little superstition on the one hand, and an utter corruption of all feelings of decency and modesty on the other. We do not therefore think it necessary to notice those portions of the letter of the Englishman's correspondent in which he professes to caution parents against a result which all must have calculated upon as inevitable. The absurd and mischievous part of his letter is that in which he ascribes the ladies of the convent as having gained a complete ascendancy over the minds of their pupils by over indulgence and excessive and ill-directed tenderness. This accusation carries with it its own refutation. When did a child do otherwise than despise, and disobey an over indulgent mistress? If the Nuns have gained the passionate attachment of their pupils the parents may rest perfectly satisfied with the admirable management of the School.—Citizen, April 9, 1851.

LORD JOHN RUSSEL'S LETTER.—THE NO-POPERY OUTORY.

[The following letter, which we give somewhat abridged, has been unavoidably delayed for some weeks from want of room.—Ed. Tab.]

TO THE RIGHT HON'BLE LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

Upper Gloucester-street, Dublin.

My Lord—I make no apology for the liberty I thus take in addressing so exalted a personage as the First Minister of the most powerful empire in the world. As you have attacked (in a letter which will yet surprise yourself, as much as it has astonished all Europe) every Catholic in the whole world, from the Supreme Pontiff down to the "heathen" Irish, it follows, as a matter of course, that, in this large and comprehensive insult, your lordship must necessarily have included me; first, as being a countryman of the "heathens;" and, secondly, as being one of the traitors, whom (as Mr. Hume hints) you pretend to be afraid of "as aiding the Pope in his sole and undivided sway over the realm of England."

There can be no doubt at all that your lordship intended to fill all England and Ireland with the old cry of "No Popery," and to pelt the Catholic Priesthood with the old degraded slander of being traitors to the throne. The Pope could not assume "sole and undivided sway over the realm of England," unless the Catholic Priests and people withdrew their allegiance from the Queen, and gave it undivided to him; nor could his sway be "sole" over the realm, unless the Priests and the Catholic people entirely ignored the Queen's supremacy, when able to do so, and transferred their entire allegiance to him. This, then, I take to be your decided meaning—to inflame the English mob, if English words have any decided signification. Although this ungenerous charge has been already made ten thousand times, it ought (as Cobbett used to say) to be again refuted with scorn ten thousand times: and this is the point which I shall presume first to discuss with you. Your lordship knows better than I do that the history of all Christian time over the world has but one page in reference to the allegiance of the Catholic Church to the throne—and that page is an unbroken, unshrinking fidelity to legitimate monarchy, to legitimate power, in every country and in every age, even to chains and to death. Let us examine the various countries, and come to facts and dates:—

Firstly—Is not the French Revolution in 1789 written in the blood of the Royal Family and the French Priesthood? They lived united, and they fell together—they were the faithful servants of their Royal master, and hence the streets of Paris ran red with their blood, and thousands died in exile in a foreign land for their fidelity.

Secondly—In Spain, when the ancient constitution was changed, and when the succession to the throne was altered, the Priesthood clung with fidelity to the legitimate heir to the Spanish Crown, and suffered trials and persecution (from what is still called there the English party) which makes the blood freeze. In one day—the 17th July, 1833—upwards of one hundred Priests were butchered in Madrid alone; in Toledo, thirty-three convents of Nuns and Friars were closed, and the aged inmates pithforked into the streets, and left to die of hunger and cruel treatment on the public highways. They were attached to Don Carlos, and therefore became the objects of plunder and assassination to the enemies of order, and to the conspirators against the ancient laws.

Thirdly—When the rebellion broke out in the Canadas (what is termed the Papinean insurrection, the Catholic Priesthood then received the thanks of the Legislature for their distinguished allegiance; and all Catholics are, since that time, admitted to a full share in the offices, emoluments, and honours of the State. Sir F. Head states the Catholics of Canada are the best support there of the English Crown.

Fourthly—When Norway was taken from the King of Denmark, and given by the allied Powers to Bernadotte, for his services to them and his treachery to Napoleon, the Roman Catholics (few in number) offered their properties and their lives to their king to resist the encroachment, and, as "Reere's Narrative" states, gave a noble instance of fidelity to their Lutheran king.

Fifthly—In the various revolutions which have convulsed Europe since 1847, in Lombardy, in Naples, in Austria, in Hungary, and in France, the Catholic Clergy have not been so much as named for any disloyalty in these eventful times; and when the whole populations of whole kingdoms (such as Hungary) have been hurried along in one tempestuous revolution, in a perfect hurricane—when princes, ministers, and generals, and armies, yielded to the storm, will you point out, my lord, the kingdom, the province, the parish, the town, the village, in all these countries, where the allegiance of the Priest has been violated to the Crown? Tell me the place, the name, the date, the office of the Priest who has been a traitor to the king, in the European frenzy, when monarchs fled from their capitals from fear, when their friends abandoned them, and when almost half the thrones of Europe were nearly crumbled beneath the violence of popular fury?

Sixthly—Did not the Pope himself (who now seeks "the sole sway over the realm of England"), did he not fly from his capital sooner than declare war against Austria? And yet, my lord, are all these Priests, and this Pope, now leagued in England to rob our Queen of her realm, and claim undivided away in her empire alone, where we have the most perfect constitution the world ever saw, and where we are governed by the most exemplary, the most illustrious, the brightest, and the most beloved Sovereign that ever sat on the throne of Alfred—are they, the men who bled at the feet of all the thrones of Europe in defence of their kings—are they, my lord, seeking the sole sway over the realm of Victoria? Shame, my lord, to have made such a charge of attainder against the most faithful subjects of the Queen, and to have inflicted a deep and burning insult on millions of your former friends, and on nearly one-half of the entire human race.

Seventhly—When I turn from Catholic Europe, and come to Protestant England, let me ask you, when revolution raised its horrid head in England, in 1640 who was it, I ask, who sold a king who fled to them for protection?—who was it who bought that king with a national oath to spare his life?—who was it who, in the teeth of these national engagements, murdered that king in mid day before the gaze of mankind, and before God and man committed an act of national darkness, national perfidy, national dishonour, and national cruelty, of which there is no parallel in the history of the civilized world?

Eighthly—Who, again, were these men who, in the year 1688 joined an unnatural daughter in her rebellion to her Royal father?—who were they who conspired with an usurper, and expelled their legitimate monarch and left him to die in a foreign land a beggar at the gates of the French Court?—who are these men, therefore, who in your own country, overthrew the realm by a new pretended danger?—who were they?—were they Irish or English? I echo in vain—English? Aye, and the heathens, poor forlorn fellows, clung to these kings and suffered from Cromwell, the foul monster, a cruelty which can never be known till the three hundred women who were murdered at Wexford will stand before God, on the last day, and cry for vengeance. Turn over a few more pages, my lord; and before you venture to accuse a State rebellion in England, in 1829, of your Cabinet did in Ireland in 1798, you should have weighed the different nature of times, and have seen that what a Prime Minister did with the latter the last century, your lordship committed in the middle of the present, therefore, it is the half century in advance, and in the intention of Lord John Russell which has put the State back

Your lordship has been pleased to designate the creed which I profess as the "mummeries of superstition." The Rev Mr Bennett, who styles himself "your Parish Priest," avers that you profess three distinct creeds—"that you turn your back in the evening on the principles you professed in the morning," and that when it suits your purpose "you gladly, ignore all the laws and obligations of every Church whatever." You are a Presbyterian in the morning, a Protestant at noon, and a Methodist in the evening, in fact. Faith to you, my lord, is a matter of taste rather than of principle. You change your religion with your dress; and hence you are a follower of John Knox in your morning gown, of John Calvin in your dress boots, and of John Wesley in your night slippers. St Paul uses the words "one Faith, one Baptism, one Lord;" by which he clearly teaches that unity of Faith is as essential as the unity of the Godhead, and, consequently, that two or more Faiths are as absurd as two or more Gods. Hence, my lord, according to the clear logic of St Paul, your professing three Faiths (as Mr Bennett asserts) is the same absurdity as if you worshipped three Gods; so that, after all, your lordship is, known to yourself, a greater Pagan, in point of fact, than all the heathen Irish, whom you have condescended to jibe in your late encyclical.

Your lordship states that the danger "within the gates is even greater," and causes to you greater indignation than even the danger from the Pope. On this point I have the advantage entirely to agree with you; but the danger to be apprehended is, that all England will rush into wild infidelity, in consequence of your governing the Protestant Church by the decrees of a Privy Council, and defining by your decree the doctrine which is not necessary to be taught. All the world has heard of the Rev Mr Gorham, Vicar of Brampford Speke, who believes in certain opinions relating to baptismal regeneration, the minutiæ of which are so well known to your lordship. His Bishop refuses to present him to the vicarage. Mr Gorham appeals—the Bishop persists. One says that baptismal regeneration is not an essential doctrine of Christianity—the other says it is. Mr Gorham says no—the Bishop of Exeter says yes. Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, of the Court of Arches, says no—the Archbishop of Canterbury says yes. The Chief Justice, Lord Campbell, says neither yes or no; but in a letter to an English lady, says it is an "open question." At length my lord, you, who are versed in all creeds, take up the question as, chief in your Privy Council, and, like the cat settling the dispute between the rabbit and the weazel you make short work of it, and by a decision of the Privy Council you decide what is not necessary to be taught in the Protestant Church, and, by way of proving the apostolicity of your mission, you would send down to Bramford Speke a bishop of dimensions necessary, to give a gentle hint of your infallibility. By the decision of your Council, you have bona fide ignored the Protestant religion in England, and you would do well to record the event by the following memorandum. "The Protestant religion commenced in Germany, in the little town of Saxony in the end of the year 1517; flourished for two hundred years and upwards in England, particularly in the neighbourhood of cannon foundries and powder magazines, and ceased to be on the 16th July, 1850 when, by an order of the Privy Council, Rev Mr Gorham was informed it was not necessary to teach it any longer."

Your lordship has been pleased to brand my Church as a Church of "mummery and of superstition," but if ever mummery can be made palpable, it certainly will be in three judges and a country gentleman, like your lordship, changing the very faith even as you would change a turnpike road, and if ever superstition stood stark naked before mankind, it is certainly to be seen in that act by which you expect that any man in his plain senses—that any man, except a bound thief, can make "an act of faith," in you, who professes three creeds at once as we know at present—in you, who, as Mr Bennett asserts, are "bound by the laws and obligations of no Church whatever"—in your lordship, who make and unmake creeds, as a potter makes crocks, shaping them according to the public taste and the public demand—you even forgive sins. The Bishop of Exeter says it is a crying sin not to teach baptismal regeneration—you deny this assertion, coming from a common Bishop, and particularly not a member of the Privy Council; and to show your spiritual power, you absolve Mr. Gorham from all guilt, and you give him your warrant of authority to present to God as a guarantee against his justice. 'Tis endless to recount the circumstances, the incongruities, the rank absurdities of your present Church Establishment; and, ten to one, unless it be managed by a skilful hand, it will bring a sad revolution on all the land. You seem to wonder at the danger arising from the crowds leaving your system, and joining the Dissenters or the Catholics—can you be so blind as not to see the just cause of the secession?

In order that any Christian shall conscientiously belong to this creed of your Council, it is necessary that he shall make "an act of faith"—in its decisions; and what man under the sun can do that?—that is, "to make an act of faith"—that you and your Council transmit the precise meaning of the revelation from God—that what you decide is precisely the same as if Christ spoke—that your decision is beyond all doubt the unerring truth—that you and your Chancellor and Chief Justice cannot deceive or be deceived. Now, without meaning any disrespect, you both are the two last men in England on whose word, in spirituals, a Christian would make an act of faith. You are clearly no theologian, or you would not profess four creeds at the same time, and the Chancellor has not read even Church history, as Mr. Bennett has already proved. Your decisions are, therefore, filled with doubt, which is incompatible with belief: he who doubts clearly does not believe; and hence thousands of the unthinking masses of English-men are going into infidelity, as Reverend Mr. Jones has proved before a committee of the House of Commons; and all the reasoning portion, like the 149 converts from Oxford and Cambridge, are coming to lay their weary heads beneath the roof of the Catholic Church, where God's testimony need not a warrant of the Privy Council as the foundation of the Faith, and where they can with all their soul say "I firmly believe."—I have the honour to be, my lord, your obedient servant,

D. W. Cahill, D.D.

[Tablet.]

CONVERSIONS.

Among the numerous conversions this week, I have to mention the names of two of her Majesty's Clergy. One is Mr. Henry Bedford, Curate to Mr. Scott, of Hoxton; I believe that he enjoyed the confidence and esteem of his parishioners to an extent not usual among Anglican Clergymen. He was received into the Church by Mr. Oakeley. The other is Mr. Harper, who has been received by Dr. Whitty. It is said that several members of his congregation have declared their intention of following him.—Tablet.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL AND THE ENGLISH ROMAN CATHOLICS.

Athenæum Club, Feb 6.

My Lord—Your lordship is reported, in your speech on the address, to have said—"That, generally speaking, the lay Catholics of England neither wished for the establishment of the Catholic Hierarchy nor approved of it; that your lordship said this on the authority of Roman Catholic laymen and Priests; and that you were in a position to take measures, not only satisfactory to Protestants, but to loyal Roman Catholics, who wished to preserve their allegiance to the Crown unimpeached and unimpaired."

Your lordship can hardly have avoided seeing the copy of an address to Cardinal Wiseman, distributed to all members of both Houses of Parliament, in which the following lines occur:—

"It is our ardent wish that our Holy Father Pope Pius IX. should be assured of the heartfelt gratitude which we feel towards him for the great blessing which he has bestowed upon us in establishing the Hierarchy in our beloved country," &c.

This address is signed by twelve either English Catholic peers or resident proprietor peers in this country, by fourteen Catholic baronets, and by above 600 of the principal resident Catholic gentlemen of England, including thirty Catholic barristers.

May I inquire of your lordship on what authority of Roman Catholic Priests or laymen you contradict this overwhelming majority of the Catholic gentry of England, or whether your lordship really intends to exclude them from the number of those loyal Roman Catholics who wish to preserve their allegiance to the Crown unimpeached or unimpaired?

Your lordship has advised her Majesty, in her Royal Speech, to express her earnest and firm determination, under God's blessing, to maintain unimpaired religious liberty; an assurance, I fully believe, most in accordance with her Majesty's benevolent feelings towards every class of her subjects.

The constitution of a Catholic Hierarchy in this country, and the power of nominating Bishops for the purpose, is in accordance both with the discipline and doctrine of the Catholic Church.

Beware, my lord, how, in the face of such a solemn declaration, to which your lordship pledges the Royal word, sanctioned by a solemn appeal to the Almighty God, you introduce into Parliament a measure which may attempt a violation both of the above discipline and doctrine of the Catholic Church.

I have the honour to be, my lord, your lordship's obedient servant,

Charles Langdale.

To the Right Hon. Lord John Russell.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.

No. 16. CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE ALLOCUTION OF OUR MOST HOLY LORD PIUS IX. BY DIVINE PROVIDENCE, POPE, DELIVERED IN THE SECRET CONSISTORY, HELD ON THE 17TH DAY OF FEBRUARY A. D. 1851. ROME 1851.

VENERABILES FRATRES.

Inter novos diversarum Ecclesiarum Antistites, quos Vobis, Venerabiles Fratres, in hodierno Conventu proposituri sumus, erit etiam Ven. Frater Joseph a Silva Torres Archiepiscopus Palmyrensis, quem Coadjutorem futurumque Successorem dare consilium est Dilecto Filio Nostro Petro Paulo S. R. E. Cardinali Figuereido Archiepiscopo Bracharensi. Opportunum vero reputavimus Nostri ejusdem consilii rationem Vobis breviter explicare, ut eorum, quae antea contigerant, memoria repetita, notum cuique sit, quare et quibus usi cautionibus induxerimus animum ad memoratum Josephum futuro Bracharensi Ecclesiae regimini destinandum.

Erat idem Josephus, ut sane nostis, Archiepiscopus Goae in Indiis Orientalibus, cujus Ecclesiae regimen decretum ei fuerat a Gregorio XVI. fel rec. Decessore Nostro in Consistorio Secreto diei 19 Junii Anni millesimi octingentesimi quadragesimi tertii. In magno autem Orientalium illarum Regionum numero et amplitudine, ad quas olim Goani Archiepiscopi sive ordinaria, sive Metropolitana jurisdictio pertinebat, complures tunc erant Vicarii Apostolici Antistiti eidem minime subditi, quos inibi Sancta haec Sedes, Catholicae scilicet Religionis causa id postulante, constituerat. Nam praeter illos, qui in latissimis Regionibus Sinarum Imperii, aliisque conterminis per Litteras Apostolicas Innocentii XII. rec: me: Praedecessoris Nostri() a Dioecesibus Pechinensi, Nanchinensi, et () Datae illae sunt diebus 15. et 23 Octob. 1690.

VENERABLE BROTHERS.

* Amongst the new Prelates whom we intend to propose to you Venerable Brothers, in our assembly of to-day for several distinct Churches, there will be also one, viz., Our Venerable Brother Joseph A Silva Torres Archbishop of Palmyra, whom we purpose to designate, as Coadjutor and Successor to our well Beloved Son Peter Paul Figuereido, Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church and Archbishop of Braga. We deem it expedient, briefly to lay before you the grounds of our conduct in this matter, in order that by recalling preceding events to your recollection, each of you may know, wherefore and under what precautions, We have resolved to appoint the aforesaid Joseph to the future government of the Church of Braga.

This same Joseph, you are doubtless aware, was Archbishop of Goa in the East Indies, The Government of that Church having been granted to him by our Predecessor Gregory XVI of happy memory, in the Secret Consistory held on the 19th day of June 1843. At that period, there existed throughout the numerous and extensive regions, which in former times were included within the limits either

* The Allocution delivered by His Holiness on the 17th Feb. 1851 was received in Calcutta by the Archbishop on the 15th April 1851, and was translated into English, and printed and published, both in Latin and English, in the Bengal Catholic Herald of the 19th April 1851, that is within fifty-eight days from its delivery at Rome. "Roma locuta est, causa finita est."—St. Augustine.

Macaonensi, atque a Metropolitano Goanae Ecclesiae jure in perpetuum divulsis deputari jamdiu consueverant, et praeter alios, qui postmodum aliis Indiarum locis destinati sunt (†); ipse etiam Gregorius XVI. novos in Goanae Ecclesiae Dioecesi ac Metropolitana illius provincia Vicarios Apostolicos provisorio modo instituerat. Eo spectant nonnullae ejusdem Summi Pontificis Litterae, quarum initium Multa praeclare, datae sub Annulo Piscatoris die 24 Aprilis Anni 1838 uti et aliae Litterae Apostolicae, ac Decreta Nostrae Congregationis Propagandae Fidei, quae illis aut praecesserant, aut pontificio postmodum jussu et auctoritate successerunt.

Hunc Decessoris Nostri ampliorem providentiam mutata temporum ratio, et tuendae in Indis atque ampliandae Catholicae Religionis causa flagitabat. Dum enim major ipsa verae Fidei propagatio majorem in dies Evangelicarum Missionum et Sacrorum operariorum numerum postularet, huic quidem sustinendo oneri impares omnino erant Viri Ecclesiastici, qui Lusitanorum ope illuc mitti, aut ex indigenis institui soleirant; postquam praesertim quae in Indis plurimi olim fuerant Lusitanae Ditionis Loca nonnullis tantum cum Urbe Goa et Urbe Macao exceptis, in aliorum Principum potestatem transiverant; ut nihil porro dicamus de postremis Lusitani Regni calamitatibus, quae relationibus etiam inter S. hanc Sedem et Lusitanum Gubernium interruptis, eo rem adduxerant ut et Goana, et illius Suffraganeae Ecclesiae una simul vacarent. Jam vero Ecclesiastici homines, qui tunc temporis easdem Ecclesias sive ex canonica Capituli deputatione, sive alio quovis titulo administrabant, quaerentes quae sua erant non quae Jesu Christi, contradicere ausi sunt Vicariis Apostolicis a Gregorio XVI. deputatis, nec dubitarunt arrogare sibi spiritualem auctoritatem super Ecclesias, et fideles illorum curae a Sede Apostolica commendatos: ex quo eorum facinore haud leves difficultates, dissensiones, et scandala dimanarunt. Atque haec quidem, ad Religionem quod attinet, Indicarum rerum conditio erat, cum, instauratis Lusitani Gubernii cum Sancta hac Sede relationibus, Charissima in Christo Filia Nostra Maria Portugaliae et Algarbiorum Regina Fidelissima supradictum Josephum a Silva Torres Decessori Nostro praesentavit, ut ad Goanam Ecclesiam promoveretur.

Jam vero Goana Civitas cum circumstantibus Locis pertinebant adhuc, uti et nunc (*) Verapolitanus an. 1701, Cranus et Peguanus an. 1741. etc.

of the Ordinary or Metropolitan Jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Goa, many Vicars Apostolic, constituted by this Holy See, and not subject to that Prelate, the good of Religion rendering this arrangement necessary. For besides the Vicars Apostolic, constituted by the Letters Apostolic of Innocent XII. of recent memory, and who in accordance with long usage had been appointed in very extensive districts of the Chinese Empire, and in conterminous places, juridically separated both from the Dioceses of Pekin, Nankin, Macao, and from the Metropolitan jurisdiction of the Church of Goa, there were moreover other Vicars Apostolic, who were afterwards appointed to different parts of India, besides those whom Gregory XVI. provisionally established, as well in the Diocese, as in the Metropolitan Province of the Church of Goa. The well known Letters of the same Supreme Pontiff issued on the 24th day of April 1830, under the Fisherman's Ring, beginning with the words "Multa Praeclare," as well as other Apostolic Letters, and also certain Decrees of our Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, issued previously to, or subsequently to these Letters, by the order and authority of the Supreme Pontiff, all have reference to the appointment of the aforesaid Vicars Apostolic.

The exigencies of the present altered aspect of the times, as well as the regard due to the support and propagation of the Catholic Religion in India demanded of us, to adopt still more extensively, the wise economy of our immediate Predecessor. For whilst the wider diffusion of the true faith calls daily for the erection of new Evangelical Missions and for an increased number of Holy Labourers, the Ecclesiastics supplied for the Indian Mission, whether sent out by the Portuguese, or of native origin were wholly inadequate to sustain so great a burden, especially since most of the places formerly subject to Portugal, the Cities of Goa and Macao and some others excepted, have passed over to the subjection of other Powers, not to speak of the difficulties arising from the late calamitous state of the Kingdom of Portugal, which, whilst it occasioned the relations of this Holy See with the Government of that Country to be suspended, caused both the Church of Goa and its suffragan See, to remain both together vacant. Meanwhile certain Ecclesiastics, men who sought their own interests not those of Jesus Christ, and who, either, in virtue of canonical nomination by the Chapter, or under some other title governed these Dioceses, presumed to oppose the Vicars Apostolic appointed by Gregory XVI. and arrogated to themselves Spiritual Authority, over the Churches and Faithful confided to them by pertinent, ad Lusitanam Ditionem, nec ulli ex Apostolicis Vicariis commendata illa fuerant; ideoque hac ex parte nihil impedimenti erat, quominus Ecclesiae illi novus daretur Antistes. Sperare autem licebat, ipsos Apostolicos Vicarios alibi constitutos nihil porro molestiae a memorato Josepho passuros. Siquidem Gregorius XVI. antequam de ipso ad Goanam Sedem provehendo decerneret, plura eademque idonea testimonia acceperat de illius fide, doctrina, et probitate, atque insuper noverat eumdem de Pontificiis Decretis ad Vicarios Apostolicos permanentibus ab Internuntio et Delegato Apostolico, qui Olissipone degebat, fuisse praemonitum; denique idem Josephus obedientiam et obsequium suum erga Romanum Pontificem Solemnique Apostolicam pecularibus quoque Litteris declaraverat. Nihilo tamen minus Praedecessor Noster novum ipsum Archiepiscopum de Apostolicis Vicariis, eorumque auctoritate sarta tecta habenda admonere voluit Pontificiis Litteris, quas ea super re ad illum dedit die 8 Julii 1843, quaeque eidem redditae fuerant eo ipso tempore quo Apostolica Diplomata delati Archiepiscopatus testimonium de more habentia Olissiponem perlata Verum septus Archiepiscopus insequenti adveniente anno 1844 Goam profectus haudquaquam continuit se intra fines officii sui, sed sibimetipsi ante pedes Decessorum suorum auctoritatem asserere conatus est in Locis quoque Apostolicorum Vicariorum curae commendatis; neque porro Litteris paruit quibus rerum Praedecessor Noster Gregorius, ac subinde Nos ipsi illum ad saniora revocare consilia studuimus. Itaque facile Nobis fuit perspicere, providendum omnino esse, ut Archiepiscopus ille a Goanae Ecclesiae procuratione revocaretur. Sed una simul consideravimus, rem fore gravissimarum difficultatum et periculi plenam, nisi Regium Lusitanum Gubernium Nobiscum in id consentiret. Itaque Nostro Extraordinario Internuntio et Delegato Apostolico, qui Anno 1847. Romae aderat, et Olissiponem rediturus erat, in praecipuis mandatis dedimus, ut de revocando Goanae Antistite ageret cum Regio Gubernio, negotiumque hujusmodi omni ope atque opera urgeret. Is, post tractationem susceptam, haud sane praetermisit insequenti anno millesimo octingentesimo quadragesimo octavo referre de praecipuis conditionibus, quibus rem componi posse perspexerat; ac Nos subinde curavimus, ut Nostram super illis sententiam in tempore cognosceret.

Sed Litteris, quae a Cardinali Nostro Secretario Status die 8 Julii datae in id fuerant, turbulento illo tempore interceptis, aut aliter retardatis, tandem ipso illo anno ad exitum vergente, dum Nos ab hac Alma Urbe discedebamus, Apostolicae Sedis Internuntius, qui Olissiponem reversus erat, Nostrae voluntatis ignarus, Archiepiscopum Goanum ad Nostrum usque in Urbem reditum ab omni Goanae Ecclesiae procuratione removere minime potuit. Quamobrem Archiepiscopus ille, qui Goam ante Nostrum in Urbem reditum profectus erat, ibi per totum annum millesimum octingentesimum quadragesimum nonum, et ad insequentis anni millesimi octingentesimi quinquagesimi primi initium, quae Nostra mandata erant, omnia pervertit, et quae Praedecessor Noster Gregorius, quaeque Nos ipsi ad illum scripsimus, ea omnia contemnere, et pro nihilo habere non dubitavit. Quae cum ita sint, Nos, qui Nostrum Apostolicum officium explere debemus, et Nostrae Conscientiae consulere, Nostrae Auctoritatis Litteras, quae ad Archiepiscopum Goanum datae fuerant, ad Internuntium Olissiponem misimus, quibus Archiepiscopum ipsum Goanae Ecclesiae procuratione removeri mandavimus. Quae Litterae cum Internuntio Olissiponem reverso traditae fuerint, ipse Archiepiscopum Goanum ab omni Goanae Ecclesiae procuratione removere non distulit.

Quamobrem Archiepiscopus ille, qui Goam ante Nostrum in Urbem reditum profectus erat, ibi per totum annum millesimum octingentesimum quadragesimum nonum, et ad insequentis anni millesimi octingentesimi quinquagesimi primi initium, quae Nostra mandata erant, omnia pervertit, et quae Praedecessor Noster Gregorius, quaeque Nos ipsi ad illum scripsimus, ea omnia contemnere, et pro nihilo habere non dubitavit. Quae cum ita sint, Nos, qui Nostrum Apostolicum officium explere debemus, et Nostrae Conscientiae consulere, Nostrae Auctoritatis Litteras, quae ad Archiepiscopum Goanum datae fuerant, ad Internuntium Olissiponem misimus, quibus Archiepiscopum ipsum Goanae Ecclesiae procuratione removeri mandavimus. Quae Litterae cum Internuntio Olissiponem reverso traditae fuerint, ipse Archiepiscopum Goanum ab omni Goanae Ecclesiae procuratione removere non distulit.

the Apostolic See—a criminal course of proceeding which has caused serious difficulties, together with dissensions and scandals. Such indeed in what appertains to Religion was the state of things in India, when at the restoration of intercourse between the Portuguese Government and the Holy See, our most dear Daughter in Christ, Mary the Most Faithful Queen of Portugal and Algarves, presented to our Predecessor the above-mentioned Joseph A Silva Torres, for the purpose of his being promoted to the Church of Goa.

Now, as Goa with the places in its vicinity belonged then as they belong at present to the Crown of Portugal, and as no portion of this territory had been entrusted to Vicars Apostolic, there was therefore nothing, in this respect, to prevent the appointment of a New Prelate for that See. For it was reasonably hoped, that the aforesaid Joseph would not give any molestation to the Vicars Apostolic established in places distinct from the Goanese territory. The hope thus conceived was derived from the circumstance, that before Gregory XVI. had resolved on promoting him to the See of Goa, He (the Pope) had received many suitable commendatory testimonials of his faith, learning and integrity, and had moreover ascertained, that he had been forewarned by the Internuncio and the Delegate Apostolic residing at Lisbon of the existing Pontifical Decrees concerning the Vicars Apostolic; and finally this hope was grounded on the special letters of obedience and submission, which the said Joseph had addressed to the Roman Pontiff and to the Apostolic See. In addition to these precautions, our Predecessor ordered, that the Archbishop should be again admonished by Pontifical Letters, issued for that purpose on the 8th July 1843, and sent to Lisbon together with the Apostolic Diplomata, which latter Documents, agreeably to usage, were forwarded thither, in testimony of his promotion to the Archiepiscopacy, of the Vicariates Apostolic which had been erected, and warned not to infringe upon any account, with their authority.

The Archbishop Joseph having in the following year 1844 gone to Goa, did not however confine himself within the limits of his duty, but on the contrary endeavoured to assert for himself the former authority of his Predecessors, even in districts committed to the care of Vicars Apostolic; neither did he obey the Letters of our Predecessor Gregory; nor those which We Ourselves subsequently wrote from a desire to recall him to wiser counsels. It became therefore evident, that it was now incumbent upon us, to recall the Archbishop of Goa from the administration of that Church. But We, at the same time reflected dere coacti Cajetae substiteramus, perlatae illuc sunt Litterae et Documenta ab Internuntio missa, ex quibus apparuit, ipsum die 21 mensis Octobris illius Anni cum Regio Gubernio jam convenisse, ut Praesul Josephus ab Ecclesia Goana ad aliquam in partibus Infidelium Metropolitanam Ecclesiam transferretur, et Olissiponem sine mora rediens munus interim obtineret Commissarii Bullae Cruciatae, atque insuper ut Coadjutor fieret, futurusque Successor Archiepiscopi Bracharensis; datis tamen ab eodem Josepho ad Nos Litteris, quibus suam Sedi Apostolicae submissionem atque observantiam testaretur; denique ut ad ulteriores dissensiones praevertendas in novo postmodum Antistite in Goana Ecclesia constituendo, atque adeo in Diplomatibus Apostolicis delati si Archiepiscopalis muneris testibus mentio haberetur finium intra quos auctoritatem suam exercere posset. Cognovimus una simul Lusitanum Gubernium jussu Reginae Fidelissimae suas jam Goam misisse Litteras, ut Archiepiscopus Josephus de his omnibus certior fieret, et Olissiponem reverti non cunctaretur. Eodem tempore Regius apud Sanctam hanc Sedem Legatus, qui Nos Cajetam sequutus fuerat, a Nobis Regio nomine suppliciter postulavit, ut Praesuli Josepho in Lusitaniam prope diem rediturο nedum munus tribueremus Commissarii Bullae Cruciatae, quo fungi interim deberet donec Bracharensis Ecclesia non vacaverit, sed etiam ut in Consistorio quod illis diebus habituri eramus, illum constituere dignaremur Coadjutorem futurumque Successorem Archiepiscopi memoratae Ecclesiae; siquidem dubitari minime posse dicebat, quin ille statim ad Nos eas, quae superius indicatae sunt, submissionis Litteras scriberet.

Haec sane postulatio, et supradictae Pontificii Internuntii Litterae, imprimis autem quae ab eo conventa fuerant de futura Ecclesiae Bracharensis procuratione Praesuli Josepho destinanda, Nos, tot jam tantisque aliis per eos dies angustiis circumdatos, non parum sollicitos habuerunt. Obversabantur enim ante oculos quae Praesul ipse in Goano Archiepiscopatu fungendo perperam gesserat. Contra vero si Nos ea, in quae Noster Internuntius hanc circa rem consenserat, praestare abnuissemus; metuendum profecto erat nedum ut spes evanesceret, quam de removendo ab Indiis memorato Antistite conceperamus, sed etiam ut ab ipso, ejusque asseclis ex Nostra illa recusatione, nova atque ad facinus faciendum apta arriperetur occasio majoribus illic dissidiis cum graviore Religionis detrimento excitandis. Interim sperare alia ex parte licebat, memoratum Antistitem, sacrae cetero quin doctrinae, bonorumque morum laude non destitutum, ubi ab occasionibus removeretur that this proceeding would involve very great difficulties and much risk, unless the Queen of Portugal's Government by its consent co-operated with us in its accomplishment. To our Extraordinary Internuncio and Apostolic Delegate who happened to be in Rome in 1847 and was about to return to Lisbon, We gave therefore special commands, to treat with the Queen's Government on the recall of the Archbishop of Goa, and to employ every exertion and industry for the accomplishment of that measure. Our representative was careful to report to us in the year 1848 the chief conditions, by a compliance with which he was of opinion, that the matter at issue could be arranged, and We, on our part, then took care to inform him in due time of our impression respecting the aforesaid conditions.

But at that troubled period, the Letters, issued by our Cardinal Secretary of State on the 8th day of July, having been intercepted or otherwise retarded, at length, towards the end of that year, and whilst We, having been forced to retire from our beloved City of Rome, resided at Caieta, Letters and Documents sent by our Internuncio were brought thither to us, from which it appeared, that on the 21st day of October in the same year, our aforesaid Internuncio had entered into an agreement with the Queens' Government, that the Prelate Joseph should be translated from the Church of Goa to some Metropolitan Church in partibus Infidelium, and that on his return to Lisbon, which was to be immediate, he should be appointed Commissary of the "Bulla Cruciata," and moreover Coadjutor and future Successor to the Archbishop of Braga, on the condition, however, 1st. that he should testify his submission and reverence for the Apostolic See, and next, that in order to guard before-hand against the recurrence of ulterior dissensions, on occasion of the appointment of another Bishop for the Church of Goa, express mention should be made in the Apostolic Diplomata which would testify the promotion of that Prelate to the Archiepiscopacy, of the limits within which, he was to exercise his Authority. We learned at the same time, that by order of Her Majesty the Most Faithful Queen, the Portuguese Government had sent Letters to Goa, to inform the Archbishop Joseph of all these things, and to instruct him to return without delay to Lisbon. At the same time, the Queen's Ambassador to the Holy See, who had followed us to Caieta, in Her Majesty's name humbly petitioned us, to assign to the Prelate Joseph, whose immediate arrival in Lisbon was at hand, not only the office of Commissary of the "Bulla Cruciata," which office he was to fill during the occupation of quae illum Goae in transversum egerant, rediturum per Dei gratiam ad consilia meliora, et in novae Ecclesiae procuratione ita se porro gesturum, ut suae pariter, atque ovium saluti consuleret. Hinc considerata ut par erat, tota rei causa, et aliquibus de Vestro amplissimo ordine in consilium adhibitis, ac memoria repetentes oeconomiam a Decessoribus Nostris in simili rerum gravitate et difficultate non semel adhibitam, induximus animum ut meliori, quam res ferret, cautione accepta, in expetitam destinationem assentiremur.

Mandavimus igitur Cardinali Nostro Pro-Secretario Status, ut Regio Legato respondens, clare illi aperteque nostro nomine declararet, Nos quidem in proximo, si id optaret, Consistorio soluturos Josephum Antistitem a vinculo Goanae Ecclesiae, eumdem quoque translaturos ad Metropolitanam aliam Ecclesiam in partibus infidelium existentem, ac subinde eidem munus collaturos Commissarii Bullae Cruciatae: ceterum Sanctam hanc Sedem, quod Regius ipse Legatus probe noverat, graves habuisse reclamandi causas contra Archiepiscopi gesta in regimine Ecclesiae Goanae, atque idcirco Nos non posse omnino tuta conscientia destinare illi futuram procurationem Bracharensis Ecclesiae, nisi antea congruum documentum sive tales ab eo Litteras acciperemus, ex quibus constaret illum et dolere quae perperam gesserat, et statutum fixumque in animo habere, ut numquam in posterum ab officio declinet.

Acquievit nostrae huic declarationi Regius Legatus, et de ratione Litterarum, quae expectabantur, minime dubitans, postulare instit, ut ea quae jam tunc perfici poterant, decerneremus. Quare ad diem 22 Decembris supradicti anni 1848 in Consistorio Cajetae coacto transtulimus Antistitem Josephum a Goana Ecclesia ad Archiepiscopatum Palmyrensem in partibus Infidelium, atque insequenti mense officium Commissarii Bullae Cruciatae novo eidem Palmyrensi Archiepiscopo demandavimus.

Hinc post aliquot menses Antistes ille in Lusitaniam reversus est. Nos itaque eidem Olissipone jam commoranti significandum rursus mandavimus, quantam Nobis sollicitudinem attulissent quae ipse in Indiis extra limites auctoritatis suae, et contra Sanctae hujus Sedis mandata gerere non dubitaverat, et nonnulla etiam quae paulo ante suum inde discessum in quibusdam suis Litteris seu scriptis indicaverat. Jam vero gratum cordi nostro est annuntiare Vobis, Venerabiles Fratres, Palmyrensem Archiepiscopum ita Nobis fecisse satis, ut existimare debeamus, ipsum per Dei gratiam ad meliora consilia toto animo fuisse reversum. Ab eo enim Litteras accepimus datas die 18 Novembris superioris the Church of Braga, but he moreover entreated, that we would deign, in the Consistory, which we were then about to hold, to nominate him also Coadjutor and Successor to the aforesaid Church, since, as he added, it could not be doubted, that he (the Archbishop) would immediately send to us those Letters of submission, to which we have above made reference.

This request indeed and the abovementioned Letters of the Papal Internuncio, particularly the announcement they contained, that it was agreed upon, that the future administration of the Church of Braga was to be given to the Prelate Joseph, occasioned to us, surrounded as we then were with so many other and so great difficulties, no little solicitude. For whilst We had before our eyes the perverse conduct of that Prelate, when he administered the Archiepiscopacy of Goa, We saw on the other hand, that if we refused to give effect to the arrangement entered into by our Internuncio on this subject, there was doubtless reason to fear, not only that our hopes of removing that Prelate would be frustrated, but moreover, that he and his adherents would take advantage of our refusal and grasp at the fresh opportunity which would be thus afforded to him, to practise deception in Goa and excite dissensions still more injurious to Religion, than those which had been previously occasioned by him. Meanwhile, on the other hand, it was reasonable to hope, that the aforesaid Prelate, as he was not without some claim to commendation on the score of his knowledge of sacred learning and of good morals, would, when removed from the circumstances which gave occasion to his perverse conduct at Goa, through the Grace of God, return to wiser counsels, and conduct himself in the administration of his new appointment to the Church of Braga, in such a way, as to consult alike for his own salvation and for that of his flock. Hence, the whole case having been duly considered, and some Members of your Illustrious Order having been consulted with, We, calling to mind the prudence so often displayed by our Predecessors, in similar great difficulties, resolved to agree to the appointment so earnestly petitioned for, but under precautions as satisfactory as the nature of the case admitted of.

We accordingly commanded our Cardinal Pro-Secretary of State, to reply in answer to the Queen's Ambassador, that in the approaching Consistory, if he still desired it, we would relieve the Prelate Joseph from his connection with the Church of Goa, translate him to another Metropolitan Church in partibus Infidelium and next confer on him the office anni, atque iis conceptas verbis, quae hominem decent errata sua detestantem, et de meliori in posterum ratione tenenda, suaque Nobis adhaesione et obedientia factis ipsis constanter comprobanda sollicitum. Subjicientur hae ipsae Litterae ante oculos vestros, atque una legetis Nostrum ad illas responsum, in quo nostros illi sensus omni ex parte declarare non omisimus.

Juxta haec, ut initio diximus, Palmyrensem ipsum Archiepiscopum Venerabilem Fratrem Josephum a Silva Torres promovere hodie concilium est ad munus Coadjutoris Dilecti Filii Nostri Cardinalis Archiepiscopi Bracharensis, cum adjuncto jure ut eidem in Ecclesia ipsa succedat. Et quoniam in hoc suscipiendo consilio nihil certe, nisi majorem Religionis utilitatem, et Apostolicarum in Indiis Missionum tranquilliorem, felicioremque cursum spectavimus, firmam plane in spem erigimur fore, ut illud Deo benedicente in eumdem finem, atque in Bracharensis quoque Ecclesiae emolumentum proficiat. Id quidem ab ipso Misericordiarum Patre per Jesum Christum ejus Filium in omni oratione et obsecratione cum gratiarum actione implorare contendimus; atque a Vestra etiam pietate, Venerabiles Fratres, exposcimus, ut fervidas preces et supplicationes vestras Nostris adjungere non intermittatis.

Concordat cum Originali,
J. McCabe,
A Secretis.
Abpi. Edessae V. A. O. B.

of Commissary of the "Bulla Cruciata," but for the rest, that it was well known to Her Majesty's Ambassador, that this Holy See had great reason to reclaim against the conduct of the Archbishop in the government of the Church of Goa, and that therefore we could not with a safe conscience appoint him to the future administration of the Church of Braga, unless we previously received from him a suitable proof, or such Letters, as would make it manifest, that he was both sorry for his past perverse proceedings, and firmly resolved for the future never to deviate from the path of duty.

The Queen's Ambassador assented to this our Declaration, and feeling confident, that the Letters We required would certainly be sent to us, urged us to resolve upon completing at once, the business which had been begun. Wherefore, on the 22nd day of December 1848, We in a Consistory convened at Caieta, translated the Prelate Joseph from the Church of Goa to the Archbishopric of Palmyra in partibus Infidelium, and in the following month We committed to him, the New Archbishop of Palmyra, the office of Commissary of the "Bulla Cruciata."

A few months, afterwards, that Prelate returned to Portugal. We therefore commanded, that, again, intimation should be made to him, of the great anxiety he gave us, by overstopping in India the limits of his authority, by the adoption of a course of conduct in direct contradiction to the orders of this Holy See, and finally by certain letters or writings composed by him, a little before his departure from India. It is with heartfelt satisfaction, that We now announce to you, Venerable Brothers, that the Archbishop of Palmyra has made to us such satisfaction, as ought to induce us to suppose, that, through the Grace of God, he has with his whole mind returned to wiser counsels. For, We have received from him Letters, dated the 18th of last November, couched in language, suitable to a person who detests his past faults, and who is solicitous, both to pursue a better course for the future, and to prove by his deeds, his unchangeable attachment, and obedience to us. These his Letters will be laid before you, and together with them, you will read our answer to them, in which We have not failed to manifest to him on every point our sentiments in his regard.

In accordance with what has been premised, it is our intention to promote to day the Archbishop, our Venerable Brother Joseph a Silva Torres to the office of Coadjutor, with the annexed right of succession to our Beloved Son, the Cardinal Archbishop of Braga.

EPISTOLA JOSEPHI ARCHIEPISCOPI PALMYRENSIS AD SS. D. N. PIUM PP. IX.

Beatissime Pater,

Puriissimus affectus, submissaque non solum observantia, quibus Beatitudinis Tuae sacram Personam et istam Divi Petri Sedem, ex mei muneris officioque prosequor gratissimo in animo sunt, quod vehementer doleo Beatitudini Tuae fuisse molesta, et nonnulla quae evenerunt, dum Goae Archiepiscopus essem, et aliquas illius epistolae sententias, quam duodecimo Kalendas Februarii anteacti anni ad Sanctitatem Tuam scripsi; et pastoralem etiam allocutionem, quam sexto nonas Aprilis ipsius anni ibidem edidi.

Quum enim Dei beneficio catholicus sim, et Episcopus simul, paternam Tuae Beatitudinis pietatem obsecro, ut has praesentes literas vultu digneris excipere benigno, persuasumque habere nullatenus in praecedentibus me potuisse habere conatum, vel actus meae in Oriente administrationis extra culpam peritus ponendi, vel me de ipsis jactandi.

Ex Bullarum etiam promulgatione quas memoratae adjunxi allocutioni minime iteratur, Beatissime Pater, in meo animo consilium fuisse insistendi in aliquo erga Sanctam Sedem, ejusque decreta oppositionis genere.

Illi enim affectu et non officio tantum conjunctus eam in debito semper habebo honore, Tuaeque Sanctitati spondeo intimum obsequium valdeque submissam venerationem, atque obedientiam erga Sacram Supremi Ecclesiae Principis Personam in meis gerendis Te semper spectaturum.

Pro hujus venerationis et obedientiae testimonio etiam per tuam singularem clementiam hoc mihi detur, Beatissime Pater, ut eam non praetermittam opportunitatem Tibi patefaciendi dolorem, quem verbis satis exequi non possum, quoque ob meum in Dioecesi Goana acerbum invitumque statum fui extra modum confectus.

And since We have adopted this course, solely with a view to the greater benefit of Religion and to the promotion of the greater peace and prosperity of the Apostolic Missions in India, We are strongly encouraged to hope, that God will bless our counsel both for that end, and also for the welfare of the Church of Braga. In all our prayers and supplications, together with our thanksgiving, We have earnestly implored this mercy from the Father of Mercies through his Son Jesus Christ, and We beg of your piety, Venerable Brothers not to cease to unite to ours, Your fervent prayers and supplications.

True Translation, J. McCabe,
Secy. to the Abp. V. A. W. B.

LETTER OF JOSEPH* THE ARCHBISHOP OF PALMYRA TO THE MOST HOLY FATHER PP. IX.

Most Holy Father.

Not only the duty of submission but also my unfeigned attachment to the Sacred person of your Holiness and the Chair of St. Peter, cause me deep affliction, when I call to mind both some occurrences which proved troublesome to your Holiness whilst I was Archbishop of Goa, as well as some paragraphs of the letter which I wrote to your Holiness on the 19th the Calends of February last year, and also the Pastoral Allocution which I published on the 6th of the nones of April of the same year—1849. Whereas by the Grace of God I am a Catholic and also a Bishop, I most humbly prostrate myself at the feet of your Holiness, and supplantly beseech you will deign to accept, according to your usual clemency, these my letters and be fully assured, that I do not attempt either to exculpate the acts of my administration in the East, or in any way to justify them.

From the promulgation of the Bulls which I annexed to the aforesaid documents, it ought by no means be inferred most Holy Father, that I ever intended to show the least opposition to the Holy See and its Decrees. United to it not only by my office but even in affection, I shall always honor it with the most profound respect; I pledge myself to your Holiness that from my future conduct you shall experience nothing but the most profound respect, submission and obedience to the Sacred Person of the Supreme Visible Head of the Church, and as a substantial proof of such my respect and submission most Holy Father, may I most humbly pray you through your usual great clemency, to grant me this one favor viz., to be allowed not to

* Late Archbishop of Goa.

Hic vero dolor maxime angebatur ob impotentiam, de qua laborabam, diversis typographicis silentium imperandi scriptis, quae longe aberant, ut charitatis ac reverentiae terminos custodirent.

Has absolvens literas, Beatissime Pater, Sanctitatem etiam Tuam supplicitèr oro leniter clementerque accipiendi non solum mea erga Te, qui es in terris Christi Vicarius, omnimque fidelium Pastor et Magister, catholicaeque unitatis centrum, justissimae adhaesionis canonicaeque subjectionis vota, sed etiam ingenuam quorumcumque dictorum vel factorum retractationem, quibus hujo catholicae doctrinae, meo in animo alis radicibus defixae, in qua Deo favente ad ultimum perseverare spero refragari potuerim.

Benedictionem tandem efflagitans Apostolicam, Beatitudinisque Tuae admodum reverenter osculans pedes, Deum O. M. pro Tua pretiosissima vita valetudineque, ut meum est, semper orabo.

Olissipone die decima octava mensis Novembris anni 1850.

JOSEPH ARCHIEPISCOPUS PALMYRENSIS.

Concordat cum Originali,

J. McCABE,

A Secretis.

Abpi Edessae V. A. O. B.

EPISTOLA SS. D. N. PII PAPAE IX. AD JOSEPHUM ARCHIEPISCOPUM PALMYRENSEM.

PIVS PP. IX.

Venerabilis Frater Salutem et Apostolicam Benedictionem. Redditae sunt Nobis Tuae Litterae die 18 proximi mensis Novembris datae, quibus pro purissimo, ut inquis, Tuo affectu, et submissa erga Nos, et hanc Petri Cathedram observantia vehementer doles, Nobis molesta fuisse, et nonulla, quae eveuerunt, dum Goae Archiepiscopus eras, et aliquas sententias illius Epistolae, quam duodecimo Kalendas Februarii praeterito anno 1849 ad Nos misisti, et pastoralem allocutionem a Te iisdem eodem anno vulgatam Sexto Nonas Martii, non vero Aprilis, veluti Tibi e calamo excidit. Hinc Nos obsecras, ut persuasum habere velimus, Te in praecedentibus nullatenus potuisse habere conatum, vel actus Tuae in Oriente administrationis extra culpam penitus ponendi, vel de ipsis Te jactandi. Ac simul declaras in Bullarum promulgatione, quas commemoratae allocutioni adjunxisti, pass by the present opportunity of making known to you the most profound grief and affliction such as I have not language to express, which I suffered on account of my very disagreeable and unpleasant position in the diocese of Goa. This my deep affliction was exceedingly increased on account of the incapability under which I labored of enjoining silence on different publications which, by no means kept within the bounds of charity and due respect. Retracting those letters, most Holy Father, again and again, I most humbly beseech your Holiness, not only to accept my good promises of firm adhesion, due submission, and canonical subjection to you who are Christ's Vicar upon earth the Pastor and Ruler of all the faithful, the Centre and bond of Catholic unity, but also my most sincere and candid retractation of all my words and acts which were in any respect contrary to Catholic doctrine so deeply implanted in my mind, and in which with the Grace of God I shall persevere till death. Meanwhile most earnestly asking your Apostolical benediction and most submissively prostrating myself at your feet, as in duty bound I shall ever pray the Almighty to bestow on you long life and good health.

Given at Lisbon the 18th Nov. 1850.

JOSEPH ARCHBISHOP OF PALMYRA.

True Translation. J. McCabe,

Secy. to the Abp. V. A. W. B.

ANSWER OF OUR MOST HOLY LORD PIUS IX. POPE, TO JOSEPH ARCHBISHOP OF PALMYRA.

Pius PP. IX.

Venerable Brother, Health and Apostolical Benediction

We have received your letter of the 18th of November last in which, on account of your pure affection, as you say, and humble reverence towards Us and this chair of Peter, you vehemently grieve, that we were pained by some things which happened whilst you were Archbishop of Goa, and by some sentences of the letter which you sent us on the 21st of January 1849, and by the Pastoral which you there published on the 2nd of March of the same year, and not of April as you wrote by mistake. Hence you entreat us to be persuaded, that you could not in any way attempt either to boast of the acts of your administration in the East, or even to justify them. At the same time you declare, that in the promulgation of the Bulls which you annexed to the aforesaid Pastoral, you never meant to insist on any sort of opposition against this Holy See and its decrees. For you profess yourself to numquam in Tuo animo fuisse consilium insistendi in aliquo oppositionis genere erga hanc Sanctam Sedem, ejusque decreta. Profiteris enim, Te eidem Sedi affectu, et non officio tantum conjunctum, eam in debito honore semper habiturum, ac Nobis intimum obsequium, valdeque subinissam venerationem et obedientiam spondes. Pro cujus venerationis, et obedientiae testimonio Nobis summum patefacis dolorem, quem verbis satis exequi haud potes, quo extra modum confectus fuisti ob luctum in Gallia Dioecesi acerbum, invitumque statum. Itaque Nos etiam atque etiam suppliciter oras, ut non solum excipere velimus Tua erga Nos, qui Christi vicariam hic in terris gerimus operam, justissimas adhaesionis, canonicaeque subjectionis vota, sed etiam quorumcumque tuorum dictorum, vel factorum retractationem, quibus catholicae doctrinae refragari potueris, quae in Tuo animo altis radicibus est defixa, et in qua, Deo favente, ad ultimum perseverare speras. Equidem, Venerabilis Frater, ejusmodi Tui animi sensus, quos e puro corde, et conscientia bona; ac fide non ficta proficisci confidimus, gratissimi Nobis fuerunt, et acerbissimum illum luctum mitiorem, quo praeterita Tua agendi ratio Nos, Nostrumque Praedecessorem rec. me. Gregorium XVI vehementer affecerat. Atque ea porro spe sustentamur fore, ut huic Tuae declarationi, quae catholicum Antistitem omnino decet, Tua omnia consilia, et actiones in posterum plane respondeant. Etenim haud ignoras, Venerabilis Frater, catholico Episcopo nihil potius, nihil antiquius esse debere, quam supremam hujus Beati Petri Sedis potestatem, unde unitas sacerdotalis exorta est, ac Episcoporum ordinatio, et Ecclesiae ratio decurrit, ex animo venerari, ejusque Sedis jura, quae non humana, sed divina auctoritate nituntur, summopere vereri ac defendere, et Romano Pontifici firmiter adhaerere, omnemque observantiam, et obedientiam fideliter profiteri, ac praestare qui in eadem Sede collocatus in persona Beatissimi Apostolorum Principis, plenam ab ipso Christo Domino potestatem accepit pascendi agnos, et oves, confirmandi fratres, et universam, qua late patet, regendi, ac gubernandi Ecclesiam. Atque optime scis quanta cura, et studio catholicus Episcopus in id imprimis incumbere debeat, ut catholicae Ecclesiae unitatem totis viribus foveat, tueatur, propugnet, quae sine debita erga hanc Sanctam Sedem, et Romanum Pontificem observantia, et obedientia esse non potest, quaeque in eo potissimum sita esse dignoscitur, ut quamvis in Populo Dei multi sint Sacerdotes, multique Pastores, omnes tamen proprie regat Petrus, quos principaliter regit et Christus. Neque Te latet quam inbe united to this same See, not only by office, but by affection also; and you promise always to hold it in due honor, and to exhibit towards us profound respect and very submissive veneration and obedience.

In proof of this veneration and obedience you inform us of the extreme sorrow, which you could not find words to express, by which you have been exceedingly afflicted on account of your painful situation in the Diocese of Goa. You therefore, again and again suppliantly beseech us to accept not only your promises of just adhesion and canonical subjection to Us, who hold the Vicarship of Christ on earth, but also the retraction of all that you said or did, by which you might have contradicted Catholic doctrine, which is deeply rooted in your mind, and in which, with the grace of God, you hope to persevere to the end. Indeed, venerable Brother, those sentiments of yours which, We hope, proceed from a pure heart, a good conscience and an unfeigned faith, have been most grateful to Us, and they assuage that bitter sorrow with which your former conduct had grievously afflicted us and our Predecessor Gregory XVI. of recent memory. And we cherish the hope, that for the future, all your counsels and actions may clearly correspond with this declaration of yours as becomes a Catholic Bishop. For, you are not ignorant, venerable Brother, that to a Catholic Bishop, nothing ought to be dearer, nothing more at heart than to reverence from his soul the supreme power of this See of the blessed Peter, in which the unity of the Priesthood has its origin, and from which flow the ordination of Bishops and the government of the Church; and to revere and defend, with his whole strength, the rights of the same See, which are based not on human but on divine authority: and firmly to adhere to the Roman Pontiff, faithfully to profess and exhibit all reverence and obedience to him, who, placed in this same See, received from Christ the Lord in the person of the most blessed Prince of the Apostles full power to feed the lambs and the sheep, to confirm the Brethren, and to rule and govern the universal Church, wherever it may be spread. And you know full well with what care and attention a Catholic Bishop ought in the first place apply himself to nourish, defend and promote with all his strength, the unity of the Catholic Church, which unity cannot exist without due respect and obedience towards this Holy See and the Roman Pontiff, and which consists principally in this, that although amongst the people of God there are many Priests and many Pastors, Peter notwithstanding properly governs them all, whom Christ also governs as their head. Nor can you but know how undignum, quam perversum, quam miserrimum sit fideles, ac praesertim ecclesiasticos ab hac catholica unitate deflectere, et quantopere sint improbandi, ac damnandi ii omnes, qui ejusmodi unitati quovis modo adversari, et eorum opera, atque exemplo alios etiam ab illa avertere non extimescunt. Dum autem haec Tecum loquimur, Venerabilis Frater, ea sane fiducia nitimur, ut catholicis hisce sensibus Tu vere animatus, quemadmodum in commemorata Tua Epistola luculenter declaras, nihil antiquius habere velis, quam majoris consolationis causam Nobis semper praebere, nihilque intentatum relinquere, ut qua opere, qua verbo, qua exemplo sinceram Tuam erga Nos et hanc Sanctam Sedem fidem ostendas, omnesque Tuas vires in catholicae Ecclesiae doctrinam, ejusque unitatem tuendam, ac promovendam conferas, atque ita efficias, ut ii omnes, qui Tuae Goanae administrationis facta agnoscunt, quique non mediocrem ex illis admirationem, doloremque susceperunt, malam de Te opinionem deponant, bonamque concipiant et habeant. Denique Pontificiae Nostrae in Te caritatis testem, et caelestium omnium munerum auspicem Apostolicam Benedictionem Tibi ipsi, Venerabilis Frater; peramanter impertimur.

Datum Romae apud Sanctum Petrum die 6 Ianuarii Anno 1851. Pontificatus Nostri Anno quinto. PIVS PP. IX.

Concordat cum Originali, J. McCabe, A Secretis Abpi. Edessae V. A. O. B.

R. P. D. Patricio Josepho Carew, Archiepiscopo Edesseno Vicario. Apo. Bengaliae, Occidentalis, Calcuttae.

Illme, et Rme. Domine,

Jubente Sanctissimo Domino Nostro Providentia PP. IX. adjectam Sanctitatis suae, quam nuper habuit in Consistorio Allocutionem ac typis edidit, amplitudini Tuae mittimus, ut eam istis in regionibus vulgari ac notam ubivis poteris fieri satagas. Id porro maximi momenti esse sentiet ex iis quae memorata Allocutio praefert, quaeque Deo juvante rei Catholicae in Missionibus istis felicius promovendae vel maxime profutura confidimus. Hinc D. O. M. adprecamur ut Amplitudinem Tuam incolumem diu servet ac sospitem.

Romae ex Aedibus S. C. de Prop. Fide Die 1 Martii 1851 &c., Amplitudinis Tuae,

Ad Officia Paratissimus,
J. Ph. Card. Fransoni Pref.
Al. Barnabo.
A Secretis.

Concordat cum Originali,
J. McCabe,
A Secretis.
Abpi. Edessa V. A. O. B.

worthy, how perverse, and how miserable it is for any of the faithful and especially for Ecclesiastics to depart from this Catholic unity: and how much all those are to be reproved and condemned who tremble not to oppose this unity, and by their deeds and example to withdraw others also from it. But whilst we thus address you, venerable Brother, we confide, that you, really animated by the Catholic sentiments which you clearly expressed in your aforesaid letter, will hold nothing dearer to you than always to afford us cause of greater consolation and that you will leave nothing undone to shew by deed, by word and example your sincere faith towards Us and this Holy see; and that you will exert all your strength to defend and promote the doctrine and unity of the Catholic Church, and effect, that all those who know the deeds of your Goanese administration, and who were so greatly surprised and pained by them, may lay aside the bad opinion they have of you, and that they may instead thereof conceive and entertain a good one. In conclusion, as a token of our Pontifical charity towards you, an auspice of every heavenly gift, we impart to you, venerable Brother, our Apostolical benediction.

Given at St. Peter's Rome the 6th day of January 1851, in the fifth year of our Pontificate.

Pius PP. IX.

True Translation, J. McCabe, Secy. to the Abp. V. A. W. B.

To the Most Rev. Patrick Joseph Carew, Archbishop of Edessa, Vicar Apostolic of Western Bengal, Calcutta.

Most Illustrious and Most Reverend Lord.—In compliance with the directions of our most holy Lord Pope Pius the IX. We send your Grace the enclosed printed Allocution of his Holiness delivered in a late Consistory, in order that you may diffuse the knowledge of it and cause it to be published throughout the East. Moreover, We confidently hope you will find the contents of the Allocution of the greatest importance, and such as with God's blessing will happily promote Catholicity in those Missions or greatly help it in its future progress. We therefore most earnestly implore the Almighty God, to preserve your Grace, for many years in good health.

Rome, Hall of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide 1st March 1851.

Always at your Service,
J. Ph. Card. Fransoni Pref.
A. Barnabo.
Secy.

True Translation.
J. McCabe.
Secy. to the Archbishop, V. A. W. B.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE MUSEUM.

The Rev. Mr. Kennedy, Rector of St. John's College begs to return to P. S. D'Rozario Esq. grateful thanks for his interesting Contributions to the College Museum. The Contributions consist of an Alligator preserved in spirits of Wine in a large Glass Vase, and the Skeleton of a Cobra Capella.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE REASONS OF MY CONVERSION TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY A LATE CLERGYMAN (REV. MR. NEWMAN) OF THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION, IN LETTERS TO A FRIEND. FIFTH EDITION. LONDON: JAMES BURNS 1849.

LETTER VIII.

My Dear ——

It would be an endless task to attempt to answer in detail and seriatim all the objections that persons are in the habit of urging, either against leaving the English or joining the Roman Catholic Church; for the objectors sometimes take one and sometimes the other side, trusting to no one argument in particular, but going from one to another, leaving each as it seems to fail them, and then beginning again. All objections are, of course, really answered by proving that the Church of England is in schism, and that the Church of Rome is the true Church; and this is what—as I am most deeply convinced of it myself—I have endeavoured to make clear to you. When once a person is convinced of this, all difficulties as to what his duty is vanish at once. He may have long borne with the corruptions and defects of the English Church, felt her trials and punishments as his own, and laboured as his sole duty and care to remove what he lamented, and to supply what was needed. He did so because he thought she was his Church, and he knew that so long as she was a portion of the one Church, it was death to desert her. But as soon as he is convinced that he has been mistaken in his great assumption, that the English Church is indeed a portion of the one Church—that moment he has no longer any duties towards her, but that of charity towards her members, with an earnest desire to deliver them from the delusion from which he has been himself delivered. He has had great trials of mind and feeling to go through; much to contend against; but his duty is clear—he must join the Church.

Now, this simple view of the conversion of so many persons to the Catholic Church, it is hardly possible, strange to say to impress upon our Anglican friends. We cannot get them to accept our own statement of our own reasons for acting as we have done; viz. because we are fully persuaded that the English Church is not the Church, and that the Roman Catholic is. Thus, they will bring charges against us for "deserting our mother the Church of England"—not merely meaning what they think is our mother, but as if we had consciously and wilfully deserted what we thought to be our mother. They say, we left her because of her corruptions and our impatience under them, or from a morbid craving for exciting services, or for something that we preferred in the Roman Church; whereas we left her because she was not a Church, and we preferred, indeed, being in the Church. If she had been twenty times more corrupt than she is, and yet the Church, I for one could never have been persuaded to leave her; and if the Roman Church were twenty times as corrupt as she is, and yet the Church, I should equally consider it my duty and chief happiness to join her.

Another form of that charge is, that we have left "the Church of our Baptism." This seems a favourite and an effective phrase; though on examination, it simply has no meaning at all. How could we leave the Church of our Baptism, if we were not in a Church at all? And, moreover, does not every one know that Baptism does not admit us into a Church—it is not a private ceremony for a particular body; but it admits us into the Church. Supposing a Moravian was to become convinced of his errors, and leaving the Moravian Church (as it is called) should join the Church of England, would he have left "the Church of his Baptism?" He would simply have left what he had discovered was not a Church at all. And in that case Anglicans would certainly not blame him, nor think he had much to endure or be ashamed of in being accused by those he had left of having deserted "the Church of his Baptism."

One feels as if these things were hardly worth noticing. Yet they are so often said, and by persons from whom one could so little have expected it, that we cannot but fear that they tell in some quarters. They could not be repeated and circulated as they are, if they were not believed to mean something, and to produce an effect. All these things only serve to convince us the more of what is ever striking us afresh as the root of all Anglican errors and conduct, that they have not grasped the idea of "the Church" at all.

(To be continued.)

HISTORY OF THE LIFE, WRITINGS AND DOCTRINES OF MARTIN LUTHER

By J. M. V. Audin

THE TWO BULLS 1520.

LEO X—1521

(Continued from page 151.)

The pope did not forget his dear Erasmus. His favours followed him to England, to the court of Henry VIII., which the philosopher visited, and where he met with a very different reception from that which he had found at Rome. He had not as yet disembarked at Dover, when a letter addressed to Henry, awaited him at London. This papal brief is not only a precious evidence of kindness for Erasmus, but a monument of the honour paid to the learned.

"I have always loved literature and the learned. This love was born with me: age has but strengthened it, because I have generally observed that those who cultivate literature, are cordially attached to their faith. Besides, literature is the ornament of the Christian church."*

Let us finish this hasty sketch of the reign of Leo X. Those who would wish to study its wonders, will find them in Paul Jovius and William Roscoe. Especial credit is due to the English historian, who has shown himself grateful to the memory of the Medici. His work, notwithstanding some defects, inseparable from the production of a rectangular pen, is a noble eulogy on the restorer of literature, and a bright page in the life of the English writer. After having recounted at great length the history of this pontiff, and having exhibited him with that aureola of glory with which the artists environed him, Paul Jovian shows him to us, escaping from the bustle and magnificence of the Vatican,—from the Roman festivals, and from the intoxicating effects of the incense which all Italy burned before him,—from the joys and turmoils of the papacy, and without giving notice of his departure, hastily retiring to his villa Malliana. At his approach the bells of the obscure village ring: the peasants run; they strew the road with flowers, stop the litter of the pontiff, and offer him a bouquet. The pope gets out of his chariot, gives them the hand, and puts divers questions to them. He listens to the silver headed veterans, and carresses the playful children: he gives dowries to poor virgins, and pays off the debts of the distressed; for it is his maxim, that a prince ought to relieve the indigent, and diffuse happiness on all around him.

Leo X., died on the first of December, 1521 Some days before his death, he caused a diploma to be sent to Zwingli,* the pastor of Einsiedlin, by which he was made acolyte of the Holy See. To Reuchlin, whose apology had been condemned to the flames, by the universities of Paris and Cologne, and who had taken refuge in Rome, he gave peculiar marks of his munificence. Thus he ended, as he had begun, his pontificate.—At that very time, a small boat was quietly stealing away from Bâle. The fugitive whom it contained, saluted the ungrateful city in Latin verses,—the overflowings of a heart big with vexation.—"Adieu Bâle adieu thou who wert so long kind and hospitable to me! I bid thee farewell, from this bark which bears me for ever from thee! May thou have all happiness and honour, and never have a guest more troublesome than I."

It was Erasmus, whom protestant intolerance drove away from Bâle;—a city that was indebted to him for a portion of its glory, Froben, Amerback, and Holbein †

We have seen something of Leo X. Let the render judge, whether he, or Luther, was the more likely to oppose the peace of the church, Had Julius II. been in the place of Leo, he would have been inflexible. He would not even have listened to the voice of the innovator, but would have at once imposed silence on him. Does it not seem, as if Providence had placed on the papal throne, a pontiff like Leo;—"a lamb in the midst of wolves,— a Daniel in the lions' den,—an Ezechiel in the midst of scorpions,"— a pontiff whose mortals were so pure, that the breath of calumny has not dared to sully them,—that this revolt might have no pretext to justify itself to the world?‡ And yet there were found men like Hutten, who, when Luther cried out "Antichrist," re-echoed the exclamation!, Leo X. Antichrist! What folly! Providence, who watched over his work, determined that this pope, who was an angel of mildness, should also be an angel of light, that thus the reformers might not be able to accuse him of loving darkness. And yet, has it not been said, and is it not hourly repeated, that, but for Luther, the world would still be

* Letter of Leo X. to Henry VIII., 10th July, 1519. See the letter of Erasmus to the pontiff, on St. Jerom, 174. The elegant answer of Leo. Epist. Erasmi. T. iii. of this writer's works.

* Vie d' Ulrich Zwingli par M. J. C. Hess. 1816, p. 63. Note. et 75.—Hottinger, Histoire des Eglises Helvet. t. iii.

† Prazer's Magazine. Revue Britan, Feb. 1836.

‡ Quid referam castos vitæ sine crimine mores? And Fulvio, non extra libidinem modo, sed extra famam libidinis, Math Herculanus.

involved in darkness?—While Luther was disputing on indulgences, Italy produced an epic poem!

THOUGHTS SUGGESTED BY THE PRESENT ROMEWARD MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND.

A POEM BY THOS. P. MANOEL OF PATNA.

For the Bengal Catholic Herald.

I.

ceeds:—the mighty harvest rose
To made ion; —the mind of man rose high
Quick as lightning within the tube:—the throes
Of Nature gave the surest sign:—the cry
Rang forth like throughout, "No Popery!!"
A Universe Babbuh rose;—the host
Of Lucifer blew keen, and out it flys
The Flags and Furls of destruction vast:—
But lo! the scene is changed, and the form's past!

II.

A calm succeeds;—and Romanism still Survives the shock—and the elaborate plan
Of Ignorance affected naught;—it will Survive the death of Nature, nor can man
Its date of Empire shorten;—neither can
The power of Hell prevail;—when Luther rose,
Inspired by the Arch-Fiend, to rise and fan
The flames of death of heresy,—and disclose
Before the headed throng how to become God's foes;—

III.

And what has followers, slaves to passions all,
Foul shame, guilt, hate, avarice, and the love
Of novelty, rose instant, and his call Obeyed,—in thought that this will surely prove
The end of Romanism;—that 'twill remove
The power of infallibility:—
Vain hope! that never will the power above!
Luther, where art thou, Calvin! where are ye?
Rise and behold thy staffs, rebounding all to thee!

IV.

They were ambitious minds,—and in their hearts
Was their innate love of glory, which inflames
The very immortal soul, nor e'en departs
In direst moments of,—with thoughtful pangs
Love, hate, hope, fear, reproofs, nor blames:—
They saw not the way to Rome, they knew not how;—
For light and wisdom they cared not, nor the names
Of God and Lord appalled their brow
Was seared, the stern resolve—"to have a name!

They grew imperious,—bursting from the bond
Of reason, in the inviolate stream they drank
Of knowledge, confidence in self—the round
Of wisdom is neglected;—and deep sank
The rash, presumptuous men, when from the bank
Afflicted wisdom saw them, and her heart
Was moved,—she saves them;—but they never their thank Bestowed on her, their Benefactress; they depart—
And on the true religion throw the poison'd dart.

VI.

Rome wears an ægis;—on her shield's display'd
The radiance of the Almighty, and the light
Of the Son-God in human form arrayed—
Before which Sol is Mercury, and the bright
Star of the evening mole-like wings its flight
Within the beam—invulnerable shield!
That has preserv'd the wearer in the fight
A thousand times—nor e'er was seen to yield
Her palm of glory Rome, in the dreaded field—

VII.

A Sun is risen in the South whose beams
Obliquely fall on Albion;—but the eyes
Power'd to darkness, when the refluent streams
Of light come rushing, clos'd themselves, and cries
Came from the lips, that from these "mummeries
Of superstition," should be freed the land;—
The cries unheeded, daily numbers prize
The worth of Rome, and join the faithful band:—
Yes tens, and tens it is. Rome ever, ever, will stand.

[illegible] can oppose her power,— [illegible]ver,—infallible!—and one!—
Oh Rome! [illegible]ty of our faith,—the Bow'r
Of hope sure;—[illegible]-made to Salvation;—
The fountain [illegible] streams of virtue run;
Repentant A[illegible] kneels before thy shrine;
From sin absolve her, [illegible] to thee alone
The power [illegible] gives
Not her th[illegible]er!— [illegible]

IX.

But no! the mother opens wide her arms,
To clasp her fair but disobedient child,—
Mercy divine! the very portion charms
My heart admiring—Oh thou Holy One!
Who rulest in the Vatican alone,
Peter's successor, may the Almighty's eyes
Look on thy acts of virtue, and the Sun
Become thy crown;—ye nations virtue prize!
Rise, join your mother kind, ye Albion's sons arise.

Patna, March, 1851.

Selections.

PROTESTANT CLERGYMAN'S REASONS AGAINST THE "AGGRESSION" MOVEMENT.

The Rev. T. T. Trench, Perpetual Curate of Cloghjordan, has published a letter, giving his reasons for refusing to sign a petition praying for measures of persecution against the Catholics. We quote a few extracts:—

"I have not been able to view the Papal appointment of Roman Catholic Bishops in England as a 'daring and insolent aggression.' I think that, in Christian charity, we should take for granted that the Bishop of Rome is as sincere in his opinions as we are in ours. Now, his opinion is that we are all heretics, beyond the pale of salvation. Why, then, should we be offended by his appointment of Bishops, with a view to an aggressive movement towards our conversion to what he believes the saving Faith? As one who did not believe the doctrines of his own Church, or as one who cared not whether the souls of Englishmen were lost or saved, he might have refrained from any interference with their religion. But ought we to have thought more highly of him if he had so done? Ought we to blame the Pope for seeking what we may charitably suppose he believes to be our good? Further, I believe the Pope too wise to be intentionally insolent on such an occasion. Whatever his motive may be, we may surely presume that both he and his Cardinals are desirous of spreading their religion throughout the British dominions. Now, I believe them to be too 'wise in their generation,' to begin their 'aggression' by insulting the nation which they wish to convert. Again, I object to the petition, inasmuch as I am not aware that any aggression whatever has lately been made on the 'freedom and privileges of the United Church of England and Ireland.' In what way has our freedom been interfered with? Is there anything what or which we are not as free to do now as we were before the Pope's letter published? Is there any obligation upon us to designate Dr. Wiseman as Archbishop of Westminster,' or any of his Suffragan Bishops by their assumed titles? The complaint of our 'freedom being interfered with,' appears to me as groundless as if the Christian inhabitants of Rome had complained of an 'aggression' on their liberty, because the walls of the Ghetto, which had degradingly confined for so many centuries God's ancient people, the Jews, were demolished by the Pope on his accession to the throne, and comparative liberty thereby given to his Jewish subjects.—Tablet Jan. 29.

THE CATHOLIC HIERARCHY.

Lord Arundel and Surrey has addressed the following letter to Lord John Russell:—

"My Lord—It was not until this afternoon, after reading the speech delivered by Lord Lansdowne in the House of Lords yesterday, and, after referring again to your lordship's speech in the other House, that the conviction forced itself upon my mind that your lordship did actually believe the recent appointment of a Catholic Hierarchy in this country to be an assumption of temporal power on the part of the Pope. It really had not occurred to me previously that you or any of her Majesty's Ministers did or could view the appointment of the Hierarchy in that light. I beg, therefore, most distinctly to assure your lordship, in the strongest language I can command, that such is not the fact. The language made use of in various documents which have been alluded to, does apply exclusively to spiritual jurisdiction; and the loose phraseology of newspapers, which have also been referred to, either bears the same exclusive meaning, or is incorrect. The appointment of the Hierarchy does not make the smallest difference in our temporal position as subjects of her Majesty. This I distinctly and unhesitatingly affirm. I, therefore, hope that, whatever may be said by others, no Ministers of the Crown will on any occasion again attempt to stigmatise with disloyalty any portion of her Majesty's Catholic subjects for accepting—as I hold it to be their bounden duty to do—the purely spiritual organization given to them by the head of their Church.

"I have the honour to be, my lord, your humble servant,

"ARUNDEL AND SURREY.

"11, Carlton-terrace, Feb. 5.

ITALY

ROME.—His Holiness has nominated the members of the Conseil d'Etat. They are ten in number. Count Spaur, the Bavarian Minister at the Holy See, after an absence of some months, has returned to Rome. All good Catholics are aware that it is to this illustrious personage that they principally owe the escape of his Holiness from the hands of the Mazzinians. A plot has just been discovered at Rome, the object of which was the assassination of the Head of the Church, and numerous arrests have taken place in consequence. It is stated that the Government of the United States has requested a Nuncio from the Holy See at Washington.

PARMA.—We are informed that the question of the various religious establishments has been settled with the concurrence of the Holy See, so as to satisfy all parties.

FLORENCE.—The Grand Duke has given audience to his Excellency Richard Lalor Sheil, who presented letters from her Majesty in quality of her Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Tuscany.

PIEDMONT.—Count Siccardi has given in his resignation on account of the state of his health, and the King has accepted it.

MR. ANSTEY AND HIS CONSTITUENTS.

At a public meeting of the constituents of Mr. Anstey, held at Youghal on the 9th inst., it was unanimously resolved to address to him the following notice:—

"TO T. C. ANSTEY, ESQ."

"SIR—We, the undersigned Roman Catholic inhabitants of Youghal, by whose exertions and votes you were elected a member of Parliament for this borough, most reluctantly feel it our duty to inform you that you have altogether disappointed our expectations. It with grief that we have all along noticed in your public career a departure from those principles on which you were elected by us. We need not remind you of your advocacy of coercion, even against those of our countrymen whose principles you had publicly adopted, nor of your total indifference to the cause of legislative independence for Ireland on the occasions on which that question has been introduced in the House of Commons. But the act by which you have forfeited our confidence for ever is your advocacy of penal measures against the Catholic hierarchy of England, and your support of a Minister who having already awakened a fell spirit of religious bigotry in this country, now seeks by legislative enactments to violate the rights of man and suppress liberty of conscience. Under these circumstances we feel it our bounden duty to desire that you will at once resign the representation of this borough; we need not remind you of the distinct promise you made here that you would do so whenever your constituents would require it."

[Here follow the signatures.]

Cardinal Wiseman's reply to the address of the Roman Catholic Bishops and clergy of Cork, says:—"In my own name, and in that of my brother Bishops, I beg to offer to your lordship and your Clergy our warmest thanks, and the expression of our sincerest affection, strengthened by the new proofs which we are now receiving of strong and generous friendship. The violent excitement which has been caused by the just and salutary measure of the Holy See is fast subsiding; and I trust that more reasonable views will soon succeed to the misapprehensions which have been too industriously raised upon the subject."—Limerick Chronicle.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.

No. 17.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, April 26, 1851.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

4TH WEEK—4TH WEDNESDAY.

We have been favored with the following outline of the Lenten Lecture delivered at St. Thomas' Church by His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, V. A. W. B:—

"Going therefore teach ye all nations: baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and behold I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world."—St. Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.

Wisdom, my Brethren dictates, that in proportion to the proposed grandeur and elevation of the superstructure the foundation on which it is to be raised, should be deep and solid.

In the magnificent plan traced out by the Saviour for the construction of his Church, it was therefore of paramount importance, that his own Divine Character and Mission, should have been clearly established by him, in order that the authority of the Apostolic Hierarchy which he designed to establish in his Church, should repose on that Divine Character and Mission, as on a sure and certain Foundation.

For this reason it was, that he so often appealed to his miracles in testimony of himself. For this reason it was, that he dwelt on their superior grandeur—a grandeur far surpassing that of any which had ever been achieved before the Saviour's time.

Having by this wise course thus proved his Divine Mission, and rendered inexcusable the incredulity of the Jews, the Saviour might now arrange in the way he judged best, for the transmission, to succeeding ages until the consummation of the world, of all such powers, annexed to his own Mission, as might conduce to the Unity and Sanctity of his Church, of its Pastors and its People. For this purpose it was necessary, that it should be provided in the economy of the New Dispensation, that in every age, the Pastors of his Church should be enabled to trace up their Mission to the Apostles, as the Apostles traced theirs to Christ and as Christ traced his to His Heavenly Father.

According to St. Paul, the Apostles were constituted Ministers of Christ, and Dispensers of the Mysteries of God. The Saviour himself had previously intimated the same truth, when he addressed to them those words so pregnant with meaning, which we read in the 15th Chapter of St. John—"You have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and appointed you that you should go and should bring forth fruit, and your fruit should remain," In this way did the Great Pon-tiff and High Priest of God and man instructs his Apostles, that the powers and honors of their exalted Ministry were derived wholly from his having invested them with the Apostleship, and that they came by no means from themselves, from their own election of the Sacred Ministry or in short from any human origin whatsoever. Guided by the heavenly light which emanated from the Saviour's words, St. Paul, long after the Saviour had ascended into Heaven, when speaking of the Priesthood lays it down as a truth then universally confessed, "Neither doth any man take this honor to himself, but he that is called by God as Aaron was" Hebr. Chap. 5. And, in order to prove that no exception whatever could be permitted in this grand ordinance of Religion, the Apostle subjoins, that even Christ did not glorify himself, that he might be made a High Priest, but he (the Heavenly Father) who said to Christ; "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee and again thou, (viz. My Son) art a Priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedech." Thus then, with regard to our Divine Redeemer, He, though the eternal consubstantial Son of God, the express image of the Father, the splendor of His Glory, God of God and Light of Light, He by whom all things were made, not even He would glorify himself by the Assumption of the Priesthood, until His Heavenly Father had as the Royal Psalmist proclaims, constituted him a Priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedech.

The principle then which the Saviour laid down when He said to his Apostles, "Not you have chosen me, but I have chosen you, He himself fulfilled before entering on his Priesthood, and by doing so, He announced far more effectually than any words could convey, that, as his Priesthood, if entered upon without his Heavenly Father's sanction, would have been an intrusion, a usurpation most displeasing to God, so too, would the Assumption of the Christian Ministry be a most grievous usurpation, in every case in which the party who assumed it, could not satisfactorily show, that he derived his ordination from the Apostles, as the Apostles derived theirs from Christ, and as Christ derived His from His Heavenly Father.

It is as evident as the noon-day Sun, that in proportion to the importance which the Scriptures attach to the tracing up of the sacred Ministry to its origin, it must be of greatest consequence, that the medium or means of ascertaining whether, in any particular case, a person, claiming to be a Priest, can or cannot trace his ministry to its proper source, must be such as can be judged of and pronounced upon, by those to whom the duty of such an investigation may belong. When the Aaronic Priesthood was established, the rites and ceremonies appointed for the consecration of Aaron and his Priesthood were minutely determined by God himself and in such a way, that, whilst the Jewish Church existed, a brief and easy investigation sufficed, to ascertain who was or who was not the lawful Pontiff, that inherited the powers conferred by God upon Aaron I need not remind you of the examples of terrible vengeance, inflicted on those, who presumed to disturb the order of the Aaronic Priesthood, or to usurp the ministry which that Priesthood exercised.

If in order to preserve the Priesthood of an imperfect and transitory dispensation in its integrity, and to exclude and punish any intrusion on its prerogatives, God, in his wisdom, laid down certain means by which it was always easy to discern between the rightful and the unjust claimants of the Aaronic Ministry, must we not feel persuaded, that in a dispensation founded on better promises as the Christian Church is, a still greater Providence was exercised by the Saviour, for the purpose of enabling his children, to distinguish between the true inheritors of the Apostolic Ministry and those, who without a just title, might assume its honors and prerogatives. It is obvious that the means appointed by the Saviour for so important an end, must have been external and sensible such as other men could judge of. For if were not such, and if the mere allegation of an internal call sufficed for entering on the Sacred Ministry, then, as, without a miraculous interposition on the part of God, no tribunal could pronounce on the truth or falsehood of the allegation, the Christian sanctuary might, with impunity be invaded by any impostor.

In effect, both Scripture and tradition testify, that as the mysterious powers of the Christian ministry were first imparted in an external visible manner by Christ to his Apostles, so the Apostles transmitted the same by imposition of hands to their successors, who in their turn imparted the sacred deposit by the use of the same rite to those who were to take their places in the sacred Hierarchy. Thus did the Saviour provide for the persevering integrity of the Apostolic ministry, in such a way, that by the uninterrupted lawful succession of Chief Pastors, the College of the Apostles has continued to live in its heirs and representatives, so that, thus, the words of Christ to his Apostles "I am with you all days even to the consummation of the world," have obtained up to the present day their literal and adequate fulfilment.

In truth, it was only in this way, that it would seem to be ordinarily feasible, for the Christian ministry in the ages, which passed away since the time of the Apostles, to inherit, and acquire possession of the great powers and prerogatives conferred by Christ on the Apostles, the first chief Pastors of the Church. For those powers and prerogatives could come only from the Saviour and could be transmitted only through the channel which the Saviour had appointed as the medium, for communicating them to the Successors of the Apostles. The sublime supernatural character of the powers conferred on the Apostolic Ministry St. Paul indicates, as you have already heard, by the exalted epithets he employs, when he designates himself and his fellow-Pastors, "Ministers of Christ," Dispensers of the mysteries of God," and "God's Coadjutors." Human language with all its copiousness could not supply words more expressive of the extraordinary powers attached to the Apostolic Ministry. And as if to intimate by his own example, that the powers conferred first on the chosen twelve, were, in all that regards the sanctification of souls, to extend equally to succeeding Pastors lawfully chosen and inaugurated into the Chief Pastoral office, the wisdom of God arranged, that the grand epithets I have adduced should be claimed and vindicated for himself and the Christian Ministry, not by any of the chosen twelve, but by Paul, who did not belong to that number, and who was introduced into the Apostleship together with Barnabas by being ordained by the Apostles with the imposition of hands, ten years after the Ascension of Christ into Heaven.

The Holy Scriptures in order to point out, that the rite employed in setting apart Paul and Barnabas for the Apostolic Ministry was to be the fixed perpetual medium, for transmitting the powers of the Sacred Ministry to succeeding ages, represent to us Saint Paul himself, as having, by the use of the same rite of the imposition of hands, consecrated Timothy and thus imparted to him those grace and powers of the Sacred Ministry, which were necessary to qualify him to govern as Bishop the Church of Ephesus. Writing to Timothy, 2 Ep. 1 Chap. St. Paul admonishes him to stir up the grace of God, which was in him by the imposition of his hands, and in his 1st. Ep. St. Paul referring to the same rite calls it the imposition of the hands of the Priesthood. That Timothy was to perpetuate the Chief Pastoral office by imparting its powers to succeeding Pastors, in the same way in which he himself had received them from St. Paul, we learn from the Epistles of St. Paul to Timothy. In the second of these letters, St. Paul thus addresses his spiritual child, the newly constituted Bishop of Ephesus. "Thou therefore, my Son, be strong in the grace which is in Christ Jesus: and the things which thou hast heard of me by many witnesses, the same commend to faithful men, who shall be fit to teach others also." In his first Epistle to Timothy, the Apostle had previously instructed Timothy on the great caution and care he should make use of, in selecting candidates for the Sacred Ministry and in the same letter, he warns his beloved Disciple, that any neglect in this important part of his duty, would make him a participater in the guilt of the unworthy Priests, to whom Timothy might culpably have imparted ordination "I charge thee before God, writes the Apostle to Timothy, and before Jesus Christ and the elect angels, that thou observe these things, without prejudice, doing nothing by declining to either side. Impose not hands lightly upon any man, neither be partaker of other men's sins."

(To be continued.)

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

Lectures on Mechanics, by the Rev. Mr. Stephenson.

After the usual examination of the pupils on Thursday the 3d instant, the Lecturer proceeded to explain of the definition of motion. He deemed it necessary that the Pupils should be well acquainted with that definition, in order to understand well the [illegible] gravitation which he was about to explain. Motion as he had previously informed them, simply signified change of place, and it was always proportional to the space over which a body travels: in the calculation of simple motion, no regard had to time, but merely to the space passed over. Thus for example, should one body travel over 5 feet in one second of time, and another body pass over the same space in no less than 5 millions of years, the motion of both would still be the same, since the space passed over was solely to be regarded. Absolute and relative motions had been already explained. Motion might also be considered as rectilinear or curvilinear, the former took place when a body moved in a straight line, and the latter when its course was curved; this sort of motion might be either uniform or variable. Uniform when the body passes over equal parts of space in equal portions of time, and variable when it passes over unequal spaces in equal times.

In uniform motion, the space passed over is always equal to the velocity multiplied by the time, if then a body travels with the velocity of 5 feet per second and move for 7 seconds, we know at once the space passed over to be 35 feet or that the velocity 5 multiplied by 7 the number of seconds gives the space required.

Motion was said to be continuous, when the body moved on in the same path and it was termed reciprocating when the motion was backwards and forwards In the velocity of a body, or the rate at which it travels, we are to consider the quantity of of motion with reference to a given time. Thus for example, if a body be supposed to move uniformly 5 miles per hour, its velocity will be 5 miles per hour And in regard of two bodies in motion, if we suppose one to move one mile per hour, and the other to pass over the same space in half that time, then the velocity of the latter will be reckoned twice as great, because its quantity of motion with regard to time was twice as great By the momentum of a body was to be understood its velocity multiplied into its weight. Both matter and motion were elements of momentum and if you take away either you can no longer calculate momentum. As the velocity or weight varies, so does momentum which always is in proportion to its componont parts; an explanation of these several terms having occupied more than the allotted time the Lecturer concluded by proposing the attraction of gravitation as the subject for the next Lecture.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

To His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop of Edessa, V. A. W B.

My Dear Lord,—As Secretary to the Dwarkanath Testimonial I am directed by the last orders of the Committee to send any proceeds from the sale of the Engraving from his Portrait to the distressed Irish and Scotch, but as these have only realised Co.'s Rs. 15, and the sum is too small to remit, I therefore take it upon myself to place this amount in your Grace's hand, for the use of the Orphanage, where I think it will equally find distressed Irish and Scotch? and where I am sure it will do all the good possible.

With much respect, believe me with all good wishes,

My dear Lord,
Your very obdt. Servt.
H Piddington.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE REASONS OF MY CONVERSION TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH; BY A LATE CLERGYMAN (REV. MR NEWMAN) OF THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION, IN LETTERS TO A FRIEND. FIFTH EDITION. LONDON: JAMES BURNS 1849.

LETTER VIII.

(Continued from our last.)

Another charge that is often brought against us is, that we have acted hastily, without hearing all that was to be said on both sides. It may be so; but the fault cannot be in not hearing all that was to be said on the Anglican side. We may, indeed, have been guilty in not sooner listening to what was said on the other side by Catholics themselves For five, ten, or fifteen years, we may have been most diligently reading, and hearing all that was said and written on Anglicanism. We may have been saying it and writing it ourselves. We may have taken our views of Rome as well as of England almost entirely from Anglicans. Yet when we become convinced that Anglicans are wrong and are about to leave them, we are told we are only considering "one side,"—meaning by that the Catholic side. Nothing, indeed, could possibly satisfy them that we have given their side sufficient consideration, or done justice to it, or understand it, but a final resolution to stay with them. And this they say, although it is notorious and obvious that all our prejudices, all our feelings, all our hopes, our affections, and our interests were all with them from the first. We embraced the High Church theory (God is our witness) with a hearty faith and high hopes, and it crumbled in our grasp We laboured and worked for the Church of England, and trod the round of our duties in it, and it gave way under our feet. Rome had to contend against every possible disadvantage, and won its way simply by the power and attractiveness of truth. Is not this at least a plausible statement to give? Yet scarce one of our old friends will give us credit even for having conscientiously acted in this way, and for being influenced by these motives and considerations. They seem to think it impossible that any one can really think that they are wrong, their theories false, and their position indefensible.

This charge of only reading and hearing on one side comes, too, with a very bad grace from them, many of whom steadily refuse to read or hear what is said on "the other side," and exert their influence and authority to prevent others from reading on any but one side, and that side their own. I know one who forbade a person under his guidance to read a tract on the Anglican controversy against Anglicanism, or any thing on that side at all; and recommended another person to read Dr. Wordsworth's book—a book whose quotations he knew to be falsified, and with whose general principles and tone he had almost as little sympathy as with the writings of Luther,—simply because it opposed Rome. This is one-sidedness indeed. Can it be wondered at, if such persons continue all their lives what they happened to be born? How is it possible that any one being in error could ever escape from error but by a miraculous conversion, if all persons acted on this principle, and in this way? Doubtless it is wrong to seek controversies, and lightly to indulge or encourage dissatisfaction and doubts of the communion in which we have first learnt of God and of Christ. No religious mind could do so. But surely there is such a thing as religious inquiry from religious motives, seriously, solemnly, and as before God. And surely if ever there were a time and circumstances which were like a providential summons to all to inquire, they are the present circumstances and the present time. We did not doubt for doubting's sake; we did not doubt first, that we might believe afterwards; we trusted first; we acted in faith and love, and these brought forth doubts. Such doubts, so sprung, I maintain, are religious doubts, are calls from God; not, indeed, to be lightly or hastily yielded to, but to be solemnly heard, listened to, and if not satisfied, then to be acted upon. If this be not a justifiable way of acting in such a case, then can there be no justifiable way of being converted from error to truth. In the progress towards truth, such persons would oblige us to believe we must be ever acting on wrong principles; the way to right must ever be a wrong way, which is surely absurd.

Another charge that is sometimes made in connexion with this point is, that persons on leaving the Church of England are "acting on their own private judgment." Such a charge exhibits a very great misconception or misuse of the term "private judgment;"—it is to confound it with personal responsibility. Every one must act on his own personal responsibility, whether he stays in the communion in which he was born or leaves it. It must at last be our own personal act, and we are personally responsible for it. To act on "private judgment" in its wrong sense, is to act without due regard to authority in matters of faith or conduct. If a person in deciding on a matter of faith, and choosing the greater authority, is guilty of acting on private judgment, then it is clear that a person cannot act by authority, since he must virtually choose his authority; and to do so according to the use of the word now alluded to, is to act on private judgment. When a person leaves the communion in which he finds himself, because, first, he finds in it no authoritative guidance at all, and is necessarily left entirely to his own choice whether he will belong to two parties which contradict each other on fundamental points; and next, because he considers that the authority of the whole Church—the great, the good, the holy—is decidedly against his communion;—it is ridiculous to tell such an one that he is acting on what is called "private judgment," which, as every one knows, means something quite different. Those who do act on private judgment would tell this same person, that he was acting on the rule of implicit faith, and obedience to human authority.

It is to be feared that many persons deceive themselves in this matter very much. They see the great responsibility of joining the Church of Rome; but they altogether forget the equally great responsibility of upholding the Church of England, if that body be schismatical. A man is almost as much responsible for continuing in schism, when his attention has once been turned to the fact, as he is for making a schism. Can any one think that Dr. Pusey, for example, is not as responsible for the active support he gives to the Church of England, and the fearful charges he makes, or insinuates, against the Roman Catholic Church, as Mr. Newman is for joining himself to the latter? The personal responsibility is the same in both cases. The risk, in my opinion, I need not say, is fearfully greater in the former. "Suppose," it is sometimes said, "you should, after all, be joining a corrupt and apostate Church?" Suppose, I retort, you should, after all, be blaspheming the Church of God, and the Saints, by your fearful charge of "anti-Christian usurpation" and "virtual idolatry?" Let us not deceive ourselves. There is an awful responsibility on both sides. We must steadily contemplate it, awful as it is. A choice we must make. To stand still is to choose. To go back is still more actively to choose; and our choice must leave us all fighting for or against the holy Church of God. Anglicans ought to consider that the Roman and English Churches cannot pursue separate and neutral courses. They are ranked in absolute hostility to each other, both here and in every corner of the earth. That hostility can know no cessation but by the submission of the English claims—such hostility can only be justified by the most extreme necessity. Are Anglicans who think that they are doing in this nothing positive, nothing hostile, by remaining in the English Church—are they prepared to defend, and carry out to all extremes, their active and most miserable conflict? Is there not a fearful responsibility here, lest haply they be found fighting against the Church of God?

Another favourite charge is, that of "deterioration of character" in the converts. I hardly like to speak of this. I can only say that what is called by this name might, with at least equal propriety, be called uncharitable judging and evilspeaking among Anglicans. The most ridiculous and unfounded stories are circulated and believed without a moment's hesitation or examination; and persons seem to feel no sorrow or shame when they discover that they have been circulating falsehoods. The readiness with which the worst stories are implicitly believed, and immediately repeated, is a far worse feature in those among whom it prevails than the reputed deterioration of character among converts. If Anglicans could but know how strange and unaccountable (to use no harsher term) their own conduct and language appear to all around, above, below them, to all but themselves, they would be more charitable to others. As to deterioration of character, if one is to speak as one feels, I can truly say, that nothing has pained me more than certain changes that have come over some whom once I greatly respected. I know men who, in former days, despised reports,—who were far too high-minded to descend to abuse and detraction,—whom I scarce ever heard speak evil of any body,—come in later times to lend themselves to all the idle rumours and evil reports in circulation. I know men who once preached truth, and sought to win alone or chiefly by its power and beauty, come at last to find their best arguments in abuse of Rome and detraction of the converts, not hesitating to assign to their conduct, motives and feelings of the most unworthy kind, that in language utterly at variance with Christian charity and courtesy. In one point, too, we may appeal to their sense of honour and generosity; we cannot defend ourselves, or our defence can never keep pace with their accusations. They have an audience ready to believe any thing they say, and especially against the converts; we can get no hearing, and are suspected even when we speak. They have only to say, mysteriously and with apparent sorrow, "I have heard sad stories of so and so;" and the worst is believed of the unhappy party mentioned, who has no chance of being heard in his defence, and has no friends to take his part. I would therefore entreat Anglicans not to add the sins of slander, rash judgment, and evil-speaking, to the miseries of disunion.

Again, Anglicans often say, "How can you leave a Body in which such holy men as so and so are content to remain? Is not that which is enough for them enough for us?" Surely such persons cannot imagine that they who leave a Body profess thereby to be better than all who remain behind. If they think so, then certainly they can never leave the English Church till they become the most self-righteous Pharisees, and most unworthy members of any Body, either of that they join or that they leave. Such an argument may be of weight when a person has really no opinion of his own, or rather agrees with Dr. Pusey in his opinions; but to speak and act on this sentiment when one's own convictions and feelings are with the holy men who are against Dr. Pusey, and who have left the English Church, is the most extravagant following of a man that can be conceived. The presence of holy men, indeed, on either side (such, that is, whom we deem so), is a fact of weight; but it must be remembered, that we have as holy men, at least, and far more numerous, on our side. Is it not better, if we are to follow men, to follow Mr. Newman with our convictions, than remain with Dr. Pusey against them? These things ought not to be said. They may frighten timid minds, and induce them to believe that they ought to stifle convictions, and the voice of conscience, and it may be the Spirit of God, rather than seem even "to condemn Dr. Pusey." Such language, and it is becoming more frequent, will most justly affix the odious stigma of sectarianism on the party, and will be testimonial to their branding themselves with the name of "Puseyites."

Before I conclude this Letter, I will notice another argument, or rather assertion, that is sometimes used to deter persons from joining the Roman Catholic Church. It is said that those who have joined it are "disappointed." This is not an argument; and, therefore, cannot be answered. It is an assertion, which can only be contradicted. If converts themselves are the best witnesses in this case, I can speak, from a very general acquaintance with them as a class, that in all the instances I have known, the satisfaction felt has been quite beyond all that they expected, or could have imagined. The common expression used by several whom I have known, and who have written without communicating with each other, is, "I feel as if I were in a new world;" and this feeling has not worn off, but has passed into a state of settled thankfulness for the greatness of the blessing experienced. It is remarkable that there have not been more cases of disappointment, arising from mistaken feeling, on a subject of which so little could be known previous to experience; or again, we might not unreasonably have expected cases of relapse, owing to persons having joined the Church on insufficient grounds,—such as a mere preference of system of externals, &c. Such cases would not have surprised any thoughtful person. The fact, however, is as I have said. Amidst the greatest trials, the converts (with not more than one or two exceptions) have experienced the greatest support and joy of heart; and have rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer, as well as to believe.

(To be continued)

FLOWERS OF HEAVEN.

Connexion between Religion and Morality.

CHAPTER XIV.

FRUITS OF MODERATION.—(CONTENTMENT.)

The ancient sages acknowledged, many centuries since, that happiness is not to be found in extremes; that the route of life is bordered with precipices and marshes, and is only safe in the middle path; in a word, that contentment is the source of quiet, of wisdom, and of virtue.

"Not too much of any thing," was the maxim of Chilon, whose aphorisms were written in golden characters on the temple at Delphos: and the sentiment and language were echoed by Socrates. But this maxim, although much admired in theory, was not often reduced to practice by the Greeks, who, although less greedy than the Romans, whose characteristic virtue was frugality, were foolishly fond of glory, and never were satisfied with the measure of it they possessed.

Horace was the minstrel of contentment, among the Latins. "If it be true," said he, "that the most precious marble, or the most brilliant purple, cannot charm away care; if Falernian wines, and Persian perfumes, are equally powerless, why should I wish to build superb palaces, which would cause me to be envied? Why should I exchange my little Sabine farm for treasures which would only increase my anxieties?"

The Holy Spirit itself marks out mediocrity as the only really desirable state. "Give me neither beggary nor riches: give me only the necessaries of life: lest perhaps being filled, I should be tempted to deny, and say —Who is the Lord? or, being compelled by poverty, I should steal, and forswear the name of my God."* This was was the prayer of the wisest of men.

Poverty is, indeed, the solution of many human weaknesses. When hunger gnaws the entrails, conscience is willing to surrender at whatever may appease it; and then are seen apostacies from honour, fidelity, and principle, which rouse the indignation of those who have been deserted. Before determining how far the apostate is blameable, we should first inquire, whether he had not long before felt the pinchings of want,—whether he had not hungered and thirsted through attachment to his cause,—and whether he did not find himself destitute of every thing, at the setting in of the rains and frosts of winter. We have seen some of these abandonments of principle which have awakened in us feelings more of compassion than of anger, so melancholy were their causes! "This writer has sold himself," some rich man may say; "he is a base and venal soul."—No such thing: it was not he that sold himself—it was poverty!

Poverty passes over the soul, as the simoom over the desert; it blasts all its flowers, and dries up all its springs. Thus religion, which knows man, and compassionates the weakness of his nature, does not forbid him to procure for himself an honourable independence; far from it—she excites him to it. Labour, says she to the sluggard, or poverty will come, and seize on you, like an armed man; carefully observe the state of your flocks; mow the grass while it is yet green, and gather the hay of the mountains: when there is no more wood on the hearth, the fire goes out. Then she sets bounds to the thirst of gain by these words, which in one dash depict the satiety engendered by great wealth: "A soul that is full, shall tread upon the honeycomb."†

(To be continued.)

EASTER SUNDAY.

An Ode by Mr. Thos. P. Manuel of Patna.

(For the Bengal Catholic Herald.)

How radiant the dawn, and how bright is the morning,
How cool are the zephyrs, how gentle, the breeze;
Majestic the Sun, the high mountains adoring,
Appears, and exults on the glory he sees.

II.

Oh Joy to Mankind! when the Saviour arising
The Empire of guilt, and of Satan o'er throws,
Oh mercy! the cross nor the Burial despising,
He died for our sins, for our Judgment arose.

III.

The dimple of Joy's on the face of the waters,
A smile on her crystal fair Jordan displays;
While deep in the forest the fair Virgin—daughters
Of Sion have wak'd all the anthem of praise:

* Lib. iii, Od. 1. † Prov. xxx. 8, 9. † Prov. xxvii. 7.

IV.

The Nymphs of the Valley, the Spirit of the Mountain,
The song of the breeze, and the chorus of leaves,
All join the fair Virgins of Zion;—the fountain
Proclaims by its rippling the joy it receives.

V.

Behold of thy Spouse! Oh! he comes to receive thee,
Oh welcome him well, and his message fulfil;
He gave thee all Pow'r o'er thy foes,—and he'll give thee Victorious o'er all he returns to thee still.

Patna, 1851.

Selections.

MISSIONS OF THIBET.

Extracts from a Letter of Rev. Dr. Huc, Apostolic Missioner in China, to the Rev Dr. Etienne, Superior General of Saint Lazarus, at Paris.

SOJOURN AT LASSA.

The morning after our arrival at Lassa, we took a Thibetian guide, and we went through the different quarters of the city in quest of a hired lodging. The houses of Lassa are generally large, consisting of several stories, and roofed with a terrace slightly slanting, in order to let the rain flow off. The exterior is whitewashed with lime and water, except some border lines and the frame-work of the doors and windows, which are of red and yellow. The reformed Buddhists have a special predilection for these colours. They are, as it were, sacred in their eyes, and they are denominated lama colours. The inhabitant of Lassa are accustomed to paint their houses annually, which gives them habitually an admirable air of cleanliness, and they seem always as if recently constructed; but the interior is far from harmonising with the good appearance which they present externally. The apartments are filthy, smoky, foul, and encumbered with furniture and utensils scattered here and there in disgusting confusion. Thibetian houses are, as it were, merely large whitened sepulchres.....true image of Buddhism and all false religions, which are ever careful to gloss over, by sundry dogmatic truths, and sundry moral principles, the corruption and conceit which they conceal.

After a long searching we chose at last a small lodging, which constituted part of a large house containing fifty boarders. Our poor receptacle was in the upper story. It was reached by a staircase of twenty-six wooden steps, without any bannister, and they were so awkward and narrow that the use of both hands and feet were requisite to avoid breaking our necks when mounting. Our apartments consisted of a large square room and a small corridor, which we called a cabinet. The room faced the north-east by a narrow window, furnished with three thick logs, and the ceiling contained a round aperture admitting the light, wind, rain, and snow, and letting out the smoke. The Thibetians have an invention to protect themselves against the cold of winter; it consists of a small pan of baked earthenware, in which they burn argols. When this combustible is lighted, it often emits more smoke than heat, so that there is an advantage in having an aperture; without it, any fire would risk occasioning suffocation by smoke. Hence, however, arose the uncomfortable sensation of an occasional fall of snow or rain on our backs; but when an individual has once led a nomadic life he does not mind such trifles. The furniture of the room consisted in two ox-skins, stretched from right to left on the floor, our fire-pan, two horse saddles, our travelling tent, some old pair of boots, two broken trunks, three torn coats hung on nails, our plaid, covering folded up, and a large stock of dried dung piled up in a corner.

We were at once up to the mark of Thibetian civilisation. The cabinet having a fine oven built with masonry, was our kitchen and store room. We had installed there Samdadchiemba, who had resigned the office of camel-driver, and now united the functions of cook, purveyor, and ostler. Our two white horses were accommodated in a corner of the yard, and rested after their irksome and glorious campaign until an opportunity occurred to hand them over to new owners. The poor brutes were so reduced that we could not in decency expose them for sale until they were got into better condition.

As soon as we had settled our dwelling in order, we spent some time in minutely examining the capital of Thibet and becoming acquainted with its numerous inhabitants. Lassa is not a large city; it is almost not more than two leagues in circumference, and is not encircled like the cities of China with an exclosure of ramparts, it is alleged that such existed formerly, but that they were entirely destroyed in a war which the Thibetians had formerly to maintain against the Indians of Boutan—now-a-days not the slightest vestige of them remains. Outside the suburbs are numerous gardens planted with large trees compassing the city with a beautiful belt of verdure. The principal streets of Lassa are very large, straight, and pretty clean, at least when no rain falls; the suburbs are unutterably filthy and disgusting; the houses, as we have already stated, are generally spacious, lofty, and well-looking; some of them are stone-built, others are built of brick and sometimes of mud; but they are all so neatly white-washed that they all seem of equal value. There is a certain district in the suburbs where the houses are built entirely with the horns of cattle and sheep. These odd edifices are of extreme solidity and present a rather agreeable appearance to the eye; the horns of the cattle being smooth and white, and those of the sheep being black and rough. These strange materials admit a wonderful diversity of combinations and form on the walls an infinite variety of designs. The interstices between the horns are filled with mortar. These are the only houses that are not white washed. The Thibetians have the good taste to leave them in their natural state without endeavouring to add to their wild and fantastic beauty. It is superfluous to remark that the inhabitants of Lassa consume a fair share of beef and mutton; their horn-houses are an incontestable proof of it. The Buddha temples are the most remarkable buildings of Lassa; we shall not describe them here, as almost all of them nearly resemble those we have hitherto had occasion to allude to. The only remark we have to make is that here they are larger and richer, and covered with greater profusion of gilding.

The palace of the Talé-lama is every way deserving of the celebrity it enjoys throughout the whole world. On the north side of the city, and not more than one quarter of an hour's distance at most, there is a rocky mountain somewhat elevated and conical shaped. It rises in the middle of this large valley like an islet above an immense lake. This is named Buddha-la, that is to say, mountain of Buddha, divine mountain. On this spacious foundation prepared by nature, the adorers of Talé-lama have built a magnificent palace, where their living divinity resides in flesh and bone. This palace consists of a group of several temples of different sizes and beauty. The central one is four stories high and commands all the others; it terminates in a dome entirely covered over with gilt plates, and surrounded by a large peristyle, the columns of which are likewise gilt. It is there the Talé-Lama has fixed his residence. From the top of this elevated sanctuary he can contemplate on days of great solemnities his countless adorers in motion on the plain and coming to prostrate themselves at the foot of the divine mountain. The second-rate palaces around the great temple serve as residences for a host of Lamas of every order, who are continually occupied in the service of the living Buddha and paying their court to him. Two handsome avenues lined with large trees lead from Lassa to Buddha-la; there you always see a great number of foreign pilgrims dropping between their fingers their long Buddha beads, and court Lamas clad in magnificent dresses and mounted on horses richly caparisoned. Great activity prevails continually round the environs of Buddha-la; but, in general, all there are grave and silent. Religious thoughts seem to engross their souls.

The demeanor of the population of the interior of the city is of quite a different character; they vociferate, push forward, and crush each other, while each individual is busily engaged in making bargains. Trade and devotion attract unceasingly to Lassa a great number of foreigners, and make this city the rendezvous of all Asiatic people. The streets are constantly choked with pilgrims and merchants, exhibiting a wonderful variety of physiognomies, costumes, and idioms. This immense multitude is mostly shifting and daily renewing. The resident population of Lassa is composed of Thibetians, Penoups, Kalotis, and Chinese. The Thibetians belong to the large family that are usually designated by the name of Mongolian race. Their hair is black, thin beard, small sunken eyes, high cheek bones, short nose, wide mouth, and thin lips. Their complexion is slightly bronzed; however, you find among the elevated class as white countenances as in Europe. The Thibetians are of middle stature; they add the strength and vigour of the Tartars to the agility and suppleness of the Chinese. They delight in gymnastic exercises and especially the dance; their step is balanced and extremely light. When they go through the streets they keep constantly humming prayers and popular airs; their character is frank and generous. They are brave in war, and front danger courageously; they are likewise religious, but less credulous than the Tartars. They have no very high notions of cleanliness; nevertheless they are fond of luxury and sumptuous dresses.

The Thibetians do not shave the head; they allow their hair to float over their shoulders and merely point it occasionally with scissors. The fashionable people of Lassa have within a few years since adopted the Chinese way of trimming them, and then securing in the tresses golden trinkets ornamented with precious stones and pieces of coral. On festival days they wear a large red hat, very like the Biscayan cap. A large cloak, clasped on the right side by four hooks, and tightened round the waist by a red sash, completes the simple and yet not ungraceful costume of the Thibetians. They usually hang from their sash a bag of yellow taffeta, containing their inseparable wooden bowl, and two small, oval-shaped and richly-worked purses. These contain nothing, and only serve for decoration.

The Thibetian women wear a dress somewhat similar to that of the men; over a cloak they add a short gown bedizened with sundry colours; they part their hair into two tresses which they let hang over their shoulders. The women of an inferior class wear a small yellow bonnet, not unlike the cap of liberty that was worn under the French republic. The ladies of highest rank wear no other head ornament than an elegant and graceful crown made of fine pearls. The Thibetians submit in their toilette to a usage or rather an incredible regulation which is unexampled over the whole world.

(To be continued.)

ROCHFORT CLARKE AND CARDINAL WISEMAN.

Our readers, of all classes and opinions, will have perused, with feelings of indignation to which it would be difficult to give utterance, some passages of the speech delivered at the Oxford county meeting, by a person named George Rochfort Clarke. He is in the position of a gentleman, as was Sloane the barrister. The meeting in question was got up, like other recent meetings, to protest against the "Papal aggression," and was attended by various gentlemen of rank and consequence. The Marquis of Blandford, the Earl of Abingdon, Colonel North, the President of St John's College, and the Rev. Charles Marriott, were present. The bigotry and nonsense uttered by the various speakers was much the same as we have had to chronicle in the reports of other meetings of the same kind; but the speech delivered by this Mr. Clarke, before the assembled lords and Clergymen of the first University in the world, has certainly astonished us. It has been reserved for Oxford to put the climax to the vulgarity, the cruelty, and the wickedness which Protestant England has exhibited to the world. Clarke, after a good deal of legal argument and declamation about Cardinal Wiseman's being born at Seville, said, "that seeing the way in which the Confessional brings the Catholic Priest into contact with the female portion of his community, he (Mr. Clarke) thought it just possible that Dr. Wiseman might be a Spanish nun!" Such is the report given in the Chronicle. We ask our readers' pardon for quoting these words, which we place on record that the world may have another specimen of the temper of mind which Protestantism engenders: that good Protestants may know what sort of men are they who hallod them on to attack the Holy Catholic Church—how false, how mean, how impure! It is fair to add, that at these words the courtesy of Oxford was certainly startled and revolted—it was going a little too far, even for the heated and angry men who composed the assembly. Cries of "Shame! shame!" resounded through the room, and Clarke was not allowed to continue his speech. But we have still to lay before our readers the most painful part of the business—namely, the correspondence which has followed, and to which we give the amplest publicity that we are able. May the malignity of this lost and wretched man, degraded and sunk by a false creed beneath, we will not say the dignity of a gentleman, but the common feelings of humanity, serve to awaken some salutary reflections in the minds of those honourable though mistaken men who found themselves on the same platform with him.

For Catholics, such occurrences we can safely say, serve to strengthen their faith. It is encouraging to find the opposite party make use of such implements of attack, the choice weapons of the spirit of falsehood and impurity. The eminent and illustrious Ecclesiastic and the venerable and innocent lady* whom Mr. George Rochfort Clarke has thought fit to assail, will doubtless have their consolation. "Blessed are ye when men speak evil of you falsely" for my name's sake." Any further comment is needless; and we throw from us with disgust the loathsome reptile whose presence we have felt it necessary to notice:—

* The late Mail announced the death of the Mother of Cardinal Wiseman in Italy, at the house of her Daughter who is married to an Italian Prince.

[Correspondence.]

We (Daily News) have been requested to publish the following letters, which have passed between Cardinal Wiseman and Mr. Rochfort Clarke, relative to the speech of the latter at the Oxford county meeting:—

"35, Golden-square, Jan. 4, 1851.

"Sir—A letter in this day's Chronicle, signed 'Gentilis Homo,' has called my attention to some expressions in your speech at the Oxford county meeting, on the 2nd instant, respecting my birth, which I cannot with decency transcribe.

"I have for the last two months borne silently much calumny and railing against myself; and I am ready to go on enduring, personally, more still, for what I believe to be the cause of God. But I cannot allow to pass unnoticed any slander of one to whom I owe all good in life, and whom God's commandments enjoin me to honour, and consequently to shield from dishonour. Although nearly an octogenarian, my venerable parent, against whom you have publicly uttered a most revolting insinuation, retains still full possession of every faculty, and as keen a sense of the honour due to an unblemished life as others do in earlier years. After having passed her days with the respect and esteem of all that know her, unless the kindness of friends shall keep her in ignorance of the blow you have struck at her honour, God only knows what the effect of it may be upon her mind or her life. As it has been the first, so it may prove a last and fatal stroke.

"I therefore earnestly and solemnly call upon you, as a Christian, as a gentleman, and as a man, publicly to retract and apologise for the unfounded imputations which you have cast upon my parent's honor in your speech at Oxford.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"N. Card. Wiseman.

"Rochfort Clarke, Esq."

"Spring Garden-terrace, Jan. 6, 1851.

"Sir—A gentleman, representing himself as Mr. Henry Bagshawe, and your attorney, delivered to me in the afternoon of this January 6th, a letter from you, dated January 4th.

"I stated at the Oxford county meeting that, by our ancient common law, it was high treason for a subject to introduce into this kingdom a foreign power; that our King, Edward the First, ordered one of his subjects to be drawn and hanged, according to that common law, for having published a Pope's Bull, excommunicating another English subject; that Blackstone and Coke both declare this to be the common law; that it is a misdemeanor at common law for a subject to enter into the service of a foreign prince, &c., without the Queen's license, even in time of peace, but if he enters into the service of the Queen's enemy it is high treason. Such being the common law, it became important to consider whether any person who took part in the Pope's recent aggressions was an alien, or British subject, for what might be an offence in a subject might be none in an alien. I then said that you were sometimes represented as a Spanish alien; sometimes as born in Spain of Irish parents; sometimes as being descended from an Irish grandmother and Spanish grandfather; but that I had not the least knowledge of any circumstance relating to your birth or parentage. It is no fault of mine that your injudicious friends, 'Gentilis Homo,' and the writer of the article in the Morning Chronicle of Jan. 6th, whilst, by omitting the words of my legal argument and giving a couple of sentences, contrived to suit their purpose of dealing out injustice to me. They have held me up for a little while to the disapprobation of their readers, have at the same time placed you under the disagreeable necessity of appealing to me to relieve you from their imputations, not mine. But, though I am in no way bound to interfere, and have nothing to retract or apologise for, as you seem to infer, and though from your use of those terms, as also 'slander,' of which I have not been guilty—nor 'revolting insinuation,' nor 'unfounded imputations,' &c., &c., I am very apprehensive you do not intend to make a generous use of this letter—and, though such a letter was put into my hands by your attorney, yet I will cheerfully do my best to neutralise the folly of your unjust and hasty friends. I therefore assure you that I never intended to make any insinuation against your mother, as you seem to suppose. On the contrary, my object was to show that we none of us knew anything good or bad about your birth or parentage, except that you were supposed to be a Spaniard.

"But I will do more to assist you against the Chronicle—I will publish my speech so as to be most satisfactory, according to my judgment, to your feelings on this point. And if you will send me a short letter to explain your birth and parentage, and state whether you are a subject of Queen Victoria or not—and if I find your letter of such a character as to justify me in doing so, I will add it to my pamphlet, and afford you this opportunity of placing your birth and parentage truly before the public which we, Englishmen, are naturally anxious to have explained." See the postscript on the other side.—I am Sir, your obedient servant,

"G. ROCHFORT CLARKE.

"Cardinal Wiseman."

"P.S.—(Jan. 7.)—I sent a letter very much to the above effect to the editor of the Morning Chronicle, on January 4th, in answer to the disgraceful letter of 'Gentilis Homo.' I have waited till this morning to see if it would appear; but the editor, with unheard-of injustice, not only has not inserted it, but had it in his hands long before he published his false leading article carrying on the attack against me, making the malice more apparent.—Tablet.

SINGAPORE.

The interior of our Island appears to have been in a most disturbed state for several days past, owing to an active persecution having broken out against the Chinese converts to the Roman Catholic Church, who are found scattered over the island as planters, and whose numbers are steadily increasing. A very slight pretence would appear to have been laid hold of, for putting in practice a general sacking and pillaging of the plantations belonging to the Christian Chinese, and for carrying off individuals and holding them to ransom at large sums. These proceedings are generally ascribed to the influence, more or less openly exerted of the Tau Tae Hoé, and probably of the other Secret Societies, from whose ranks the Christian converts are withdrawn, and whose power and influence is, of course, diminished in proportion to the success of the Roman Catholic Missionaries. Besides withdrawing members from these Secret Societies, the extensive conversion of the Chinese in the interior has had the effect of placing everywhere throughout the Island, men who are subject to influences adverse to the interests of the Societies, who are thus deprived of that complete immunity from surveillance which constitutes one of the sources of their power. With these Chinese converts disseminated throughout the islands, the Hoés can no longer hold their meetings, or execute sentence on refractory or defaulting members, with the same security which they once enjoyed that there will be no spy upon their proceedings. This it is which no doubt has led to such a general attack upon the Christian Chinese throughout the length and breadth of the island, and it will be very difficult as long as this feeling lasts to restore anything like security and order. The Secret Societies are no doubt determined to make a strong effort to destroy the influence of the missionaries and to deter the members of these Societies from deserting them for the Christian Hoé, as it called. To those converts who apply for protection to the heads of these Societies, the answer is—return to the Society and you will be safe. It will probably therefore be necessary that some prompt measures be taken by the Government to put a stop for the present, and also for the future to these lawless proceedings. The present police force is avowedly unequal to cope with this outbreak in addition to discharging its usual duties. It will be necessary to augment the force assigned to the rural districts, but to prevent this becoming too burdensome on the Municipal Funds, we would again reiterate the suggestion that there should be two or three small Military stations in the interior of the island, say at Changie, Bukit Timah and Keangie. The sepoys stationed there we would not employ as police peons, or in any other unusual duty, but we should expect that the very fact of their being so near at hand to assist the ordinary police, in the event of any serious disturbance of the peace, would contribute very much to ensure the continued maintenance of order. We have heard no objections stated to this proposal which are of any weight or founded upon any good grounds, and we have the system already in operation at Malacca. Why it should not be tried here we know not. If it would undermine the discipline of an officer or a sepoy, to be detached for a month to Bukit Timah on out station duty, we should be very much inclined to doubt whether that officer or sepoy is worth his salt, and to recommend his being got quit as soon as possible as a decidedly bad bargain. The plan is worth trial at all events, and as it may save the Municipal funds from being altogether swamped, we would recommend the Municipal Committee to take it into their serious consideration, and if it finds favor in their eyes, to press its adoption with higher authorities.—Overland Singapore Free Press, March 5.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC MEASURES.

The course which the debates on this subject will take was last night pointed out with sufficient clearness. It is not difficult to foresee that, in the House of peers, Lord Stanly will urge the Premier's reluctant colleagues farther than they are anxious to go. Lord Lansdowne's temperate reference to the disputed question would do credit to his judgment if he were not independent of his party. Mr. Roebuck, in vindicating the act of the Pope, took a position which we have held to be untenable; but ministers must expect to hear again and again the exposures which he made of their utter inconsistency with all their former professions. Lord John Russell as might have been expected, met the criticisms which had been pronounced on his policy with vague generalities, and with promises of maintaining religious toleration. To prove the sincerity of his declaration, or to illustrate the distinct meaning which the Prime Minister of England attaches to the rights of conscience and to civil equality, we regret to say that he condescended publicly to adopt the mean and malignant interpretation by which his supporters have aggravated, in trying to extenuate, the most offensive phrase of his notorious letter. If it were his object to protest against political encroachment, what had 'superstitious mummeries' to do with the matter? And if the provocation was an excuse for the error of introducing an insult to religious opinion, who but the Roman Catholics would naturally have been the victims? That they were victims is obvious to common sense, and has been universally felt by themselves. But Lord John Russell says that he referred to a party in his own Church, and he seems to think that he has excused himself. Yet, if he has a right to [illegible] a party in his own Church, is he justified in his offensive language to the Roman Catholics? But his defence only proves his perverse misunderstanding of the point at issue, without relieving him from that part of the charge which he is anxious to disavow. He intended to insult 'a party in his own Church'—he did insult the Church which he now wishes to conciliate; and insults now mainly intended as much are sometimes not the least offensive. It is well that he will now have opportunities of hearing some explanation of the principles of freedom, which he has so long talked about without imbibing their spirit.—Chronicle.

FATAL EXPLOSION.

Yesterday at Manchester a very shocking and fatal explosion took place in springfield-lane, Salford by which Mr. J. Wainwright Hodgetts, a manufacturing chemist, whose attainments had secured him a somewhat honourable name in the scientific world, was killed and another man very seriously injuried:—

The works in Springfield-lane, belong to Mr. White, inventor and patentee of a new description of gas from naphtha and water, called hydrocarbon gas. The gas-works are situate at Southport, but the residuum obtained in the manufacture, which till recently had been sold as waste, had been discovered to be capable of very profitable employment—three products being obtained from it consisting of a highly purified gas, a superior quality of turpentine, and a description of oil. The Springfield-lane works have been established for the purpose of converting this residum into these valuable products, and had been in operation only four days, under the management and direction of Mr. Hodgetts. These works consisted of a shed, in which were three retorts or purifiers heated by furnaces having cisterns connected with them by means of copper pipes. Mr. Hodgetts was engaged in inspecting the operation at one of the retorts, when the mass of combustible matrials suddenly exploded, and threw his body to a distance of 15 or 16 yards; a portion of the naptha which burst instantly into flames, striking him in the face and frightfully burning and disfiguring him. The burning materials destroyed part of the roof of the shed, and the other two retorts were also set on fire and exploded. A labourer, named Francis Gallaghan, was the first person who went to the assistance of Mr. Hodgetts, and he succeed in extinguishing the fire, which had taken hold of his clothes, but the unfortunate gentleman was quite dead, his face, chest, and lower extremities being nearly reduced to a cinder. A man named Howarth, who was at one of the other retorts, was so badly burnt about the shoulders and one arm, that it was found necessary to remove him to the Royal Infirmary, where he now lies in a dangerous state. The mass of naphtha in the retorts burst into flames, and set fire to the building, and though two fire engines came into play as quickly as possible they were found to be almost useless, the only means of extinguishing the flames from the naphtha being by filling up the retorts with sand, bricks, and other materials, which were thrown upon the fiercely burning fire by labourers. The flames had approached, at the time of their extinction, very nearly to a reserve tank containing 400 gallons of naphtha, which would probably have produced still more disastrous consequences to the neighbourhood had it taken fire. The explosion is supposed to have resulted from a leakage in the coppar pipe connecting the retort with the receiving pan, which is some way ignited, and communicated with the contents of the retort.—Manchester Journal.

KING DAHOMEY'S ARMY OF AMAZONS.

It is rarely that Europeans are called upon to believe in the existence of amazons,—fighting women prepared to do battle on all around, the terror of the neighbouring tribes, dressed in the attire of male soldiers, armed muskets and swords. These sable ladies perform prodigies of valour, and not unfrequently, by a fortunate charge, save the honour of the male soldiers, by bearing down all before them, discovering themselves to the astonished and abashed prisoners to be women, exceeding their coadjutors in cruelty and all the stronger passions.

Excited by the hopes of reward, the evil passions of man are fearfully developed in Dahomey. Blood-money is the sure reward of valour, the price of blood the only fee; and it matters not if the prisoner is brought alive to the monarch, as his reeking head is almost equally valuable. Without a trophy, such as a prisoner or a head, the soldier had better have been killed; disgrace, and often cruelest punishment, follow to the defaulters of either sex.

There is not a more extraordinary army in the known world than that of the military nation of Dahomey. The nucleus of the national power, the throne, is occupied at the will of the militant people, who claim an annual war as a birthright. If, from want of courage, or any other insufficient reason, the monarch dares to dispute the will of his people, he, who could by serving the vitiated appetites of his soldiers have taken the lives of any, high or low, is as surely dethroned and murdered.

In speaking of the two armies, let not the sensualist imagine that a Dahoman campaign is disgraced by a freedom it would almost be natural to suppose to belong to so curiously disposed an army, half male, half female. On the contrary, the latter are in charge of eunuchs, officered by their own sex, and scorn the softer allurements of their nature. To use their own words, "they are men, not women! their nature is changed! they will conquer or die!" Such expressions could not be openly used, even as mere boasts, by women standing in a jealous position, emulating the most daring acts and achievements of man, unless fundamently true; and with the certainty of being openly contradicted, and brought to shame, by their fellow-soldiers of the opposite sex. Such then are the amazons, in whose chastity we may believe, when we bear in mind that the extreme exercise of one passion will generally obliterate the very sense of the others. The amazons, while indulging in the excitement of the most fearful cruelties, forget the other desires of our fallen nature. Superstition assists in the preservation of the chastity of this most singular army. The amazons are accommodated within the precincts of the harem walls, and when abroad share the honour of royal wives. The bell announces to the traveller that he must not gaze on them; and thus they have not much opportunity of joining in conversation with the opposite sex. On the thresholds of the royal portals a charm is set of so determined a nature as to render enceinte the offender religiously believing its existence. The frail amazon not infrequently sickens, and confesses the seducer's name, though fully aware that the decapitation of herself and her lover is the immediate result.—Journal of Commander Forbes, R. N.

PRAYER IN SPAIN FOR ENGLAND'S CONVERSION.

TO THE REV. JOHN B. CUTHBERT, RECTOR OF THE ENGLISH COLLEGE OF ST. GEORGE, SANLUCAR DE BARRAMEDA, ANDALUCIA, SPAIN.

Dublin, Feb. 5th, 1851.

Rev. Dear Sir,—With delight and admiration I have read your letter, addressed to me in the Tablet. It consolingly fills a void which I have long felt in my heart, I have gained associates in France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Portugal, and other more distant countries, for the enterprise of England's conversion, but I have not been able to establish any footing in Spain. This I have particularly wished for, since reading the animating and beautiful account given of the state of Catholicity in Spain by Cardinal Wiseman, after his visit to Seville a few years ago. At length I behold a grand movement in Spain, excited by your truly patriotic zeal, and one the more gratifying to me, because I have had nothing to do with exciting it, except as far as my preaching the crusade to the Irish may have suggested the thought to you. With most cordial brotherly affection do I, in the name of the holy army in Ireland, embrace and welcome into our ranks these new confederates in Catholic Spain. They are to me like an unexpected and most powerful reinforcement coming in sight precisely in the moment of our greatest need. The Catholics of England and Ireland have been standing their ground during a long contest of three centuries, against repeated furious assaults from the opposite powers. Just now the enemy seems to have gathered all his remaining strength—to have brought up into action all his troops of reserve, to make one grand effort to overthrow the lines and entrenchments of God's Church, which, however, has stood this shock like the former ones, unmoved, and we see the adversaries on the point of being beaten back again in confusion.

I am now imploring the Irish people not allow this crisis to pass unimproved; to take this occasion to cease acting merely on the defensive, and to advance now in pursuit of the broken columns of the foe. You will see by the letter from me to the Tablet, which appears in the same number as yours, what I mean by all this military language, and my own use of it is the best way to intimate my full acceptance of your apology for the use of the like terms. I have been waiting in suspense to see whether the great occasion will be seized. I am not the commander of the forces; I only come to Ireland to beg help. It is for the Prelates of the Church to judge in their wisdom what has to be done, and for me to acquiesce in obedience. The appearance of your new army of allies may, I am hoping, decide them in favour of giving the word of command, that Ireland may rise as one man, and take up the weapons of prayer and holiness, and, strong in God, rush on to the conquest of England. It is because I feel I possess not the proper lawful authority to command the movement of the forces that I do not myself suggest any particular form of confraternity for this enterprise, nor take up with such as others have, like you, adopted for particular battalions, as I may say. Go on with that beautiful plan which you have traced out for the Spaniards. Any plan of the kind will have my cordial sympathy; and the variety will do no harm, though the great point is that the whole Catholic world should be moved to one united effort.—I am, dear Rev. Sir, your grateful affectionate servant and brother in Jesus Christ,

IGNATIUS OF ST. PAUL, Passionist.

Formerly the Hon'ble Lord Spencer.

CARDINAL WISEMAN AND THE CONGREGATED TRADES OF LIMERICK.

Mr. O'Sullivan, Secretary to the Congregated Trades of Limerick, has been honoured with the following beautiful reply from his Eminence Cardinal Wiseman to the truly admirable address from that body:—

"TO THE CONGREGATED TRADES OF THE CITY OF LIMERICK.

"Dear Friends and Fellow Catholics—Accept my sincere thanks for your warm-hearted and generous address. The Catholics of England could not for a moment doubt of the genuine sympathy of their brethren in Ireland. The unity in which our holy religion binds us together, making us but parts of the same body, the Catholic Church would not permit one portion of that living structure either to rejoice or to be afflicted, without all the rest becoming partakers of their joy or sorrow. Each of those has been our lot. The goodness of our common Father, the Vicar of Christ on earth, has bestowed upon his grateful children in England a welcome and cherished gift, in the restoration of their Ecclesiastical Hierarchy; but the misapprehension, complete as it has been unexpected, of the objects and nature of this great measure, by many of our fellow-[illegible] to my fellow-subjects, has led, no doubt, to much distress in many, and has caused affliction to us all. But from all parts of the Church we have received assurances of the deepest interest felt for us and our sacred cause; and the prayers of our brethren in many countries have served to assure us how really the establishment of a Catholic Hierarchy in England is considered as an important and most blessed work, and how well we may bear with some present affliction in compensation for it.

"It was therefore but natural that Catholic Ireland should even go beyond other countries in warm and generous feelings for us. Your city, too, so eminently Catholic, so constant in the Faith, is naturally among the foremost to avow them.

"In my own name, and in that of my fellow-Catholics, I assure you that we most highly prize them, and pray God to requite them with His choicest blessings.

"As to the kind offers which you make of shelter in any possible case of future oppression, whilst I most sincerely thank you for the generous feelings they display, I beg to assure you that in spite of the interested exertions lately, and in part successfully, made to awaken religious bigotry, the heart of the English people is too sound to allow itself to be carried away to the extremes contemplated in your kind proposal. And no greater proof of this can be desired than our experience of the people's conduct. 'I dwell in the midst of my people in peace,' and so, thank God, do all our Clergy; nor can we desire more protection from our brethren than that of their united and fervent prayers.

"Begging Almighty God to bless you and your families, I am your affectionate servant in Christ, "N. CARD. WISEMAN.

"London, January 10th, 1851."

DR. M'HALE.

Our readers are aware that Manchester has been visited by Dr. M'Hale. The following details of this visit are from a local paper:—

"The object of the visit of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam was, we believe, purely ministerial—to preach the annual sermons on behalf of the day and Sunday schools attached to the church of St. John the Evangelist, in Salford. Whether it was, that, taking into account the 'present crisis,' he was expected to allude to the all-important question of the papal aggression, we know not, but certes his name drew such a congregation to the church, on the morning and evening of Sunday, as has never hither. to assembled within the walls. Both Romanists and Protestants (Churchmen and Dissenters) alike crowded the church. Whatever the expectations indulged in, however, all allusion to exciting topics was eschewed—the two subjects on which he had been announced to preach—viz., on 'Good Works,' and on 'Education,' forming entirely the subjects of his discourses. The amount of the collections made after the two sermons reached the sum of £156 1s. 11d. The day after an address of welcome and sympathy from the Roman Catholic Irish residents of Manchester and Salford was presented to the archbishop, who, in reply, thus alluded to the present agitation in England, and the letter of Lord J. Russell:—

'Independently of the sympathy that binds us all together as members of the same body, under our common head, the Pope, we should indeed be ungrateful were we not to proffer to English Catholics the assurance of our making common cause with them in repelling all aggression on their civil and religious liberty. A statesman—I should have said a minister—who allowed our people to starve in thousands, with such vast resources at his disposal, has been so infatuated as to insult our religion in a manner that would have disgraced the most rabid fanatic; and then to threaten with pains and penalties the distinguished ecclesiastics whom the Pope has appointed to govern and feed their flocks, in the sees which he has defined for the exercise of their spiritual jurisdiction. Should the menaces of the Prime Minister be embodied in the form of any penal enactment affecting your liberties, the Catholics of Ireland will feel, and not fail to manifest their feelings, as if the blow were aimed at the destruction of their own. Accept the tribute of my deepest gratitude for such a welcome, and the assurance that I will not easily forget the kind reception I have met with from the Irish Catholics, lay and clerical, of Manchester and its vicinity.'—Manchester Courier.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 18.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, May 3, 1851.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

4TH WEEK—4TH WEDNESDAY.

(The Archbishop's Sermon concluded.)

Thus then the Holy Scriptures clearly intimate, in the several instances I have adduced, that the Divine Founder of the Christian Church had from its very beginning provided, in an admirable manner, for the uninterrupted transmission by lawful ordination, of all the great powers of the Apostolic Ministry. In this wonderful economy it has been effected, that as the Apostles, if questioned as to the title or origin of the mysterious powers of the Hierarchy which they claimed and exercised, could vindicate their authority at once and conclusively, by referring to the commission they had received from Christ, and as Christ could at once establish his authority, as the great Pontiff of the New and Eternal Testament, constituted by his Eternal Father, with the solemnity of an oath never to be repented of, a High Priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedech, as I repeat it, Christ could thus at once demonstrate his right, to confer on his Ministers, the dispensers of his Mysteries and the Coadjutors of God in the sanctification of souls, all the supernatural prerogatives attached by him to the Apostolic Ministry, so too, at the present day after the lapse of eighteen centuries, can the Catholic Hierarchy, by means of its unbroken succession from the Apostolic age, trace its claim to the rightful possession of all the Chief Pastoral prerogatives, which Christ conferred on the first Pastors, whom he himself had called and ordained. The great fact of this unbroken succession may be proved as easily as any other important historical occurrence and by a similar process. In profane history, for example that of England, the very title or name of the Sovereign brings us back to the first King of that name who swayed the British sceptre. Thus William the Fourth's name brings us back to 1066, the reign of the first William. So in Church history Pius the Ninth's name brings us back to the year 142 the time of Pius the first.

From the second century allow me to conduct you to the seventh century of the Church and to lay before you the sentiments expressed in that age, respecting the successor of St. Peter, by St. Columbanus, a Holy and learned Irishman, who was then Abbot of Luxien in France. His testimony suffices to prove that at that period the Churches of France and Ireland were unanimous in their recognition of the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff.

The evidence respecting the supremacy of St. Peter's successor, cannot be better illustrated, than by referring to the letter of St. Columbanus on the celebrated question of the Three Chapters. The honourable appellations of "Most illustrious Head of all the Churches of all Europe," of "Most exalted Prelate," and of "Pastor of Pastors," are those, which the Saint employs in the last mentioned epistle, to designate the Roman Pontiff. It is his glory, Columbanus declares, on this occasion, that he belongs to a Church which, though placed at the extremity of the earth, never admitted any error contrary to the doctrine of the Gospel, or of the Apostles. "For," says he, "among the Irish, there is no Jew, no heretic, no schismatic; but the Catholic faith, such as it was delivered, by the predecessors of your Holiness, continues unshaken among them. For, we are bound to the Chair of Peter: it is that Chair, which renders Rome, otherwise, indeed, great, eminent and illustrious with us. By the Apostles, Peter and Paul, you are become almost celestial, and Rome is the Head of the universe and of all Churches."*

From the seventh let us pass to the 12th century of the Church and mark the admirable analogy which so obviously exists between the testimony of St. Columbanus in the 7th and St. Bernard in the 12th century on the Supreme Authority of the successor of St. Peter. If the beautiful passage I am about to read for you, could receive encreased lustre and strength, it would derive both from the circumstance, that it is taken from the learned Treatise on the See of St. Peter, which has been just published by Mr. Allies a recent distinguished Convert, who has proved his sincerity not only by his writings, but if possible still more conclusively, by the extraordinary temporal sacrifices he has generously made for the sake of the truth.

"† May we not, then, sum up the whole belief of the Church concerning that living power which her Lord has put at her centre, in the words of one who has been called the last of the Fathers, who at least in his day was loved and honoured by all who themselves were worthy of love and honour? Thus speaks S. Bernard to that monk who had been his own spiritual child, but was become his father, as holding the See of Peter; and in him speaks a countless multitude of Holy Doctors, Saints, and Martyrs, who have had no other home, hope, or comfort, but in the Church of God, who but carried on what they had inherited, a perpetual living tradition. Thus he interprets S. Augustine: "This is the Rock against which the proud gates of hell prevail not."

"Come, let us inquire yet more diligently who you are, that is, what person you, for a time, sustain in the Church of God. Who are you? a great Priest, the Supreme Pontiff. You are chief of the Bishops, heir of the Apostles, in primacy Abel, in government Noah, in patriarchate Abraham, in order Melchizedec, in dignity Aaron, in authority Moses, in judgment Samuel, in power Peter, in unction Christ. You are he to whom the keys are delivered, to whom the sheep are entrusted. Others indeed there are who keep the door of heaven, and are shepherds of flocks, but you have inherited both names above the rest, as in a more glorious, so in a different way. They have each their several flocks assigned to them, while to you singly all are entrusted as one flock. And not only of the sheep, but of all the shepherds you are the only Shepherd. Ask you whence I prove this? By the word of the Lord. For to whom I say, not of Bishops, but even of Apostles, were all the sheep intrusted so absolutely, and without distinction? 'Peter, if thou lovest Me, feed My Sheep.' Which sheep? the people of this or that city, or region, or specified empire? My sheep, He saith. To whom is it not plain that He did not designate some, but assign all? nothing is excepted, where nothing is distinguished. And perhaps the rest of his fellow-disciples were present, when, by committing them to one, He commended unity to all in one flock, and one shepherd, according to that 'My dove, My beautiful, My perfect is but one.' Where is unity, there is perfection. The other men have not perfection, but division, in receding from unity. Hence it is that others received each their own people, knowing the sacrament. Finally, James, who seemed to be a pillar of the Church, was contented with Jerusalem alone, yielding up to Peter the whole. But well was he there placed to raise

* The passage here adduced demonstrates, that, neither Pelagianism nor any other heresy had ever corrupted the purity of the Christian faith in Ireland. For, with so important a circumstance, Columbanus could not have been unacquainted. Had Columbanus the least reason to entertain a doubt of the accuracy of his assertion, it is not possible, that, in an epistle, which he knew must have attracted a good deal of public attention, he could have ventured to speak so confidently as he does, in the passage which is referred to here. Indeed, had Pelagianism ever prevailed among the professors of Christianity in Ireland, some mention of it would doubtless occur in the numerous Canons, which the Pastors of the Irish Church enacted. And yet, they are wholly silent on the subject. I may here also, remark, that Pelagius was a native of Britain. That gius quarrelled with Jerome at Rome, A. D. 405. The foundation of the Monastery at Bangor is assigned by Ware, Harris, and Archdall, to A. D. 551; by Usher, to the same year, or to A. D. 559; by the Annals of Innisfallen, to A. D. 558; and by the Four Masters, to A. D. 552. Doctor Lanigan assigns it to the year 559.—Church History of Ireland by Archbishop Carew.

† See of St. Peter, by Thomas William Allies, M. A. London &c. &c.

up seed to his dead Brother, when that Brother was slain. For he was called the brother of the Lord. Moreover, when the brother of the Lord gives way, what other would intrude himself on the prerogative of Peter?

"Therefore, according to your canons, others have been called to a part of your solicitude, but you to the fullness of power. The power of others is conferred within certain limits; yours is extended even over those who have received power over others. Can you not, if fitting cause exist, shut heaven to a Bishop, depose him from the Episcopate, even deliver him to Satan? Therefore does your privilege stand to you unshaken, as well in the keys which are given you, as in the sheep which are entrusted to you. Hear another thing which no less confirms to you your prerogative. The disciples were in the ship, and the Lord appeared on the shore, and, what was cause of greater delight, in His risen Body. Peter, knowing that it is the Lord, casts himself into the sea, and thus came to him while the rest arrived in the ship. What meaneth that? It is a sign of the one only Priesthood of Peter, by which he received not one ship only, as the rest each their own, but the world itself for his government. For the sea is the world, the ships Churches. Thence it is, that, on another occasion, walking like the Lord on the waters, he marked himself out as the single Vicar of Christ, who should rule over not one people, but all; since the 'many waters' are 'many peoples.' Thus, while every one of the rest has his own ship, to thee the one most great ship is entrusted; the Universal Church herself, made out of all Churches, diffused through the whole world."*

In what a magnificent light, does not Catholicity in this view of her Sacred Ministry, exhibit the whole Providence of God with respect to Religion. In her principles, her children, now, as at the consummation of ages, when they look back and trace the development of the true religion from its first plantation in Paradise to their own time, are taught to contemplate it as gradually, but uninterruptedly and beautifully unfolding its dimensions and its precious fruits, until it has extended its blessings to the very ends of the earth, and like the mustard seed in the parable, gives shade and shelter, not only to the poor that crawl on the earth but even to the birds of Heaven, the high and the mighty, the great and the learned among the Children of men. In this grand view, Catholicity acknowledges no break, no interruption, no chasm which swallowed up the stately tree of Religion, no darkness which rendered it invisible. No, not even when the waters of the Deluge swept desolation and destruction over the whole earth, for even then, in the midst of the general devastation and wreck, the Ark of Noah, the grand type of the Catholic Church floated triumphantly over the waste of waters, carrying securely within its bosom the faithful believers and worshippers of the true God, by whom Religion was to be transmitted without interruption to their posterity, the future inhabitants of the entire earth.

But wherefore attach so much importance to the Apostolic succession, of which the Catholic Church alone can boast. Because on the least reflection, it must be obvious to every person, that of himself, and without the Divine sanction, no man can pretend to exercise any office or dispense any ordinance to which supernatural graces are annexed. In the order of civil society, no man not duly delegated by the Supreme Authority can undertake to represent the Sovereign, or to confer validly those honors or prerogatives, which emanate from the free bounty of the monarch. To disturb this order would be treason against the Sovereign. In Religion, the same principle must be recognised and upheld. The power to remit sin in Baptism, to consecrate and dispense the Holy Eucharist an ordinance pregnant with grace, because containing the source of all grace, the power to celebrate sacred rites like these and to impart the graces annexed by Christ to them, man could receive only from the Divine Institutor of those mysteries. Much more is it true, that the ability to transmit the power to administer these heavenly rites to others, from age to age, from hand to hand, could come only from the same heavenly source, from which they derived their origin. Were the transmission of such a power once interrupted, no earthly authority could restore it. Christ, who first gave it, should if he wished to renew it, descend again from heaven and impart anew Apostolic ordination to those whom he might select for the Chief Pastoral dignity. The Saviour calls the Apostles the light of the world. If in the order of nature, mankind were deprived of the eye, the appointed ordinary organ of vision and light, the Creator alone could by his interposition supply the loss, as all efforts on the part of men, considered either individually or collectively would be unavailing for its restoration. In the supernatural order of Religion, a similar result would still be more inevitable, if once the succession to the Apostles, the light of the world were extinguished. No man, no number of men could supply the fatal privation that should arise hence, but a moral chaos would ensue, such as would occur in the Physical world if the sun ceased to give its light. But the Saviour himself warns us against the possibility of such an evil occurring, by his solemn parting assurance to his "Apostles, that he would be with them all days to the consummation of the world, that" thus by their unfailing Ministry, they should always guard the Church from error and prevent the gates of hell from prevailing over it. This assurance he has fulfilled by preserving in the Church an unbroken succession of Chief Pastors, who in virtue of that succession are entitled, as the heirs and representatives of the Apostles, to all the powers conferred on the Apostolic College. It is in order to ingraft each infant Church, according as it may rise up amidst the Gentile world, on this Apostolic succession, that in Catholic discipline, no Bishop can be consecrated, until authority for the consecration, be first granted by the Bishop of Rome the Successor and representative of St. Peter the first Chief Pastor, to whom Christ committed both the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven and the authority to feed, that is to provide for and govern the lambs and the sheep, the whole flock of Christ both Pastors and People.

* S. Bernard, de Consid. lib. II. c. 8.

Thus after eighteen Centuries have rolled away, during which error and persecution have unceasingly laboured to overwhelm the Church, we find, in this distant land, whenever occasion may require it, Peter, by his illustrious Successor and representative, raising his voice in the midst of the Faithful, as he did in the Infant Church at Jerusalem, and providing for the Church in India a Chief Pastor, just as, at Peter's voice, Mathias was chosen to take the Ministry and Apostleship, from which Judas had fallen. Acts Chap. I.

"Simon, Simon, said the Saviour to St. Peter, behold Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat. But I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not, and thou being once converted, confirm thy Brethren." The high trust thus given to Peter, Peter through his venerable Successor exercises to this day, throughout the world. In the spirit of the words addressed by Peter to the infirm man whom he miraculously restored at the porch of the Temple, Peter's august representative says to each Bishop at his consecration, "Silver and Gold I have none, but what I have, I give thee." My temporal principality being from earth, earthly, like every other worldly possession must be subject to all the uncertainty and fluctuation of terrestrial things. To-day I may be a Sovereign Prince, to-morrow a destitute exile, or captive as my Predecessor Peter was, and in want even of the necessaries of life. But the power which my Saviour conferred on Peter to carry the keys of Heaven, to bind and to loose, the authority he bestowed on him to feed his Lambs and his Sheep his whole flock, no earthly revolution can deprive me of. For the Saviour gave these illustrious prerogatives for the benefit of his Church and he made Peter, a rock to be the enduring indestructible foundation of his Church, in order that the powers of earth or hell should never prevail against it. "Gold and Silver I have not, but what I have, I give thee." As at Peter's voice Mathias was numbered amongst the eleven, so at the voice of me his Successor, you are aggregated to the Apostolic College. Go forth then clothed with Apostolic power and piety and feed for me with the pastures of eternal life that portion of the flock which I have delegated to your care. Go forth like the Baptist and give to your people the knowledge of Salvation for the remission of their sins. Go forth to be a light to those who sit in darkness and in the shade of death and hold ever in mind that they who instruct others unto justice shall shine as stars for all eternity.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE REASONS OF MY CONVERSION TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, BY A LATE CLERGYMAN (REV. MR. NEWMAN) OF THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION. IN LETTERS TO A FRIEND. FIFTH EDITION. LONDON: JAMES BURNS 1849.

LETTER IX.

My Dear ——

It is impossible, as I began by saying in my last, to answer all the objections that are urged, by persons against leaving the English communion and joining the Catholic Church. Some of the most common of these I have already noticed; others have not occurred to me; some, perhaps, I have not heard; but all, I am sure, stop far short of proving, or even making it probable, that the English Church is not in schism, and that it is not our bounden duty to leave a schismatical body, though calling itself, with the greatest confidence, by the holy name of our Mother Church.

There is one other argument, however, which I think myself bound to notice; and with some remarks upon it I will bring these Letters to a close. The English Church, it is sometimes said, is a great fact. It looks too like a work of God, a step in His Providence, for the furtherance of some great design in the world. Its history contains such remarkable evidences of His fostering care and supernatural grace, that it is impossible for one to abandon it without running the greatest risk of abandoning Him, and thwarting His work. Especially, it is said, is this the case now, when, more than ever, and in such a striking way, He has moved, and is moving, the minds of men within her, calling them to the knowledge of higher truths, and to a sense of deeper wants, and to a deeper appreciation of the means of grace. Does not this shew, it is said, that He yet looks favourably upon her, that He has not abandoned her, that He has some work for her to do? Can we, then, abandon her, and destroy, so far as in us lies, this work? Who knows but He may be moulding her for the high office of first regenerating this nation, and then recalling to primitive truth and purity the whole erring and corrupt Church of the Continent?

It must be acknowledged that this is very solemn language, and that these are very awful considerations. But they do not prove themselves. It is not enough to ask these questions, and to allow them, as it were, to answer themselves, as a matter of course, in the affirmative. If we are to read the history of this fact, and to speculate on its past course and present position, with a view to gather reverentially from the consideration the design of God, and the providential indications of His will, let us do so. But let it not be imagined that such a review of the past, and consideration of the present, must necessarily lead to such conclusions, or support such hopes as those which I have just been giving as the hopes of Anglicans. On the contrary, I can most truly and seriously affirm that such considerations as these have convinced me as much, or more than any thing else, of the utter fallacy of the views I once held, and the wild but seductive hopes which I, in common with others, once entertained.

Let us look at this "great fact," which is thus made to challenge our scrutiny, and by the greatness of which we are to be awed into submission and reverence. Is its career, and the causes of its rise and progress, and the methods by which it has been sustained, and protected, and extended,—are these so obscure, or so mysterious, or so superhuman, as to hide themselves within the veil of Providence, and to induce us to marvel at so great effects from such slight apparent causes? Surely not. Surely if ever there were a body human and earthly in its origin,* human and carnal in the means of its diffusion and the weapons of its warfare, it is this very body called the Church of England. Surely there is no other cause which can appeal so little to our highest sympathies and best feelings, as the cause of the Reformation and the reformed Church of England. With its origin and early progress, with its agents and with their works, with their end and with their means, with their acts, language, spirit, tone, and temper, what person, rightly informed in the history of those times, can sympathise in the slightest degree? Who does not rather tremble to presume to apply the grave epithet of "providential" to such an event, except in the sense of a providential chastisement for the sins of our nation, and it may be, for those of the Church at large? I declare that, the more I have considered this matter, the greater has ever been my difficulty to refrain from denouncing it in the strongest terms which language afforded me.

And then, if we go on in its history, can we either approve of the course pursued to support and extend this body, or wonder at its efficacy? Was there ever such mighty power employed so unscrupulously, by appealing to every earthly motive within its extensive sphere, to bring about its fixed resolve? On the one hand, spoliation, fines, imprisonment, banishment, death; the most severe penal laws, the most rigid enforcement of their penalties by the most brutal agents. On the other hand, bribery, and all the allurements of worldly power, honour, and national distinction.

And what has been the spiritual state of this Church, and its variations from its first origin until now? At one time predominantly Calvinistic, at another Erastian, at another utterly lifeless, at another groaning all over with a feverish sectarian spirit, which either broke out into open schism, or continued to agitate and vex the lifeless quiet within. Here and there, at intervals in its history, have appeared for a short time gleams of another spirit, and men of a different mould. Just enough, as it were, to keep up within it the tradition of other times, and the echo of better days,—just enough to add to all the other elements and parties within it, what might be called, for distinction-sake, the Catholic element and the Catholic party. Insignificant enough in themselves in numbers, and great only from the greater power their accidental hold of a greater and better system gave them upon the better portion of their body—better and higher than the rest of their brethren, just in as much as they approached nearer to that Body from which they had been cut off, and to which whatever portion of Catholic life yet lingered in the removed limb quivered to be united, even though unconsciously. Never for any time has this better element predominated in the body. More frequently has it been quiescent, under the more powerful Erastian or Puritan influences.

* See on this head Mr. Lewis's most able and convincing pamphlet, "Notes on the Royal Supremacy in the English Church."

Never until our day has Anglicanism made such a vigorous effort to claim for itself, and to bring within its influence, the whole body of the English nation. Now at last it has openly and boldly asserted its supposed rights—offered a Catholic hypothesis and theory for the English Reformation, and claimed the English people for itself, not on national but on Catholic principles. It arose full of hope in the beauty of its theories, and in the freshness of an untried, and therefore undimmed career. Its promoters doubted so little of success, in their honest confidence, that they not only expected, but almost foretold the extensive success of their efforts. But what has been the result? Surely, as compared with expectation, as compared with the end and object aimed at, a most complete and signal failure. The English people as a body, and the English Bishops as a body, have rejected the theory and pretensions of Anglicanism. The things that have been said, and the things that have been done of late years, by those in high places in the English Church, and the spirit that prevails so widely, notwithstanding some exceptions—fatal at any time to Anglican claims—are the more crushingly fatal as having been said and done in the very face of the Anglican movement, and after fifteen years of agitation of those claims.

One of the most active of the Bishops* has recently, on the most public and solemn occasion in which he could speak,—on an occasion when, if ever, he spoke ex cathedrâ, and when he knew that his words must sound throughout the kingdom as the deliberate expression of his opinion,—denounced the doctrine of the eucharistic Sacrifice. Another† whose words have been quoted in former years as a witness on the Anglican side, and who was considered to be almost one of the movement, has also, quite lately, publicly written on the subject of the Eucharist in a manner quite at variance with any serious faith in the doctrine of the Real Presence.

* "Bishop of London" See his Charge for 1846.
† Bishop of Exeter, in his Letter to the Rev. Mr. Smith.

Several of the other Bishops have, so to speak, "gone back." Many of the clergy likewise have "gone back." Many have advanced to the very gates of the Catholic Church in obedience to the force of Catholic principles, and then fearing or refusing to go on, have given up their principles, and become, what it is equally painful for Anglicans and Catholics to think that they should become. In many places where Anglicanism has been set up, and the "Church system" was in full operation, a change of incumbents has brought with it a return to the very opposite system. No parish or district is safe. Death or removal might make Christ's Church St. Pancras, or St. Paul's Knightsbridge, as St. George's Bloomsbury, or St. John's Bedford Row. Leeds may become a Cheltenham. The fate of St. Mark's Chelsea, or St. Andrew's Harrow-weald, trembles upon the merest accident. The movement has been a most emphatic failure: the tide has turned, and the worst has not yet come.

This within the body. And then how many have gone out? From fifty to a hundred of the clergy, and other active promoters of the movement in its origin, whose presence was, in a great measure, its strength have abandoned it. They have gone out, and not only by so doing weakened the body,—thrown discredit and suspicion upon the movement as the cause of the English Church, and opened people's eyes to the real nature of its principles,—but they have thrown their whole strength into the opposite side. With the most devoted enthusiasm and confidence, with hearts full of gratitude to Almighty God, and full of courage and spirit for His service, they are preparing, or now stand ready, to bring all their special qualifications into the field in a most loving warfare against their former associates. Anglicanism is now a broken weapon. It can never again be used with confidence. No more can young men throw themselves unsuspectingly upon its theories, confident that it will be their best protection against Rome. Its very character has already altered. Its language, its purpose, have become confused. None or few are agreed among themselves. It has lost its spring and movement, its onward direction. It is turned and scattered. Nothing short of infatuation can persuade any one to think that it is in the least likely to become the religion of the English Church in the shape in which it was first put forth. Henceforth it will be one among the other recognised theories or parties within the Church—another element of discord and disunion, instead of a bond of unity and strength. The most that it will do will be to diffuse a greater respect and attention to the external structure and adornment of churches, and some slight feeling for the hierarchical and sacramental principles of religion. This will be its end, so far as the English Church is concerned.

If, then, we are to venture to read Providence, surely there is another reading than that which Dr. Pusey so confidently puts upon the history and position of the English Church. If the Reformation were partly an enormous sin of the nation, and partly God's chastisement for past sins,—if the schism of this country from the rest of the Catholic world has been and be a great evil; then may it not be that God's anger is in some measure appeased, and that He has thoughts of mercy towards us,—that the time is come when He would graciously reunite us again to our fathers and brethren? May not the recent movement in the very heart of the members of the English Church, when the voice of their Catholic brethren could never reach their ears, this stirring of spirit, as it were, by the very finger of God, so unaccountably, have been His call and summons to us to get up and return to our brethren? May not the strange rise and sudden spread of Catholic principles within us have been intended to lead us on, first to see the beauty of the Catholic system, and then to convince us that we could not find what we sought here? May it not have been as the end of a clew dropped at our feet to guide us out of the labyrinth into which we had wandered? Was it not as the soft food in small quantities given to us at first, until we acquired strength to partake of and enjoy the stronger?

Truly thus it seems to us all, as we look back upon the way in which we have come and compare the yearnings we once felt, and the hope that once haunted us, with the things we see, and the realities we possess and enjoy in the bosom of the true Church—of her who is our Mother indeed. No longer can we doubt, if we would. One shadow after another may be mistaken for the substance, and beguile us for a while; but when the substance itself is obtained, shadows can no longer deceive. A cloud in the horizon may look like land, and we may be deceived a thousand times by the delusive appearance; but when we have really neared our promised land, and touched its shore, we can be deluded no more. We cannot, therefore, help reading the signs of the times, and the history of the past in our present; and thus reading them, we see in them the very contrary lessons to those by which Anglicans would dissuade from leaving the English Church. We see in them a most merciful Providence calling us out of it, and preparing the way, as we hope and trust, for the union of the nations. We cannot, if we would, persuade ourselves that we are abandoning God, or thwarting His work. Our only fear is for those whom we have left behind, lest they should miss the blessings which God is calling them to, and prevent others from partaking of them also.

Appearances without coincide with those within the English Church, and confirm us in our reading of the signs of the times. While Anglicanism is thus breaking up, and by its last and most vigorous effort to make the English Church catholic has proved most clearly that it never can be catholic, the Catholic Church is gathering strength on every side.

Never at any time have its conversions been more remarkable than within the last fifty years. Some of the first and leading minds of France and Germany, and last of England,* have calmly and deliberately yielded themselves willing captives and devoted servants to Holy Church. Never at any time has Catholic theology and the Papal theory been better understood or more distinctly defined and ably defended than in the present day. Reason and intellect have found new weapons with which to defend old truths. The highest powers of mind, the last advances of science, have been enlisted to meet the new attacks of learned or scientific infidelity and heresy. The enemies of the Church have been foiled with their own weapons; and never at any time did the Church put on a more reasonable and intellectual appearance.

So much so, indeed, that reason has been of late accused of creating what it only came forward to defend. The truths of theology, and the doctrines and practices of the Church which are the spontaneous and almost unconscious growth of the spiritual mind feeding on its spiritual food within the Church, were first attacked as irrational or extravagant. The soul perceives truths which reason may not always be able to defend, and which wiser than reason, it will hold to in spite of reason But when the spiritualised reason, God's highest work on earth, came forward to defend with the weapons of reason the truths of the Spirit and by similes and analogy, and arguments drawn from admitted truths, interpreted them almost to those outside the Church, then were those very doctrines, before stigmatised as irrational, declared now to be the mere produce and deductions of reason, and of subtle in-

* I saw a letter from Rome the other day, in which the writer mentions that several Russians, converts to the Catholic Church, were in that city; and that a movement similar in character, to that in our own country, in favor of the Roman Church, was very extensive in Russia.

tellects sporting themselves with the truths of religion! Such is ever the inconsistency of heresy.

In many other ways also do we see gathering signs of promise for the Holy Catholic Church. How remarkable is the growth and spread of the Church in this country! A new spirit has arisen among the old Catholics, and new life has joined it from without. As yet it has hardly begun to act.—as yet that body of men gained from Anglicanism has been almost passive,—as yet they are but preparing themselves for their future work. But while they are thus preparing to act, a new field seems preparing for action. Old barriers are being thrown down, and obstacles removed; Catholics are once more recognised as Englishmen, and have the rights of Englishmen and, as Englishmen and Catholics, a double feeling of devotion for their country is burning within them. Efforts are being made, on all sides, to restore those institutions by which chiefly the Evangelisation of the people has ever been effected. A great work is going on, and a greater work is preparing. If we only considered the human instrumentality we might well be confident of success; for in the Catholic Church are to be found all the elements of strength and success. The Catholic Church is one all over the world; the success of each part affects every other and the good of the whole is the good of each part. Each convert gained is one gained to a definite and well ordered system; he knows at once his place and his work, while his enemies are divided among themselves. A definite system, with definite teaching and acknowledged authority, must fight at immense advantage with a body divided in every point, hardly daring to avow its most cherished opinions, and afraid of yielding submission, while professing to obey as a principle.

But I have said enough just to shew you how naturally the signs of the times, and the finger of God's providence, seem to be pointing to conclusions the most cheering to the heart of a Catholic. Far be it from me to presume to prophesy, or affix positive meanings to what may only appear to us to be providential indication. I have been led to say thus much in answer to the call that is sometimes made upon converts to read the history of the Church of England and the present times in another sense. We can act without the least regard to such appeals, because we really see things quite differently. But our best hope and our best ground of confidence is not in such private readings of Providence as these, but in the strong ground we have for believing that we are in the Church of God,—in the deep conviction that we have left the unreal for the real, the human for the divine,—that God is with His Church; and that whatever obstacles may oppose or whatever length of time may intervene, success is surely hers in the end, because HER CAUSE IS THE CAUSE OF GOD.

Selections.

MISSIONS OF THIBET.

Extracts from a Letter of Rev. Dr. Huc, Apostolic Missioner in China, to the Rev. Dr. Etienne, Superior General of Saint Lazarus, at Paris.

SOJOURN AT LASSA.

(Continued from our last.)

Before quitting their houses they rub their faces with a sort of black adhesive paste, very like black currant jelly. It being their aim to render themselves ugly and hideous, they smear their faces right and left with this disgusting compound, and so daub themselves as to no longer resemble human creatures. We received the following account of the origin of this monstrous practice. About two hundred years ago, the Nomekhan or Lama-King who governed Hitherto Thibet, was a rigid man, of austere morals. At this epoch Thibetian women were no more in the habit than women of other countries, to render themselves ugly. On the contrary, they had an uncontrolable zest for luxury and show. Hence arose fearful disorders and unlimited immorality. The contagion gradually spread into the holy family of the Lamas. The Buddha convents relaxed from their ancient discipline, and were labouring under an evil that was rapidly hurrying them on to complete dissolution. In order to stop the progress of libertinism that had become so general, the Nomekhan published an edict forbidding women to appear publicly unless they bedaubed their faces in the way we have already stated. High moral and religious considerations were the motives grounding this strange law, and threatening the refractory with the severest penalties, and above all with the indignation of Buddha. It required, unquestionably, very extraordinary courage to venture the publication of a similar edict; but what is more astonishing, the women evinced themselves obedient and resigned. Tradition has not preserved the slightest record of the smallest insurrection or trifling riot. In conformity to the laws, the women blackened themselves outrageously, and rendered themselves frightfully ugly, and the usage has been religiously preserved down to the present day. The thing seems now to be considered as a point of dogma, a rule of devotion; the woman who daub themselves in the most disgusting manner are reputed the most pious. In the country districts the edict is observed so scrupulously, that the censors cannot cavil against its non-observance. But the Lassa is not rare to meet in the streets, women, who in spite of the laws and decency, venture to exhibit in public their unvarnished faces, such as nature has given them. Those who allow themselves this license are in very bad repute, and never fail to hide themselves whenever they notice the approach of a police agent.

It is contended that the edict of the Nomekhan had been highly beneficial to public morality; we have no reason for positively asserting the contrary; however, we can say that the Thibetians are far from being exemplary in regard to morals. The greatest disorders exist among them; and we would be tempted to believe that the blackest and most hedious varnishes are incapable of reclaiming back to virtue a corrupted population. Christianity alone is capable of withdrawing pagan nations from the shameful vices in which they wallow.

One circumstance would induce the belief that in Thibet there is, perhaps, less corruption than in certain pagan countries—i. e., great liberty enjoyed there by women; instead of vegetating in imprisonment in their own houses, they lead a very active and laborious life. Besides housekeeping, they carry on all the trade. They act as carriers of all mercantile commodities, which they expose for sale in the streets, and they keep almost all the retail shops. They perform a great portion of farm labour in the fields.

"Although the men are less laborious and less active than the women, they are far from spreading their lives in idleness. Their chief employment consists in spinning and weaving wool. The clothes which they manufacture are called Poulou: they are very close and extremely strong. The quality varies to an astonishing extent; you find among their goods the coarsest strong cloths and the finest napped, even the most beautiful and finest merinos that can be imagined. According to a rule of the Buddha reform, all the Lamas must be dressed in red Poulou; there is a great consumption of this article in Thibet, and the caravans convey a considerable quantity of it into the north of China and Tartary. The coarser Poulou is sold cheap; but the superior quality is extremely dear.

The scented sticks so celebrated in China under the name of Tsan-hian, or Thibet perfume, are an object of commerce of some importance to the inhabitants of Lassa. They are manufactured from the powder of several aromatic trees, to which musk and gold dust are added. A violet-colored paste is formed from all these ingredients, and subsequently moulded into small sticks three or four feet long. These are burned in the lamaseries and before the idols honoured in the interior of the houses. When the scented sticks are lighted, they burn slowly without extinguishing, and diffuse widely a perfume of exquisite sweetness. The Thibetian merchants who annually proceed to Pekin in the train of the embassy, export considerable quantities, and sell them at an exorbitant price. The northern Chinese counterfeit the scented sticks, and circulate them for sale, under the name of Tsan-hian, but they can stand no comparison with those brought from Thibet.

The Thibetians have no porcelain ware; nevertheless they manufacture every description of pottery to rare perfection. As we have noticed elsewhere, the only vessel in use consists simply of a wooden bowl, carried by each person, either concealed in his breast or hung from his sash in an ornamental bag. These bowls are made from the roots of certain valuable trees growing upon the mountains of Thibet; they are handsomely shaped, but simple and destitute of ornament. They are merely covered over with a slight varnish that neither hides their natural color, nor the grain of the knots of the wood. The Thibetians are select in their bowl, not like us Europeans; there are bowls and bowls; some are purchaseable for a few coins, and others fetch as much as a hundred ounces of silver, nearly one thousand francs. If our readers inquire what difference we discovered between these different qualities of wooden bowls, we reply, that truly they all seemed to us of the same value, and with the best endeavours we could not possibly discern a a difference of any importance.

Some days after our arrival at Lassa we were desirous to renew a little our table service, which was now rather antiquated and worn, and we entered a bowl shop. A Thibetian woman, with a rich black varnish on her face, was at the counter. This lady, judging from our rather exotic and unusual appearance that we were no doubt personages of eminent distinction, opened a drawer and exhibited two small, skilfully-made boxes, each of which contained a bowl, wrapped in three folds of silk paper. After having examined the merchandize with seeming eagerness, we inquired the price:—'Tchik-la gatsere? How much for each?' 'Your Excellency, fifty ounces of silver a bowl.' These thundering words tingled our ears, and we were so stunned that it seemed as if the entire shop was in motion around us; our whole fortune could only purchase, at the most, 2 wooden bowls! when we had partially recovered from our amazement, we replaced respectfully the two precious toys in their respective boxes, and we passed in review the numerous collections that were plainly arranged for sale on the shelves of the shop.—'And how much each of these—Tchik-la-gatsere?' 'Excellency, one pair for one ounce of silver. We presently paid down an ounce of silver, and we bore off our two bowls with triumphant joy, for they seemed to us similar to those which were priced at 100f. each. When we returned to our lodging, the master of the house to whom we eagerly showed our bargain, informed us that at least four bowls of this sort could be had for an ounce of silver.

The Pou-lou scented sticks, and wooden bowls, are the three principal branches of industry which the Thibetians engage in successfully. In everything else their workmanship is inferior or very middling, and the coarse productions of their arts and trades are undeserving of notice, neither is their agricultural produce remarkable. Thibet being almost all covered with mountains, and intersected by impetuous torrents, furnishes its inhabitants with but little soil suited for cultivation; the valleys alone can be sowed with any prospect of reaping a harvest.

(To be continued.)

PARIS—INTERESTING RELIGIOUS CEREMONY.

One of the most curious and touching ceremonies of all those which belong to the Catholic Church took place on Monday last at the little chapel in the Rue de Courcelles. Seven ladies belonging to the Convent of Grey Sisters took their departure for French Guiana in order to assist in tending the sick and comfort the dying in that colony just now under the ban of the most frightful epidemic. The order of Grey Sisters, which owes its very existence to Madame Javoney, its present superior, has become in the short space of fifteen years one of the most numerous and powerful of all the religious bodies which are beginning once more to establish themselves in every district throughout France. The lady to whom is owing its admirable organisation and management is, perhaps, one of the most remarkable characters of our day. She is still in the full vigour of her age and understanding, and so great is her influence in all matters connected with the Church, that very few decisions of importance are taken without her sanction. It will for ever remain a mystery how, from the humble position of cowherd on an obscure farm in Lorraine, which she occupied in 1835, this lady should have risen not merely to a post of such elevation and dignity, but to such extent of power and influence likewise. But little of the tale is told, and that little is most likely to be at variance with the truth. It is said that during the appointment of M. de St. Hilaire to the Ministry of Marine serious thoughts were entertained by the Government of abandoning the colony of French Guiana on account of the deadly nature of the climate and the utter failure of every means hitherto employed to drain the soil effectually. Menilon was one day made of this intention at the table of M. de St. Hilaire, and much regret expressed at the necessity of thus abandoning a possession which cost so much blood and money to obtain. One of the guests present hereupon observed that he should henceforth never believe in the impossibility of reclaiming land, however difficult it might appear, for he had just returned from Lorraine and had beheld whole tracts of pasture, where, but a short time before, he had left though but morass and noxious bog.* The recital raised so much interest in the mind of M. de St. Hilaire, that he caused inquiries to be made, and discovered, to his astonishment, that the metamorphosis was owing to the wondrous skill of the young herds woman of M. de F——, who had suggested a new mode of drainage, which had succeeded so well that a large portion of the province, which had hitherto been regarded as irreclaimable, was already in a fit state to be submitted to the plough. The young woman was soon sought out and engaged in the service of M. de St. Hilaire. She agreed to depart to Guiana, but stipulated for six months' delay. During this time she set about forming as many pupils of her own sex as she found willing to follow her into exile. With an ardent heart and enthusiastic mind like her own, the task was an easy one, and when M. de St. Hilaire's emissaries went once more to seek her at the expiration of the six months, they found her already established at the head of a tolerably numerous community, to whom she had imparted every species of knowledge likely to be of service in the distant land to which they were hurrying. A company of forty females, having pronounced no other vows than those of chastity and obedience, set forth under command of Madame Javoney. They were not then even formed into a community, and were free as any other members of society; but, nevertheless, not one instance is recorded of an attempt to shake off the vow which bound them to their superior nor is there known to have been one single example of discontent or complaining during the difficulties and hardships which beset them in the accomplishment of their task. Everything succeeded according to the wishes of the superior. After a while she returned to Europe, leaving a rich and flourishing congregation in the forty poor peasant women she had taken out a few years before. The next thought was the regular foundation of her order, which, under the name of Sœurs Grises, was soon accomplished: and ever since that time her whole existence has been given up to its enrichment and aggrandizement. The principle upon which she has founded her community was unique at the time although it has since been imitated by other religious orders. It is that of ceaseless vigilance and industry. Her ladies are, by turns, washerwomen, cooks, housemaids, gardeners, semptresses, and schoolmistresses. They dig, they plant, they sow, they build with their own hands; they sing morets in the choir of the chapel; they paint without. Their superior has caused to be inscribed in letters of gold over the gate of every one of her houses, of which they are already fourteen, Laborare est orare, and thus they have never been chosen as resting places for weary dissipation, nor yet as solitude for the indulgence of idle sorrow, for all must work. It is not to be supposed that the talent and energy displayed by Madame Javoney should pass unnoticed by the clerical authorities. She was wooed by them all, and the late Archbishop publicly acknowledged the debt of gratitude which the church had incurred towards her Louis Philippe used to take peculiar delight in the society of the superior,* and suffered from her lips remarks and criticisms which he would have borne from no one else. Thus the reverend mother would love to jeer his Majesty for his aristocratical tastes, and his preference for the noble ladies of Cahors, whose Abbess, was a frequent visitor at the Tuileries and would imitate with such racy humour the high and lofty airs the queenly bearing of the old lady, that his Majesty would be betrayed into fits of laughter at the expense of his absent friend. The revolution did not affect the superior any way. She had always prided herself upon belonging to the people, and knew that her best friends would be found amongst them. The ceremony of Monday last was attended by most of the clergy at present in Paris. The Archbishop himself bestowed the blessing upon the wayfarers and the Bishop of Rouen officiated at the altar. The seven ladies sat side by side in the middle of the aisle. Each bore a pilgrim's staff and a little bundle supposed to contain the whole of their worldly goods; they walked barefoot in procession to the altar, there to take the oath of self-denial, of devotion to the poor and sick, and the vow of suffering all things for Jesus' sake. There was a homely simplicity about the whole affair which carried the speculator back to the early days of Christianity.—Atlas, February 15.

PRAYERS IN SPAIN FOR THE CONVERSION OF ENGLAND.

[The following letter, which the excellent writer forwarded to us for publication, not having been acquainted with Mr. Spencer's address, will be read, we doubt not, by all English Catholics, and we hope many Protestants, too with emotions of gratitude, respect, and admiration.—Ed. Tab.:—]

TO THE HON. AND VERY REV. GEORGE SPENCER.

Seville, Jan. 15th, 1851.

Very Rev. Sir—For many years I have been in the habit of offering up the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass for the conversion of England, and particularly on the Feast of our great patron, St. George, as also my humble petitions to the Throne of Infinite Mercy, that the Almighty may enlighten those of our countrymen who live in darkness and the shadow of death. But having read in the Tablet some time ago of your holy crusade for the conversion of my native country, not by force of arms, like Goliath, but, confiding in the God of armies, by prayer and five little pebbles like unto David—yes, in the infinite merits of the five wounds of our Divine Redeemer on the Cross, which overturned the power of the devil, the world, and the flesh—I must confess, Very Rev. Sir, that my courage was roused, and I immediately enlisted myself under the noble and sacred banner as a private soldier; but I must tell you, that now I am like a general, for I have recruited and arrayed in battle about six thousand of as brave and zealous soldiers as ever fought against the phalanx of sin and heresy.

Now, I think it is only just I should inform who my troops are, and how I have arranged them. All the good Nuns of Seville, and many other towns in this Province, are placed just as a vanguard, who, with their virginal lips and cloistered hearts, offer up the "Hail Mary" every day to the immaculate Queen of Heaven, that she may intercede with her Divine Son, that though His hour may not be yet come, through her powerful intercession He may, as at the wedding feast of Cana in Galilee, work a miracle for the conversion of England. Next come the Sisters of Charity; then the Priests as spiritual rulers, with their penitents; and last, though not least, the pious congregation of the Sacred Heart of Mary, on every Thursday, offer up their prayers in presence of the Adorable Sacrament, exposed for the same intention.

The number of this pious crusade is increasing wonderfully; almost every week I receive a list of fifty or sixty persons offering themselves, with heart and soul, to be enrolled.

I have also established sodalities, with their rules, under the especial patronage of Mater Creatoris and protection of St. Ursula and her holy companions. They consist briefly as follows:—Each association is formed of one Priest, who represents St. Ursula, and eleven persons representing the eleven thousand virgins. They say, every day, for twenty-five days, the short prayers of the devotion of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, for the conversion of sinners, and then go to confession and receive the Holy Communion at the Mass of the Priest who represents the Saint, all for the conversion of England.

When any of the members are sick, the others visit them and exhort them to unite their intention with the association; and if not in a state to receive the Holy Communion, at least to make a spiritual one.

If any member should die, the others are to offer five Mysteries of the Rosary for the repose of his or her soul, and elect another member immediately.

These devotions are only four times a year, commencing the first month of each season.

It is only a month since I commenced this association, and there are now three established.

Very Rev. Sir, if this association be not worth notice or imitation, could not any other more perfect be established in the Island of Saints, and in that once garden of the Church of God, as an eternal reward awaits those who are the means of the salvation of others?—for we have it written in the records of the Inspired Book, qui ad justitiam erudiunt multos fulgebunt quasi stellæ in perpetuas æternitates. "They that instruct many to justice, shall shine as stars for all eternity."—Dan. xii. 3.

What did Moses gain by his prayer on the Mount while the people of Israel were arrayed in battle? A complete victory. What did the Church gain by prayer when St. Peter was imprisoned by Herod? A heavenly messenger was sent down from the Sovereign of eternity, and with his angelical hands softened, like wax before the fire, the iron bolts of the prison, and at his voice the chains of the Holy Apostle melted like gold in a furnace, and the brazen doors gave way and obeyed, and finally the Apostle was set at liberty.

Surely our relatives and brethren separated from us in Faith should not be angry with us for using every means Christian charity devises for their conversion to God, and the eternal happiness of their souls. Perhaps some of them, with the placid serenity of their own security in their beguiled devotions, may pray for us; and certainly, at least with respect to myself, I am not angry with them for that, because it proceeds from a good disposition, though erroneous in its principle, as opera bona sine fide nihil pro- sunt ad salutem. "Good works without Faith avail nought unto salvation."

Some of these lines may appear strange, for mixing military terms with religious sentiments; but if the impartial reader reflect that in many passages of Holy Writ we find a number of military terms used figuratively to point out more forcibly the power of things holy, I feel confident he will not be startled or scandalised at my allegories. Væ mihi quia tacui tanto tempore. "Woe, is me, that I have so kept silence."

Very Rev. Sir, please favour me with the receipt of this either through the Tablet or by post. —Yours, unfeignedly.

JOHN B. CUTHBERT.

My address is the "Rev. John B. Cuthbert, Rector of the English College of St. George, Sanlucar de Barrameda, Andalusia, Spain."

[Tablet.

HON. AND REV. MR. SPENCER.

THE CRUSADE OF PRAYERS FOR ENGLAND'S CONVERSION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TABLET.

Jesu Christi Passio.

23, Essex-quay, Dublin, Jan. 29, 1851,

Feast of St. Francis of Sales.

Dear Sir—I undertake a difficult task in giving you a report of the lectures which I have been giving in SS. Michael and John's Church, as the space I shall occupy in your paper must necessarily be limited, and the matter is very extensive. I think it better, however, to try to do this myself, than to leave it to others I shall not keep myself strictly to the substance and order of what I have been saying in these eight Lectures, but rather explain the topics which I have been treating in Ireland generally, and which I have endeavoured to go through in full at Dublin.

1. I apologise for the leading part which I have taken in speaking of the conversion of England during the last twelve or thirteen years, whereas so many might have been found more worthy and better able to advocate the cause.

My defence is—first, that circumstances have led me on from step to step; and if the matter has been left so much in my hands, this is not by my choice. I would have wished to have been lost sight of in the number of others who would have taken it up; but it has been nearly left to me. Secondly, I advert to my position for the first twelve years of my life as a Priest, when I was the only acting Priest in England who had once been a Clergyman of the Established Church. I might, therefore, properly be marked out as a kind of mediator between my former brethern, who still treated me generally with undiminished respect and friendship, and my newly-gained brethren in the Catholic Church, who have suffered me so patiently and kindly to take the course I have. The ground of this apology, thank God, is cut from under me, now that I see in the same position with myself so many more, formerly Anglican Clergymen, now Priests; but I have a new excuse given me by my vocation as a Passionist—that is, a spiritual child of the Venerable Father Paul of the Cross, now acting as Provincial of the Congregation in England. I see myself thus the representative in that country of Father Paul, who alone, among the great servants of God venerated by the universal Church, was distinguished by so extraordinary a devotion to the object of England's conversion. I may have mentioned the fact, that in becoming a Passionist I was not influenced in the least by this consideration. When I took this step, I was seeking only the advancement of my own spiritual advantage, and of my power of general usefulness to others.

2. I have taken up latterly a new name for the work I am about. It used to be called an association of prayer for the conversion of England. I now say I am proclaiming a crusade for the conquest of England for God and His Church. The crusade for England, observe, not against England; because it is a holy war, in which, when the victory is gained, the vanquished will be conquerors no less than they who subdue them; nay, they will be the most noble conquerors of the two, and the greater gainers. In choosing this name of crusade, I mean to compare or rather to contrast this holy war with the crusades of old: and maintain that this crusade is an enterprise infinitely more great and holy than those, under many points of view. First, in regard to its object: the old crusades were set on foot to recover the Holy Land and the Sepulchre of Christ from the power of the infidels. This was, perhaps, the holiest material object which could be contemplated by Christians; but it was after all, only material. To liberate one immortal soul from error and sin is an object infinitely greater. Now, this conquest of England is intended for the liberating or saving souls, of which the number has to be reckoned not by millions, nor by hundreds of millions, but by thousands of millions; for we must not look only at the eighteen millions of the population of England and Scotland, multiplied by countless generations to come who would inherit the Faith once recovered by their fathers, but we may fairly consider this conquest as leading to a mighty revival of Catholicity in France, Spain, Austria, Italy, and its other ancient dominions; as a death-blow to Protestantism throughout the world, as giving hopes more distantly to the reunion of the Greek and Russian Churches, and as bringing innumerable tribes of Gentiles to God in the East and West Indies, in Australia, China, and Africa. This, I know, is calculating, perhaps in a human way; but we have the example of St. Peter, who, on a like calculation of the probable results, fixed the seat of his Episcopate at Rome, and was justified by the event. Secondly this crusade is superior to the others in regard to the quality of the arms. This contrast I may state in the words of St. Paul. The weapons of those crusades were carnal, for the destruction of men's bodies. The weapons of this crusade are spiritual, mighty, through God, for the overthrowing of strongholds—i.e., the strongholds of error and sin in men's souls. For an account of the sort of weapons in detail, I refer you to the sixth chapter of Ephesians, v. 10, &c. The third point of view trast regards the character of the champions who will gain the most glorious names in the war. The palm was carried off in the crusades of old by men of great bodies and strong limbs, whose names were recorded in earthly chronicles, and some, indeed, also written in heaven. In this war the heroes will be men of great souls, and strong in all virtues—whose exploits will in some cases, perhaps, be recorded and honoured in the Church on earth, but all will infallibly be glorious for eternity in heaven.

3. Why propose the crusade in a special way to Ireland? For many reasons. 1st. Because of her present poverty. St. Ambrose says of our Blessed Lady, "she put her trust not in the uncertainty of riches, but in the prayers of the poor." So do I. It is the poor of Ireland to whom I look for the most mighty help; and, at the same time, I exult in the thought of thus co-operating with God in "raising up the needy from the earth, and placing him with princes."—Ps. cxii., 7, 8. 2nd. Because of their Faith, which is "spoken of in the whole world." All things are promised to the prayer of Faith. And remark, that the Faith of Ireland has now not only the proof of its stability for ages to recommend it. It is just emerging from the furnace of tribulation by which God, the great artificer of virtues, gives to this virtue especially the strength and temper which is given to iron by the skilful application of the hammer of fire, and water. God has used England in this case as his hammer. From England the flames and floods of persecution have overwhelmed Ireland: What a triumph to the knowledge and wisdom of God, if England should be found to have been thus unwittingly preparing the weapon by which principally she has to be herself conquered for her salvation! Thirdly, and chiefly, because of the heroic charity which will animate the prayers and efforts of Ireland for the salvation of England, and give them greater value than any other virtue can do. I conceive the hearts of Ireland are peculiarly susceptible of heroic charity and generosity. They may be stirred readily, on human motives, to vengeance and hatred, but they may be brought back as easily to the contrary sentiments on motives of faith and religion; and again I exult in the thought of the heroic sacrifices of charity and forgiveness which will ascend to Heaven from Ireland if the crusade is taken up with zeal.

4. But what prospect of success is there? Will England—can England ever be recovered for the Church; brought back from her wanderings and divisions to unity in the truth? If this question has been asked twenty-five years ago, many would have said it was impossible. But at that time, I, for one, though a Protestant, not knowing where the truth was, hoping for myself and for my country, that the truth might be discovered if sought for, and I was seeking it and moving others to seek it with me. After I had, in this way been led to know it myself, was I to leave off hoping for my country? And if some will not believe except they see signs and wonders, has not God done enough to move them; Twenty-five years ago, what place more unlikely than Oxford for the first outbreak of Catholic life in England? What class of people more unlikely to furnish the first great reinforcement to the armies of the Church, than those men who now have already joined her, and by themselves form a mighty host? But, I say, England of herself is not far from Catholicity. She thinks that she hates the Catholic religion, but she does not. She hates the false image of Catholicity, which has been forcibly kept before her eyes since the days of Queen Elizabeth; and the peculiar points of doctrine, for which the differing parties in England are most vehemently contending, and, as they suppose, contending against the Catholic Church, are, in fact, Catholic principles, toward which their hearts are being drawn, though they know not that in the Church alone they will ever find satisfaction. I cannot now explain myself on this point. I beg that they who would think me here unreasonable, will waive their judgment till they know what I mean. I here simply assert that England wants only to see the Catholic Church as she is indeed, and with God's grace she will return to her. The people of England know her now only in that prison suit with which her oppressors have disguised her. Let them see her once more in her own gilded clothing, surrounded with varieties, and they will love her again as their fathers did. It is for the Irish people—especially for those living in England, who, in fact, represent the Catholic Church there—to show what she is, by undertaking, for this end, to sanctify and perfect themselves and they will soon gain the hearts of our poor people for the Church and for Ireland.

5. What will be their reward? I can only shortly state what I promise them; and this point also I would desire to explain more at large, as I may seem here to go beyond the bounds of reasonable expectation; but wait till you hear the cause before you judge. I promise that if the crusade be duly taken up, the Irish people will be, in six months, a nation of Saints—the most glorious spectacle to God, to angels, and to men, that this world has yet presented to them. And, for their temporal reward, I promise that, as soon as the crusade is fairly and rightly taken in hand by the nation, there will be sufficiency of food, clothing, and shelter for all; in other words, from being the most miserably poor of all people in the world, Ireland will become the happiest and most prosperous, not only in heavenly, but in earthly goods.—I am, dear Sir, your faithful servant in Jesus Christ.

IGNATIUS OF ST. PAUL, Passionist.

[Tablet.]

DECLARATION OF THE PROTESTANT BISHOP AND CLERGY OF THE DIOCESE OF CAPE TOWN.

(From the Govt. Gazette)

We, the Bishop and Clergy of the Diocese of Cape Town, in Communion with the United Church of England and Ireland, under a deep sense of the duty we owe to God and His Church, and after seeking in earnest prayer for the guidance of the Holy Spirit, do feel that an obligation is laid upon us by the present circumstances of the Church of England, as well for the purpose of exhibiting our sympathy with Her to whom we are bound by so many ties of love and gratitude, as for disabusing the minds and quieting the consciences of the people committed to our care, to make this our solemn Declaration :—

I.—That we do most cheerfully and willingly acknowledge to belong to the Queen's Majesty that Prerogative which we see to have been given always to all godly Princes in Holy Scripture, by God himself;—That is, that they should rule all States and Decrees committed to their charge by God, whether they be Ecclesiastical or Temporal, and restrain, with the Civil Sword, the Stubborn and Evil-doers. (Article xxxvii.)

II.—But, whereas to the Church of God alone has been entrusted, by her Divine Head, the keeping of the Faith once delivered to the Saints, and consequent "authority in controversies of Faith." (Art. xx.)

And whereas, this Office of the Church hath ever been allowed, as far as we know, by all Christian States,—

And whereas, it is most certain that the title of the Church of England in particular, freely and effectually to exercise this office, is bound up with the most ancient Rights and Liberties of the Realm, and is thus part and parcel of the inheritance of Englishman, "by Magna Charta confirmed to them for ever," most plainly acknowledged in many Legislative Enactments since, and never at any time revoked,—

And whereas, it is equally certain that by immemorial usage, confirmed by many Statutes, a "National Synod" is the true Church of England by representation (Canon cxxxix)—

And whereas, it appears that a Court has been recently established as the Supreme Court of Appeal in England in matters affecting Faith, by Act of Parliament, without the consent of the Church; which court may be composed mainly, if not entirely, of persons alien from, or even positively hostile, to the church—

And whereas, the said court has itself declared its own incompetency directly to decide points of doctrine, though it is currently believed to have done so by implication :—

We do further declare, that we cannot consider this Court as entitled to express the judgment of the Church of England in points of Doctrine; and therefore, while we are ready and anxious to listen dutifully to the acknowledged Voice of the Church, we cannot accept from such a Court any interpretations or decisions in a controversy of Faith. And we do, moreover, fervently hope and pray, that Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, in the exercise of her undoubted Prerogative, may be moved to protect the ancient Liberties of the Church of England, and to remove those obstacles which, at present, prevent the church from meeting to deliberate in a free and lawful Synod, not only upon such questions pertaining to the Faith, as have been recently brought into dispute, but also upon such other subjects as affect the vital interest of the church.

Capetown.

N. J. Merriman, M.A., Archdeacon of Graham's Town.

PARIS.

Accounts from Christiana (Norway), of the 22d, contain details relative to the recent events in the town of Levanger, province of Drontheim in that kingdom. It has already been stated that communist doctrines have unfortunately become very popular among the working populations of the north of Norway, and that the disturbances at Levanger took place in consequences of the arrest of a communist propagandist, named Michelsen, who had formerly been condemned by justice. The first thing the populace did was to break open the doors of the Town Hall, where the man had been interrogated, and, not finding him there, they then made an attack on the prison to release him.

A MODEL OF A CEMETERY.

The Leicester Mercury describes a large model of an 'immense Pyramidal Cemetery' designed by Mr T. Wilson, architect, of that town, and to be sent to the Great Exhibition. Mr. Wilson thinks that the present suburban cemeteries in the neighbourhood of London will, in the course of a few years, become very much crowded, and that it will be found difficult to obtain additional tracts of land of sufficient size to prevent the necessity of a recurrence to the evils of intramural interment. He therefore purposes the construction of a National Metropolitan Cemetery on Working Common, Surrey, of from 100 to 200 acres in extent. In the centre of this, he proposes to erect his great Pyramid Mausoleum, occupying an area of from 18 to 20 acres, and rising in successive stages of catacombs (10 feet high and arched) to the height of 900 feet—each stage of course, gradually diminishing—until the apex is reached; and on the top of that, the plan further embraces the elevation of an astronomical observatory in the shape of an obelisk. This Pyramid would hold above 5,000,000 bodies; and large as the cost would be, that need not be an insuperable objection, since the erection of the vast edifice would proceed stage upon stage, as one became filled—and the money paid for catacombs would probably defray the cost of each stage.—Weekly News.

SLAVERY IN AMERICA.

	Slaves.
The Methodists hold.....	219,563
Presbyterians (old and new school)	77,000
Baptists.....	125,000
Campbellites (Baptists).....	101,000
Episcopalians.....	88,000
Other Denominations	50,000
Total owned by ministers of the Gospel and members of Protestant Churches.....	660,563

Valuing each slave at an average of 400 dollars, or 80*l.* here is a capital of 52,845,040*l.* invested by a Christian people in the bodies and souls of men.—Patriot, March 6.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 19.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, May 10, 1851.

CATHOLIC CLERGY OF THE DIOCESE OF LIMERICK.

We lay before our readers to-day an admirable document, the Petition of the Catholic Clergy of Limerick, against Lord Russell's Penal Law. We had the pleasure of knowing the Very Rev. Chairman Dr. Coll, many years since in Ireland and we are happy to find that though much advanced in years, he is still able to preside with dignity and efficiency at a public meeting of his Reverend Brethren. Dr. Coll was the very first Clergyman in Ireland, who, when the well known Mr. Owen came to Ireland, to establish there his system of Anti-Christian Socialism, exposed in so clear and masterly a manner its dangerous and impious tendencies, in a public meeting convened at Limerick, at which Mr. Owen was present, that the latter gave up all further attempts to gain Converts in Ireland. The case was however very different in England and Wales. In these countries of sects and heresies, Owen found thousands ready listners and then converts to his Communistic Doctrines, and so much favor did he find among the Lord John Russells of that day, that he was actually presented at Court. At the time when he was thus honored his English and Welsh followers were reputed to amount in number, to four hundred thousand persons.

RUSSELL AGITATION.

TO THE COMMONS IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

The Petition of the Roman Catholic Clergy of the Diocese of Limerick.

SHEWETH,

That Petitioners are the Clergy of the people of the Diocese of Limerick, no matter by what fiction of law others may claim their obedience, or may live upon their means.

That Petitioners have learned with grief and indignation the intention of Lord John Russell to seek from your honorable house the enactment of a law which while it jeopardizes the peace of these countries is injurious to the dignity and authority of the Crown.

That any legislation which forces into direct antagonism the necessary dictates of conscience and the authority of the State, arrays the temporal power in hostility to the law of God; and that obedience to such legislation would, to some extent, involve an apostacy from the known and recognised truth of the Gospel.

That the enjoyment of Religious liberty by Roman Catholics essentially requires the perfect organization of their Hierarchy; and that any proscriptive interference with the rights, titles, or functions of such Hierarchy, is subversive of the equality to which Petitioners believe they have an indefeasible right.—Bearing the burdens of the State equally with others, sharing its responsibilities, and ready to rise in its defence, they deem it an intolerable grievance that their most sacred convictions should be excluded from the protection which it is bound to afford.

The petitioners are loyal from a principle superior to selfishness, and invariable as right and truth. That this loyalty has been attested by their deeds, and by the testimony of the very men who recently aspersed them; and yet that they are the only class of the English empire who are disbelieved when they declare their own principles and views. On the contrary, the inventions of malevolence and the perversions of prejudice are received as exponents of their creed. Petitioners declare that if legislation proceed upon data so wicked and absurd, and if it realise the threats of the late minister of the crown, it is impossible to anticipate the dangers with which this country is menaced, Petitioners beg to represent that the obtrusion of the established form of religion as the occasion of every aggression upon their belief, is impolitic, dangerous, and unjust Exclusive patronage and protection begets in one—and in Ireland a small part of the community—pride and assumption, while in their fellow subjects it produces jealousy and angry reaction. Petitioners submit that there never can exist in Ireland the union so necessary for national progress until this iniquitous and absurd system of legislation shall be abandoned.

Petitioners beg to assure your Honorable House that the rights, titles and functions of the Roman Catholic Episcopacy are purely spiritual, and conferred by a spiritual jurisdiction which no earthly power can legitimately impede or assume. To the Queen's Majesty belongs the concession of temporal titles, and of spiritual titles to those possessing the form of belief which accepts her Majesty as its head. But to the Bishop of Rome, as successor of Saint Peter, and Vicar of Jesus Christ, Petitioners believe belongs the right of appointing bishops and erecting Sees in the universal Church; and this right they will maintain at the sacrifice of property, liberty, and life.

Petitioners, therefore, pray that your Honorable House will enact no law preventing the assumption of ecclesiastical titles by the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, because such a law will assail the liberty of twelve millions of her Majesty's subjects, render their temporal duty absolutely incompatible with the laws of God, exceed the power of your Honorable House, or of any State, or of all the States in the world—be an unprovoked insult to the Roman Catholics, who assure your Honorable House that the establishment of Sees is a purely spiritual act and office, and therefore will jeopardize the public peace of the kingdom, while it will injure the dignity and authority of the Monarch.

And Petitioners take occasion to pray that your Honorable House will repeal the absurd and inoperative clauses affecting the Hierarchy and Regular Clergy in the Relief Act of 1829. These clauses are insulting and oppressive to Petitioners and to the Catholic people of Ireland, while they can afford no protection to the Protestant form of belief; and that they are a continued memorial of the wrongs, Petitioners' faith has suffered, as well as of the presumption which impertinently assumes to treat them as strangers in their own country.

And your Petitioners, &c.

[Limerick Chronicle.] March 5.

PROTEST OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC BAR OF IRELAND, AGAINST THE ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES ASSUMPTION BILL.

We, the undersigned Roman Catholic members of the Irish Bar, feel bound publicly to declare our sense of the impolicy and injustice of the Bill now before Parliament respecting Ecclesiastical Titles.

We take this step with reluctance, because we are unwilling to act on public questions as a separate class in the community, in respect either of our professional position or our religious belief; but on this occasion we fear that silence on our part might be constructed into acquiescence.

We view the proposed measure as retrogressive and penal in its character, an infringement upon religious liberty, an unwarrantable interference with the discipline of our Church, and a departure from the policy recently pursued by the Legislature, in facilitating the voluntary endowment of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy and Clergy of this country.

We object to this measure, because, by subjecting our religion to special legislation of a vexatious character, it will place the Roman Catholic people in a position of inferiority to their fellow-subjects.

We object to the measure, because it will create new difficulties in the administration of charitable bequests and religious trusts connected with the Roman Catholic Church, unduly control the free disposition of property, interfere with and endanger settlements made upon the faith of existing laws, and in its results be productive of great embarrassments and irritation.

Finally, we object to the measure, because it has been conceived and framed in a spirit of hostility to the Roman Catholic religion, and because it is calculated to revive animosities which have been so baneful to our country, and which in latter years have been happily subsiding.

John Howley, Q.C., Second Queen's Serjeant.
James O'Brien, Q.C., Third Queen's Serjeant.
Nicholas Purcell O'Gorman, Q.C.
Daniel R. Kane Q.C.
James Plunkett, Q.C.
J. D. Fitzgerald, Q.C.
Mathew R. Sausse, Q.C.
Vincent Scully, Q.C.
David Lynch, Q.C.
Richard Deasy, Q.C.
Thomas O'Hagan, Q.C.
James Stratherne Close, Q.C.

Blake, Patrick J.	Magrath, Cahill
Haytagh, Edward	Murray, Patrick Joseph
Burke, William Joseph	M'Mahon, John
	Meehan, Alexander S.
Burke, Henry O'Neil	M'Carthy, Alexander

Bayley, Thomas Wey
Casserley, James
Cooke, J. William
Close, Arthur
Cogan, William H.
Curran, John A.
Coollins, Thomas
Coppinger, Stephen
Conway, W. A.
Devereux, J. H.
Donohoe, Thomas
Dwyer, Michael Francis
D'Arcy, Dominick
Duggan, Austin
Ferguson, Robert
Farrell, James
Fogarty, Joseph
Gallwey, Thomas
Gernon, William
Hobart, Robert
Heron, Denis Caulfield
Harding, John
Jordan, Edmund
Kernan, James
Kennan, Machael
Lawless, Edward B.
Lawless, Philip
Lynch, Thomas Perry
Levey, John
Loughnan, James Meade
Meagher, Francis
Murphy, John D.
Mullen, Robert
M'Donnell, Edward
Mackey, William
Marnan, Mulhallen
M'Kenna, Peter John
Molloy, Bryan A.
Maguire, Edward
Mara, William F.
M'Elroy, John
M'Gowran, James
Moylan, Thomas
M'Dermott, Daniel
Neligan, John C
O'Shaughnessy Michael
O'Callaghan, Isaac L.
O'Connell, John. M.P.
O'Gorman, Nicholas Smith
O'Loghlen, Colman M., Bart.
O'Donnell, Mathew
O'Mahony, Edward
O'Hara, Henry
O'Neil, Charles H.
O'Hagan, John
O'Donnell, Joseph H.
O'Loughlin, James H.
O'Brien, Patrick
O'Grady, James, LL.D.
Penefather, William
Pigot, John Edward
Roche, James Downes
Sherlock, David
Scully, James Daniel
Whyte, John Charles
White, Pierce Francis
Walsh, Robert Waters, George
Walsh, John Hussey

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON AND THE PARISH PRIEST OF RAHAN.—Rahan is a Parish in the King's County—and the Rev. Mr. Fitzgerald is Parish Priest. In this Parish a meeting was recently held by the Parishioners, lay and clerical, to petition against the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. Resolutions were voted unanimously, and the Petition, which was framed by Mr. Fitzgerald, was an excellent one. Rev. Mr. Fitzgerald, exercising a sound and judicious discretion addressed a request to the Duke of Wellington, praying that his Grace would be so kind as to present the Petition to the House of Lords. In the course of a few days, Mr. Fitzgerald was honoured with a letter from his Grace expressing his readiness to present the Petition, but intimating some irregularity in the document, which he desired should be corrected. But the important, the really important point is this—that his Grace intimated he should cheerfully present the petition, and support its prayer. This is really an important piece of intelligence. Though one might deduce the Duke's opinion from his previous conduct this we believe is the first public indication of his views on this question. These views are in accordance with the feelings of his countrymen, and there can no possible doubt that they will have an effect on the Legislature and on England more than sufficient to counterbalance the uproar of the last three or four months. We do not know that we ever communicated a fact with more pleasure to our readers than that which he have just laid before them.—Dublin Evening Post.

RESTORATION OF THE CATHOLIC HIERARCHY IN ENGLAND.

Election of a Bishop—In consequence of the resignation of the bishopric of Moray and Ross by the Right Rev. Dr. Low, the Primus (Bishop Skinner) has issued his mandate to the Presbyters to meet on Friday, the 31st inst., for the purpose of proceeding to the election of a new Bishop. It is expected that the Presbytery will be divided in opinion, and that there will be a severe contest between the Puseyite and Low Church parties.—Home News.

A reflecting impartial person who reads the preceding announcement can hardly forbear to enquire, wherefore all the noise and discord occasioned by the late restoration in England of the Catholic Hierarchy? Is it that the Catholic Bishops have been nominated without the sanction of the Queen? That cannot be the explanation, for here we find the Scotch Bishops providing a successor to one of their Body, without troubling themselves in the least, about Her Majesty's approval or disapproval of their proceeding. Is it that the nomination of Catholic Bishops in England interferes unduly with the Protestant Episcopate spiritually considered, of that country? Neither will this suggest any satisfactory answer. For assuredly in Scotland where Presbyterianism is the established Church, the election of an Episcopal Chief Pastor by no means interferes with, or disturbs the exercise of that authority, which the Heads of the Presbyterian Church claim over the Members of their Communion. Is it in fine, that the new Catholic Hierarchy infringes in any way or trespasses upon the temporalities of the Protestant Episcopacy? This besides being an impracticable supposition, is openly at variance with the repeated public and solemn avowals of the Catholic Body, their oaths of allegiance to the Sovereign and the public conduct of those amongst them who at home and abroad have been entrusted with important public offices in every department of Government. Even in what regards the interchange of the Courtesies of Society, who has ever heard of any Catholic Government Official, who has been wanting in the exhibition of them to those Protestant Dignitaries with whom they happened to be connected in their public relations? Assuredly? No one. We feel as assured as if present in the localities, that the Protestant Bishop of Gibraltar who resides at Malta experiences as much polite and hospitable attention from its present pious and talented Catholic Governor, as he would from any of the Exeter Hall leaders, if one of these worthies happened to hold Mr. O'Ferrall's appointment. And, what we affirm of Mr. O'Ferrall in Malta, we can assert with equal confidence of Mr. McCarthy the Catholic Secretary of Government at Ceylon, of Mr. Wise at Athens, of Mr. Sheil at Florence and of Col. Sheil at Teheran, &c. &c.

The real source then of the tumult and discord occasioned by the recent organisation of the English Catholic Hierarchy must be derived from the bigotry and intolerance of a large Section of the upper Classes of English Society, and from the gross brutal ignorance and bad passions of the lower order excited to frenzy by men, from whose station experience and education, very different conduct might have been expected. In our next we shall advert to the struggle, which the premised announcement states is likely to take place at the election of the new Bishop, between the Puseyite and the Low Church parties.

VOLTAIRE AN APOLOGIST FOR RELIGION.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

Sir,—A Friend having favored me with the perusal of a most interesting and valuable French treatise, entitled "Petite Bibliotheque Religieuse" viz, the small religious Library, I beg to forward for insertion in your Journal, the accompanying translation of a Chapter of the work. The object of the treatise is to present together at one glance, the recorded testimonies in favor of religion which by a Divine Providence are to be found in the publications of Infidel Writers, Voltaire, Rousseau &c. &c. The compiler of the work here noticed, lays simply before his Reader each of these evidences and leaves it wholly to the Reader to deduce his own conclusions. The apposite motto, if I may so call it, of this excellent publication is "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." I shall merely add that the edition from which the subjoined translation is made is that published by Du Vivier at Liege, 1827.

Calcutta, 8th, May 1851.

A Catholic.

Voltaire an Apologist for Religion.

Art 2.—Objections favorable to religion, and first those which attack the abuses which ligion itself deplores, are out of place in the mouths of Infidels.

In the abuse which is made of Religion; you see only the workings of human passion, but I can perceive in them divine wisdom, which has preserved religion notwithstanding these abuses.(1)

Amongst mortals, by a fatal abuse, the most perfect good may become the source of evil.(2)

If art be innocent, the abuse thereof is criminal.

We cast no odium upon the arts notwithstanding the abuses so fatal and dangerous to morals, which have originated from painting, sculpture and poetry. It is not art that is defective but man. We must also love religion and serve God, notwithstanding the cries of hypocrites and the superstitions which dishonor divine worship, (3) Because men can abuse the art of printing as they do writing or speech, does it follow that we should be deprived of so valuable an invention? as well might we be deprived of the use of speech to prevent our making bad arguments; or of the use of drink through fear that some one might become intoxicated; or that a man's blood be taken from him, because he might get apoplexy; all this is nothing else but a mistake and a false deduction, viz., a general conclusion from particular premises (4.)

All our warriors are not to be judged by the cowardice of one and it would be an error to attribute to an entire nation the vices of several individuals. Do some blades of cockle destroy the hopes of the harvest would a caterpillar shown to us in the garden of Versailles or Saint Cloud, lessen the worth of these master-pieces of art?(5) Why then should consequences so ridiculous in every other case be admissible only against religion? There are some wanderings of individuals or even entire bodies of men, which should only be imputed to the misfortunes of the times. A community may err; it is composed of men: but these men also repair their faults. Reason, sound doctrine, modesty, diffidence in self return to take the place of ignorance, pride and passion. We no longer dare condemn any one after having ourselves been so worthy of condemnation.(6) Alas, we have made all things conducive to our ruin, even religion itself! but this is not the fault of its morality which inspires only meekness and patience, which teaches to suffer but not to persecute.(7) Such is the deplorable condition of men that the most divine remedies have been

(1) End of 1st. para. Vol. 60, p. 180.
(2) Vol. 49, p. 247.
(3) Vol. 43, p. 146.
(4) Vol. 60, p. 250.
(5) Vol. 41, p. 225.
(6) Vol. 60, p. 184.
(7) Vol. 17, p. 105.

turned into poison. It is thus that practices established in the most saintly manner, sometimes become the occasions of the most fatal abuse (8)—no—certainly it was not religion which meditated and which executed the massacre of St. Bartholomew: religion is humane, because it is divine, it prays for sinners but does not exterminate them, nor does it destroy those whom it desires to instruct.(9) Must abuse irritate, and good laws make no impression on you?

Thus the science of God has been profaned, absurd ideas given of the divinity and thence persons conclude against religion. It is just the same as saying that quinine should not be taken for fever—or bleeding be had recourse to for Apoplexy, because there are unskilful Physicians.

Would you deny the Science of Astronomy, because there have been Astrologers; or the evident effects of Chemistry, because some wheedling Chemists have pretended to make gold?(10)

Religion is not less true, less sacred, less divine, were it even certain (which assuredly it is not) that it had been so long sullied with crime and reddened with slaughter.

A Physician having given too strong (11) a dose of emetic to his patients they were seized with convulsions; but is it because too much of a good remedy has been taken that it is to be for ever renounced.

(To be continued.)

CATHEDRAL MALE ORPHANAGE.

UNDER THE CARE OF THE CHRISTIAN BROTHERS.

The present Dormitory of the Male Orphanage affording accommodation only to forty-four Children, and the number of Inmates being now fifty-four, whilst applications are almost daily made for the admission of other destitute Orphans, it is proposed to erect by Subscription a second Dormitory and Offices, in order both to meet the existing exigencies of the Institution and to enable the Christian Brothers to extend its Benefits still more widely.

SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Archbishop Carew,	...	Rs. 50	0
Mrs. Young,	...	50	0

CATHOLIC SCHOOLS, CALCUTTA.

At the meeting of the General Committee on last Sunday, the School Reports for April exhibited 625 Pupils in attendance at the several Catholic Schools of Calcutta.

HOLY WEEK, CALCUTTA.

The number of Communicants in Holy Week and on Easter Sunday, at the several Catholic Churches is estimated at about one Thousand.

A DISCOURSE ON THE MISSION AND INFLUENCE OF THE POPES, BY THE RIGHT REV. BISHOP GILLIS.

"WHOM DO MEN SAY THAT THE SON OF MAN IS?"—Matt. xvi. 13

These words, Beloved Brethren, occur in the portion of St. Matthew's Gospel read during the Mass of yesterday's Festival, and they lead there to a dialogue between the Saviour of the world and one of his disciples, the import of which it may not be without advantage for us to meditate, while engaged with the rest of the Catholic Church in commemorating the martyrdom of Rome's two glorious apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul.

Thirty years and more had passed away, since the wondrous birth of the Child of Bethlehem, the greatest prodigy of which was still exclusively the secret of his Virgin Mother; and the tomb perchance had already closed over the simple shepherds of Judea, whom an angelic messenger had led to worship at his crib, as well as over the wise men from the East to whom a star of heaven had revealed the humble cradle of the infant King of the Jews. He had grown up the while to manhood, so veiled, as it were, in miraculous obscurity, as literally to justify the words of his evangelist: "He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not."* Widely different, however, had matters now been for more than a whole twelvemonth. Jesus had so far emerged from the mysterious cloud that shrouded from mortal eyes the internal glory of His being, for the hour of His public ministry had come, and "His mouth had spoken wisdom" to the surrounding crowds, and he had walked forth once and again in all the strength of His Divinity, "with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm."† That arm had been stretched, and that hand had been raised, to restore sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, or a voice to the speechless; to expel from the bodies of those around Him whole legions of devils; to multiply the living fishes of the deep or the dead ones of the wilderness; to cleanse the leper, and give power to the palsied limb; to command alike the storms of the sea, and the stillness of the grave; so that the astonished multitudes were every where heard to exclaim,

(8) Vol. 32, p. 314.
(9) Vol. 46, p. 12.
(10) Vol. 50, p. 457.
(11) Vol. 45, p. 36.

* John i. 10. † Psalm cxxxv. 12.

that "never had the like been seen in Israel."‡

Such, dear Brethren, were the circumstances under which our Blessed Redeemer put the question to his disciples: "Whom do men say that the Son of man is?" They said: "Some John the Baptist, and other some Elias, and others Jeremias, or one of the prophets." Jesus pursued,—"But whom do you say that I am?" Simon Peter then answered and said, "Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God!" and Jesus answering, said to him—"Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jonah, because flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee, but my Father who is in heaven.

There is to me, I own, something wondrously sublime in this familiar converse between the rude Jewish fisherman and the Incarnate Son of God. Peter had left his all to follow in the steps of Jesus. He had watched His every movement, and been the daily witness of His many prodigies; and unconscious of any other ground on which to rest his certainty, or that he was himself at the moment illumined from above by a ray of the Divine Light, he looks his Master in the face, and unhesitatingly tells him that he has found out the secret of his being, and that he knows him to be Christ the Son of the living God. Not less wondrously instructive is the manner in which the boldness of St. Peter's faith is here explained to us by the Redeemer, when He declares, that however many, or however great, the outward motives of belief before him, it was not through the mere exercise of any reasoning faculty of his nature, that he had come to this conclusion: "flesh and blood had not revealed it to thee;" but, that as he had been made to see, so had he been strengthened to speak the revealed Truth, by the direct agency of that Divine Being who alone could reveal it—"Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jonah, because flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee, but my Father who is in heaven." Our blessed Lord then hastens to add: "And I say to thee, that thou art Peter;" (Peter! who was to tremble and deny his Master at the voice of a servant maid; yet, Peter for whom Jesus had prayed that his faith might not fail, and whose special mission it was afterwards to be to confirm his brethren;) "I say to thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind upon earth, it shall be bound also in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose upon earth, it shall be loosed also in heaven".

Now, mark, Beloved Brethren, the burden of this same strange discourse, and see how it proceeds. The dialogue before us results in a double testimony; a testimony mutually borne to each other by two men, one of whom a mere man, it is true, is yet under the direct inspiration of Heaven at the moment; while the other is no less than the Son of God in person. The testimony of both, then, is clearly infallible. In other words, as truly as Christ is God, so truly is Peter the rock on which is built that Church of Christ, against which the powers of hell are never to prevail; so truly does Peter hold in behalf of that Church the keys of heaven's kingdom; so truly is bound or loosed in heaven whatsoever he binds or looses within that Church upon earth. There is no escaping from the inference. The words are such as to admit of no other meaning; and such also is their context, as to render that meaning unmistakeably evident. It was, in fact, as if our Blessed Saviour had said to his disciple,—Thou hast borne witness to what I AM, and thy testimony is true, for God Himself hath revealed it to thee. I AM the Son of the living God.—And now I shall bear witness to what thou art. I have called thee Cephas or Peter, which means a rock; well, then, thou art indeed Peter, or a rock, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

That these words, Beloved Brethren, although actually addressed to none but Peter personally, were not understood to apply to Peter exclusively, but to find their application for all time coming in those who were to inherit the privileges of Peter's special mission, is a truth demonstrable not only from the unanimous testimony of the earliest Christian Churches of the world, some of which had listened to the very teaching of Peter himself; but a truth of which the evidence must in a manner force itself upon every unprejudiced mind capable of appreciating the following very simple reasoning.

Whatever privileges were given to St. Peter, or whatever duties were made to devolve upon him in reference to the Church which Christ built, were undeniably to endure as long as the Church was to last, for whose benefit they were intended: for, if restricted to the limited period of Peter's earthly career, it is clear that not only the power of binding and loosing must have ceased in the Church, from the moment of that Apostle's death; but that, there being no longer in the world any Peter on whom the Church could rest, as upon the rock of her foundation, there was no longer for the Christian Church any security against the ultimate prevailing of the gates of hell. Since the Church, then, over which St Peter had presided, did continue to exist beyond the period of his natural life, one of two conclusions must necessarily be arrived at: either that there is now in the world no Church of Christ's building; or, that Peter must still live in the persons of his successors; and that whatever Church rests upon them, as on the rock of her foundation, that is the Church of Christ's building.

‡ Matth. ix. 33.

We, my dear Catholic Brethren, require no convincing upon this head; nor have I come hither to day to argue the apostolic claims of Peter and his successors in Rome's Holy See. But, assembled, as we now are, around the altar of God, to give solemn thanks for the return of the present earthly representative of the Prince of the apostles to the prophetic city of his unfailing Priesthood, I would seek rather to confirm you in the Faith you already profess, by endeavouring to show that it alone has ever strictly coincided with, and been supported by the Providential decrees of God, as these have been gradually developed in public events, from the beginning of the Church's history to the present day.

The divine mission of St. Peter, and of his successors unto the end of time in the Apostolic Primacy, is to preside over and govern in its entirety, that Church which Christ built, and through whose ministry was to be continued among men, the great work of the world's Redemption.—The humiliations, then, the weakness and the apparent folly, but at the same time, the wisdom, the power, and the triumphs of the Cross; such clearly are the mysterious elements that must for ever be found combined in the earthly fortunes of the Church; and form the leading and characteristic features in the chequered story of its Supreme Pontiffs.

(To be continued.)

Selections.

EDUCATION,

Religion the true Basis on which it rests.

THE WARRENPOINT SCHOOLS CHARITY SERMON.

On Sunday last, a Charity Sermon was preached in the Catholic Church, Warrenpoint, by the Rev. H. Marshall, formerly a member of Oxford, and a clergyman of the Established Church. The fame of the preacher, as well as the meritorious object of sustaining the cause of education, attracted a large and respectable audience. After the celebration of Mass the Rev. gentleman ascended the altar, and delivered an eloquent and argumentative discourse, of which we subjoin an epitome.

The Rev. PREACHER after reading the gospel of the day, reminded his hearers of the frequency with which the similitude of the cultivation of the vine occurred in Holy Scripture, when foretelling or describing the progress of the great work of the regeneration of the human heart. He should take advantage of it that day, in placing before them the important principles on which he should found the appeal he came to make that day in favor of the children of Christ's poor. After alluding to the importance of the work of education, and to the great want of it felt and recognised by every speaker or writer of the present day, and after having shown that for 300 years neither in England had the Established Church been willing, nor in Ireland had it been able, to educate the masses. He proposed to prove to them that the Catholic church alone could educate the people—as she alone was authorised to teach all nations of the earth, and to her alone had been given the commission and power to complete that work of God—the restoration of the human race to the true character from which it had fallen. He showed first, that the religion of Protestants—containing in itself the germs of disunion—stood in the way of the very work it pretended to perform. Under its influence religion must either be adopted or discarded; from a system of education to discard it was revolting to men of wisdom, piety, and experience; but to adopt it, placed them in difficulties of no less magnitude. If adopted, either the religion of the establishment must be selected, or that of the Dissenters. If the latter—what sort should be chosen? If the former, what sect within the pale of the establishment should then be chosen? Here was the great Protestant difficulty; and thus it stultified itself by the very principles of its own existence: whereas the Catholic Church ever had connected religion with the education of her children—and, if married at all in her work, it was in consequence of the opposition of her enemies and not from any defect either in her own zeal or principles. The Catholic Church he asserted, could alone educate the world.—Education, a word so common at the present day, but the true idea of which few seemed able to grasp, might best be described under the simile of the cultivation of the vine—for that required the preparation of the soil, the removal of all hinderances to the growth of the plant, the draining away of stagnant, chilling water, the pruning off such shoots as might prove too rank or too luxuriant, the exposure of the more healthy branches of the plant to the salutary influence of the sun and rain, the gathering of the fruit, and the gardening of it, where the owner of the vineyard would have it treasured. It was a complete work, but to stop at any one portion of it, would be to render the whole fruitless, and throw all industry and skill away.—And so it was with education; the object of it was to develope the whole man, to draw out, train up, to foster, to make fruitful, preserve from premature decay, and to preserve to its true end—not alone the physical and intellectual—but the moral and spiritual portion of his created constitution. Education, to deserve the name, must aim not only at the mind, but at the spirit and the heart as well, and anything short of this could not be said to be education. He who should teach that the development of the mind, its properties, its gifts, and excellences, was all that we had to do, in training and educating a human being, was guilty of as much folly as a nurse would be, who, after teaching a little child to walk, and put forth its infant energies, should say that she had finished his education. Those who would reach the mind alone, might make us artists, mechanics, or engineers—might make us useful in our day and generation—might enable us to fulfil some portion of the work we had to do: but men were not created alone for that, nor was it for such a destiny alone that we were redeemed at such a tremendous price. And the moralist might take us a step or two higher up the ladder; but then, what was the experience of the six thousand years of this world's weary life? It had its moral giants in their days; but what influence had all their teaching, even on the followers who took their names, and what look now these great monument to us? As ruined towers, exhibiting at their base proofs of the strength and skill with which they were built up, but shattered in their summits, overgrown with mourning ivy, a few wild flowers or perhaps a tree, springing from some fissure in the stones, planted there by some bird of chance and withering in the frost of death. The Catholic Church alone, could truly educate, for in her teaching she aimed at heart and mind, and calculated on results beyond the reach of accident or decay. For instance to revert to the simile of the cultivation of any plant:—If the land which we should propose to till, should prove rocky, or should have swamp, would it not be necessary to remove such impediments? Until removed would not all care and cost be thrown away? However plentiful the seed, however rich the manure, however heavy and great the toil, or vast the skill, however wakeful the anxiety, however full of prayer and hope the husbandman, however indulgent heaven in its bounty of shower and sunshine, could there be any other fruit but thorns, brambles, weeds, and worthless thistles? Is there any such impediment in the human heart?—Is there some desolating swamp? Is there in the man some impediment inherent in his nature, rendering, until removed, all cultivation useless? There is, and it is sin. The preacher after measuring by the atonement of Christ, the extent and nature of sin, and having shown its positive existence and desolating influence over the heart of man, declared that it could be removed alone by the influences, gifts, graces, and sacraments of the Catholic Church, which had been endowed by Almighty God with the commission and power to wage its warfare against sin, and to rest not until it was annihilated.—The Catholic Church had power to remove and to destroy sin. It removed it by the holy truths it taught, by the lessons of piety and virtue that it enforced, and, above all, by the use of those keys by which she unlocked heaven, and by the sword by which she could break the slavery of hell. What Catholic was there who did not acknowledge its mighty influence here—even its very shadow had power. It might be the sound of a bell, the sight of a ruined church, the name of an honored saint, and consolation at once began its gentle whisperings, but it was at the tribunal of confession where it would be most found, when he who had been loaded with it brought his staggering footsteps to the judge of mercy, and in return for the acknowledgment of guilt, the sighs of sorrow, and promised penance, he should receive the full forgiveness of his sins, and like the forgiven adulteress in the gospel, be told to 'go and sin no more.' Then again, the Catholic Church alone could teach, for she alone claimed to have authority from God. The mind of man is naturally independent; it has a liberty given to it by God, which no man may take away—"call, no man master, was the counsel of Jesus Christ.—God has given to us a free will, a reason, a heart.—He has given to us such excellent gifts as separate us from the visible creation. No one beneath us can be even our companion, and no one of our species has any right to tyrannise or domineer. You may chain the body and keep the victim in a dungeon, but you cannot compel him to think as you shall choose, or to surrender his affections to objects that have not won his will. God alone has the right, as he alone made us, and made us for Himself—has the right to demand the submission of our reason—the homage of our hearts, and the surrender of our free will to Him. And, in the name of God, with His authority alone, as His vicar, as His agent, His representative, with the marks of His wisdom, His power and goodness, deeply impressed upon her, the Catholic Church claims the submission of the human race to the teaching which, in the name of Jesus Christ, she publishes to the entire world. Nor does she teach—mighty as is her authority—with a tone and manner of a tyrant. True, she has thunders, the echoes of which shall reverberate, for all eternity, in hell. But, then, they are for disobedient sons, and those who wilfully impugn the truths she teaches. But, it is with a mother's love, with a winning and a gentle voice, with smiles that penetrate the bosom, and chase away all care and fear, that she teaches the children whom she loves, and whom she would have made Christ's own for ever. The Catholic Church alone can teach the heart, can show it how to love, and present to it objects worthy of its warmest and most ennobling affections. This she does in her doctrine of the communion of the saints, by which each dutiful child she has is taught to feel himself a member—for in spite of all his own-felt unworthiness, a member of a brotherhood of saints and heroes. She does it in all her offices and ordinances, in baptism at his birth, with the gifts of chrism, when his reason dawns, meeting him at every turn of his eventful life with some fresh proof of her great regard for him, feeding him with the very body of her own dear Lord, administering with tender care the salutary medicine for his soul, fortifying him his last agony, for his encounter with the spirits of darkness, and even after his eyes have closed, and his breath departed, still keeping him in her affectionate remembrances, in all those prayers with which she is for ever satisfying Heaven. But above all, does she complete this portion of her task in the doctrine, that she alone of all religions, practises towards her who is chosen to be the Mother of Jesus Christ. Is it not enough to make the bosom burn and overwhelm it with celestial influences, to know that she, the mightiest servant of Almighty God, purer than the angels, corresponding to the uttermost with all the treasury of grace that Heaven in its bounty exhausted upon her, charming the Holy Spirit Himself, who, enamoured of her charms, descended from Heaven, that of her might be conceived in human flesh, the Eternal Son of God himself. To know that she prostrates herself before the throne of God clasping her sinless hands upon her ever virgin bosom in supplication for us sinners, and permitting us to approach her, tenderly and familiarly, and salute her with the title of 'our dear Mother.' And then again, with what reverend affection, with what burning sentiments of love, does the church invite us to approach the king of tremendous majesty, Himself, bidding us remember that for the love of us He became a man, taking upon him all our ills and woes, and asking no other terms save the consolation of knowing that we are willing to receive his caresses. Nor let it be forgotten that it is not by precept only, but example, that the church has taught her children: in all the lessons that she teaches, of virtue and of holiness, she enforces them by the heroic examples of her saints. She can point to St Agnes, who, though young, beautiful, and rich, preferred the love of Christ to all, and thought that furnace, into which her persecutors cast her, cold as ice, in comparison to those flames with which the love of her celestial spouse consumed her. She could point when she would urge her missionaries to do her glorious work—to her St. Francis Xavier—perishing in the heats of India, or to her St. Patrick, propagating the faith upon the lofty mountains and the green valleys of Ireland, and praying to Him, who would not refuse his prayer, that the same Holy Faith might be Ireland's inheritance for ever. So could she point to her confessors, in all their immense variety, to teach us patience and to endure every trial, and when she sings the praises of her martyrs, she invites us to remember that God, who gave us life, is yet more lovely than the life He gave us. Thus, then, alone could the Catholic Church teach and train the human race, for it alone had power over the entire man, and commenced a work which ended not until the fruits it sought were garnered up in heaven. What, then must be their joy and gratitude to God, for that immense movement by which the Church was gaining ground in the very countries where her enemies had thought she had lost all footing? What must be their gratitude to God for that assistance of His spirit, by which He had enabled their venerable prelates assembled in the Holy Synod, and headed by one over whom Rome mourned when losing him, she sent him as a boon to Ireland—Paul the Archbishop of Armagh—to foresee, with wonderful sagacity, the treachery of our foes, which, however artfully it was then concealed, has now, by the blunder of the Prime Minister, been made transparent to all the world, and to determine with noble faith and hopeful spirit to develope the energies of Ireland, and to devote them to the endowment of her Catholic University for the land. The reverend gentleman then reminding the people that the work they had to do was to assist their respected pastor in providing the children of the poor with Christian and Catholic education, concluded his address with an appeal to their sense of duty, and to their charity as the redeemed of Christ.—The Newry Examiner and Louth Advertiser Feb. 19.

THE PENAL LAW AND THE PARLIAMENTARY DIVISION.

The Penal Law reaches its second reading on Friday night, but when it will get through its second reading it would take a better prophet than ourselves to foretell. We fear it will meet the fate which befell the unfortunate King in the house of the northern Thane—

Macb.—Duncan comes here to-night.
Lady M.—And when goes hence?
Macb.—To-morrow, as he purposes.
Lady M.—Oh, never shall the sun that morrow see.

Among reasonable men the only question now seems to be when and where it shall be thrown out. That it can pass—that a Bill which answers no purpose, which pleases nobody, which accomplishes nothing, which settles no question, which if passed will not be obeyed, and which when disobeyed can never be enforced to answer any purpose but that of spite—that the two Houses of Parliament can ever make themselves such fools as to pass such a law through six readings and two committees, does seem a sheer impossibility. Why, even the English Catholics declare they won't obey it; that it must be resisted; and that such impotent impertinence cannot and shall not be endured!

The only question that remains undecided is how and when it shall be thrown out. It seems hardly possible that it can last through a second reading; that any human being can be induced to vote for it who is not already compromised by it, and committed to it. Will Mr. Disraeli vote for the second reading? Why should he? What has he to gain by it? His party will not accept such a Bill, nor will the Protestant insanity of the country accept such a Bill in full of all the demands it has been yelling out for the last five months. Even Sir Robert Inglis will hardly, on second thoughts, put out his hand to take such a beggarly ninepence in the pound. Even if Sir Robert does, we don't understand how any man in Mr. Disraeli's position can vote for means of escape by this device

And if he and his party, from any cause, vote against a second reading, how can the Bill hobble through the House with the bulk of the Conservatives, Sir James Graham, Messrs. Cobden, Bright, Gibson, and Sir J. Walmesley and a more numerous squad of Irish members, combining against it?

Meanwhile, in our humble judgment, the more readings it goes through, the more time it occupies, the more it is discussed, and the more trouble it gives, the better. Why? Because the more it is stirred the more offensive it becomes, and the more apparent the nastiness of its authors.

This is one reason—but there is another. The longer this Bill lasts, the more enduring is the ministerial purgation, and also the period of probation for Irish members. As matters now stand, we may hope that every week will give the Ministers one defeat, or at least one very close run for a defeat; and we shall be curious, by repeated experiments of this kind, to test the virtue of the Irish members.

Such an occasion there was on Tuesday night. Lord Duncan brought on a motion to which the most fastidious stomach could not object. There was involved in it no question of Free Trade. Men of all sides voted for it. Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Cobden; Mr. Bright and Lord Manners; George Bankes and Thomas Wakley. It was a motion to have public accounts kept a little better; that a certain kind of public property, which produces about two millions and a-half annually, and sends into the Exchequer only three-quarters of a million—the difference being absorbed in the expenses of mismanagement—shall be managed a little better in future. In a word, it was a motion for a reform in the Woods and Forests. The Government was beaten by a majority of one—a victory to which some of the Irish members contributed.

Some. There were Martin Blake, Colonel Dunne, Willim Fagan, Mr. Grace, Henry Grattan, Ouseley Higgins, Thomas Meagher, George Moore, John O'Brien, Doctor and Nicholas Power, Francis Scully, and M. Sullivan:—all these helped to make up the majority of one.

On the other side, doing Government work for wages or some other consideration that does not immediately suggest itself, were Richard M. Bellew, Fitzstephen French, the O'Gorman Mahon, J. P. Somers, the Hon. C. Clements Sir R. Ferguson, and some others, who are mere Whigs.

But then of the absent we have a most shameful list. Many of the men whom we are now going to enumerate, could not for the delicate conscience of them, vote against Free Trade, even to turn out a persecuting Minister. Plenty of opportunities less offensive to the moral dignity of an Irish member were sure to come, and they were ready to avail themselves of these; but to vote against Free Trade! they could not be guilty of such an odious indiscretion. Well, one of these opportunities presented itself, as we have seen, last week, and what do these men do? Do they take advantage of the opportunity? Not they. The worst hacks vote with the Government, with unblushing effrontery. A few vote right and true. But the many keep rigidly away, and do their best to serve and save the Government by their absence. Some names in the following list are, we believe, the names of honest men, whose absence may be accidental; but the whole list cannot be accidental; the list, as a whole, we hesitate not to say, is a corrupt list; and contains the names of men who stayed away out of consideration for a friend, a patron, and a paymaster. But read the names—we give them alphabetically :—

Anstey, T. C.	Macnamara, Major
Barron, Sir H. W.	M'Cullagh, Torrens
Blackall, Major	Monsell, W.
Butler, P. S.	Nugent, Sir P.
Devereux, J. T.	O'Brien, Sir Timothy
Fox, R. M.	O'Connell, John
Fagan, James	O'Connell, Maurice
Goold, —	O'Connell, Morgan John
Green, John	O'Flaherty, Anthony
Keatinge, R.	Reynolds, John
Keogh, W. (absent, we believe on Circuit)	Roche, Edmond
Lawless, Cecil	Sadleir, John
Magan, W. H.	Talbot, J. H.
Maher, N. V.

Twenty-seven Irish Liberal absentees! If these twenty-seven had been in their places, and had done their duty, Lord John Russell would have been in a minority, not of one, but of twenty-eight. The Irish Liberal members saved him from that great defeat.

LETTER OF FATHER IGNATIUS (THE HON. AND REV. MR. SPENCER.) TO THE PRIMATE, RECOMMENDING PRAYERS FOR THE CONVERSION OF ENGLAND.

JESU CHRIST PASSIO.

My Lord Primate—I beg leave, at this important crisis, to lay before your Lordship the spiritual necessities of my country, and to implore, through you, the charitable help of Ireland for England. It is now more than twenty-one years since I ceased being a clergyman of the Established Church in England, and became a Catholic. For many years I was the only Priest acting in England who once had been a clergyman of the Church of England. This has been my apology for taking so prominent a part as I have done in begging prayers for the conversion of England from all Catholics, but especially from those of Ireland.

I now come forward once more with my earnest appeal for my country, and entreat your Grace to support it by your authority. My petition has been, and is, that the Catholic people of Ireland should take on them the conquest of England, for God and His Church, by a holy crusade, in which the weapons will be prayer, holy example, and holy instruction. I need not say that this is a conquest in which, when it is achieved, the vanquished will be even more noble conquerors than they who subdued them.

The movement of all the Irish people in this enterprise of love—at the present time, when the adversaries of the Church which they love, not knowing what she is, are renewing their most bitter reproaches against her—would be a miracle of charity, by itself sufficient to convince England and the world that they are the true disciples of Him who, hearing the revilings of His enemies who were putting him to death, answered them by those Divine words, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

I entreat your Grace to authorise your reverend Clergy to move their people to devote themselves, during the coming Lent, to this grand work. Who can calculate the treasures of heavenly benediction which would be poured forth on England, in answer to such prayers, but much more abundantly and certainly in Ireland. —I am, my Lord, your Grace's obedient, humble servant in Jesus Christ,

IGNATIUS OF ST. PAUL, Passionist.

Dublin, Feb. 13, 1851.

MONASTERY OF MOUNT ST. BERNARD, LEICESTERSHIRE.

To the Editor of the Tablet.

Dear Mr. Editor—May I be allowed a short space in your columns to remind the public of the great charity which is continually practised at Mount St. Bernard towards the poor. Within the last four years, I have been given to understand, the number relieved has amounted to—

	Food.		Lodging.
1847	36,374	...	12,144
1848	32,521	...	6,753
1849	30,020	...	5,939
1850	29,354	...	4,927
Total ...	128,269		29,773

Thus, 128,269 portions of food have been distributed, and 29,773 of the houseless poor have been provided with lodgings, and no distinction of creed or country has been made.

Four parts out of five of those who have received this relief have been natives of Ireland. When ill or suffering from any infirmity or accident, they have been kept, even for weeks, until they were recovered. Many have had shoes and stockings given to them; and other, who were in want of necessary apparel, of both sexes, have been clothed.

While Mount St. Bernard has been providing for the wants of the body, it has also been an hospital for the soul. A great number, who were out of the Church by neglecting the sacraments for years, have been reconciled to their offended God. Many have been received into the bosom of the Church. In one year they amounted to between thirty and forty, two of whom were on the point of committing suicide, but made their peace with God, and became good members of society.

Your readers, Mr. Editor, must be aware that all this charity to body and soul could not be accomplished without great labour and expense. The Monks have been obliged for the purpose to sacrifice a good part of the produce of their land, as they have no other foundation for their own support than what they obtain from their farm, and the voluntary offerings of the Faithful, while many of their best benefactors are now gone to the reward of their charity in Heaven. Any contributions to them, therefore, whether in money or in clothes, would be a very timely and acceptable aid, to enable them to persevere in their charitable exertions for the poor of Christ.

The words of our Lord in the Gospel, addressed to all who practise charity, are very encouraging where he says—"I was hungry, and you gave me to eat; I was thirsty, and you gave me to drink: I was a stranger, and you took me in: naked, and you covered me, sick, and you visited me. Amen, I say to you, as long as you did it to one of these, my least brethren, you did it to me."

The many munificent establishments, both in England and Ireland, where our forefathers in the olden time displayed their fervent love for God in the persons of His poor, have long since passed away. After three centuries of devastation and persecution, an attempt has again been commenced, at Mount St. Bernard, to prove that the fire of Catholic charity, which ever burns to accomplish deeds the most heroic for our neighbour, is not extinguished, and that their spirit can be revived in their descendants. Catholicity, thank God, still survives amongst us, and pours annually forth from the sister island its countless multitudes into England, to seek for employment, or any chance for relief in their distress, which they may be able to obtain.

The remote solitude of Mount St. Bernard is a point to which a vast number direct their steps. Catholic Faith and charity raises in their breasts expectations which the poor Monk feel it impossible to resist. May I, therefore, Mr. Editor venture to hope that some of the charitably disposed, at this solemn season, when our Holy Mother the Church recommends so particularly, to her children the practice of alms-giving, will think of the poor Monks of Mount St. Bernard, Leicestershire; and that you, Mr. Editor, who know and have visited the Abbey, will lend your powerful assistance in so holy a cause—I remain, dear Mr. Editor, yours, very truly.

A FRIEND TO CHARITY.

11th March, 1851.

ANIMAL MAGNETISM OR MESMERISM.

BY R. LYALL, M. D. F. L. S, TRAVELS IN RUSSIA.

At General Raevksii's we were introduced to a Polish nobleman, Count Chodkiewicz, who has porcelain fabrics in the vicinity of Kief, who is a great amateur of chemistry, and a strong advocate of animal magnetism, and probably of somnambulism; subjects respecting which a general and lively conversation took place, in which the ladies warmly participated. For the last ten years animal magnetism has been much in vogue in Russia, and by it a number of medical men have made their fortunes. I was not surprised, therefore, that every effort was made to have my opinion as to this renowned method of curing diseases. At length, finding evasions useless, I frankly stated, that for some years after animal magnetism was greatly employed at Petersburgh and Moscow, I was one of its decided opponents and took all occasions of turning it into ridicule, notwithstanding that some of my friends, whose talents I highly respected, were its greatest patrons; that I had received some curious histories from undoubted authority, and witnessed some experiments that astonished me; and that, as yet, I could not make up my mind to decide, whether the marvellous cures were merely happy coincidences, the effects of the imagination, or the results of the operation of the boasted magnetic fluid. With the utmost difficulty was I allowed to maintain my determination to remain neutral between the opponents and the patrons of animal magnetism, which has but too frequently been made the instrument of the greatest abuses, and of the most immoral conduct, especially in Germany. There, indeed, it has led to the disgrace of some well-known characters, and to the dishonour of some families.—vol. 1, pp. 89, 90.

Distribution of the Bible by Protestants Missionaries, by the same.

It is painful to read the following quotation. The missionaries, "finding to their no small grief and astonishment, that not a few of the Mahomedans made it their business to ask for Testaments, without the remotest intention of reading them, and, so far as could be ascertained, for the sole purpose of providing themselves, at an easy rate, with covers for the Koran and other books, recommended by their teachers; while the sacred volume, which they had promised to read, was destroyed, or thrown aside as waste paper; they altered their plan, and now they seldom give away a copy of the Testament, till, by sounding the petitioner respecting his views, or enquiring into his character, they obtain some faint evidence that he really intends to peruse it,—with a promise, if the case seem to require it, that he will on no account destroy the word of God."* vol. 1, pp. 431, 432.

Extraordinary Scene at the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society, on Tuesday last.—It will be in the recollection of the Profession, that some years since the Council of this Society unwisely permitted a paper to be read purporting to describe an amputation under the supposed influence of mesmerism. Wisdom came late, but it came at last, and the minutes of the meeting were erased from the books of the Society. During the present session, Dr. Marshall Hall announced that the patient confessed himself to have been an impostor on that occasion, and that the whole affair was a trick. This statement, published in the medical journals, seems to have excited the indignation of the mesmerists, and Dr. Ashburner attended the meeting on Tuesday evening, to be the exponent of their views. He rose accordingly, before the paper for the evening was read, and commenced addressing the Fellows. As soon as his object became evident, Dr. Copland rose to order, and the President, after briefly recapitulating the preceding facts, stated that the question now rested between the gentleman who reported the case and Dr. Marshall Hall. It would be very irregular were he to permit its further discussion before the Society. Dr. Ashburner very unwillingly yielded to the dictum of the President; but he had scarcely resumed his seat, when a Mr. Cohen sprang up and commenced speaking and gesticulating in favor of mesmerism, as far as we could judge, but the noise and confusion were such we could scarcely catch a word he said. The Fellows were most decided that the discussion on mesmerism should not be re-opened, and Mr. Cohen seemed as determined that it should. The voice of the Fellows ultimately prevailed; and the President finally succeeded, after the waste of some time, in causing Mr. Cohen to resume his seat. Dr. Copland emphatically declared that Mr. Cohen, after the strong expression of feeling from the Society, and the declaration of the President, was irregular, and that he had insulted the Society by persisting in speaking on the subject they repudiated.—Medical Times.

* Journal of a Tour, p. 188.

SINGAPORE.

(From Singapore Free Press, Feb. 21.)

The interior of our island appears to have been in a most disturbed state for several days past, owing to an active persecution having broken out against the Chinese converts to the Roman Catholic Church, who are found scattered over the island as planters and whose numbers are steadily increasing. A very slight pretence would appear to have been laid hold of, for putting in practice a general sacking and pillaging of the plantations belonging to the Christian Chinese, and for carrying of individuals and holding them to ransom in large sums. These proceedings are generally ascribed to the influence, more or less openly exerted, of the Tan Tae Hoé, and probably of the other Secret Societies, from whose ranks the Christian converts are withdrawn, and whose power and influence is of course diminished in proportion to the success of the Roman Catholic Missionaries. Besides withdrawing members from these Secret Societies, the extensive conversion of the Chinese in the interior has had the effect of placing everywhere throughout the island, men who are subject to influences adverse to the interests of the Societies, who are thus deprived of that complete immunity from surveillance which constitutes one of the sources of their power. With these Chinese converts disseminated throughout the island, the Hoés can no longer hold their meetings, or execute sentence on refractory or defaulting members, with the same security which they once enjoyed that there will be no spy upon their proceedings. This it is which no doubt has led to such a general attack upon the Christian Chinese throughout the length and breadth of the island, and it will be very difficult as long as this feeling lasts to restore anything like security and order. The Secret Societies are no doubt determined to make a strong effort to destroy the influence of the missionaries and to deter the members of these societies from deserting them for the Christian Hoé, as it called. To those converts who apply for protection to the heads of these Societies the answer is—return to the Society and you will be safe. It will probably therefore be necessary that some prompt measures be taken by the Government to put a stop for the present, and also for the future to these lawless proceedings. The present police force is avowedly unequal to cope with this outbreak in addition to discharging its usual duties. It will be necessary to augment the force assigned to the rural districts, but to prevent this becoming too burdensome on the Municipal Funds, we would again re-iterate the suggestion that there should be two or three small Military stations in the interior of the island, say at Changie, Bukit Tima and Krangie. The sepoys stationed there we would not employ as police peons, or in any other unusual duty, but we should expect that the very fact of their being so near at hand to assist the ordinary police, in the event of any serious disturbance of the peace, would contribute very much to ensure the continued maintenance of order. We have heard no objections stated to this proposal which are of any weight or founded upon any good grounds, and we have the system already in operation at Malacca. Why it should not be tried here we know not. If it would undermine the discipline of an officer or a sepoy, to be detached for a month to Bukit Timah on out-station duty, we should be very much inclined to doubt whether that officer or sepoy is worth his salt, and to recommend his being got quit of as soon as possible as a decidedly bad bargain. The plan is worth trial at all events, and as it may save the Municipal funds from being altogether swamped, we would recommend the Municipal Committee to take it into their serious consideration, and if it finds favor in their eyes, to press its adoption with higher authorities.

A long account of the operations against the Chinese in the Jungle will be found in another column. The conduct of the Chinese seems to have been extremely daring, and we hope that the authorities will leave no effort untried to bring the ringleaders to justice, and to teach the lawless population of the interior the danger they incur by disturbing the public peace, and offering resistance to the execution of the law.

On Monday evening the full complement of the convicts having come up, a detachment of 50 Sepoys headed by an European Officer, Lieutenant Wilson, also arrived, and the Catholic Missionary of the Chapel most cheerfully put at their disposal the whole of the hospital as a barrack for the troops, while the Commanding Officer was located in the Revd. Gentleman's own apartments. On Tuesday the Police force reinforced by Constable Hale and some Peons, and followed by the Military, departed to execute twenty-two warrants issued at the instance of the Catholic owners of as many plantations which had been pillaged by the heathen. The force arrived at 4 o'clock in the morning at Kraujee village, without having been observed or betrayed. Halting there for a few minutes, the light of a dammer carried by one of three armed Chinese was seen to descend a hill. The greatest silence was preserved until they were at a few yards distance but still on the steep declivity of the hill, there they discovered the force, threw their light away and disappeared, at the same moment a shot was fired by a concealed rioter and the noise and cries of a multitude of people from every direction saluted the discovery of the police party, which however by some very intricate paths continued its movement, and succeeded in inspecting a great number of bangsals, in some of which robbers were identified and some stolen property recovered. It being however now about 10 o'clock A. M., and alarm being every where given, the force returned by two different paths; the Sepoys took a short one to reach the highroad, while the Police returned by a circuitous route, in order to surprise and disperse the Chinese concealed amongst the bushes and jungle opposite the village of Kranjee on the east side of the road. The Sepoys arriving first on the spot halted, and were saluted by the customary Chinese alarm signals. The Police coming a little later from the East, a number of about 200 Chinese were surprised and dispersed without a shot being fired, they not offering any resistance but decamping to the North like hares chased by hounds. Here the Sepoys departed, there being no more than two bangsals, situated at the other side of the river and village to inspect. Leaving a strong guard for the prisoners Constable Hale, Mr. Kraal and the Special Constable passed the village which was for the greatest part deserted, but passing the bridge a great number of Chinese appeared on the different hills in a threatening manner, and two shots were fired by them as the party by whom a volley was fired in return and a chase commenced to secure some of them and the white flag carried by them, but their nimbleness surpassing that of the Policemen, only one man could be secured; while four men were shot by the volley, amongst whom was an old man the guardian of the Chinese brick temple, who certainly had no lawful business in the centre of a crowd of such vagabonds, whose number is differently given up by the European Officers, according to the different sections of the hills on which they were noting for Mr. Kraal calculated the number to whom he was opposed to amount to about 50; while Constable Hale could discern on his side about 80 or 90 and the Special from his position about 120 or 150. The Chinese being dispersed, and the Police force much exhausted, they returned home with the prisoners and the stolen goods without a further search.

When at a distance of about ½ a mile from the village a fire was observed behind, which in all probability was caused by the burning of a hut situated near the temple. The bangsal of a heathen was also burned to the ground by some unknown hand, but this fire must have been occurred at 7 o'clock in the morning, for an European Overseer of Convicts, who came near the spot on horseback, states he saw the fire already at that time, when the Sepoys, the Police, Convicts, and about 10 or 11 out of the 32 Complainants were occupied some 4 miles from the place amongst the hills and jungle. The heathen ascribe these fires and the destruction of a great number of pots, pans &c., left in the deserted houses as also the destruction of the ornaments of the temple and of the idol, to the Christians, but it is difficult to believe, this, 30, would dare to remain on such a spot where three regular fights had taken place, without Sepoys or Policemen in great numbers. Would it not be more probable that the heathen had done it themselves in order to found a charge against their enemies; if such was their intention they have partly succeeded, for the Hon'ble Resident Councillor, accompanied by the Superintendents of Police and Convicts and a most influential member of the Chinese population in town, came in the early morning of Tuesday to inspect the spot; a trouble which certainly was not taken when day after day nearly all the plantations of the Christian planters were attacked and pillaged, 28 in number. It it certainly remarkable that on Monday, the Police were informed by their spies that the heathen had received orders from the hoë in town, to remain quiet and to keep out of view from that moment!! Since that time orders have been issued to stop until further orders the execution of the warrants and a portion of the military is already withdrawn. Is then the destruction of the Bangsal of a heathen, which, after all may have happened by accident to be considered as a compensation for the losses of 28 Christian planters, and for the misery of hundreds of Christian coolies who are now thrown out of work, for they dare not return to their plantations for fear of being again injured having no security whatever for the good conduct of the miserable slaves of the hoë? A quarrel between 4 and 5 Christian Chinese and some heathens of which one appears to have been wounded in the row at the Ellenborough Market and which was followed by the storming of the shop of the Christian named Lauw Ah Tang by 20 or 30 heathens, was the pretence for causing the ruin of hundreds of peaceful honest agriculturists by a secret society which the laws do not recognise. Who guarantees to these poor men that the same misfortune or worse will not again happen to them, if they take possession again of their plantations?

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 20.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, May 17, 1851.

RESTORATION OF THE CATHOLIC HIERARCHY IN ENGLAND.

Election of a Protestant Bishop.—In consequence of the resignation of the bishopric of Moray and Ross by the Right Rev. Dr. Low, the Primus (Bishop Skinner) has issued his mandate to the Presbyters to meet on Friday, the 31st inst., for the purpose of proceeding to the election of a new Bishop. It is expected that the Presbytery will be divided in opinion, and that there will be a severe contest between the Puseyite and Low Church parties.—Home News.

SCOTLAND.

In our preceding issue, we noticed the extract given above, chiefly in order to show by means of it, that the clamor, raised in England against the Restoration of the Catholic Hierarchy was an unmeaning uproar, excited for party purposes, by interested individuals, who for their own unworthy ends, stimulated to frenzy, the ignorance and bigotry of a large portion of their fellow-countrymen.

We now revert to the consideration of the same extract, for a very different purpose, one wholly unconnected with political or secular objects and having solely for its end, to exhibit the incompatibility of Protestantism with unity, and by consequence its total want of claim to the possession of the primary distinguishing characteristic of the true Church of Christ.

"It is expected," according to the premised extract, "that the Presbytery (that is the Electors of the Prelate about to be chosen) will be divided in opinion, and that there will be a severe contest between the Puseyite and Low Church parties."

Now, let us pause for a moment, to enquire into the cause of this apprehended division, and contest, which the writer anticipates, will take place between the Puseyite and Low Church parties. Will the apprehended division and contest of the Electors arise from a becoming solicitude on their part, that from among Candidates who are of one mind and heart in Faith, that person may be selected, whose other qualifications mental and moral entitle him to be preferred to his Competitors, in as much as on account of these superior endowments, he is likely to prove himself more worthy than the other Candidates of the Episcopal dignity. This indeed would be a laudable solicitude, a solicitude, such as is expressly sanctioned by the example of the Apostles themselves, in their election of Matthias in the room of Judas.

But unfortunately, in the instance now under consideration, the solicitude of the Electors to the vacant Episcopacy, is stated to have its origin in a very different cause.

The avowed occasion of the threatened division and contest of the Scottish Electors, is their own discordance in Faith, and the anxiety which each of the discordant parties has, is that a Candidate of its own peculiar religious sentiments may be the successful one. It is not then among the Electors only, that dissension in Religious belief is acknowledged to exist, but it is also openly confessed, that a similar disagreement is found, to characterise the respective Candidates for the Episcopacy put forward by each party of the Electors.

What a caricature must not an assembly such as is here described be admitted to be of the unity and concord in Faith of the Primitive Church, if we receive the clear testimonies supplied so copiously by the Holy Scripture, on this subject. To begin with the Acts of the Apostles, a record to be numbered amongst the earliest annals of the Primitive Church, how does this Inspired, History depict the unity of Faith which pre-eminently distinguished the First Christians? "And," says the Inspired Penman, "The multitude of believers had but ONE HEART and ONE SOUL." Could this have been so, if the Pastors, by whom these believers had been instructed in the Faith, were unfortunately divided, in heart and soul, in judgment and affection, from each other? Unquestionably not. Division in judgment or belief on the part of the Pastors would have infallibly produced, as experience proves, a corresponding discord and contest in their disciples, so that instead of one mind and one heart, these instead of deserving the honorable testimony given to their unity and concord by the Holy Ghost, would on the contrary merit to be stigmatised as the Children of strife and schism.

For argument sake, let us suppose, that this mockery of an assembly, or Synod of the Primitive Church has at length concluded its operations, and that a Puseyite, or a Low Church Clergyman, has after the enactment of all the scandal, uniformly occasioned by Religious strife and discord, been elected Bishop. Then indeed comes the tug of War. Then will the Sheep be warned by one party to beware of the Shepherd, admonished, as in the case of the Church* Wardens of Bampton Speke to note down carefully the doctrine preached by their Pastor, in order to examine at leisure its accordance with the Scriptures, that is, in effect with their own learned interpretation of the Divine Word.

Only imagine such a Bishop as we speak of and chosen by an election such as we treat of, ascending the Pulpit and addressing his Clergy and People, in the language employed by St. Paul in writing to the Church at Corinth.

"Now I beseech you, Brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that you all speak the same thing, and that there be no schisms among you but that you be perfect in the same mind and judgment."—1 Cor. Cap. 1. As if the Apostle would say, "It by no means suffices that you uphold an external appearance of union by speaking the same thing, for a union merely external is hollow and vain, however imposing it may for a time appear to be to others.—The Union, the Unity, I require of you, in the name of the Lord Jesus, must be moreover internal, and be based on your being perfect in the same mind and judgment, so that, in what appertains to faith, (for faith includes the exercise of the mind and the judgment) there be no room for dissension, whether in great things or in small, but on the contrary perfect harmony and concord, as if all had but "one mind and one Heart," like the first Christians.

Now, in the name of common sense, how could any Man, capable of a blush, or of a smile, who might be elected to the episcopacy in circumstances such as those detailed in this notice, venture to address these words, to a Clergy and People divided in Religion, as the Puseyite and the Low Church Clergy and Laity notoriously are. If we suppose the successful candidate to be a Puseyite, and to speak thus, the hall would instantly resound with indignant exclamations, "Popery, rank Popery. Priestly Tyranny &c. &c." Were the Person chosen for the Episcopacy on the other hand, a Low Churchman, the Puseyites would scoff at him for recommending to his Hearers a Unity in Religion, which in Low Church principles has been hitherto and will be in all future times found to be impracticable "verba et prætereа Nihil." And yet St. Paul teaches in language so perspicuous as to defeat every effort to obscure their significancy, that it was primarily, for the purpose of securing a perfect unity of belief in every age among the faithful, that this Sacred Ministry was ordained by Jesus Christ; and says the Apostle, Ephes. Cap. 4. He gave some Apostles, and some Prophets, and other some Evangelists, and other some Pastors and Doctors. Until we all meet into the Unity of Faith ..... That henceforward we be no more tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine.

We now leave it to the reflecting and impartial reader, to pronounce if Unity of Faith and Doctrine have ever been attained by means of the Pastors of any portion of Protestantism, and whether, in effect it be possible, that through such a medium, Unity could be either attained or preserved. If not, then Protestantism can have no claim to be the Doctrine of Christ or of the Apostles.

* Vide. The letter of the Bishop of Exeter to the Church-Wardens of the Parish here named.

CORRESPONDENCE.

—ooo—

MISS TALBOT AND THE TAUNTON CONVENT.

To the Editor of the B. C. Herald.

Sir,—Although it appears to me that the letter of Miss A. Talbot to the Lord Chancellor* satisfactorily refutes the grievous charges preferred by Mr. C. Berkeley and repeated with great exaggeration by the bigoted portion of the Press against the Taunton Convent and the Bishop of Clifton, yet as it may be gratifying to your Catholic Readers to be made more fully acquainted with the nature and character of that Convent, I shall, with your permission, lay before them a few interesting particulars connected with it. From these, it will be easy for any impartial person, whether Catholic or Protestant, to infer how groundless and calumnious are the statements lately published in certain Newspapers, notorious for their unprincipled disregard of truth, whensoever there is question of Catholicity or of its Professors.

The first circumstance connected with Taunton Convent, which I shall notice, is the high birth and connections of the leading Members, I believe, I may safely say, of the majority of the religious Ladies of that Institution. I advert to this circumstance from no secular motive, but solely because the simple assertion of the fact suffices to show, even to prejudiced minds, how utterly improbable it is, that such personages would lend themselves in any unworthy manner to the aggrandizement of their community.

The present highly accomplished Lady Superioress of Taunton belongs to the Noble Family of Stafford. Her Gallant Brother is a distinguished Commander in the British Royal Navy, distinguished I repeat it, not only for personal bravery, but also for great scientific professional attainments, to an extent, that has deservedly obtained for him the notice and commendation of the highest Naval authorities. It was at the special invitation of the late Admiral Maitland that he joined the Wellesley then on the Indian station, and he was the first officer who erected the British Flag on the Island of Chusan. By marriage, this same brave Officer is the Nephew of Lord Gormanston the Premier Viscount of Ireland. One more circumstance connected with him and I shall have completed, what I wish to say in his regard. I had the honor and happiness, to know this gallant gentleman, whilst his Ship was attached to the Indian station, and I can bear testimony, that he was not more distinguished in his honorable avocation for bravery and science, than he was as a Christian for piety and virtue. Whilst sojourning in this unfriendly climate, and when exposed to the still worse climate of Chusan as well as to the dangers of his profession, his unfailing consolation was the recollection, that during his exile, his beloved Sister together with the Taunton community knelt daily in united prayer, to interest Heaven in his behalf.

Another Noble Lady, a professed Nun at Taunton is of the illustrious house of Clifford, a name known to English History, long before the Reformation sent its pestiferous brood to scatter impiety, discord, and calumny among the children of the Island of Saints.

By this very Mail, I have received a letter from the aunt of a professed Nun lately deceased at Taunton. The father of the Saintly deceased was for many years the representative of his county in Parliament and also one of its Deputy Lieutenants. This Gentleman's brother still lives, a retired Lieut. Colonel of the Bengal Army—the family, I may add, are allied to the Marquess of Ormonde and to Lord Talbot of Malahide.

I again emphatically declare, that I relate these particulars, not by any means for the unworthy purpose of exalting a Catholic institution, on the grounds of the Aristocratical connections of its Members, but solely to satisfy every reasonable person, of the incredibility of the accusations lately preferred against the Taunton Convent, by a reference to the high standing in Society of several of the leading Inmates of that community.

It will not be out of place for me to advert here, on testimony on which I have reason to rely, to the remarkable circumstance, which led to the establishment in England of the religious Institute of the Taunton Convent.

It is well known in England, that His Majesty George the Third lived on terms of great friendship with Mr. Weld of Lulworth Castle, and that the Royal Family not unfrequently honored that Gentleman with a visit. The esteem in which His Majesty held Mr. Weld, more than once, made him enquire earnestly, if in any way he could be of service to Mr Weld. Mr. Weld's usual reply was in the negative, but of course accompanied with those expressions of profound gratitude to His Sovereign, which were due to His Majesty's gracious condescension It happened, that after some interval, the King repeated his former expressions of readiness to be of service to Mr. Weld, when this Gentleman answered, that he had indeed one desire greatly at heart, the gratification of which, would give him in his old age, unspeakable consolation This desire was, that His Majesty would permit the Return to England of His Daughter a Nun and of her Sisters in Religion, and graciously extend to them on their return, his august protection, so as to shield them from the annoyances of the barbarous penal Code which then existed. His Majesty was himself a Father, and his feelings as a parent pleaded so strongly in favor of Mr. Weld, that the petition was granted, and on the assurance of the Royal promise, Miss Weld and her companions returned to England.

* By the Lord Chancellor's decision, Mr. C. Berkeley is strictly forbidden to interfere any more in the arrangements made for Miss Talbot's education &c. in her letter Miss Talbot openly accuses Mr. Berkeley of a wilful misrepresentation of her case. By the same decision the Rev. Dr. Doyle a Catholic Priest, continues as Miss Talbot's Guardian in accordance with her Father's Will and the present charge of the Minor is confided to the Countess of Newburgh, a recent illustrious Convert to the Catholic Faith.

The Institute at Taunton, embraces several objects of paramount importance to Religion and Society. The first is the practice on the part of the Religious Ladies, in their full perfection of all the Evangelical Counsels,

The next is the Education of Female Youth both rich and poor, in distinct establishments. The third is the relief of the poor. No matter in what number the poor may call at the Convent Gate, no matter what their country or their creed, no Pauper ever departs from it, without his hunger being appeased in a way so courteous and benign, as is known only to Catholic Religieuses.

As the Educational department for young Ladies is designed chiefly for those of high position in Society, and as the various branches of ornamental and useful Instruction are conducted by Teachers of the first order, the expenses in this department are necessarily heavy. The Community consists of about thirty Professed Ladies, and the number of young Ladies Boarders is, nearly the same The Bishop is merely the Ecclesiastical Superior of the Convent, and neither directly nor indirectly participates in its temporalities.

I have known the Taunton Institution for many years, and I can confidently say, that I know of no other Establishment either in England or in any other Country, where all the demands of Pupils of the Highest rank in Society, in all that relates to Religion and Education can be more abundantly satisfied

I have moreover met both in India and at home with parents of rank, whose Children either had been educated or were in course of education there, and never have I heard from one of them any expression except of veneration, esteem and gratitude towards the Conductors of the Taunton Convent.

A very few years, since, an Irish Protestant Lady, a joint Heiress to a considerable landed property, took it into her head on the authority of several Protestant writers, that the time had arrived for the Restoration of the Jews. She felt, she said, that she was called upon to co-operate in the accomplishment of this enterprise and she accordingly ordered maps of the Holy Land to be prepared, and the sites most eligible for Forts, &c., to be marked out upon them. A Military Commissioned Officer was now found to be necessary and one was accordingly employed on a high Salary, both for the discharge of the duties just described, and also for the purpose of making arrangements to raise a Regiment to engage in a new Crusade. All these proceedings naturally alarmed the next Heir to the Estate, who very justly apprehended, that sums of money to so large an amount would soon have to be raised on a mortgage of the inheritance, as would render his expectancy something as valuable as a Castle in Spain. He accordingly appealed to the Court of Chancery and the case was brought to trial.

A strong and talented Bar was engaged on both sides, and it must be confessed the case in favor of the Lady Crusader was fully established by her Counsel on purely Protestant Scriptural principles. But unfortunately for the Jews, Lord Plunket was then the Chancellor, and His Lordship on that as well as on other occasions, was more swayed by his decision by Catholic than by Protestant dicta. However, Politics soon came to the Fair Crusader's aid. By a change of Cabinet Lord Plunket had to resign his seat to Sir E. Sugden and the adverse judgment was reversed.

The bigoted Journals of that day looked on this extraordinary proceeding with a most edifying moderation Not a Syllable escaped from them which could bear the least comparison to the vulgar abuse lately dealt out by them against the Taunton Convent and its Bishop.

No! No! As far as Protestant Journalism is concerned, the Lady in question might without the insinuation of reproof on its part, have thrown herself and her estate away on some broken down Roué, or have expended it at the festive Board, or in the Theatre or at the Gaming table, because, forsooth, she had a right to do as she liked with her own. Or if instead of disposing in these ways of her fortune, she should, on the contrary endow a mongrel Bishopric at Jerusalem, and send there at her expence in the Devastation Steam Frigate ! ! ! a half Jewish and wholly heretical Bishop, with a German Frow and six children, oh! then indeed her praise would be in the mouth of all the Churches, from the ponderous and mendacious annals of Protestant Missions to the sickly half penny tract edited by some snuffling Female Missionary.

But what a pity for the sake of Protestant bigotry, that their "ingenious device" about the Convent &c. has been so soon blown into thin air by Miss Talbot's own letter and by the decision of the Chancellor. Yet there is one consolation, the lie had its effect for the day, and that too at a crisis. The same ingenuity that devised it, will not be long before its talents will be again exhibited in some other shape.

So it has always happened, since the curse of heresy has divided Britons in religion from one another I shall conclude by quoting one memorable and somewhat analogous instance mentioned by Miss Strickland in her life of Mary Beatrice of Modena Queen of James the second. Your Readers doubtless known, that James was a Convert to Catholicity, whilst his Queen always professed that faith, having been educated in it:—

"The first serious annoyance that befel the duchess of York, was the attempt of a French felon pretending to be a Protestant Convert, and calling himself Luzancy, to bring her name maliguantly before the public, by deposing that St Germains, a Roman-Catholic Priest, whom he termed "th Confessor of her royal highness, had come to his lodgings one morning, and holding a pouard to his breast threatened to stab him, unless he signed a recantation"

"This story was brought before the house of commons by Lord William Russell, (what an ominous coincidence with the name of the present Premier) and was made the pretext of additional severities against papists. Luzancy was examined before a Committee of the house, where he stated, in addition to his marvellous tale, "that he had learned from some French merchants that, in a short time, Protestant blood would flow through the streets of London, that the king was at heart a Catholic," and many other particulars calculated to alarm the timid and inflame the ignorant. This man was the precursor of Titus Oates, only not possessed of sufficient effrontery to stand his ground, after da Maresque, a conscientious French Protestant minister, who was acquainted with the impostor's parentage and career of infamy in his own country, had the courage and honesty to expose him, which put an end to his study with parliament, Yet such was the blindness of party prejudice, that Compton, bishop of London, sent the disgraced adventurer to Oxford, and although he involved himself in a swindling transaction while there, he ordained him as a priest of the Church of England, and made him a Vicar of Dover Court, in Essex *" vol. ix. p 71.

I remain Sir,
Your's &c,
A CATHOLIC.

Calcutta, May 15, 1851.

MISS TALBOT'S LETTER

MISS TALBOT TO THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

"Taunton, Tuesday, Feb. 18.

"My Lord—You will, of course, see that I have written in answer to Mr. Craven Berkeley's false statements and I'm sure in such a case you will think it only just for me to express myself what is the pure truth as I have done. It is scarcely credible how a gentleman can act as Mr Craven Berkeley has done, for I assure you, my lord he was down here at the convent himself on the 24th February. He then asked me a numerous set form of questions as if he had some object in view, but wished to get a little information beforehand; and at his departure he said he should come again and bring with him a little half-sister of mine. No opposition was made, for how could we know how Mr. C Berkeley intended to act? but after the manner in which he has spoken of the convent at Taunton, where I have spent the happiest days of my life and where I have experienced for nine years the most unbounding kindness, how could I read his petition and not feel a just indignation at such conduct; so that it is now my Lord, my own free and deliberate wish never again to see Mr C. Berkeley, should I meet him any where he would not surely be the first to address me, and most resolutely I should not. He has disgraced himself for ever in my eyes, and I should think in the eyes of every just and reasonable person Believe me, my Lord I alone in this house have shown any feelings of indignation, for all under this roof are too good to let any feelings rise but which any one must naturally feel of compassion for so weak and dishonourable a man This letter your lordship is at liberty to show to whom you please. I do not feel to have said more than I ought. I may have spoken strongly of Mr. C Berkeley's conduct, but I have not passed the limits of truth and justice I must add, that every word of the letter is from myself I am alone while writing it, and therefore no one can allege that I have been prompted by any one Every word is the result of my own thoughts and reflections Mr. Norris, whom I saw on Monday, told me of your Lordship's wish that I should go up to town again, and see a little more of the world, It will cost me much, certainly, to leave Taunton, where are all my dearest and truest friends are, but your Lordship acts for the best, and I would not, therefore, on any account oppose your wishes After Easter I shall be ready to yield myself, and again enter a world, whose charms I can never value, Thanking your Lordship for the kind interest you have taken in my welfare,

"I remain, yours respectfully,
"AUGUSTA TALBOT."

 Miss Talbot is now with the Countess of Newburgh.

VOLTAIRE AN APOLOGIST FOR RELIGION.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH FOR THE B. C. HERALD.

(Continued from our last.)

ART. 2.—OBJECTIONS OF UNBELIEVERS.

We may condemn abuses, but we must always respect even the persons who may be the occasion of them.

---

* Anth A Wood. Oxon. IV Lingard, Parliamentary History, Journal of James II. &c &c.

Is a ministry less holy because its ministers dishonor it?(1)

"Correct the servant, but respect the master."

He who wrote the book entitled "Good sense" had the intention of dishonouring God, by attacking his Sacred Ministers; in this he proved his want of sense. Did he think to annihilate the master by finding fault with the manner in which he was served?(2)

A Sacred Ministry 'tis their's to fulfil
They approach the heavens, yet are mortal still Œdipe.

It is rendering a service to religion to combat the ignorance which disfigures it.

We may observe that all the disgusting follies which have inundated the world for the last seventeen hundred years, have not been able to injure our holy religion. It must then be divine, since for seventeen centuries so many clever and powerful enemies, and so many weak souls have not been able to destroy it; this consideration should make us revere the truth and despise falsehood.(3)

Superstition and Fanaticism.

Superstition and fanaticism are the two serpents which attacked Laocoon; kill the serpents but do not wound him whom you wish to defend.

By attacking those two formidable enemies of human nature, the unbeliever usefully serves Christianity, he being by his nature equally remote from the foolish fears of superstition and the fury of fanaticism. Religion you say has been productive of many crimes, say, rather superstition which has reigned over our unhappy globe; say fanaticism, the most cruel enemy of the worship which is rendered to God.

Let us detest these monsters which have ever been tearing the entrails of their mother those who combat them are benefactors of the human race.(4)

PRACTICES OF THE CHURCH.

Confessions.

Repentance is a virtue which to mortals God gives,
And the true God my son, is a God who forgives.
Alzire.

Of so many different sects there is not one which has not expiation for its principal end. Man has always been sensible of his need of clemency.(5)

Confession is a divine institution which had a beginning only in the infinite mercy of its author.

It may be considered as the greatest curb upon secret crimes. The wise of antiquity embraced the shadow of this salutary practice.

The Egyptians and Greeks confessed in expiation in the celebration of almost all their mysteries.(6)

Confession is not a juridical examination, it is the avowal which the sinner makes of his faults to the supreme Being through the medium of another sinner who likewise has to accuse himself.(7)

One of the benefits which is derived from confession is the obtaining of restitution; it is the malice of men which sometimes turns this salutary remedy into poison.(8)

Such was the reply of the Jesuit Cotton to Henry the Fourth. "Would you reveal the confession of a man who had resolved to assassinate me? No! but I would place myself between you and him.(9) it is clear that it would be useful to have in every court a conscientious man whom the monarch could frequently consult and who would have the courage to say to him Nonlicet, it is not permitted.

Communion.

The Christ of our sins, the victim renew'd,
Of his cherished elect, the life giving food;
Descends on our altars and our wondering eyes,
Discovers a God where no longer bread lies.
Henriade.

It is assuredly a great advantage to the world to place a restraint upon crime. Christ did not establish the Eucharist as a politician, but as a father. He established it through love, in order to give himself to us and to render us as it were divine. The Catholic Religion says to men. Believe that it is a God whom I give you under the appearance of bread which no longer exists, will you defile your heart by crime? Behold then, men receiving a God within them, in the midst of an august ceremony, of the light of a hundred tapers, after listening to music which has enchanted their senses, at the foot of an Altar shining with gold. The imagination is subdued, the soul absorbed and affected, they scarcely breathe, they are detached from every terrestrial tie, they are united to God.

God is in their flesh and in their blood: who shall dare, who could commit after this, a single fault, or even conceive the idea of it? It is certainly impossible to imagine a mystery which more strongly upholds men in virtue.(10)

It is certain that in raising marriage to the dignity of a Sacrament, the fidelity of spouses becomes a more holy duty, and adultery a more odious sin.(11)

(To be continued.)

(1) Vol. 41, p. 15. (6) Vol. 58, p. 74.
(2) Vol. 17, p. 448. (7) Vol. 30, p. 284.
(3) Vol. 17, p. 120. (8) Vol. 30, p. 284.
(4) Vol. 17, p. 120. (9) Vol. 30, p. 499.
(5) Vol. 17, p. 120. (10) Vol. 41, p. 210. (11) Vol. 17, p. 390.

A DISCOURSE ON THE MISSION AND INFLUENCE OF THE POPES, BY THE RIGHT REV. BISHOP GILLIS.

"WHOM DO MEN SAY THAT THE SON OF MAN IS?"—Matt. xvi, 13.

(Continued from our last.)

Let us now cast a rapid glance, Beloved Brethren, over the principal events of the last eighteen centuries, and see how far the outlines of Calvary are discoverable in the annals of Rome's enduring Church, and how far her Bishops have proved in every age the natural instruments of Divine Providence, in working out the salvation and the civilisation of the world. There are, if I may use the expression, landmarks enough in the long and complicated history of Christianity, to enable us to do this with comparative brevity; while, at the same time, with quite a sufficiency of detail, to show how the inquiry may be more satisfactorily pursued, by a leisurely investigation into the history of the Popes.

The first consideration that strikes one in studying the annals of the Bishops of Rome, is that wondrous amount of human suffering, and of more than human courage, that spreads itself, like a glory pall, over the three first centuries of their existence, during which, with hardly an exception, "their succession," as Ranke observes, was rather to martyrdom and death than to office;"* for, out of thirty Popes who successively filled the chair of St. Peter during the these first hundred years of Christianity, two only were not called upon to shed their blood for the truth of the Faith they had been sent to preach—all the rest died martyrs. They dwelt and prayed in the bowels of the earth; and, to use the words of St. Paul in his letter to the Hebrews, when speaking of those who "by faith conquered kingdoms," they truly "had trials of mockeries and stripes, moreover also of bands and prisons; they were tempted, [and] were put to death by the sword, they wandered about, being in want, distressed and afflicted, of whom the world was not worthy; yet they recovered strength from weakness, and became valiant in battle."† While the tyrants who sat enthroned above them in all the splendour and profligacy of unbridled power, while the Cæsars of Pagan Rome, from Nero to Diocletian, were fearlessly decreeing in their gilded palaces the ten general persecutions that were to deluge the world with blood; the Bishops of Rome garnered the Church from the Catacombs, and may be said to have emerged from them only from time to time, to bear public testimony to Christ and to die. And so well did they understand that hidden martyrdom of Christian heroism, which enjoins the constant immolation within the heart of every feeling that rises unkindly to rebel against the self-denying lessons of the Gospel, that for more than two hundred long years, with one exception only,—Linus,—there sat not upon Peter's chair one single Pope, whose name has not since been enrolled in the calendar of the Saints. No wonder, then, dear Beloved Brethren, that the veneration of universal Christendom was such as we find it to have been from the beginning for the Holy Church of Rome; since, apart from their lofty claims to the supremacy of jurisdiction, her Bishops had in their own daily lives so long monopolized, as it were, the highest regions of Christian virtue.

"Ignatius,—writes the martyred Bishop of Antioch, as he bent his steps towards Rome and its Colosseum, there to become the food of wild beasts for the name of Christ,—"Ignatius to the Church which hath found mercy in the majesty of the Father Most High, and of Jesus Christ His only Son; to the Church beloved and enlightened in the will of him who willeth all things which are according to the love of Jesus Christ our God; and which presides in the place of the Romans, all-godly, all-gracious, all-blessed, all-praised, all-prospering, all-hallowed, and having first place in love with the name of Christ, with the name of the Father, which Church I greet in the name of Jesus Christ."‡

Such, Dear Brethren, were the terms of veneration in which the greatest bishops of the Christian world were every where in the habit, at this very early period of addressing the Holy Church of Rome, and of acknowledging her signs of universal Primacy. The letters of St. Cyprian to the Pope St. Cornelius, as well as the writings of the other early fathers, are full of evidence of a similar nature,—and they were founded on the circumstance that the Bishops of Rome were the immediate successors of the Prince of the apostles, that like him their faith had never wavered, that their singular privilege was a mandate to confirm their Brethren; an order to feed the sheep as well as the lambs of Christ's flock; and that like Him they had ever proved themselves "good shepherds" "shepherds ready to lay down their lives for the flock committed to their care. The mission, then, of the Bishops of Rome during those first three hundred years of trial to which Christ was pleased to subject his Church, that never might fail the future of his work, and keep it to be one and the same with that which he had come down from heaven to begin in his own person,—the first Providential mission of the Bishops of Rome, was to consecrate before the world the principle on which it was to be saved and civilised, the principle of Calvary; by cementing with their own blood the foundations of the stupendous edifice they and their successors had been called upon to raise. They were humbled; they were made to share largely in the apparent weakness and folly of the Cross; they were sent to drink deep from the chalice of Calvary; they suffered, they died of suffering, and they triumphed; for now the very emperors were at their feet, and the proud eagles of Imperial Rome were struck before the lowly emblem of the world's redemption.

* Ranke's History of the Popes, book I. sect. 1.
† Hebrews xi. 36, 37, 38.

‡ Ep. ad Rom.

(To be continued.)

WHITE'S CONFUTATION OF CHURCH OF ENGLANDISM.

(Translated from the Original Latin, by E. W. O'Mahoney, Esq., of the Middle Temple London.)

CHAPTER XXIX.

The thirtieth Article examined.

(Continued from page 261.)

Thirdly, in the primitive ages of christianity, the Roman Pontiffs and the clergy used, on Easter-eve, or the sixth day of passion week, solemnly to receive the holy communion under the species of bread only, as we read in the "Sacramentary" of Pope Gregory the first.* Moreover, this custom is also related in the "Roman Order," which was published prior, at least, to the year eight hundred. And it is even commanded therein, that all the Blood be consumed on the anniversary of the Lord's Supper (Holy Thursday), and that the body of the Lord only be preserved for the communion of the following day, (Good Friday) on which day the sacrament is not consecrated.† But, this custom is not, indeed, mentioned in the Roman Order, or in Pope Gregory's Sacramentary, as one of recent introduction, but as a custom handed down by the ancient fathers, and preserved by their successors. This same custom is also carefully observed at present throughout the whole Roman Catholic Church; for upon this day consecration does not take place, and the priest himself, in the mystic ministry, communicates under the one species only.

Finally, though the Greek schismatics severely censure the custom which prevails in the Latin Church, of consecrating the Eucharist in unleavened bread; yet they raise no objection against her custom of giving communion to the faithful under one species only, which they certainly would do, if they thought that custom in anywise unlawful. As it is, therefore, evident from the foregoing arguments and authorities, that the doctrine of this article is contrary to the doctrine and practice of the Catholic Church—it only remains for us to conclude this chapter with the words of St. Augustin: "Whatsoever the Catholic Church practises throughout the world, it is indeed the extreme of insolence and madness to dispute but that it should be so."*

(To be continued.)

FLOWERS OF HEAVEN.

Connection between Religion and Morality.

FRUITS OF MODERATION.

(Continued from p. 181.)

Competence is the point towards which our efforts should be directed, in order to preserve virtue with greater facility: but who is there that moderates his desires wisely enough to be content with it? It is easy to conceive that we should fly from poverty with the precipitation of a soldier who flees before the sword of the pursuer; but when we have left it far behind, and that we no longer perceive it on our horizon, why should we not take breath under our vine or our fig-tree? Instead, however, of doing this while yet exhausted by fatigue, we gird our loins afresh, and endeavour to overtake the travellers who have ascended higher than ourselves on the hill of fortune, and whose heads seem to touch the clouds, which the setting sun gilds and purples. It would appear as if we discovered poverty, even when separated from our view by a tract of country sufficient to maintain twenty families. The better to secure ourselves against it, and to protect ourselves from its invasions, we would wish that all the flocks, all the forests, all the villages, that meet our eye during our hurried course were added to our possessions; and we do not reflect that great riches, like beautiful fruit, into which worms have penetrated, bear within them a principle of destruction.

---

* Gregor. tom. 2. edit. Paris. lib. Sacramentor. in ord. Paraseev.

† Bibliothec. Patrum. tom 8. Ordo Romanus de celebrand. divinis in Officio Parasceves.—Idem in officio (cœnæ Domini, seu feria 5.

* Augustin. tom. 3. epist. 118. ad Januar. c. 3.

Excessive abundance weighs down the corn-stalk; the fruit-tree branches break under their heavy load; and the excess of opulence becomes, at times, the forerunner of poverty. Affluence renders a man soft and effeminate, and induces habits of neglect and inattention and he that thinks he can afford to be idle, is not far from being poor. Obliged to depend on others for the management of his affairs, as he is too ignorant or inexperienced to attend to them himself, he will find himself plundered by every one, without being able to apply a remedy. Involved in the labyrinth into which he has been driven, he will be obliged to implore the assistance of those who have perhaps, already divided his patrimony between them, and he will fall alive into the talons of the birds of prey who already hover over his ruined fortunes.

Thus it was with those young patricians of Rome, who after having dazzled all Italy with their gorgeous pomp, found themselves reduced, in the flower of their age, to become charioteers in the circus, servants in the public baths, or gladiators.*

"These palaces," says La Bruyere, "this furniture, these gardens, these beautiful water works, delight you and make you exclaim, at first sight,—'What a magnificent dwelling!—What extreme happiness is his who owns it!' But he is dead, and he never enjoyed it so agreably or so tranquilly as you do: he never had a serene day or a quiet night. He plunged into debt, to confer on it that degree of excellence which charms your eyes. His creditors drove him away from it, and he lost his mind. He, however, saw it once more at a distance, and died with joy at the sight."†

Moderation avoids all these excesses with temperate anxiety: it soberly enjoys the most lawful pleasures, that, by placing intervals between them, it may the better relish them: for, as the Sudder says—"continued pleasure ceases to be such."

Magnus, son of St. Olaus, was master of Denmark and Norway, as was before him Canute the Great, whom he equalled in courage and enterprise. Besides this, he had on England much better claims than the sea-kings, his predecessors, and was invited by a powerful party to enforce them. His envoys declared to Edward the "Confessor," who then reigned in that island, that it had fallen to their master by the same title as Denmark that is, as part of the inheritance of Canute. St. Edward, on his part, sent ambassadors to Magnus, with a moderate answer, in which he stated to him his rights to the throne of his ancestors, and drew for him a touching picture of the misfortunes it had endured while occupied by Danish princes. He ended by mildly reproaching him with not limiting his ambition to the possession of two crowns, especially as he had been a long time without having had pretensions to any.*

Magnus showed that he had not degenerated from the moderation and piety of his father, and gave the English ambassadors an answer more honourable to him than any victory could have been.

"It is indeed," said he, "enough to have two kingdoms to govern, if God gives me the grace to accomplish it. I cannot forget that I myself have been an exile, and the victim of persecution. Tell Edward that I will no more think of depriving him of the kingdom of his fathers, and that he may enjoy it in tranquillity and peace."

A moderate man is a benediction for all who surround him: he calms the passions, appeases anger, and reconciles enemies: he is especially in his place in the national assemblies and the councils of princes, where he obliges enthusiasm, which is not always the safest of counsellors, to confine itself within the limits of justice, possibility and likelihood.

The moderate man drinks of the small and limpid spring that bubbles through his meadow: the immoderate man seeks to slake his thirst at the river, whose bank is silently undermined, and involves him in its ruin.

CONVERSION.

Meanwhile the accessions to Rome have again become numerous, and four clergymen, and eight laymen of the town of Leeds, have been formally "reunited" to the Romish Church.—Friend of India.

A letter, supplied by the late Mail states, that Lord John Pavet was received into the Catholic Church at Sicily by the Rev. Mr. Cuthbert, Rector of the English College there.

Selections.

MISSIONS DU THIBET.

Extracts from a Letter of Rev. Dr. Huc, Apostolic Missionary in Thibet, to the Rev. Dr. Etienne, Superior General of Saint Lazarus, at Paris.

CHAGAN, AT LAMA.

(Continued from p. 249.)

One day that he was returning to the palace of the Chinese ambassador, a young Lama threw into his palanquin a scroll, upon which these words were written, Lo-Pou Masa; that is to say, do not eat radish, abstain from radish. The Nomekhan understood very well from these words that he was cautioned to mistrust the Kin-Tchai-Lo-Puu; but as the notification was not clear or precise enough he pursued his way. While he was in private conference with the two delegates, soldiers suddenly introduced themselves into the apartment, poinarded the Nomekhan, and cut off his head. A Thibetian cook who happened to be in an adjoining place, ran on hearing the cries of the victim, seized the bloody head, stuck it on the end of a spike, and ran through the streets of Lassa crying out, 'Vengeance and death to the Chinese!' The whole city was suddenly in an uproar, the people took up arms on all sides, and rushed in a mob upon the palace of the kin-Tchai, who were horribly hacked to pieces. The wrath of the people was so great they afterwards hunted down indiscriminately all the Chinese; they tracked them everywhere like wild beasts, not only at Lassa, but likewise in every other point of Thibet where they had established military posts; the butchery was frightful. It is stated that the Thibetians did not lay down their arms until they had unmercifully pursued and massacred all the Chinese to the frontiers of Su-Tchuen and Yun-Nan.

* Malt, Hist. de Danemarck.

† La Bruyere, des Biens.

The news of this horrible catastrophe having reached the court of Pekin, the emperor, Khan Loung, ordered immediately large levies of troops to be made over the whole empire, and made them march against Thibet. The Chinese, as in almost all the wars they had to wage against their neighbours, were worsted, but they were victorious in negociation.

Things were established on the old footing, and from thenceforth peace has never been seriously interrupted between the two governments.

The ordinary military forces which the Chinese keep in Thibet are inconsiderable. From Sse-Tchouan to Lassa they have at each stage ill-appointed stations, established with a view of aiding the transit of the emperor's courier.

In the town of Lassa itself, their garrison is composed of a few hundred soldiers, whose presence contributes to encredit and appuye the position of the ambassadors. In the southern direction, towards Bootan, they have likewise a line of detachments, badly kept up.

Upon the frontiers they guard, conjointly with the Thibetian troops, the high mountains separating Thibet from the English posts.

There are no Chinese in the other parts of Thibet; they are interdicted from entering it.

The Chinese soldiers and mandarins stationed in Thibet are in the pay of the government of Pekin; they usually remain for three years in the country: when that time has elapsed substitutes are despatched to replace them, and they return to their respective provinces.

There are, however, a certain number who, after the termination of their service, obtain permission to fix themselves at Lassa, or in the cities situated on the way to Sse-Tchouan.

As to Boudchan Remboutchi, he is reported to be preparing himself arduously for the great revolution he is to be the soul of. Although already advanced in years he often applies to military exercises. Every instant of the day that is not absorbed by his high functions of living Buddha is turned to account by him, for the purpose of familiarising himself with his future office of generaliss no of the Kelans. He is alleged to be a od archer and dexterous in the use of the lance and the matchlock. He rears large studs of horses for his future cavalry, and packs of enormous-sized dogs, that combine prodigious strength with superhuman intelligence, and are one day to perform important service in the great army of the Kelans.

Such silly and extravagant ideas have so penetrated amongst the masses, and especially into the minds of the votaries enrolled in the confraternity of the Kelans, that they may very likely one day occasion a revolution in Thibet. Future anticipations engrossing the minds of the people are never unproductive of results. After the death of the great Lama of Djachi-Loumbo, some audacious adventurer will have only to repair to Tie-Chan-Pê Lou, the himself Boudchan Remboutchi, and make an appeal to the Kelans.....perhaps no more would be requisite to revolutionise these fanatical populations.

The actual and immediate result of this confraternity of the Kelans is, that it gives Boudchan Remboutchi an importance which seems to be gradually infringing on the supremacy of the Talé-Lama. This result is the more attainable on account of the sovereign of Lassa being but a child of nine years of age, and his three predecessors died by a violent death before attaining the majority fixed by their laws, viz., twenty years of age. The Boudchan Remboutchi, who seems an able and ambitious man, will probably not have failed to turn to account a period of four minorities, and monopolise to his own advantage a share of the spiritual and temporal authority of the Talé Lama.

The violent death of the three Talé-Lamas, the immediate predecessors of the present ruler, gave rise, in the year 1844, to an occurrence which occasioned the greatest sensation in Thibet, Tartary, and even China, and which, on account of its importance, deserves perhaps some notice here.

The unheard-of phenomenon of the death of three successive Talé-Lamas in the flower of their age, had plunged the population of Lassa into mournful consternation. Underhand rumours began at first to circulate, and shortly the words crime and assassination were publicly uttered. Matters proceeded so far that all the circumstances of these sad events were narrated in the streets of the city and in the lamazaries. It was stated that the first Talé-Lama had been strangled, the second crushed to death by the ceiling of his sleeping apartment, and the third poisoned by his numerous relations who had come and established themselves at Lassa. The head Lama of the lamazary of Kaldan, who was much devoted to the Talé-Lama, also underwent the same fate. The public voice designated the Nomekhan as the author of all these occurrences. The four ministers had no doubt on the subject and knew the whole truth, but they found they were powerless to avenge the death of their sovereign; they were too weak to grapple with the Nomekhan, who was backed by powerful and numerous friends.

This Nomekhan was a Sifan, and was originally from the principality of Yang-Tou-Sse, in the province of Kan-sou. The supreme dignity of Tou-Sse was hereditary in his family, and a great number of his relatives who had been settled for several generations at Lassa exercised great influence over the affairs of Thibet. The Nomekhan of Yang-Tou-Sse was very young when he became invested with authority second only to that of the Tale-Lama. It is alleged, a few years after his elevation to power, he manifested his ambitious sentiments and an uncontrolable desire for domination. He made use of his great riches and the influence of his relatives to draw round him a circle entirely devoted to him. He aimed specially to create partisans for himself among the Lama class, and with this view he took under his immediate protection the famous lamazary of Sera, situated within half a league of Lassa, and comprising more than fifteen thousand Buddha religious. He loaded it with his favours, granted to it immense privileges and revenues, and he contrived to have a great number of his creatures stationed in the several administrative offices. The Lamas of Sera were not slow in becoming enthusiastic adherents of the Nomekhan. They looked upon him as a saint of the first order, and framed a catalogue of his perfections as long and pompous as that of the perfections of Bouddha. Supported by this powerful party which he had managed to form for himself, the Nomekhan no longer set limits to his projects of domination. It was at this juncture that he made away with three successive Tale-Lamas, in order to retain in his hands the power of regent. Such was the Nomekhan of Yong-Tou-Sse, or at least he was so represented to us during our sojourn at Lassa.

It was no easy matter, as may be seen, to upset an individual whose power was solidly rivetted. The Kalou ministers not being able to combat openly the Nomekhan without the prospect of sinking in the struggle, resolved to dissemble, and in the meanwhile to labour secretly for the ruin of this execrable man. The assembly of Hou-touk-tou elected a new Tale-Lama, or rather designated the child into whose body the soul of the living Bouddha had transmigrated. He was enthroned upon the summit of Bouddha La. The Nomekhan, as well as all the other dignitaries proceeded to prostrate themselves at his feet, adore him very devotedly, but, no doubt, with the flattering self-assurance that he would make the Tale-Lama transmigrate a fourth time whenever he deemed it expedient.

The Kalous secretly took measures to anticipate a fresh catastrophe. They entered into an arrangement with the Boudchan Rembouteki of Djachi-Loumbo, and it was agreed that in order to arrest the sinister projects of the Nomekhan, it was necessary to oppose to him the irresistible power of the emperor of China. A requisition was therefore drawn up and signed by the Boudchan and the four Kalous and then despatched secretly to Pekin by the embassy of 1844.

There were three main reasons why the government of Pekin could not dispense granting to the Thibetians the protection they sought for in so grave a juncture. Firstly, the Tartar dynasty had solemnly declared itself protector of the Tale-Lama; in the second place the Nomekhan being originally from Yang-Tou-Sse in the province of Kan-Sou, was in some sort amenable to the Chinese emperor. Lastly, in a political point of view this was an excellent opportunity for the court of Pekin to establish its influence in Thibet and carry out there its projects of usurpation.

The requisition despatched to Pekin by the Boudchan Rembouteki and the 4 Kalous, was received as favourably as could be desired. It was immediately concerted to forward to Lassa an ambassador of sufficient energy and prudence to upset the power of the Nomekhan: the emperor fixed upon the mandarin Ki-Chan, and charged him with this difficult mission.

Before we proceed further it will not be superfluous, perhaps, to submit some information concerning the Ki-Chan, who is a very celebrated personage in China, and who has played an important part in the English affairs at Canton. Ki-Chan is of Mandchoo-Tartar origin; he began his career as a writer in one of the six great tribunals of Pekin. His rare capacity soon became discernible, and when a very young man, he rapidly attained the several grades of the magistracy. At the age of twenty he was governor of the province of Ho-Nan. At five and twenty he was viceroy of it. But he was degraded from this post for not having foreseen and arrested an overflow of the Yellow River, which caused great disasters in the province entrusted to him. His disgrace was not of long duration; he was restored to his original dignity, and sent successively, in quality of viceroy, to the provinces of Chang-Toung, of See-Tchuen, and of Pe-Tche-Ly. He was decorated with the red ball, the peacock feather, and the yellow mantle, with the title of Heou-Jé (imperial prince); at length he was nominated Tchoung-Tang, the greatest dignity to which a mandarin can ever aspire. There are only eight Tchoung-Tang in the empire, four Mandchoo and four Chinese. They compose the most confidential council of the emperor, and have a right to hold direct correspondance with him.

Towards the close of 1839, Ki-Chan was sent to Canton in quality of viceroy of the province, and with the title of imperial commissioner. He had full power to treat in the name of his government with the English, and restore peace, which had been disturbed by the silly and violent measures of Lin, his predecessor. What reflects the highest credit upon Ki-Chan's capacity is the fact of his having, as soon as he reached Canton, recognized the immense superiority of Europeans over Chinese, and comprehended the impossibility of a war. He therefore instantly entered into negociations with Mr. Elliot, the English plenipotentiary, and peace was concluded by the cession of the small island of Hong-Kong. In order to cement the good understanding that had been just established between the emperor Tao-kwang and Queen Victoria, Ki-Ching gave a magnificent banquet to the English authorities, and Mr D'Aguilar, commander of the corvette La Danaë which had entered the roadstead of Macao a few days previously, had the honour of attending it. Every one was enchanted by the good graces and the amiability of the imperial commissioner.

A few days had scarcely elapsed when underhand intrigues set on foot at Pekin by the former imperial commissioner, succeeded in inducing the emperor to cancel the treaty just concluded at Canton. Ki-Chan was charged with having let himself be corrupted by the gold of the English, and of having sold to the sea-devils the territory of the Celestial Emperor. The emperor despatched to him a thundering letter, which declared him deserving of death, and ordered him to repair forthwith to Pekin. The poor imperial commissioner obeyed. The emperor, in his imperial mercy, granted him his life, and confined himself to degrading Ki-Chan from all his titles, depriving him of all his honorations, confiscating his whole property, levelling his house, selling his wives by auction and sending him in exile to the depths of Tartary.

The generous friends whom Ki-chan had at court did not abandon him in his misfortune. They laboured with courage and perseverance to raise him again to the good graces of the emperor. He was recalled from exile in 1844, and sent to Lassa in quality of extraordinary delegate, to manage the affair of the Nomekhan. He started, after being decorated with the blue ball, instead of the red, which he wore before his fall, the peacock feather was restored to him, but the privilege of wearing the yellow mantle was still interdicted to him. His friends at Pekin joined together and erected at their own expense a magnificent house for him. The post of Kin-Tchan, in the midst of the mountains of Thibet, was still looked on as banishment, but it was a step towards a glorious and complete restoration.

THE CRUSADE FOR ENGLAND.

Jesu Christi Passio.

23, Lisson-quay, Dublin, Feb 12th, 1851.

Dear Sir—I beg leave to add something to the explanation which I gave, two weeks past, of the matter of my discourses in Ireland; and what I am going to say I reckon very important to my cause—very important to the happiness of England and of Ireland at the present crisis. The crisis to which I allude is that brought on now by the proceedings of the Parliament in London, both such as have been already reported, and such as are likely to be matter of future reports. Do I conceive that anything which the English Government has done, or can do, will hinder or retard England's conversion? I do not. If God is determined to grant that gift, no powers of the world can possibly defeat or embarrass His purposes, and consequently, in the first place, I entreat Catholics to look on all which happens with an humble tranquility and confidence, and to hold on with their prayers that it may testify their love and innocence not only in virtue but knowledge, ones to be ready to move with powerful grace as soon as the recommencement of God's army of Martyrs or Gods Church shall have arrived, or the word to fall into ranks for the grand assault on England, or rather on Heaven in behalf of England.

But I may be asked, do I mean that the Catholics of England and Ireland have little else who (from human causes I maintain) are the declared enemies of our religion carry on the public measures against us without using ultimate political efforts to oppose them? I beg for attention to my answer to this question. In the first place, I may be misunderstood, if wrong, be corrected in time, and I avow I answer, then, that if in the movements of the Catholics in opposition to the measures of Government there should be any thing of human displeasing to God—as, for instance, any want of humility or charity, any undue regard for earthly, above—or in comparison with heavenly things; any vehemence of mind to Christian patience or meekness, any disrespect to persons in authority—[illegible] take its own way until [illegible] thus offended. But do I think movements can be carried on without something of this spirit entering in more or less? and I conceive that the Irish people naturally may be moved to cases the measure in which I desire, if only it be attempted [illegible] out of a favourite idea or theory of mine, which I am very frequently dwelling upon that Irish people are capable and peculiarly disposed to be called on for a great public effort of a moral, and that martyr Saint. And how would a Saint enter into politics? or do it, will a Saint ever be a politician? Yes, perfect he carries out his politics like a Saint. And how is that? I answer, not only in the point of charity—but, so as not to wound charity but out of a motive of charity. When wrong or insulted, if he sees it wise to seek redress he will do it not for his own sake, but for his brethren. It is not I, but the Son of God who speaks thus to His disciples—"I say to you not to resist evil but if one strike thee on thy right cheek, turn to him also the other," &c. and, consequently, supposing I advised the Irish to suffer passively under the ill treatment of England, whatever it might be, I should only be advising what our Lord there commands; and so I should not be dismayed at the indignant refusal or the mockery, which such advice might draw on me from some; but I do not advise this. If the good of Ireland alone were to be considered, the above is the advice which I, with our Lord, would give to the Irish; but I feel for England. As long as England treats Ireland with injustice, be it little or great, this is an infinite evil to England; to Ireland it is not certainly, but, perhaps, more or less of a temporal evil, but one which Ireland, with her faith, can turn, and I believe generally has turned, to her immense spiritual good; consequently, no evil at all in reality. Hence it is I as a lover of my country, who ought to be the beggar to Ireland to labour at gaining justice from England for England's sake. If Irish politician will move their people in this way, they have my cordial sympathy. If they will move them on other principles—that is, on human and selfish principles—I am against them, as the enemies not so much of England as of Ireland: for if Ireland is not to be permitted to rise and save England, I do not, therefore, despair of England, for which other help may be found; but I mourn for Ireland, and the loss which her professed friends and children are causing to her.

If Ireland will act as I propose now, she will work a miracle which, by itself, will be sufficient to convert England. The greatest miracle of conversion, perhaps, on record, is that of the thief on the c , who, from a blasphemer, was in a few minutes changed into a glorious Saint and Doctor in Israel. What miracle did he see to convince hi that the companion of his sufferings and disg ace was his Lord and God? No miracle is rela ed but the miracle of love shown forth in th w rds o Father, forgive them: they know not wh t they do." Our Lord said once to His disciple , "Greater things than these (my mira s) shall ye do." And thus the Irish people now ma this miracle of Divine love, from the lips us Christ, in a more magnificent way ev him when it wa first worked—that is, by lettin thes nents be heard from millions of mouths an one and accordingly, by taking the way resp nding to the blasphemies against th gion, and the calumnies against th ds ch, in all probability, will soon be u , in gland, instead of one soul they wi gain milli and hundreds of millions. —I am, dear Sir, your faithful servant in Jesus Chr st.

IGNATIU ST. PAUL, Passionist.

APPRENTICESHIPS.

You must l ere you s says one very old proverb,— must walk ere you run," says another.—

A man must se his time to every trade, says Byron, a l tl makes a special exception—

re nay; cities all are ready mad."

These embra e European notions on the subject of attaining proficiency: a man as a matter of course know he must pay for being taught,—or at all events be content for a long period to labour for nothing before he can expect ever to know anything worthy of being requited. In the East we are in everything at antipodes with Europe—in nothing more so than in this: not only are Orientals of the opinion of the worthy gentleman, that they need only try to play the flute, and they are sure of success, but the European, as much as the Native, looks on it as monstrous that he should attempt to do anything for which he is not directly requited—for the sake of making his capabilities known, of securing an introduction to employment, or obtaining proficiency or experience in a pursuit he is anxious to prosecute. It is not in cases such as those referred to a leaving of certainity for hope, the abandonment of employment yielding a small yet certain recompense, though it holds out no prospect of increase, for one which promises great things by and bye, but affords nothing whatever just at present; but, a man, absolutely idle, unprovided for, penniless and starving by his own account, prefers remaining such, to doing ever so little to secure an introduction. A printing office is one of the great resorts on such occasions, as somehow or other a newspaper seems to be considered a kind of refuge for the destitute. In the parish of Cupar, presided over in spiritual matters by the fathers of the present Lord Campbell, there flourished some half century since a Mr. Green, a dancing master, who chanced to have a very large family of sons. He was one day explaining to his pastor how he meant to dispose of each, and what hopes he entertained of them: the majority were to the musicians or dancing masters, but Willie he declared to be such a perfectly useless stupid fellow, he could make nothing of him whatever—he had tried every trade and failed, and he "just thought he would make him a minister." So those amongst us who have tried every trade and failed, or who may never have thought of trying any trade at all, take it for granted that they might just as well try their hand at a newspaper. The following is one of we will not venture to say how many scenes that have occurred in our office, and it does not represent any individual instances, but is a type of scores—there is probably not an office in Bombay in which something resembling it has not occurred. Mr.——— sends in his card—takes a seat; has heard that we are in want of some assistance—a sub-editor, reporter, or sub-reporter, reader, or what you please. Is asked if he has had any experience in any of these departments—answers he has not: has been many months in Bombay, and can find nothing to do—was assured that an European could never be at a loss for occupation. Asked how he has spent his time in Bombay—answer doing nothing—stayed for a time at the——— hotel—found it expensive—betook himself to a tent, and now stays with a friend: could never get an appointment, and therefore never thought of doing any thing. Asked if he never thought of writing l tters or paragraphs for the newspapers, as his aspirations seem to have lain that way—success in this way might have proved a valuable introduction to employment? No—never thought of it; people did not like to work without being paid for it, and did not know besides what to write about. Assured that knowing what to write about is an indispensable quality for a newspaper office. Asked how he thinks being taken on the pay book will enlighten him on this point? No answer! Asked whether he would not prefer doing something useful, and that would make him known, rather than be altogether idle—answers yes. Disappears the second day—the employee has heard of a situation. A few weeks afterwards re-appears—heard of an appointment, but nothing more, and could not make up his mind to work for nothing. And so on. Parties, perfectly willing to submit to any amount of dependence or degradation, despise the very thought of taking the means of becoming independent! And this runs through the whole community, European and native: a man is delicate and destitute—you have not the means of obtaining for him the amount of emolument he desires; but you can get something for him probably better than mere want. He looks perfectly appalled—tells you it is not enough, not worth his while, turns up his nose, and walks away, to relapse into sloth and indigence. And this is a state of matters visible every day, and in all directions,—and people, thus wretched in prospective destitution, consider themselves as the victims of ill-usage and misfortune. Should they be taken away, the families of such parties are left unprovided for, and it is deemed the duty of the public to see to their interests—"poor things, the fault was none of theirs! We have another variety of the same phenomenon, of still more frequent appearance than that just described. A deserving party, black, white, or brown, for the failing is equally common amongst all three, is very anxious to obtain an increase to his emoluments, which as they now stand scarcely meet his wants. Extra work is offered him, which may be performed in spare hours, and is excepted on extra requital—in nine cases out of ten it seems considered somewhat monstrous that additional pay should only be secured by additional exertions. Or again the applicant for encrease of emoluments is recommended just to try and do at present a little additional work for nothing,—in full assurance that if he persists in this, and his employers find him to be a man who never spares himself, or begrudges extra labor in anything, he will secure all he wishes for by and bye: the very notion of such a thing is deemed too preposterous to be thought of! It is this great pervading element of do-next-to-nothingism, which makes its appearance everywhere, and in all varieties of form, but constantly makes its appearance, that so grievously mars the hopes of the most sanguine of the advancement of the people. Throughout the rest of the world success and greatness of position in any way has almost invariably been secured by extra exertion; and perseverance and exertion have hardly ever failed to make wealth. If the path by which eminence in any department of life has been won be examined, it will be found to have been steep, arduous, and rugged—surmounted only by indomitable industry and steady determination: it will be found, moreover, that seldom has ever failure attended the efforts of him who showed himself determined to succeed, if perseverence, pains, and labour, would secure success. To reach the time when every hour brings with it its requital, how many hours of arduous exertion must have spent without thought of immediate recompense. Yet things of this sort never seem to be dreamt of in India: it seems supposed that there is some royal road to wealth or eminence, and the exertion by which alone these can be reached is shrunk from as superfluous, or too irksome to be encountered. Is it, under circumstances such as these, marvellous, that improvement should stand still? A correspondent in the Bombay Guardian recommends that cotton manufactories should be introduced into Bombay—the machinery to be driven by the tide—with the view of furnishing occupation to the unemployed in Bombay. There can be no greater delusion than to imagine that there is any want whatever of employment amongst us,—the want is of industrious and skilful hands to perform it. The first sign of a glut in the labour market is that each individual labourer must work as long as severely as possible to make up for the scanty requital each hour of exertion supplies the London sempstresses work as severely as possible from fourteen to eighteen hours a day all the year round, and then scarcely find themselves able to earn their bread. In Bombay the average time of labour is about eight hours a day amongst the hardest worked of our population—about a third part of their whole is wasted in holidays; and if out of the days 1825 hours, or at an average five hours day is spent in exertion, we are greatly mistaken if this is fully double of what household or servants bestow in actual labour. And the money earned at this half time sort of work—the hardest of which would scarcely be looked on as half work in Europe—enough is secured not only to meet all the necessities, but the luxuries of—the betrothment festivals, the marriage feast, the display and glare, and noise, which awaken the neighbourhood for a furlong round. In Bombay itself the bulk of the population is exogenous, and scarcely a servant but finds time once in three or four years to spend some months, nearly a year at times, in visiting his native country. Far be it from us to begrudge the poor man, black or white, of his recreation, or to wish him to tax his thews or sinews one hour more than is required: all we mean to contend for is this,—that where people are content with "dog's days," as the Scotch byeword hath it—"little meat and muckle ease,"—progress, which is the fruit of forethought, enterprise, and toil, is out of the question—as are moderate eminence and wealth; and that it is quite in vain to seek for new occupations for those who do not find it necessary to turn half the time at their disposal to account; or to pour forth the phials of commiseration when those we pity owe their position entirely to themselves. Indigence is the natural fruit of idleness: it is deemed no evidence of hard-heartedness in the most humane countries in the world to hold it a maxim that he who will not work deserves to starve; and those amongst us who dream of eminence without the indispensable precursor of exertion, are as little deserving of pity or sympathy as of countenance or respect. Those who are everlastingly leaning on others, in place of endeavouring to help themselves, can look for nothing but a break down: had those from whom support is wished for acted as do their suppliants, they would never have been able to stand on their own legs, much less to have granted the aid applied for.—Bombay Times, April 22.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism

No. 21.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MAY 24, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, May 24, 1851.

CONVERSION TO THE CATHOLIC FAITH OF ANOTHER CLERGYMAN OF THE ENGLISH PROTESTANT CHURCH.

By the late Mail, the Archbishop received a letter from a Protestant Clergyman, who was hitherto attached as Curate to a Church in the immediate Vicinity or Suburbs of London, but has resigned that appointment in consequence of his having embraced the Catholic Faith. This Gentleman's Father was an Officer in the Bengal Army, and he himself was born in India. Influenced by that circumstance, he has offered to devote himself to the service of the Catholic Mission in this Country. But as he has lost all his temporal resources by his conversion, he intimates to the Archbishop, that, if his services, be accepted it will be necessary for his Grace to provide means for his education in Theology, in a Catholic College, during the probation that must precede his ordination as a Catholic Priest.

PUBLICATION OF A PLENARY INDULGENCE IN THE FORM OF A JUBILEE.

The Archbishop received by the late Mail, letters from the Apostolic See, by which His Grace is empowered to grant to the Faithful of Western Bengal the Spiritual benefit of a Plenary Indulgence in the form of a Jubilee, on the usual conditions of prayer, alms, fasting and the Devout participation of the Holy Sacraments. The Archbishop's Pastoral will appear in our next issue. By His Grace's Instructions a short treatise on Indulgences is being got ready at the Orphan Press, and will be completed by this-day week.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE QUEEN'S BIRTH DAY.

To-day the 24th May, being the Anniversary of Her Most Gracious Majesty, the Queen's Birth, the xix*th* Psalm "Exaudiat," together with the prescribed Prayer, will be sung at the Cathedral, St. Thomas' Church, and also at the Church of the Sacred Heart, Durrumtollah, by order of His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic of Western Bengal.

ASCENSION THURSDAY.

Thursday next being the Feast of the Ascension of our Lord, will be a Holiday of obligation on which all the faithful are bound to hear Mass, &c. &c.

EURASIANS OR EAST INDIANS.

We have read with much attention and interest several of the articles, lately published in the Calcutta Journals, on that portion of the Community known by the name of Eurasians or East Indians. The chief question discussed in these articles has reference to the solution of the enquiry, which is the best means for the class in question to adopt, in order to provide by honorable honest industry for themselves and for their families. In the publications which have appeared on this subject, some of the writers recommend a preference to be given to the ordinary mechanic trades, others to agriculture, farming &c. &c.

On the subject of agriculture farming &c, one writer advises, that the experiment be made in Australia, whilst a second asserts, that it can be made with more advantage in the Native Country of the East Indians.

Whatever may be thought of each of these suggestions, one thing is certain, that the matter at issue is of great consequence, both on account of the present and the daily encreasing numbers of the East Indian Community. and because judging from the current reports, respecting the arrangements to be adopted in the Government offices, many of the existing appointments will be abolished, and thus the hope of obtaining a subsistence in these departments, be wholly shut out. Again the rapid proficiency of large numbers of the Natives, in those requirements for Government or Mercantile offices, which were hitherto possessed almost exclusively by Europeans and East Indians, must in the course of a little time offer another additional and serious obstacle, to prevent East Indians from obtaining situations in those offices, except on a very reduced salary, which though sufficient for a native family, would not be adequate for that of an East Indian. All these considerations furnish great incentives to the East Indian Community, to apply themselves earnestly and perseveringly to the investigation of the question, what are the best means, to enable the Bulk of their class to earn a competent industrious subsistence. That there is much in the general character and habits of the East Indians, to make it difficult to come to a sound and at the same time, to a really practical conclusion in the matter we treat of, even their best friends must confess. But, yet, the difficulties to be encountered should not without a fair trial be pronounced insuperable. We need hardly add, that if is chiefly from our solicitude for our numerous Fellow Religionists among the East Indians, that we have adverted to this subject

SCHOOL OF INDUSTRY

IN CONNECTION WITH THE BENGAL CATHOLIC MALE ORPHANAGE

We have great pleasure in stating, that in addition to the Printing and Book-Binding establishments attached to the Male Orphanage, arrangements have been made also to annex to it a Work-Shop, in which according as opportunity may offer the Orphans will learn other useful trades.

For the present, an agreement has been made with a European Master Tailor, a first-rate tradesman, to teach his art to such of the Pupils as may desire to learn it. Six or seven Boys, chiefly East Indians, remarkable for good steady conduct have gladly availed themselves of this opportunity to learn the Useful Trade of a Tailor.

CORRESPONDENCE.

—000—

UNFAIR DEALING OF A PORTION OF THE PRESS IN WHAT REGARDS CATHOLICS AND THEIR RELIGION.

To the Editor of the B. C. Herald.

SIR —I beg to call your attention to the accompanying article published in the Calcutta Morning Chronicle of the 20th inst.

I know not to whom the authorship of that article ought to be ascribed, whether to the Editor, or to some other person, as it is published, but not in the usual Editorial Columns, without any indication of its being an extract, copied from another Journal.

Assuming, that it is an extract, I shall merely remark, that the conductor of the Morning Chronicle would, in my opinion, consult much better for the respectability and welfare of his Establishment, if he were to evince a more scrupulous care than he has hitherto shown, about the insertion in his Journal of articles against Catholicity and Catholics, not only false and slanderous, but even sometimes offensive to common decency.

It is true, that in every mixed Community, and especially in such as exists here, some few vulgar Bigots will be always found, whose patronage is to be secured only by pandering to a diseased appetite, which, like that of a certain Quadruped which fattens only on corrupted flesh meat, requires for its appeasement a copious supply of the moral carrion, which can always be so cheaply and readily administered by the out pouring of ribald and lying misrepresentations of the Catholic Church and Clergy.

This is no doubt a consideration, which will always have its due weight with unprincipled mercenary scribes, whose first concern is gain, and by whom virtue and truth are appreciated only secondarily and subserviently to their temporal interests. "Virtus post nummos."

Yet, notwithstanding the undue and injurious influence thus exercised over journalism, I am fully persuaded, that in the end, the Editor who would nobly despise and reject the support to be obtained from the advocates of calumny and misrepresentation, whether directed against a Religious Community or particular persons, would eventually best promote even the temporal interests of his Press, as well as secure for himself the testimony of a good conscience, and the just esteem due by his fellow citizens to the honest impartial champion of truth and virtue, by whom, "Tros Tyriusve nullo discrimine habetur."

In every community and even in Calcutta, there are to be found among all classes of Christians, a sufficient number of moderate upright characters, on whose cordial support, an honest journalist may safely rely. I may add also, with equal confidence that, in every distinct class or denomination of Christians, such as for example, the Catholics, Protestants and Presbyterians in Calcutta, there is contained, if they be true to their own cause, abundant means, by the right use of which, they may effectually reform, if reclaimable, or punish if not the journalist, who, from mercenary or other unworthy motives, makes his paper a Medium for the publication of slanderous and insulting misrepresentations of their respective creeds or Clergy.

The article which has called forth these strictures, opens, with the usual flippancy and impertinence which distinguishes upstarts in Religion as well as in Society, with a rash and unjust censure of the venerable Catholic Hierarchy of Ireland—a Hierarchy which, through centuries of a bloodier and more relentless persecution, than was ever inflicted by Paganism on the first Christians, clung to their faithful flocks with all the fidelity of good Shepherds, and, in countless instances, generously laid down their lives, sooner than abandon them to the Wolves of heresy, who at one time presented themselves in their own proper ferocious garb, while, at another, and particularly, on recent occasions, they have come forward in sheeps' clothing, to entrap, the more successfully the incautious and unsuspecting inmates of the Catholic Fold.

These grave, learned and Reverend Prelates, the hair of many of whom is silvered over with the hoar of venerable old age, and their Foreheads furrowed with the cares and labours endured by them in cold and heat, by night and by day, in good report, and in evil report for many a long year, in watching over and ministering to their flock the doctrines of the true faith and the bread of eternal life, and oftentimes, also, if not ordinarily, a portion of their own scanty means of subsistence,—these saintly Personages are, forsooth, to be schooled by some Protestant stripling scribe, who for the sake of Matriculation in one of the English Universities may, perhaps, have signed, with a sneer and a joke, his subscription to the thirty-nine articles, leaving it to the Puseyites and to the anti-Puseyites, to attach any meaning or no meaning to that formulary, and wholly unconcerned as to who may be right, or who may be wrong in its interpretation. True it is, he belongs to a Church, the highest tribunal of which has solemnly decided, that her Clergy are at full liberty to believe and teach, that Baptism is a sacrament of regeneration or to believe and teach the very contrary, and he is anxious to see diffused among Catholics equally liberal and as he would say, unsectarian and enlightened ideas of religion.

Towards the diffusion of these ideas among the Catholic youth of Ireland, the Godless Colleges, will, it is justly anticipated by those, who sympathise, in Religion, or Irreligion, with the party I have just described, greatly co-operate. Hence the wonderful solicitude that is daily exhibited for the success of those Seminaries.

For Protestants who are free to say, even upon Baptism, "It is" and "It is not," all this may be sufficiently intelligible and consistent. But it is far otherwise with respect to Catholics. They belong to a Church which like her Divine Founder "is the same, yesterday, to-day and for ever." They belong to a Church which glories that her teaching, like that of St. Paul is one and unchangeable. "But God is Faithful, for our preaching which was to you, was not, IT IS and IT IS NOT"..... "The things that I purpose, do I purpose according to the FLESH, that there should be with me, "IT IS and IT IS NOT, 2 Cor. C. 2.

I shall now proceed to notice briefly some gratuitous assertions advanced by the writer of the article under consideration, and shall show them to be unfounded and false. The writer asserts, that to the Government Colleges every safeguard is annexed, to protect the Religion of Catholic Pupils. I distinctly deny the truth of this assertion. Is the Writer's memory so short, as to have already forgotten the Infidel work published by Mr. Vericour after his appointment to the Cork College? And yet Mr. Vericour still holds his office, the easy consciences of the Superior College Authorities being readily satisfied with an explanation or apology, pretty much as satisfactory as that lately offered by Mr. Drummond in the House of Commons, in excuse for the scurrilous and offensive language made use of by him, on matters connected with Catholicity.

Has the Writer also forgotten the coarse and vulgar diatribe against Catholicity, not long since indulged in by the Protestant Dean of the Galway Government College? And this Official too still holds his appointment, and when a second favorable opportunity offers, he will again doubtless eagerly profit of it, for the exhibition of his Protestant orthodoxy. "Si sic in viridi quid in arido fiet" If under the very eye of the Liberal and Illustrious Vice-Roy of Ireland, and at the very outset of a great public experiment, to favor the success of which all the weight of government was openly put forth, these outrages on Catholic principles occurred with impunity, what ought to be expected at a future period under a less liberal Vice-Roy and when the vigilance of the Catholic Prelates might be lulled into a false and dangerous security.

A second false statement of the Writer is, that the system of the Government Colleges has been condemned by a mere majority of the Irish Catholic Prelates. The very reverse is the truth. The Colleges, that is the system, was unanimously condemned by those Prelates, without a single dissentient vote or sentiment having been uttered in their behalf.

The division which took place among the Bishops related to a totally distinct question, viz. whether Catholics, Lay or Ecclesiastical were to be prohibited under pain of censure, from resorting to these Seminaries or from holding any office or situation connected with them. To several of the Prelates it seemed enough, to have it proclaimed to the Faithful, that in conjunction with the Holy See, their chief Pastors were unanimous in the condemnation of the Government Colleges, whilst to others of them it seemed expedient that all connection with these establishments should be instantly interdicted under pain of censure and privation of the Sacraments. On this point and on this alone has any reference been made by the synod to the Holy See.

A third untrue assertion of the same writer is, that the System of the National Schools and of the Government Colleges is perfectly the same. It is not the case. In several important particulars, there is a manifest difference between that of the Colleges and that of the Schools. In the mode of appointing Masters, in that of appointing Inspectors, in the limits by which the authority of the Board is circumscribed by that of the Patrons of each School—in all these details, as well as in the general complexion of the National Board, a wide discrepancy is observable, which, as far as concerns Catholics, is greatly in favor of the National School system.

It is obvious to any reflecting person, that in elementary Schools, the same jealous vigilance in respect to Religion, is not necessary, which is indispensable in Institutions, in which the fundamental truths even of Natural Religion are investigated and discussed.

On the subject of the Dublin University, I shall merely observe in conclusion, that if ever the Catholic Church of Ireland had to mourn in tears of blood for the spiritual death by apostacy and open infidelity of several of the most gifted of her Children, she should do so at the gates of that destroyer of souls, and in the language of Scripture, like Rachel refuse all consolation.

"A voice was heard in Rama, lamentation and great mourning: Rachel bewailing her children and would not be comforted, because THEY ARE NOT."

I remain Sir,
Your's &c.,
A CATHOLIC.

Calcutta, May 21, 1850.

THE BOOK WORM.

Sit bona librorum et provisæ frugis in annum Copia.—Hor.

THE SYNOD OF THURLES.

It was not until after the Roman Catholic hierarchy had been gratified with every devisable and imaginable guarantee against every danger, possible and impossible, which could directly or indirectly, even so incidentally or contingently, affect their delicate faith and sensitive morality,—not until after a system of precautions had been devised and ordained such as no other clergy in the world ever insisted on, such as were never embodied before in statutes of any academic body,—not until that moment did the light burst upon these egregious divines,—did they make the grand discovery that no defences, no securities, no regulations, no human precautions could reconcile the system of united education with the pure religious nature of Roman Catholic youth.

The triumph of an opposition such as this, so remarkable for the absence of reason, justice, consistency, and decorum,—an opposition offered to such a cause as education in a country where education is so prized and coverted as in Ireland, —we cannot bring ourselves to anticipate. The difference is immense between the resolutions of 1845, sanctioning the colleges by a unanimous vote, and the resolutions of the other day, condemning them by a divided sentence. To a unanimous decision of the heads of the church, though ever so preposterous, ever so irreconcilable with their former principles and conduct, we can conceive a devout laity prepared to bow; but we cannot imagine the same submission to decree like this, which proceeds from a bare majority of a divided tribunal, besides its having every other quality to deprive an opinion of weight, or a resolution of authority. We shall expect to see the Roman Catholic laity in this instance vindicating their church from the reproach to which the Synod of Thurles has exposed her; defending the past conduct of their bishops against their present doctrines and pretensions. And they cannot defend that conduct more effectively than by supporting the Queen's Colleges, and insisting upon the enjoyment of the manifold advantage they afford.

It can hardly fail to strike the understanding of so acute a people as the Irish, that the Queen's Colleges are but higher and more expanded forms of the National Schools, that both institutions rest upon the same principles, breathe the same spirit, seek the same great objects, and have been wisely fenced against the same dangers with a degree of caution and foresight which no efforts of proselytising zeal can possibly elude. The abundance of security for faith and conscience cannot strike them with prodigious force when they recollect that no such amount of protection, or any thing like it, has ever been thought necessary in other educational institutions frequented by the Roman Catholic youth of Ireland. It will probably occur to them, for example, that neither Roman Catholic piety nor Roman Catholic morals can be exposed to serious risk in the Catholic of Cork,—where every safeguard has been provided for them which the joint sagacities of their own hierarchy and of the Government have been able to devise,—when the same morals and piety were never considered in the slightest peril in the University of Dublin, where not only was no special security for them ever provided, but where existed every facility for proselytism and every temptation to apostacy. These considerations will not fail to have the greatest practical weight with a people not more remarkable for their fidelity to their religious duties than eager to avail themselves of the opportunities of intellectual improvement. We entertain no doubt, but that they will practically decide this question in conformity with the decision which has been already come to upon it by all that is moderate, rational, patriotic, and consistent among the heads of their religion. Whether they consider the respect due to the opinions of their clergy, where those opinions are to be found most clearly delivered and solemnly recorded, or whether they consult the welfare of their youth, to whom the advantages of the most solid and enlightened education to be had in Europe are freely and munificently offered, the people of Ireland will be equally led to embrace and support those truly national institutions.—Calcutta Morning Chronicle, May 20.

ROME AND PORTUGAL.

To the Editor of the B. C. Herald.

Sir,—I herewith send you the accompanying from the Ceylon Times of the 25th April, and trust it may serve as an additional motive to recall back all those who had unhappily for years estranged themselves from the unity, fold, and discipline of the Catholic Church to the great disedification of the faithful.

Yours truly,

A CATHOLIC.

22*nd May*, 1851.

Our readers will doubtless remember having seen at various times, certain imaginary claims of the late Archbishop of Goa to the supreme jurisdiction of Catholicity in the East, and his assertions of them in direct opposition to his instructions from the See of Rome—notwithstanding that he had pledged himself on receiving his appointment to be ever faithful to the Representative of St. Peter. For years he proceeded in his rebellion, secretly upheld by the Court of Lisbon, and unhappily succeeded in establishing schism and discord throughout the greater part of India. In his efforts in Ceylon, he has been assisted we regret to say, by the representative of Portuguese royalty here; who, taking advantage also we have heard of his position as a vendor of Medicines, succeeded in severing a few families from the Church and its lawful Pastors. At length however, from an authentic document in our possession, which we retain for the satisfaction of the curious, we extract the late Archbishop's full and unconditional retractation and submission to the See of St. Peter, and we shall be glad to learn it may be the means of opening the eyes of the poor people who have been led astray by the individual in question, who we trust will be able to shew that he has been an unwilling or unconscious instrument in introducing schism and its evils into the Island.—Ceylon Times, April 25.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

Lecture on Mechanics. By the Rev. Mr. Stephenson.

On Tuesday the 20th inst., at the usual hour, the Lecture on Mechanics was delivered at St. John's College. Thursday, the day previously appointed for the delivery of these Lectures having been found inconvenient it was thought advisable to make the present arrangement so that for the future, these Lectures shall be delivered on each Tuesday. As had been proposed at the close of the preceding discourse, the Lecturer proceeded to discuss the principle of the attraction of gravitation — this he stated to be one of the most general principles in nature and the groundwork of explanation for several of the extraordinary changes that take place both with regard to the earth and the heavenly bodies. By the aid of this principle, the causes of the tides were explained—the descent of falling bodies,—and the pressure of the air on the surfaces of bodies. He defined this attraction to be that force by which distant bodies tend towards each other. It was a property common to all material substances of whatever form, quantity or position, and pertained to each portion of matter as well as to an entire mass. In this character it was found to differ from the other kinds of attraction which were resident in peculiar substances. For example the attraction of magnetism which affected only peculiar substances and also that of electricity. Gravity by which is signified the weight of a body is simply defined to be that tendency which all bodies have towards the centre of the earth. This property exists in all bodies, as is clearly proved from the fact, that when set at liberty and unimpeded by any obstacles they all are found to have that tendency, and even when at rest on the surface of the earth it becomes apparent from the force with which they press on the sustaining bodies. From this pressure he stated that the comparative weights of bodies are estimated. Thus one body having a certain degree of gravity or tendency to the earth may be called one pound, and another being drawn with twice that force may be said to weigh two pounds. The gravity of an entire body is but the aggregate of the gravities of the several particles of which that body is composed for this property pertains to every single particle of matter as well as to the constituted body and from this we might deduce that in proportion as you increase or diminish the number of particles of which any body is composed so in proportion you increase or diminish the gravity of the entire. When speaking of the tendency which bodies have towards the centre of the earth the Lecturer remarked that he did not mean to confine the influence of this attraction to the earth alone, as it had been clearly proved by the observation and experiments of Philosophers, that this influence is exerted between each portion of matter, although not easily perceptible on account of the superior attraction of the earth which almost deadened the relative influence of smaller bodies. Dr. Maskelyne of Scotland discovered that the attraction of a Mountain was sufficient to draw the Plumb line from the perpendicular, although of course in a very slight degree. It was in consequence of this principle that no matter on what part of the surface of the earth we stand we are supported —— our Antipodes in New-Zealand are as secure in their position as we are, although standing with their feet exactly opposite to ours, simply from the tendency which we all have towards the centre of the earth. Here the Lecturer proceeded to answer several objections raised to this principle and having demonstrated by experiments that gravity, independently of other forces, causes, all bodies to descend with the same velocity, concluded his discourse by proposing to his pupils the subject of the next Lecture which shall be detailed in due course.

A DISCOURSE ON THE MISSION AND INFLUENCE OF THE POPES, BY THE RIGHT REV. BISHOP GILLIS.

"WHOM DO MEN SAY THAT THE SON OF MAN IS?"—Matt. xvi. 13.

(Continued from our last.)

There opens out now upon us, Dear Brethren, a novel epoch in the history of those memorable changes in human affairs with which the Bishops of Rome have never ceased to grapple for the greater instruction and benefit of the world I take the five next centuries, or the eventful period that elapsed from the conversion of Constantine, and the subsequent fall of Idolatry, to the middle of the eighth century, from whence we date the establishment in Europe of the Temporal power of the Popes.

The difficulty one feels to do anything like justice to such a subject as this, arises not, as in many cases, from the paucity of materials, but from the vastness of the field before us, and from the numberless and momentous events that every where crowd its surface. Four thousand years and more of human ambition and human policy had, under the all-directing power of Divine Providence, led ultimately to the formation and perfecting of the most tremendous empire ever yet witnessed on earth, and not unappropriately termed the Roman world. This formidable sovereignty had now run its course, and, like all institutions of mere human growth, its days had been numbered. It had opened up the highways of the world to those whose commission called them to the very extremities of the earth. The Gospel had been preached.—An unwilling auxiliary, however, of the designs of Heaven, it had brought its whole energies for three successive ages to bear on one fixed object, the crushing of that name which must otherwise have unseated its gods, and overthrown the altars of its capitol; the annihilating among men of the name of Jesus Christ. In this work of iniquity it had done its worst, and failed. The divine origin of the Gospel had now been proved.

Meanwhile, the genius of an untutored savage was ripening in the North, and God was preparing his scourge in the distant and barbarous regions of the Huns. The innocent blood of his servants was at length to be avenged, the trumpet of God's justice had sounded above the downfall of Pagan Rome, and Attila, wild with the thirst of conquest and of blood, came pouring down upon Europe his innumerable hordes; like a torrent that rolls along with its waters the very stones of its bed, sweeping every where before him the various savage tribes he dislodged from their strongholds, and thus gathering the waves of that mighty deluge that was finally to overwhelm the Roman Empire. Huns, Alains, Goths and Vandals, Lombards and Sueves, were now all on their way, and busied with a work of universal destruction. Rome was, during those long and disastrous years, four times besieged and sacked; the unity of the empire was broken into Western and Eastern provinces, and it grew daily in weakness Its monuments were overthrown.—its treasures of knowledge every where doomed to the flames,—a hundred and twenty thousand volumes had thus perished at Constantinople, and Alexandria was subsequently to see its vast stores of literature consumed in an equally reckless manner. In a word, Dear Brethren, Europe could boast no longer the peaceful organization of a civilized country; it had become, as it were, one vast field of battle, soaked and softened with human blood; unmercifully trampled down, and to all appearance, hoplessly stamped with the iron hoof of barbarian despotism. The Roman empire had not expired like the bishops of its catacombs, "accepting deliverance," as writers S'. Paul, "that they might find a better resurrection,"*—the Roman empire had died to rise no more.

Where, then, Beloved Brethren, was to be seen the rainbow of hope, for the world; the ark in which were to be saved the last remnants of knowledge and of social order? Who, now that Mary's prophecy had been so far accomplished,—now that the proud had been scattered, and the mighty hurled from their seats,—and that the whole earth was heaped with the fragments of Cæsar's kingdom—who stood alone erect amidst the ruins, to stay the barbarian's hand, and pour love into his bosom; to fix the limits of aggression, and plead the cause of the oppressed; to read a lesson unto kings, and a new law unto their people; to lay down the true boundaries of human authority, and the ground-work of all future Christian government?—Or, if I may assimilate the troubles of those portentous times to the boisterous heavings of a tempestuous ocean, who then commanded the winds and the sea? What bark was still seen to live amidst the surge, and alone to ride safely upon the storm? It was the bark of him whose mysterious ancestor had walked in safety of old the foaming waters of Genesareth,—Peter, and Peter's successors in Rome's undying See; they, Beloved Brethren, and they alone, proved the rock of salvation, against which the gates of hell were not allowed to prevail.

Methinks I now behold that stately figure, as it emerges from the threatened walls of defenceless Rome, Leo, its Christian Bishop, to whom posterity has so justly awarded the surname of Great,—Leo, walking forth alone to meet Attila and his countless thousands;—Leo, the High Priest of the better Testament, the Jaddus of a new law, going forth to propitiate, not the polished Alexander of Macedon, but Attila the ruthless and indomitable Hun;—Leo, unsupported by the timid sovereign of a falling empire, and looking to the eternal hills for his only help;—Leo, the impersonation of the redeemed world, going to sue for mercy to the children of its persecutors;—Leo, accompanied by the angels of all the Churches, and praying for the peace of the new Jerusalem—Oh! Leo, Beloved Brethren, was then indeed a noble suppliant. His petition was listened to, and Attila retraced his steps. It was a Pope who then saved Christian Europe.

(To be continued.)

* Heb. xi, 35.

WHITE'S CONFUTATION OF CHURCH OF ENGLANDISM.

(Translated from the Original Latin, by E. W. O'Mahoney, Esq., of the Middle Temple London.)

CHAPTER XXX.

The thirty-first Article examined.

(Continued from our last.)

In this article, entitled "Of the oblation of Christ finished upon the cross," we read as follows—"The offering of Christ once made, is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin, but that alone. Wherefore the sacrifice of Masses, in which it was commonly said, that the priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, were blasphemous Fables, and dangerous deceits."

EXAMINATION.

As the Catholic Church, which received her instruction from Christ, through his apostles, has invariably and at all times taught, that the sacrifice of the Mass or Eucharist was to be offered for the dead as well as for the living; so she has hitherto unceasingly offered it for both, and continues the same practice at the present day. Whereas you, my brethren, by obstinately contradicting—we shall not say impiously carping at—this the Catholic doctrine and practice, have even by this single article, stained the English Protestant Church with so black a mark of heresy, that you cannot possibly cleanse it, except by recantation and penance. However, in order that the truth of what we assert may be manifest, and that the lovers of truth may know what is to be embraced, and what to be avoided, in your doctrine of the bloody and unbloody sacrifice, we shall now briefly explain the doctrine of the Catholic Church on both these heads.

In the first place, the Catholic doctrine teaches, that the virtue and efficacy of the bloody sacrifice, in which Christ once offered himself to his Father on the altar of the cross, sufficed for cancelling the sins, not only of the people of that age, when He hung a victim on the cross, but likewise of all mankind, born into the world from the beginning to the end of time. For the Scripture saith: 'God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself.'* And again it saith: 'Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who taketh away the sin of the world.'†—'And he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for those of the whole world.'‡ Now the world comprises persons not of one period only, but of all ages. Of this Oblation, which alone sufficed for the reconciliation of the whole human race, the apostle Paul says: 'For by one oblation he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.'§ And again: 'Because in him it hath well pleased the Father, that all fulness should dwell: and through him to reconcile all things unto himself, making peace through the blood of his cross, both as to the things that are on earth, and the things that are in heaven.'‖ From this it is not to be inferred, that there was not before, or is not now, any other sacrifice save that of Christ completed on the cross; but that of all the other sacrifices, this is the only one which appeases God by its intrinsic merit, and which may therefore be called, by antonomasia, the peculiar and pre-eminent Sacrifice.

Secondly, the Catholic doctrine teaches, that, from the beginning of the world, when man lived under the law of nature, God impressed on the human mind, by means of divine inspiration, the rite of sacrificing; in order that all men might be made partakers of this most efficacious oblation, which has been now offered and accepted as the full, sufficient, and entire price of the world—and that they might transfer to themselves the saving fruits thereof. It also teaches, that, immediately on the Law being given, God ordained different sacrifices, the use of which was not to reconcile man to God, and purchase his salvation; but to awaken constantly within the mind of man, by means of these external sacrifices, the recollection of the promised sacrifice; to confirm his faith therein; and to enable such as should believe and hope in its virtue, to apply to themselves the fruit of the future sacrifice, whereby God had promised to redeem the world. Another object for instituting those sacrifices was, that, as often as they should be celebrated, man might gratefully call to mind the manifold favors bestowed on him by the unceasing liberality of God, and also reflect on his own salvation, which was to be obtained through the promised Redeemer.

(To be continued.)

* 2 Cor. v. 19. † John i. 29.
‡ 1 John ii. 2. § Hebrews x. 14.
‖ Coloss. i. 19. 20.

Selections.

MISSIONS OF THIBET.

Extracts from a Letter of Rev. Dr. Huc Apostolic Missioner in China, to the Rev. Dr. Etienne, Superior General of Sain, Lazarus, at Paris.

SOJOURN AT LASSA.

(Continued from our last.)

Immediately on his arrival at Lassa, Ki-chan concerted measures with the Boudchan Rembhoutchi and the four Kalous, and caused the Nomekhan to be arrested. He then subjected to an examination all the persons engaged in the service of the accused; and in order to help them to declare the truth, he caused long bamboo needles to be thrust up under their nails. "By this means," as the Chinese say, "the truth was sifted from error, and the conduct of the Nomekhan was manifested to the daylight." The unfortunate man himself confessed his crime without it being requisite to subject him to torture. He admitted he had been capable of making away with three lives of the Tale-Lama, and making them violently transmigrate, first by strangulation, the second time by suffocation, and the third time by poison. A juridical statement was drawn up in Chinese, Tartar, and Thibetian; the Nomekhan and his accomplices signed it; the Boudchan Remboutchi, the four Kalous, and the Chinese ambassador put their seals to it, and it was immediately despatched to Pekin by an extraordinary courier. The whole proceeding was carried on in strict privacy, and in the greatest secrecy.

Three months after, the capital of Thibet was plunged in fearful agitation. A placard was seen posted upon the grand gate entrance of the palace of the Nomekhan, and in the principal streets of the city an imperial edict, in three languages, upon yellow paper, and with boarders representing winged dragons. After a high flown preamble on the duties of kings and sovereigns, both little and great, and an exhortation to potentates, monarchs, princes, magistrates, and people, of the four seas, to march in the paths of justice and virtue, under pain of encountering the wrath of Heaven and the indignation of the great Khan, the emperor recapitulated the crimes of the Nomekhan, and condemned him to perpetual exile upon the banks of the Sakalien-Oula, in the depth of Mandchooria. The edict ended with the usual formula, "Tremble and obey!"

The inhabitants of Lassa crowded eagerly around these unusual placards, which they were unaccustomed to see upon the walls of their city. The intelligence concerning the Nomekhan's condemnation spread rapidly among the multitude; numerous groups collected together and debated with warmth, but in a low tone of voice and excited attitudes, whilst hollow and inaudible murmuring arose in every direction. The object of the agitation absorbing the Thibetian people was not so much the well-merited downfall of the Nomekhan, as the intervention, at which every individual felt himself aggrieved and humbled.

At the lamazary of Sera, the opposition manifested a totally different display of energy. Immediately on receipt of intelligence concerning the imperial edict, a spontaneous and general insurrection burst forth. These fifteen thousand Lamas, who had thoroughly espoused the cause of the Nomekhan, armed themselves precipitately with lances, guns, and every weapon they could lay hold of, and rushed forward to Lassa, which lay within a half league of them. The thick clouds of dust which they raised in their disorderly advance, and their awful yells, announced their arrival to the inhabitants of Lassa. "The Lamas of Sera! the Lamas of Sera are come!".....Such was the cry re-echoing almost simultaneously over the whole city, and chilling all hearts with dread. The Lamas bore down like an avalanche upon the residence of the Chinese ambassador, and smashed its gates to atoms, amidst the thousand times repeated cry of, "Death to Ki-Chan! death to the Chinese! but they found no person upon whom they could wreak their anger. The ambassador having received timely notice of their arrival, had run off for concealment to a Kalou, and his retinue had dispersed through the city. The mob of Lamas then split themselves into several sections; some made towards the palace of the Nomekhan, and the others invested the residence of the Kalous, demanding with loud cries, that the Chinese ambassador should be delivered up to them. A long and desperate struggle arose on this point, during which the four Thibetian ministers were torn to pieces. The other parties received wounds of more or less dangerous character.

Whilst the affray lasted with the Kalous, for the purpose of securing the person of Ki-Chan, the most numerous section of Lamas had forced the prison gates where the Nomekhan was confined, and sought to convey him in triumph to the lamazary of Sera. The Nomekhan earnestly objected to this project, and used his whole influence to calm the excitement of the Lamas. He told them that this ill-considered revolt aggravated instead of ameliorating his position. "I am," said he, "the victim of a conspiracy. I shall go to Pekin; I shall enlighten the emperor, and I shall return triumphantly amongst you. At present we must only obey the imperial decree. I shall depart as I have been ordered. As to you, return peacefully to your lamazary." These words did not change the resolution of the Lamas; but night coming on, they resumed tumultuously the road to Sera, fully resolved to arrange better their plan of action for the ensuing day.

Which day arose, the Lamas were in commotion in their huge convent, and preparing to invest again the city of Lassa. But, to their astonishment, they described in the plain encompassing the lamazary, a multitude of Thibetian and Chinese soldiers armed to the teeth, and intercepting their advance. Their courage vanished at this spectacle. The signal gun was heard, and these extempore soldiers cast down their arms, re-entered their cells, took their books under their arms, and proceeded tranquilly to the choir, in order to recite there the usual morning prayers.

A few days after, the Nomekhan, accompanied by a strong escort, took the road to See-Tchuen and proceeded as quietly as a sheep to the exile assigned him. The reason has never been thoroughly known at Lassa why this man, who shrunk not from the murder of three Tale-Lamas, was unwilling to avail himself of the insurrection of the Lamas of Sera. It is certain that he had only to give the word and all the Chinese at Lassa would have been annihilated, and perhaps the whole of Thibet in a blaze. But the Nomekhan was not moulded for acting such a part; he had the cowardly energy of an assassin, and not the boldness of a seditious leader.

Ki-Chan, intoxicated by his triumph, extended his grasp to the Thibetian accomplices of the Nomekhan. His pretensions in this regard were not relished by the Kalous, who declared to him that they alone had a right of jurisdiction over persons independent of China, and against whom they had not asked for the emperor's protection. The Kin-Chai did not insist further; but that he might not seem yielding to the Thibetian authorities, he replied to them officially, that he abandoned over to them those low-graded assassins, inasmuch as it was not worth while for a representative of the great emperor to meddle in their affair.

A new Nomekhan had been appointed instead of the exiled one. The Chaperon of the lamazary of Kan-Tchan, a young man of eighteen, was chosen for this eminent position. The Talè-Lama and the new Nomekhan being minors at the period of our arrival at Lassa, the regency was entrusted to the first Kalou. The whole solicitude of the regent was bent on traversing the encroachments and usurpations of the Chinese ambassador, who sought every means of availing himself of the actual weakness of the Thibetain government. Let us now resume matters concerning ourselves personally.

As soon as we had presented ourselves to the Thibetian authorities, and declared to them who we were, and what was the object that brought us to Lassa, we took advantage of the semi-official position we thus obtained, to place ourselves in communication with the Thibetian and Tartar Lamas, and commence at last our work as Missioners. One day that we were seated beside our little fire, discussing religious matters with a Lama highly versed in Buddha lore, a rather well-dressed Chinese unexpectedly came into our presence and evinced much earnestness to become a purchaser of our wares. We replied to him that we had nothing for sale. "What! nothing for sale?" "No, nothing except two old horse saddles which we no longer require." "Good! good! that is percisely what I want; I want saddles." And whilst scanning our poor wares, he addressed to us a thousand questions concerning our country and the places we had visited before arriving at Lassa. Shortly after a second Chinese came in, then a third; lastly came two Lamas, wrapped up in magnificent silk shawls. All these visiters desired to make purchases from us; they loaded us with questions, and seemed at the same time as if they were scrutinising every corner of our room. Our declarations that we were not merchants were all to no purpose: they insisted; instead of silks, draperies, or hard-ware, they would willingly accomodate themselves with our saddles. They turned them upside down in every direction; sometimes they pronounced them quite superior, sometimes wretched; at last, after long truckling, they withdrew, with a promise of returning.

The visit of these five individuals was calculated to excite our apprehensions; their mode of acting and speaking was quite unnatural; although they came in succession, they seemed in perfect concert with each other, and to have the same object. Their eagerness to make some purchase from us was evidently a mere pretext in order to disguise their intentions. These people were rather spies or police agents than real merchants. We decided on waiting quietly in the expectation of sounding this transaction later.

Dinner hour having come, we sat down to table, or rather we remained squatting over our fire, and uncovered the pot in which a good piece of grunting ox had been boiling for several hours. Samdadchiemba, as major domo, raised it up to the surface of the liquid by means of a large wooden spoon, and then snatched it with his nails, and threw the smoking viand upon the end of a board, where he divided it into three equal portions. Each person took his ration in his bowl, and helping ourselves to some cakes baked in the ashes, we began our meal at our ease, without concerning ourselves much either about spies or police. We were rinsing our bowls, by way of desert, with buttered tea, when the two pretended Lama merchants re-appeared. "The regent," said they, "is waiting for you at his palace; he wishes to speak to you." "Good! perhaps the regent himself might wish to purchase our old saddles." "There is no demand for either your saddles or wares: get up quick and follow us to the regent." Our doubts were were at an end. The government sought to interfere with us: but why? Was it for our good or evil? to enlarge our freedom or incarcerate us? to let us live or put us to death? we knew not, nor could we anticipate. "Let us go and see the regent," said we, "and the will of the good God be done!"

Clothing ourselves in our best attire, and putting on our grand fox-skin caps, we said to the staff-officer, "Let us go!" "And this young man?" said he, pointing his finger to Samdadchiemba, who cast rather an uncourteous look at him. "This young mad is our servant; he will keep house in our absence." "Not so: he must likewise come; the regent wishes to see you three." Samdadchiemba chucked, by way of dressing himself, his coarse sheep-skin robe, cocked a small black cap on the side of his ear, in a very pert manner, and we all started together, after padlocking the door of our lodging.

We proceeded in double quick time for five or six minutes and we reached the palace of the first Kalon, the regent of Thibet. After crossing a large court-yard, where there was a large assemblage of Lamas and Chinese who commenced chuckling at our appearance among them, we were directed to stop before a guilt door lying partly open. The introducer passed through a small corridor to the left, and in an instant the door opened. At the end of an apartment, simply ornamented, we perceived a personage sitting cross-legged upon a thick cushion covered over with a tiger-skin: this was the regent. He beckoned to us with his right hand to come forward: we advanced up to him and saluted him, placing our caps under our arms. A bench covered with red cloth was placed to our right; we were invited to be seated there, which we did. During this interval the guilt door had been closed, and there only remained in the hall the regent and seven individuals, who stood erect behind him, viz., four Lamas of meek and sedate demeanour, two Chinese with looks denoting subtlety and malice, and a personage whom we recognized to be a mussulman by his turban and grave countenance. The regent was a man of fifty years of age; his tall, square, and remarkably white figure had all the appearance of regal majesty; his black eyes shaded with long eyelashes were intelligent and full of mildness. He was clad in a yellow robe lined with sable; an ear-ring ornamented with diamonds was suspended from his left ear, and his long hair, of a beautiful ebony black, was gathered to the top of the head, and confined by three small gold combs. His large red cap, encircled with pearls and surmounted by a coral ball, was placed by his side upon a green cushion.

As soon as we were seated, the regent commenced by surveying us for a long time in silence and with the most minute attention. He inclined his head sometimes to the right, sometimes to the left, and the smile that played on his countenance seemed partly indicative of leering and partly of kindness. This sort of pantomime at last appeared so droll to us that we could not refrain from laughter. "That's right! said we in French and in a low tone, "this gentleman seems rather a good sort of fellow; our affair will go on well." "Eh!" said the regent in a tone full of amiability, "what language are you speaking? I did not understand what you said." —"We speak the language of our country."— "Let me see; repeat in a loud voice what you have pronounced so low."—"We said, this gentleman seems rather a good sort of fellow."— "Do you understand this language?" said the regent turning towards those who stood behind him. They all bowed together, and replied that they did not understand it —"You see no one here understands the language of your country; translate your words into Thibetian."—"We said the physiognomy of the first Kalon was expressive of much kindness."—"Ha! yes, you deem me kind, yet I am very harsh. Am I not very harsh?" said he to his retinue. The latter began to laugh and made no answer.—"You are right, continued the regent; "I am kind, for kindness is part of a Kalou's duty: I should be kind towards my people, and also towards strangers....." He then made us a lengthened discourse, of which we understood very little. When he closed, we said to him, that not being accustomed to the Thibetian language, we did not thoroughly comprehend the sense of his words. The regent beckened to a Chinese, who came one step forward and translated to us his harangue. Here is an abstract of it:—We had been summoned without the slightest intention of molesting us. The contradictory rumours in circulation at Lassa concerning us since our arrival had determined the regent to interrogate us himself, in order to ascertain where we came from.—"We are from the heaven of the West,' said we to the regent.'—"From Galgatta, (Calcutta)?"—"No; our country is called France.'—"Therefore you are Peling, (Englishmen)?—"No; we are Frenchmen."—"Can you write?"—"Better than we speak." The regent turned round, addressing a few words to a Lama, who disappeared and returned in an instant with paper, ink, and a bamboo style —"Here is paper," said the regent to us; "write something."—"In what language? In Thibetain?"—"No; write in the characters of your country." One of us took the paper upon his knees and wrote this sentence: What will it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul? "Ha! here are the characters in use in your country! I never saw any resembling them; and what is the meaning?"..... We wrote the translation in Thibetian, Tartar, and Chinese, and we had it handed to him.— "I have not been deceived," said he; "you are men of great knowledge; you can, we see, write in all languages, and you express as deep thought as are to be found in prayer books....." He then repeated with a slow motion of the head: What will it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul?

Whilst the regent and the personages around him were in raptures at our wondrous science, the cries of the multitude together with the Chinese tam-tam became suddenly audible in the palace court. "Here comes the Pekin ambassador," said the regent to us; "he wishes personally to interrogate you: tell him frankly everything concerning you, and rely on my protection; I govern the country." Having said this he withdrew with his retinue by a small screened door, and left us alone in middle of the hall.

The idea of falling into the hands of the Chinese occasioned in us at first a disagreeable impression, and the image of those horrible persecutions which, at different epochs, have desolated the Christian congregations of China, were suddenly conjured up to our imagination. But we soon became composed on reflecting that alone and insulated as we were in the midst of Thibet, we could compromise no one. This thought encouraged us. Samdadchiemba," said we to our young neophyte, "now is the time to show that we are brave and Christians. This affairs may, perhaps, have ulterior consequences, but let us never lose sight of eternity. If we experience good treatment from them we shall thank the good God; if they ill-treat we shall likewise be thankful, for we shall have the happiness of suffering for the faith. If they put us to death, martyrdrom will be a fine crowning of our toils. After only eighteen months' march to reach heaven is not that a fine journey? is not that happiness? What say you, Samdadchiemba?" "I never feared death. If I am asked whether I am a Christian, you will see whether I shall tremble!

(To be continued.)

FIRST FRUITS OF THE "PAPAL AGGRESSION."

The "Papal Aggression" has already borne most wonderful and unexpected fruit. So singular is the issue, that worldly politicians cannot be but struck with awe. A Government apparently strong has dissolved before it, and without a contest crumbled into dust. The proud Whigs, who began to make war upon the Catholic subjects of the Queen with every human prospect of complete success, have found themselves deserted by their usual allies, and objects of execration to their very friends. Lord John Russell has become impotent, his Cabinet is broken up, and his Radical allies are denouncing loudly, and repudiating the dynasty of the Whig family.

The Whig Ministry simply dissolves; it is not destroyed by a hostile opposition. It perishes without a blow, save that inflicted on itself by the criminal folly of its head. Lord John Russell undertook to punish the Pope, and the weapon which he hurled in his malice against the Holy Father recoils on his own head, so that he is politically felo de se. Such is the fate of those who fight against God. The armies of the Assyrian beleaguered the city of Jerusalem, and in a night they perished, but not by the hands of man.

It is not the unsatisfactory Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that has brought ruin on the Ministry; nor is it distaste of power, and a longing for the Opposition benches. The Whigs have, before now, reconstructed their Budget at the bidding of their foes, and have clung to place till their friends were weary of them, or ashamed. Neither are there any symptoms of penitence for their insults to the Holy See, or of an honest desire to practice charity and justice. They go out of office, as usual, ignominously, with the contempt both of friends and foes. They go out most unwillingly, and after an attempt at a coalition at the bidding of their most implacable opponent.

Retribution rarely comes quickly in this world; but as a great sin was committed, and a greater sin attempted, justice speedily overtook the offender in the midst of his pride, and in the full consciousness of his deceitful strength. The man who denounced the true religion as a mummery is become himself a mummery. His power is gone, and his pride is humbled. He who counted upon rich spoils out of the treasury of the Church is spoiled himself; he who had made a treaty with traitors is deceived; and the innocent victim of his perfidy escapes, not by craft or strength, but by the mercy of God, who would not yet deliver it over into the hands of its enemies.

In the beginning of this national madness, the Premier declined to exert the power of the Government against the Church. Dr. Blomfield, the Protestant Bishop of the See of London, invoked his assistance, and Lord John Russell, glad to rebuke even the pretence of a spiritual power, sent a brief, but expressive, refusal to that over-busy intermeddler. But when the storm grew thick, and "the Protestant spirit" of the same was thoroughly roused, the Whig Minister, recollecting the ancient success of his progenitors, determined to turn it to his own account. It is not his fault that the tragedies of Charles II. were not re-enacted in the reign of Queen Victoria.

The Whig patrons of the Catholic Church, the friends of civil and religious liberty, have at last revealed their interior nature; they have laid bare their secret hearts, and have shown us what affection they really feel for us. We have learned an excellent lesson. We were once the proud friends of wolves, and within their reach; but they showed their purpose too soon, and so we have escaped once more from the snares of a treacherous alliance. Men have from time to time raised their warning voice against the Whig compact, and urged, hitherto in vain, that the Whigs of England and Ireland were irreconcileable foes to the Church. We have lived to see the issue of their predictions, and let us hope some profit also from our late experience.

Those Catholics who were to become the tools of the Government in its machinations against the Church, have had their reward—different, certainly, from their possible expectations, but still most wholesome. They have not been able at this time to sell the Church either for place or favour, and must, therefore, wait awhile.

Though one danger is apparently past, yet we must not suppose that we are safe: the Devil is not foiled so easily. There are rumours of a concordat and a treaty with Rome, the object of which, so far as any government of this world is concerned, is the subjection of the Church to the State, and, finally, disobedience to the Holy See.—Tablet.

REVIEW.

Familiar Sketches of Catholic Life; in a Series of Letters from a Foreign Catholic to an English Protestant. Burns and Lambert.

This is a tempting little square book, of which one only requires to turn over the leaves to feel sure that every page contains interesting matter. The idea is an obvious one, and yet, if we mistake not, almost unique in its execution. When we reflect that to the majority of Protestants the manners and customs of Catholic life especially in a Catholic country, are as utterly unknown as the manners and customs of the Jews, it is surprising no direct attempt has been made, until the present charming little volume, to place before them any collected information on that subject. Whatever has been done this way, has been done mainly by Protestant hands, and, of course, inaccurately, and often in a very bad and hostile spirit. Yet such is the inherent beauty of Catholic life, that even works of this kind, written by enemies, and on set prejudice the minds of their brethren, have often produced the contrary effect. Witness the glimpses of Catholic usages in Spain afforded, even in spite of himself, by Mr. Blanco White, in his letters on that country. Other instances might be given, if it were worth while; but enough has been said to show that the subject ought to be taken up by Catholic hands, and, to some extent, this has already been done in those beautiful papers in the Rambler, on Catholic matters in various parts of Italy. The present volume is a selection of letters addressed to Protestant friends in humble life, as well as to others of higher rank, describing, with the most profound Catholic feeling, as well as with the most thorough acquaintance with the subject, Catholic usages as they exist in Belgium. In Belgium, perhaps as in the Tyrol, in Catalonia, and some other countries, alas! too few, we see the happy and beautiful spectacle of a Catholic people, to a great extent untouched by the mad theories which are ravaging the rest of Europe, rejoicing in the full exercise of the old Faith handed down to them from their forefathers—every noble tradition, every beautiful rite, every graceful and holy usage, descending to them in an unbroken line out of that "rich and solemn past," from which less favoured countries are separated by so dreary a gulf. The pious author has, indeed, collected in a small compass a great quantity of highly instructive and beautiful information, related with the utmost naiveté.

We quote the following passages, to give an idea of the way in which the writer describes the religious customs of Belgium, and Catholic customs in general:—

Besides all these incitements to "remember" the dying legacy of Jesus, there is a society called "The Society of the Perpetual Adoration of Jesus." This society is established in most towns and villages. It is intended by it to provide that Jesus shall never be a moment of time, either day or night, without some worshippers to adore in "remembrance" of His love in giving himself to us in the Most Holy Sacrament. Each parish has one day in the year appointed as its day of adoration. Ours, for example, is the 8th of May, beginning at twelve o'clock in the night, and ending with twelve o'clock the next night. Persons who choose to be members of this society (and few among us are not) are required by its laws to adore Christ for one hour during the day or night. Those who are strong, or who wish to make some effort to serve God, choose a night hour; others an hour in the day, each according to his circumstances. The Pastor regulates the hours of his parishioners, so that each shall be filled up by several worshippers, in order that, in case of sickness or other hindrance, the hour may be occupied by some. Those who choose night hours pray at home in their houses; those who choose an hour after the church is opened, which it is at six, go into the church to perform this devotion.

It is a festival; many services are performed during the day. These are begun at six by the Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament in the remonstrance in the upper division of the tabernacle, and the chanting the "Veni Creator."

The early members come in to "pray their hour," as they call it. The head farmers and tradespeople begin to take their places, two at a time, one on each side of the altar. Little desks have been placed for them; a large candle is lighted by the beadle and placed beside them, which he removes as their hour expires, and places two for the next two worshippers, who stand ready to take their places. This is continued throughout the day. A clock is placed in the church to note our hours to us. Masses are said during the morning, as neighbouring Priests come to assist on this day. The afternoon is filled up by Vespers, preaching, and Benediction service; and the whole is closed towards dusk with chanting the Te Deum. As our day expires, some other parish takes up our work; and at twelve o'clock their day of adoration begins, and continues under the same regulations: and thus from parish to parish throughout the year.

These days of solemn devotion furnish us with a constant means of spending a day with God, whenever our inclinations and a fitting opportunity enable us to do so.—(Pp. 105, 106.)

INTERCESSORY PRAYER.

Another great means of the Church for supplying intercessory prayer is, by forming her children into brotherhoods or societies. These are very numerous, and we may choose to which we will belong, according to our devotion. Every parish has one or more of these societies established in it, of which most of the inhabitants are members. We may also belong to societies of other parishes, each having privileges of its own which we may like to partake of. We have in our small village three of these societies, and few of us there are who do not belong to them all. The conditions of being members vary, but all oblige in some way to intercessory prayer, and bring us the advantage of having Masses said for us on appointed days with benediction services; besides the being prayed for daily by the whole society. The prayers we have to recite are prescribed by the rules of the society. We are expected to be faithful in performing these devotions, and thus render ourselves partakers of the supplications of thousands, and become ourselves the dispensers of good to them.

In our daily attendance at the great sacrifice of the Mass we become of necessity intercessors, and are interceded for. But I may not enter now on the incalculable privileges we enjoy ourselves and dispense to others through intercession in that sacred service.

Thus nurtured in the duty of interceding for each other, Catholics practice it as naturally as they take their daily bread.

In our colleges the young students have many rules by which they form themselves into intercessors for the whole college, or turn the whole college into intercessors for one member. For instance, they draw lots once a month, and for him whose number is lowest the whole college receives the Holy Sacrament and hears Mass.

A Catholic, in parting from a friend, or writing to one, asks his prayers. A confessor promises his prayers to his penitent, and requests his penitent's prayers for himself.

The request for intercessory prayer is universal. Go into a shop in a strange town, and say you are in a hurry because on your way to hear Mass, the person who serves you will earnestly say, "May I recommend myself to your prayers?" The beggar you relieve at your door or in the street kneels down and says a Lord's Prayer for you. Give to the poor, their grateful reply is, "I will hear Mass for you." Tell them you are sick or in sorrow, the ready consolation is, "I will pray for you."

I am sure you must see the loveliness of this strong bond of charity, and must acknowledge that the appointment of intercession must be of God, and an additional proof of His mercy to us helpless creatures.

The volume treats at great length, partly in a doctrinal way, but still more from observation, and the rich stores of a devotional mind, a great variety of kindred subjects, such as "Description of a Catholic Day;" "The Mass as a Sacrifice;" "The Mass as a Sacrament;" "Christ Present in the Sacrament of the Altar;" "Catechism and First Communion;" "Children's Recreation;" "Catholic Prayer; its Preparation and its Language;" "Spiritual Retreat;" "Devotion to the Holy Virgin;" Passion-tide; "Month of May;" "Whitsuntide;" The Rosary; "Relics," &c., &c. All parties will be pleased with so unpretending and useful a little work—Protestants, for the affectionate and winning kindness with which it would set the truth before them in its fairest colours; and Catholics also, in these countries, for the happy picture it gives them of a country where Catholicity prevails over the great bulk of the population, unfettered by the cold hand of tyranny or heresy. It will encourage us to good works, by showing us what our glorious inheritance really is, and what the Catholic Church may be to any loving and obedient soul, whether in Belgium, in Great Britain, in Ireland, or in the farthest corners of the earth.—Tablet.

HOW TO FEED THE PEOPLE—SUBSTITUTES FOR THE POTATO.

The experience and sagacity of a philosophic traveller has furnished information from which some useful hints may be derived for ill-fated and famine-stricken Ireland. The South American labourers, plunged in the eternal darkness and travail of dismal and cavernous mines, support their unparalleled toils on a diet of beans. "In the mines of St. Anne," says Humboldt, "the miners subsist exclusively on bread and beans and while the labourer prefers the bread to the beans, the employer prefers the beans to the bread, because the vigour of the workman, he has invariably observed, improves on a diet of beans, and diminishes on bread alone; and thus the labourer is compelled by his task master to use beans with his bread." In England, Dr. Buckland, who informs us that he ascertained that sinew is supplied by the use of pulse, seems to establish by chemical theory the experience of practice. In Ireland, too, the greater portion of the county Clare has been, at the indication of some agricultural society, sown with beans; and the peasant of that country, surrounded and consoled by his scented field of blooming beans, which he mows like a meadow with a scythe, ceases to mourn in so bitter a manner the unaccountable failure of the usual esculent. Thus practice and science, America and England, appear to unite in asserting the utility of this vegetable, which horses eat in periods of plenty, and men might consume in days of famine.

As to Indian meal, it must be always remembered that in the Continental countries of the maize plant, and vessels which transport the corn, it is, for the most part, boiled whole, like pulse, and a little grease being spilled upon the platter, Italians, Greeks, and Spaniards, are seen, spoon in hand, eating it as if rice.

In Canada, the working classes in general, and especially boatmen on the river St. Lawrence, sometimes consume no other sustenance for days together except a handful of Indian grain, to which grease is added as a condiment. If Indian corn continue to be used, we would advise our peasantry to boil it whole—fuel will be saved, and the cost of grinding also—their meals will be cheaper and more promptly prepared—their food will be sounder! In a hundred parts of Indian corn the nutrition is eighty-eight; in a hundred parts of potatoes it is only twenty-four.

The energetic industry which characterises Ulster has been attributed to the invigorating aliment consumed by the Ultonians. Professor Muldar asserts, that the people of Holland, once so brave and enterprising, have, since the potato was introduced amongst them, degenerated into hebetude. Nay, he asserts that all who eat potatoes must necessarily become sluggish, because the laboratory within is obliged to make too powerful an effort to extract nutrition from a substance comparatively innutritions. The mind gets dull and the system torpid, when the process of digestion is so sluggish and operose.

We all know that a horse cannot work unless he is fed; and a man should be treated as well as a horse. As an evidence of this modern pugilists and public pedestrians, who walk for wagers, derive from the diet they consume the necessary vigour for such violent exercise. Their food, unlike potatoes, is small in bulk, but rich in nutrition. Fat is rejected, and the muscle or lean part of meat must alone be eaten with bread. Three pints of fluid are as much as should be taken during twenty-four hours by individuals who are training for pugilism or pedestrianism.

It would be folly to expect, however, that those who devote themselves to useful labour shall be fed in so careful a mode as those who contribute to the idle, if not wicked, amusements of men. Nothing is more profitable to employers, nevertheless than that the labourers whom they employ should be well fed. Labourers supplied with innutritious food have not the physical ability to labour. They dawdle over their business, and loiter at their labour, not through intentional sloth, but bodily debility It is on this account that Adam Smith asserts that taxes on such provisions as are indispensable to working men are really paid by the wealthier classes who employ the labourers

Of all the inferior descriptions of food, the most nutritious and the cheapest is fish, because no rent can be exacted from the waters. In paying for fish, we pay for labour, and not for the element in which it is reared; for, unlike corn, it grows in an element which pays no taxes. Meat can never be so cheap as fish, until the brine is as valuable as pasture-land. Meat, at twopence-halfpenny a pound, is twice as dear as fish; but it is, under no circumstances, twice as nourishing. If fish sells for a penny a pound, meat should sell for a penny-farthing, in order to equalise fish in cheapness. There is something in fish, which is essentially invigorating to the human frame. Nature was forced to make an extraordinary effort to fortify piscine animality, so as to endure the freezing climate of the surges. Nature furnished the finny race with an essential oil, which, when taken as a portion of our food, invigorates our bodies, because it supplies carbon to our blood. The liver of the cod yields an oil that supersedes, in some degree, the pharmacopeia. The dog fish affords an oil superior to Friar's balsam, in healing wounds, and is most invaluable in a stable. One pound of fish is as nourishing as eight pounds of potatoes. But we must resume this subject at a subsequent opportunity.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 22.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MAY 31, 1851. [VOL. XX.

INDULGENTIA PLENARIA AD INSTAR JUBILÆI. A. D. 1850 AND 1851.

Ex Audientia SSmi diei 23 Junii 1850.

Cum ob adversas temporum circumstantias, redeunte circulo vertentis Anni 1850, formalis indictio de more Anni Jubilaei locum habere non potuerit, SSmus D.N. Pius Div. Prov. PP. IX. ad promovendam nihilominus animarum salutem in tanta praesertim ubivis divinarum humanarumque rerum omnium perturbatione, ac spiritualibus Christi fidelium necessitatibus occurrere cupiens, neve peculiaribus et extraordinariis auxiliis ac medelis priventur, utque una simul et debitae Omnipotenti Deo gratiae reddantur ob faustum suum ad S. Sedem regressum, et quae adhuc minitari videntur mala, potenti implorata Immaculatae Virginis ope, ac SSrum. Apostolorum Petri et Pauli aliorumque caelestium incolarum intercessione, Misericordium Pater exoratus avertere, pacemque firmare dignetur; haec quae sequuntur Patriarchis, Archiepiscopis, Episcopis, Vicariis Apostolicis Atque aliis, qui Missionum Catholicarum regionibus praesunt nunciari mandavit, scilicet: Sanctitas Sua laudatis Praesulibus potestatem facit Apostolicae Sedis nomine publicandi, Plenariam Indulgentiam in forma Jubilaei ab omnibus Christi fidelibus utriusque sexus lucrandam, consuetis piis operibus, aliisque ab iisdem Ordinariis designandis, una cum Sacramentorum participatione, ita tamen, ut in regionibus Missionum intra Europam quindecim designentur dies intra currentem an-

PLENARY INDULGENCE IN THE FORM OF A JUBILEE.

From an Audience of His Holiness of the 23d day of June 1850.

Whereas, on account of untoward circumstances, at the return of the cycle of the passing year 1850, the usual formal indiction of the year of Jubilee could not take place, Our most holy Lord Pius the Ninth, by divine Providence, Pope, eager notwithstanding to promote the salvation of souls, especially in the present general disturbed state of all things both human and divine, and desirous to provide for the necessities of the faithful, and that they should not be deprived of special and extraordinary helps, and remedies, and solicitude at the same time that due thanks be rendered to the Almighty for his own propitious return to the Holy See and that the Father of mercies, moved by earnest supplication would through the powerful intercession of the Immaculate Virgin, of the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, and the other Heavenly spirits, deign to avert the still apparently impending evils and establish peace—evils has commanded, that the following things be made known to the Patriarchs, Archbishops, Bishops, Vicars Apostolic and others who preside over Catholic Missions, namely, that His Holiness gives authority in the name of the Apostolic See to the aforesaid prelates, under the following arrangement to publish a plenary indulgence in the form of a Jubilee for the Faithful of both sexes who shall perform the accustomed good works and the num 1850, extra vero Europam item quindecim designentur dies infra annum integrum a die datae praesentis Indulti inchoandum, in omnibus locis eorum jurisdictioni subjectis, intra quos dies Christifideles, qui vere poenitentes, rite confessi, ac sacra Communione refecti pia opera ab Ordinariis injuncta perfecerint Plenariam, ut supra, Indulgentiam consequi valeant. Per id vero tempus, quindecim nempe dies designatos, Sanctitas Sua Confessariis ab Ordinariis ipsis approbatis potestatem tribuit absolvendi poenitentes ab omnibus Censuris, excommunicationibus, et quibusvis reatibus et excessibus quovis modo etiam expresse Apostolicae Sedi reservatis, ac dispensandi quoque ab onere denunciationis in casibus ab Ecclesia determinatis, exceptis tamen haereticorum dogmatizantium, et iis de quibus in Constitutione sa me: Bented. XIV. Sacramentum Poenitentiae incipit, verso est Tribuit item Sanctitas Sua memoratis Ordinariis facultatem pro personis clausurae addictis, nec—non aegrotantibus, aut carcere detentis commutandi ea, quae aliis generatim injuncta fuerint, quaeque iis peragere datum non sit, in alia pia opera eorum arbitrio, ac prout magis in Domino expedire judicaverint. Commendat postremo Sanctus Dominus eadem Praesulibus, et Evangelicis Operariis, ut omni studio, ac sollicitudine enitantur fideles eorum curae creditos monere, atque urgere, ut salutaribus hisce diebus de pandito eis thesauro Ecclesiae participare satagant.

Datum ex aedib. Sacrae Congregationis de Propaganda Fide die et anno ut supra.

A BARNABO, A Secretis.

Concordat cum Originali,

J. McCabe,

A Secretis.

Apbi. Edessae V. A. O. B.

other things appointed by their same Ordinaries, and also devoutly approach the Sacraments, viz. that, in the Missions of Europe 15 days shall be appointed within the current year, but that out side of Europe 15 days also shall be marked out by the prelates of those Missions within an entire year from the date of the present indult, in all places subject to their jurisdiction, within which days the Christian faithful who being truly penitent and having duly confessed their sins, and received the Holy Communion, shall perform the pious works enjoined by the Ordinaries, may obtain the above mentioned plenary indulgence. During the fifteen days to be thus fixed upon; His Holiness confers power on confessors approved of by the Ordinaries, of absolving penitents from all censures, excommunications and whatsoever crimes and excesses, in any way even expressly reserved to the Holy See and also of dispensing with the obligation of denouncing guilty parties in certain cases determined by the church, (heretical teachers excepted and also those other cases excepted) of which mention is made in the constitution of Benedict the fourteenth of Holy Memory commencing Sacramentum Penitentiæ.

His Holiness likewise grants to the aforesaid Ordinaries, faculties for religious who observe enclosure for the sick, and for captives who may not be able to perform the works prescribed, to commute these into other pious works such they may judge more expedient in the Lord. Lastly, our most holy Lord recommends the aforesaid Prelates and Evangelical Labourers, to endeavour with all zeal and solicitude to admonish the faithful committed to their care, and excite them to labour earnestly for a participation in the treasures of the Church laid open during these days of salvation.

Given from the Hall of the Sacred congregation of the propagation of the Faith, on the day and year above mentioned.

A. BARNABO,

Secretary.

(True Translation,) J. McCabe,

Secy to the Abp. V. A. W. B.

PASTORAL INSTRUCTION ON THE PLENARY INDULGENCE, IN THE FORM OF A JUBILEE, A. D. 1850 & 1851.

To the Faithful under his care.

Patrick Joseph, by the grace of God and the favor of the Holy Apostolic See, Archbishop of Edessa, and Vicar Apostolic of Western Bengal, Health and Benediction.

Beloved Brethren in Jesus Christ,

The August Representative of the Prince of the Apostles, the Venerable Reigning Supreme Pontiff, Pius the 9th, in the midst of the countless anxieties which distress his Paternal heart, has not forgotten the Spiritual wants and necessities of you, his Beloved Children, notwithstanding your remoteness from the seat of the Apostolic See.

From that Centre and bond of Catholic Unity, his voice has reached to the ends of the Earth, announcing to the Prelates, to whom is confided, the Chief Pastoral charge of each portion of the Universal Flock, that in virtue of the Keys of Heaven, of which as Peter's Successor he is the Depositary, he authorises them to open the fountain of the countless graces and merits contained in the treasury of the Church, and dispense them to the Faithful respectively under their care, on such conditions, as they may prudently deem conducive to the glory of God and the Salvation of Souls.

In the admirable order chosen by God, to prepare mankind for the coming of the Redeemer, it was arranged with infinite Wisdom, that the Religious Ritual of the people of God should show forth the characteristic outlines, both of the future Messiah and of the dispensation which he was to establish, for the adoration of the Father in Spirit and in truth. In this way, the temporal blessings promised to and conferred upon the Jews by God, at certain fixed recurring periods, typified the infinitely greater graces and benedictions, which, from time to time, were to be dispensed to the Faithful, in the Law, which Christ came on earth to establish.

"And thou," said the Lord to Moses, "shalt sanctify the fiftieth year, and shalt proclaim remission to all the inhabitants of the land, for it is the year of the Jubilee. Every man shall return to his possession, and every one shall go back to his former family." Levit. Chap. 25.

If in a carnal dispensation which brought nothing to perfection, the Almighty provided, at fixed intervals, for the return of a season of pardon and mercy, in which the bondsman was to be made free, and the needy man, who, through the pressure of poverty, had sold his inheritance, restored to the lands of his Fathers, assuredly, in the Christian dispensation, which is founded on better promises, than that given to the Jews, there must have been provided by its Divine Founder, some corresponding season of mercy, which may be referred to and described in the words of St. Paul. "Behold now is the acceptable time, behold now is the day of Salvation."—2. Cor. Chap. 6.

If to the Church founded by Moses, who was as a servant in the house of his Master, privileges and prerogatives so great in the temporal order, were granted, is it not congruous, that to the worship established by Christ, as a Son in the House of his Father, Spiritual graces and mercies should belong, as superior to those annexed to the Mosaic Law, as the spirit is to the flesh, and as the divine consubstantial Son of the Father is to Moses, who was but as a servant in his Master's house.

From your very infancy to the present day, you know, my Brethren, that it has been unceasingly impressed upon you, both when learning your Catechism, and when listening on each Festival to the public Instructions of your Pastors, that an Indulgence is not, what it is so often described to be, by the ignorance or malice of the adversaries of Catholicity, namely, a permission to commit sin. No, my Brethren, your Holy Religion teaches you with St. Augustin, that not even for the Salvation of the whole world, would it be lawful to commit the most venial sin, were it even if possible, that by such a transgression so great a benefit could be effected.

In accordance with the Holy Council of Trent, the Catholic Church teaches, that it is wholly false and from the word of God, to affirm, as some Innovators do, who have 'an appearance of Godliness, but deny the power thereof," that the guilt of sin is never forgiven by the Lord, without the whole punishment also being therewith pardoned. On the contrary, we know from Holy Scripture, that as in the case of David, his sin was remitted, whilst he was sentenced by the Prophet, on the part of God, to undergo various temporal penalties and afflictions, so it ordinarily happens to those, who, after Baptism, fall into wilful sin, that after having obtained by repentance and the grace of the Sacrament of Penance, the remission of their guilt and of eternal punishment, they still owe to the Divine justice a satisfaction, to compensate for which, they must, imitate the example of David, who, though assured of forgiveness, thus describes the worthy fruits of Penance brought forth by him, "I have laboured in my groaning, every night I will wash my bed. I will recount to thee all my years, in the bitterness of my soul.*"

It is to help us towards the obtaining the remission of this satisfaction, that the Church comes forward to succour our infirmity by the concession of a Jubilee or plenary indulgence. But as the grand object of our Holy Mother, in thus interposing, is, not to relax in any way our unceasing obligations as Christians, to lead a holy and a penitential life, but to relieve us from a debt to the Divine justice, the full payment of which would exceed our own individual unaided ability, she requires as an indispensable condition on the part of the Faithful, who may wish to profit of the proffered mercy, that before they can receive it, they, by sincere repentance for their sins and the devout participation of the Sacraments, be first reconciled to God and in the state of grace.

Prayer, fasting, and alms-deeds are the other usual conditions to be faithfully fulfilled by each person, who is desirous to secure to his soul the great spiritual benefit of a Plenary Indulgence.

In the Gospel we read, that, immediately after our Saviour had addressed his Apostles in these words: "Amen, I say to you, whatsoever you shall bind upon earth, shall be bound also in heaven; and whatsoever you shall loose upon earth, shall be loosed also in Heaven," He added these remarkable sentences, "Amen I say to you that if two of you shall consent upon earth, concerning any thing whatsoever they shall ask, it shall be done to them by my Father who is in Heaven. For where there are two or three gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." Matt. Chap. 18. Guided by the intimation given in these words by Her Divine Founder, the Catholic Church attaches the highest importance to the united prayers of her Children dispersed throughout the world, and She gladly profits of each favorable occasion, to induce them to join together with one mind and one heart, in offering to Heaven a holy violence by prayer, fasting and alms, for their own Salvation and for that of their Brethren.

Besides the primary object of the Jubilee is, the Sanctification and Salvation of Souls, the August and Venerable Pontiff who now happily fills the Chair of Peter, desires also, that the Faithful in their devotions for the Jubilee, return profound thanks to the Most High, for his own auspicious return to Rome the seat and centre of Catholic Unity, and earnestly supplicate the Divine goodness to avert those evils, which yet threaten the peace of Religion and Society, from the dark and mischievous counsels of the enemies of peace and order.

Another object most dear to the paternal heart of the Venerable Pontiff, Pius the IXth is, the suppression of the unhappy and scandalous Schism, which, the audacious refractory conduct of a handful of ignorant Priests, several of them, a disgrace by want of education and sound Morals to the Sacred Ministry, has impiously excited in India and perversely protracted for years, by the perpetration of habitual Sacrilege, committed by men, who in open defiance of the Supreme Head of the Church, persist in exercising an unlawful Ministry, to their own damnation and the eternal ruin of many deluded souls. To extinguish this great evil and scandal, you will, Beloved Brethren, earnestly supplicate the Divine mercy, during the approaching time of mercy for the conversion of these wretched and blind Leaders of the Blind, and pray for peace for Jerusalem, the Church of the Living God, that peace be her strength and plenty in her towers—that all her Children, may be as Olive plants round about her holy table—the Altar, at which she nourishes her little ones to immortality, with the Bread of Angels, the Body and Blood of Her Divine founder and spouse.

For many amongst us, Beloved Brethren, the blessed opportunity which now offers, will certainly be the last, which will present itself to us, during the portion of our Mortal career, which may still remain. Oh! may we gratefully profit of it, lest mercy abused turn to vengeance in our regard, as it has, alas! but too often happened to many, who have gone before us into Eternity.

To avoid a like misfortune, keep constantly in mind, my Brethren, that nothing provokes the anger and indignation of God more, than that perversity and impenitence, which lead the sinner to undervalue and slight the graces and opportunities, proffered by the Divine Mercy to bring him to repentance. Hearken to the words of the Holy Ghost, spoken in the Scriptures on this subject. "Because I called, and you refused: I stretched forth my hand and there was none that regarded, you have despised all my counsel, and have neglected my reprehensions: I also will laugh in your destruction, and will mock when that shall come to you which you feared. When sudden calamity shall fall on you, and destruction as a tempest shall at hand, when tribulation and anguish ll come upon you. Then shall they call me and I will not hear: they shall rise in the morning and shall not find me, Because they have hated instruction and received not the fear of the Lord. Therefore they shall eat the fruit of their own way, and shall be filled with their own devices." Prov. Chap. 1.

* Psalm 6, v. 7. Isaias c. 38, v. 15.

But, my Dearly Beloved, We, in the words of St. Paul, though We speak thus, hope better things of you and nearer to salvation, and may the God of peace who brought again from the dead the Great Pastor of the Sheep, our Lord Jesus Christ, Fit you in all goodness, that you may do his will: doing in you that which is pleasing in his sight through Jesus Christ: to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

REGULATIONS FOR THE JUBILEE.

The time fixed upon for the Faithful of the Apostolic Vicariate of Western Bengal for the performance of the prescribed pious duties to be complied with by those, who desire to gain the Plenary Indulgence of the Jubilee, is the Fort-night which begins on next Pentecost Sunday, June 8th, and ends on Sunday June 22nd 1851.

All the prescribed pious works may be performed either in the first or in the second week of the above specified fort-night, but they are to be begun and completed within the week, which may be selected by each of the Faithful for the performance of them.

3. The Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, which occur in the week fixed upon by any of the Faithful for gaining the Jubilee, will be Fasting days of obligation for such person.

4. As in Pentecost week, the Ember or Quatuer Tense Fast falls on the three days just named, the Archbishop annexes to the Fast prescribed by the general Law of the Church for the Ember times the obligation, for each of the Faithful who may wish to gain the Jubilee in Pentecost week, of reciting on each of the aforesaid days, the Litany of the Holy Name of Jesus, or the Lords prayer and the Angelical Salutation five times and the Apostle's Creed once.

5. The approved Confessors of this Vicariate are empowered to commute the pious works required for the Jubilee when a reasonable cause exists for doing so, (Confession and Communion excepted) into others of a similar nature, more suitable to the health and circumstances of their Penitents.

6. To gain the Indulgence each of the Faithful is to visit once within the prescribed week any of the Churches under the authority of the Vicar Apostolic, and there offer up fervent prayers for the intention of our Most Holy Father the Pope and the general welfare of Religion.

7. Each of the Faithful is expected to dispense alms within the prescribed week also, according to his own pious discretion, for the relief of the poor. The Archbishop earnestly recommends the Orphanages on this occasion to the charitable consideration of his Flock.

8. On the evenings of Wednesday, Friday and Saturday in Pentecost week, there will be public instructions and prayers at half past six o'clock, P. M. in the Cathedral, and in the Churches of the Sacred Heart and of St. Thomas.

9. A compliance with the Precept of the Paschal Communion will not suffice for the Communion required for the Jubilee.

10. In order to prevent inconvenience or disappointment to the Faithful of the Cathedral Parish, who may wish to confess in Pentecost week, Divine Service will be performed from Monday to Saturday in that week, at the Cathedral only, and not in the succursal Chapels of St. Xavier and of St. John. The Clergy of the Cathedral will be in attendance on each day of Pentecost week from eleven o'clock to two P. M. to hear Confessions, and the Faithful are particularly exhorted to present themselves early in the week to profit of their Ministry.

On every day of the Fortnight set apart for the Jubilee, the Collect for the extinction of Schism is to be annexed to the Collect of the Day, by each Priest of this Vicariate, in the Celebration of Mass.

Given at the Cathedral House, Calcutta, Feast of the Ascension A. D. 1851.

✠ P. J. Carew.
Archbishop of Edessa,
J. McCabe. V. A. W. B.
Secretary to the Archbishop V. A. W. B.

 This Pastoral is to be read on Sunday within the Ascension during the Parochial Mass.

VOLTAIRE AN APOLOGIST FOR RELIGION.

Translated from the French for the B. C. Herald.

(Continued from our last.)

Chap. I.—Objections of Unbelievers.

They have dug a pit, and the earth has fallen upon themselves. (1)

Infidels may easily be represented in the act of laying snares for the enemies of the faith, with webs woven by themselves.

There exists in the impiety of Infidels such an excess of raving and so much that is ridiculous, that we are puzzled to know whether they ought to excite us to laughter or indignation, laughter would be better; but then they are so injurious to Society that they provoke us to anger. (2)

Objections to be discarded as being altogether foreign to the subject.

A comical reply is not a valid reason. Jesting is never good when the subject is serious, because it never reflects but on one side of the objects which are considered. It almost always runs upon false statements and equivocations; thence it follows that Jesters by profession almost invariably have minds as false as they are superficial.(3)

(1) Vol. 46, p. 334.
(2) Vol. 42, p. 178.

The false reasonings and evil Jests which were employed against Religion would be the shame of the nation, if those who made use of them were not the disgrace of philosophy in the eighteenth century.(4)

RAILLERIES AND ABUSES.

Little sense and much abuse supply matter for three hundred pages.(5)

No abuse, if you please: it is easier to say abusive things than to speak sense.(6)

You would be pardoned for disguising unfavorable facts, for trying to give weight to the most frivolous objections, for replying to the most solid reasonings, by ridiculous and false arguments, by exclaiming that you have proved what you have not proved, and that you have destroyed what you have not destroyed. You can give to falsehood the appearance of truth, and to truth the colour of falsehood; exhaust yourself in vain assertions upon facts which have no reference to the main point of the affair on which you treat and pass over in haste graver facts which depose against you. This method is certainly not honorable, it is tolerated for the misfortune of men; but I would dare assert that we would be falling again into the ages of gross uncivilisation, were it ever permitted us to sully an important discussion by abuse and jests.

Tranquil and stern truth, seated on the throne of Justice, requires that all those who are charged with the August Ministry of defending it, should possess something of its gravity and decorum thus.(7)

VOLTAIRE WROTE TO WARBURTON.

You exercise your fury and your insolence upon strangers as upon your own country men. You desired that your name should be every where held in horror and you have succeeded. You attack the wise, and you think to cleanse yourself by covering them with your filth; you think to crush with one hand the Christian religion and with the other the learned; such is your character. This mixture of pride and temerity is not ordinary. It has frightened yourself; you have enveloped yourself in the mists of antiquity and in the magic of your style; you have covered your frightful countenance with a mask.

Let us see if we cannot make this ridiculous mask fall with a single blow. I pass over in silence the gross and unrestrained abuse, worthy of London street porters and of you, and I come to what you dare to call reasonings this is less strong than your abuse, you have not even understood the holy books against which you have written. See then if the foul sink of irreligion is not that in which you wallow; you are detested in your country and you indulge in hatred in return; but if you have steeped in blood your hands defiled with ink and gall, would you dare assert that you had assassinated without anger and without hatred? Is it possible that such a heart as yours should deceive itself so grossly upon hatred? It is an usurer that knows not how to reckon. Your pedantry wearies, and your insolence is revolting.

Philosophers, you say, hate only Religion but not Christians, a droll distinction!

One day a tiger, satiated with carnage, met some sheep, which fled away, he ran after them, and said to them, my children, you imagine that I do not like you, but you are mistaken; it is your bleating that I hate but I have a liking for yourselves.(8)

MAGIC OF STYLE.

Their follies being defeated they disguise them under the cloak of a fine style, as false coiners apply a sheet of Silver to a crown of lead.(9)

OBJECTIONS TO BE DESPISED.

Of what use is a mass of trifling and childish objections; it matters little that a spider in the corner of a wall is in its web for the purpose of catching flies.

Berkeley by a hundred captious sophisms pretended to prove that bodies did not exist He is not worth the trouble of being refuted. It was thus that the Zenos and the Parmenides formerly argued and these were men of genius. They would prove to you that a tortoise ought to go as fast as Achilles, and yet there is no motion. They debated a hundred questions and just as useful.

The greater portion of the Greeks played Juggler's tricks with Philosophy.

Bayle was sometimes one of the band, he embroidered sob-webs like the rest. Instead of breaking the thread, we carry it away in our rapid flight, which will not be retarded by this obstacle. We must be careful not to reply in set form to impertinence, for this would be begging of Hercules to amuse him-

(3) Vol. 56, p. 131.
(4) Vol. 38, p. 125.
(5) Vol. 69, p. 186.
(6) Vol. 46, p. 63.
(7) Vol. 37, p. 67.
(8) Vol. 56, p. 339.
(9) Vol. 54, p. 175.

elf by killing a scorpion with a blow of his fist.(10)

OBJECTIONS ARISING FROM IGNORANCE.

Take from numerous Volumes that enormous mass of abuse which they contain and what shall remain? take away what ignorance and bigotry object to and nothing shall remain.(11)

(To be continued.)

GRAND DISTINCTIVE CHARACTERISTICS OF THE TRUE CHURCH.

BY THOS. W. ALLIES, M. A.*—P. 356, LATE RECTOR OF LAUNTON AND NOW A CONVERT TO THE CATHOLIC FAITH.

Now incomparably the most important facts in the Roman Church are those which concern not merely a member of it, but the whole Communion: e. g. its extent, its doctrine, its internal discipline, its vital principle, and its generative and expansive power. If under these heads we consider the Roman Church, taking it merely as a fact, like the British monarchy, is it too much to say, that no work of art, no discovery of genius, no scheme of philosophy, physical or metaphysical, earthly or heavenly, no history of human deeds in doing or in suffering, no political constitution, no scientific confederacy, no association of monarchs or of peoples, no past or present civilisation, nothing about which men have wearied themselves in research and discussion, is so worthy of patient thought and humble consideration as is that Communion. The following are a few reasons for the above observation:—1. The Roman Catholic hierarchy depends on the Pope as its centre of unity, and as the divinely-appointed Head of the Church on earth. From him all its bishops receive canonical institution, that is, the grant of spiritual jurisdiction. Accordingly, they sign themselves Bishops "by the mercy of God, and the grace of the Holy Apostolic See." What, then, is their number, and into how many countries do they extend? The following is as near an approximation to the truth as I can make.

	Patriarchs.	Archbps.	Bishops.	TOTAL.
In Europe	—	102	498
In Asia	5	20	49
In Africa	—	—	7
In Australasia	—	1	8
In America	—	12	84
	5	135	646

(To be continued.)

(10) Vol. 77, p. 467.
(11) Vol. 22, p. 47.

* This was written whilst Mr. Allies was yet a Protestant

ON THE ASCENSION.

For the B. C. Herald.

Rise glorious conqueror, heavenly king
Ascend thy royal throne
With thee the ransom'd nations bring
For whom thou didst atone.

Why should the tomb possess thee
Thou Lord of life and death
Ah! why should grief oppress thee
Who hast given to all their breath.

Thou who with one fiat of thine
This ponderous world didst form
Didst bid the glorious sun to shine
Can'st quell the raging storm.

And yet O shame! thou wert bound fast
Fettered and chained by men
But the strongest bond around thee cast
Was thy last love for them.

Oh! yes 'twas love that bound thee
Who died to set us free
'Twas love that cast around thee
The robe of mockery.

That laid thee in a manger
In winter cold and drear
Doomed thee on earth a stranger
Through many a painful year.

But now thy days of grief are past
Thy sufferings all are o'er
Thy glory shall for ever last
And thou shalt die no more.

Heaven's portals are wide open flung
For thee the Angels sigh
And loud Hosannahs now are sung
To welcome thee on high.

Calcutta, May 29, 1851.

QUIS SICUT DEUS? WHO IS LIKE TO GOD?

For the B. C. Herald.

Oh! thou the source of life and light
Almighty and Supreme
Compared to thee how frail and vain
All earthly objects seem.

One thought of thee is worth an age
Of all that's prized on earth
For thou alone canst satisfy
The soul of heavenly birth.

Angelic choirs in praising thee
Their golden harps employ
And find themselves for ever lost
In one full tide of Joy.

They bless thee in that region bright
By mortal foot unbred,
And the motto of their leader
Is——' who is like to God.

The Saints on first beholding thee
Forget this mortal scene
And all their sordidness here below
Though great and sharp tho've been.

Amidst the bright effulgence
Which surrounds thy throne of light
They gaze upon thy loveliness
No sorrow shrouds—their sight.

The just on earth to follow them
Leave all that life holds dear
And quit the cherished of their hearts
Without a parting tear,

To please thee and to gain thy love
They value gold as dross
And mindful of thy poverty
They cling unto thy cross.

Oh! grant us grace to sacrifice
Whate'er thou dost require
And may'st thou be the only good
To which our souls aspire.

Calcutta, May 29, 1851.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

A small but interesting collection of Insects, Minerals, &c. &c., collected in different parts of India has been kindly presented to the College Museum by Sergt. King, of Dum-Dum, through Rev. Mr. Prendergast, for which the Rector begs to return thanks.

Selections.

CONVERTS TO THE CATHOLIC FAITH.

Rev. A. J. Hanmer, of St. John's College, Cambridge, and Curate of Tiverton, Devonshire; Rev. Mr. Johnston, Rev. Alfred Dayman, Curate of St. John's, Wasperton, near Ipswich; Rev. Thomas Scraton, of Christchurch, Oxford; Rev. Francis Balston, M. A., of Christchurch, Oxford; Rev. John Henry Wynne, B. C. L., Fellow of All-Souls' College, Oxford; Rev. James Laird Patterson, M. A., Trinity College, Oxford; Rev. George Case, M. A., Curate of Margaret Chapel, and Brasenose College, Oxford; Rev. Edward Ballard, M. A., of Wadham College, Oxford; Rev. Charles B. Garside, M. A., Curate of Margaret Chapel, London, and formerly of Brasenose College, Oxford; Rev. Mr. Dodley, Curate of Archbishop Tennison's Chapel, London; Rev. Charles W. Cavendish, Rector of Little Casterton, with Tolethorpe, Rutland; Rev. William Maskell, M. A., late examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Exeter, and Vicar of St Mary's Church, Devon; Rev. Eyre Stewart Bathurst, Rector of Kibworth Beauchamp, Leicestershire; Rev. T. W. Allies, M. A., Rector of Launton, formerly examining Chaplain to the Bishop of London; Rev. Henry Wilberforce, Rector of East Farleigh, Kent; Rev. F. W. Trehow, late Curate of Northfield, near Birmingham; Rev. W. H. Anderton, Vicar of St. Margaret's, Leicester; Very Rev. William C. A. Maclaurin, Dean of the united dioceses of Moray and Rosshire; Rev. Mr. Todd, Curate of St. James's, Bristol; Rev. Mr. Henn, at Rome; Rev. R. J. Butler, late Warden of the House of Charity, Soho, at Rome; Rev. Mr. Rogers, Curate of the parish church, Leeds; Rev. Mr. Scott; Rev. Dr. Forbes, Rector of St. Luke's, New York; Rev. Mr. Preston, of St. Luke's, New York; Rev. Dr. Huntingdon, formerly Professor of St. Paul's College, Flushing, and late Minister in the Episcopal Church, New York; Rev. Mr. Ferret, Protestant Minister at Geneva; Rev. Dr. Simon John Bohymie, a Presbyterian Minister in France; Rev. M. Maffre, Protestant Minister at Fay-le-Froid, in France. Lay Converts:—The Countess Arundel and Surrey; Lord and Lady Fielding; Lord and Lady Campden; Hon. Captain Packenham, of the Guards; George Bowyer, Esq., D. C. L., Temple; John Bethell, Esq., Hydepark-square; —Bastard, Esq.; W. Monsell, Esq., M. P. for the county Limerick; Hon. Mr. Cavendish; Captain George Collard, of Walthamstow, Essex.—Catholic Directory.

CONVERSIONS.

America. The Revd. Ferdinand Elliot White with Mrs. White and family. White has always been regarded as one of the most respectable men of his age in the Episcopalian Church New York Freeman's Journal.

England. Revd: T. L. Coghlan, late Curate of St. Jouh's Chapel, Torquay. Revd. Edmund Coffin, to whom a testimonial of respect has been presented by the parishioners of East Farleigh, Kent, on his leaving his curacy. The conversion took place in Belgium, in the Church of the Redemptorist Fathers, where his brother Rev. Robert Coffin, lately converted is undergoing his noviciate.

Mrs. Thwaites, wife of Daniel Thwaites, Esquire, of Blackburn. Mr. & Mrs. Dashwood and their two daughters.

Lady Elizabeth Charlotte Peat, niece of Sir Walter Scott, with her five children and two Servants.

A young English lady, residing in Vannes France.

Five Clergymen of St. Saviour's, Leeds, their example being followed by 30 families. A hundred more of the same congregation are expected to enter the Church. Catholic Intelligencer.

Liverpool. The preachings in Lent against "Popery" have caused many secessions from Protestantism. Among the converts, is a most accomplished and talented young lady, who, till then, was wont to look upon the Church of Rome as the veritable "Scarlet Lady of Babylon." What first staggered her faith in the Church of England, was the decision on the famous Gorham case. In her doubts, she consulted her Pastor, who declared baptism to be essential to salvation. And she consulted another, who declared to the contrary. Her own natural good sense soon made her discover that that cannot be the true Church of Christ, which did not know its own doctrine. Then came the "Papal Aggression." She was wearied and disgusted with hearing from the pulpit, constant tirades against "Popery" &c. She began to hear Catholic Sermons, and was soon struck by the tone of Charity and the cogency of the arguments derived from the Bible, which pervaded them. Great efforts were made to oppose her Conversion, but in vain.

SCOTLAND. The progress of the Catholic Religion is striking indeed. A Correspondent of the London Catholic Standard, writes: "Every thing is done to keep the minds of Scotchmen in a state of excitement against the Catholic Church to make them believe that the Pope is Anti-christ; that the Catholic Religion is the mother of abominations; the enemy of improvement; of progression; of education; of Science; of arts; of Civil and religious liberty, and consequently the enemy of man. And yet, Sir, the Catholic faith advances in Scotland silently but surely, notwithstanding all this opposition."

"To have kept its ground surrounded by foes so persevering, so determined and so unscrupulous, would prove the Church to be sustained by no earthly power; but to have made such progress in the enemies, camp, as she has done during the last forty years, clearly demonstrates, that the hand of an omnipotent power is with her, guiding all her movements and defending her, against all her enemies."

The progress of the Catholic religion in Scotland has been as follows:—

IN SCOTLAND.

In	1810,	Catholics. 20,000.	In 1850,	2,20,000
„		Clergymen 21.	„	131
„		Convents 0.	„	3.
„	Schools	Scarcely any	„	70.
„	Churches	20	„	96.

AT GLASGOW.

In	1810,	Catholics. 3,000.	In 1850,	80,000
„		Clergymen. 1	„	41.
„		Churches 0	„	7.

EDUCATION IN INDIA.

Our Calcutta contemporaries complain that no notice should have been taken in the Education Reports of the proposal of the Revd Mr. Hamilton, to have instruction given by Europeans in the arts and handicrafts in which the natives of this country are most behind, by which the pupils might earn a livelihood. It unhappily so happens amongst us that our chief educationists will insist on looking at the subject of instruction through European spectacles; and because boys at home go to school for the purpose of learning to read and write, for instruction in literature, or it may be in the sciences, but still for book instruction only, that the same ought to be the case in India. It is quite forgotten that at home almost every branch of art has attained a degree of perfection which it is difficult to improve, and that every work-shop is a school open for the reception of apprenticed pupils, every boy knowing right well that the only path for entering a profession is through the gateway of an apprenticeship. The school and the work-shop each take their share in the task of instruction—the part performed by the shop being at least as important as that undertaken by the school. India presents us with no analogy whatever to this: a boy who has picked up a little smattering of book knowledge is considered educated—he has no place of further tuition to which he can resort: his school or college acquirements are of no use in helping him to work his way as a tradesman in the present state of the native arts,—school bred youths deem manual labour beneath them,—and the only place he is fit for therefore is the counting house or the school room. And all this too while the arts taught around us remain in the same state of primitive rudeness in which they prevailed before the printing press or gunpowder, the great dispellers of delusions, were known. It is amongst Europeans only that the want of skill work is appreciated the European artisans are every now and then being imported or picked up, on whom emoluments are bestowed, the alumni of our colleges would consider a little fortune. Neither carpentry nor blacksmith work, forging, nor turning, joining nor engineering are taught at school or college, and there are no other places at which they can be learned. European establishments at Bombay at all events have at all times found the utmost difficulty in making young men work through an apprenticeship: so soon as a smattering is acquired they are off to the bazar, and no good artificers are ever therefore trained amongst us in the European manner at all. Here at Bombay, as we have repeatedly stated, the matter was mooted a quarter of a century since by the father of so many improvements, Framjee Cowasjee, and it has of late again been spoken of. Here we talk, but we do nothing more; we have already a school of industry, accessible to all who chose to resort to it, though established for paupers and criminals merely, where instruction in all the branches referred to is given by a first-rate mechanical engineer: as yet few but criminals have found their way to its work-shops—though there are taught the very things desired to be known we are so very slow in our progress in India that generations are required for the accomplishment of what years can effect at home. —Bombay Times, May 3.

MISSIONS OF THIBET.

Extracts from a Letter of Rev. Dr. Five Apostolic Missioner in China, to the Rev. Dr. Etienne, Superior General of Sain, Lazarus, at Paris.

SOJOURN AT LASSA.

(Continued from our last.)

These excellent dispositions of Samdadchtemba filled our hearts with joy and completely dissipated the irksome impression occasioned by this misadventure. We were for an instant inclined to anticipate the inquiries that would be made from us and the answers that we should make. But we rejected this council of human prudence. We thought the moment was come when we should adhere strictly to these words which our Lord addressed to his disciples: "When they shall lead you before the synagogues, rulers, and powers, be not anxious what you shall answer." We concerted only that we should salute the mandarin in the French style, and not to kneel in his presence. We thought that having the honour of being a Christian, a Missioner, and a Frenchman, a person might, without pride, stand in the presence of any Chinese whatsoever.

After an interval of some moments in the ante-chamber, a young Chinese, elegantly dressed, and of very graceful manners, came to us that Ki-Chen, a great ambassador of the great emperor of China, was waiting to interrogate us. We followed this interesting page, and were introdoced into a hall ornamented in Chinese fashion, where Ki-Chan was seated upon a platform three feet high and covered with red cloth. There was a small black varnished table before him, upon which were placed a desk, Chinese writing materials, some sheets of paper, and a large silver box, filled with snuff. Below the platform there were four scribes, two at the right, and two at the left. The remainder of the hall was occupied by a large number of Chinese and Thibetians, who had dressed in their best attire in order to be present at the scene.

Ki-Chan, although he has attained 60 years, seemed to us full of strength and vigour. His figure is, unquestionably, the noblest, most graceful, and intelligent, that we ever met with among the Chinese. As soon as we had taken off our hats to him, and made him our best bow, "That is right, that is right," said he to us, "follow your own customs....I have been informed that you speak correctly Pekinese—I wish to chat a little with you." We commit many mistakes, but your wonderful understanding will supply for the obscurity of our utterance. "Really that is pure Pekinese!.... You, Frenchmen, have great facility for all the sciences. Are you not Frenchmen? Oh! I was acquainted with many French; there were formerly many of them at Pekin: I saw some of them." "You must have been also acquainted with some when you were imperial commissioner at Canton." This reminiscence caused a frown from our judge; he seized a huge pinch of snuff, and took it off in very bad humour. "Yes, it is true; I saw many Europeans at Canton.....You belong to the religion of the Lord of Heaven—is it not so?" "Certainly, we are preachers of that religion." "I know that, I know that; you are, no doubt, come here in order to preach this religion?" "We had no other aim." "Have you hitherto travelled over many countries?" "The whole of China, the whole of Tartary, and here we are now in the capital of Thibet." "Whom did you lodge with when you were in China?" "We do not answer questions of that sort." "And if I command you." "We cannot obey. ....Here the angry judge struck the table with his first. "You know," said we to him, "that Christians are not afraid; why, therefore, do you try to intimidate us?" "Where did you learn Chinese?" A little of it everywhere." "And where did you learn Tartar?" "In Mongolia, the land of herbs.

After a few more insignificant questions, Ki-Chan said to us that we must be fatigued, and invited us to be seated. Then bluntly changing his tone and manner, he addressed Samdadchiemba, who had stood with his fists akimbo a little behind us. "And you," said he to him, in a dry and angry tone, "where are you from?" "I am from Ki-Tou-Sse." "What is this Ki-Tou-Sse; who knows that?" "Ki-Tou-Sse is in San-Tchouan." "Aha! you are from San-Tchouan, in the province of Kan-Sou! Child of the central nation, down on your knees!!!" Samdadchiemba grew pale, his wrist fell from his hip, and the arm sloped modestly down alongside the thigh. "On your knees!!!" repeated the mandarin in a shrilling voice. Samdadchiemba fell down upon his knees, saying, "To kneel, stand, or sit, is indifferent to me; a man of suffering and fatigue like me is unaccustomed to comforts." "Aha! you are from Kan-Sou; you are a child of the central nation; answer your father and mother, and take care not to invent lies. When did you meet these two foreigners? How did you engage in their service? Answer." Samdadchiemba entered very coolly into a long narrative of his life, which seemed highly interesting to his auditory: he then stated how he had met us in Tartary, and what where the motives inducing him to come with us. Our young neophyte spoke with dignity but especially with such prudence as we did not expect from him. "Why did you become a member of the religion of the Lord of Heaven? Do you know that this is forbidden by the great emperor?" "The like one entered this religion because it is the only true one. How could I know that the great emperor proscribes a religion which enjoins to do good and avoid evil?" "True, the religion of the Lord of Heaven is holy: I know that. Why did you hire in the service of foreigners? Do you not know this is forbidden by the laws?" "How can an ignorant person as I am know who is a foreigner and who is not? These men have never done me anything but good; they have always exhorted me to the practice of virtue: why should I not go with them?" "What wages do they give you?" "If I go with them, I do so in order to save my soul and not to earn money. My master never let me want either rice or dress—that is enough for me." "Are you married?" "Having been a Lama before I entered the religion of the Lord of Heaven, I never married. .....The judge next put an unbecoming question to Samdadchiemba, who hung down his head in silence. One of us arose and said to Ki-Chan, "Our religion not only prohibits to commit impure actions; but also to think or speak of them; we are not allowed to listen to indelicate expressions." These words, pronounced with calmness and gravity, caused a slight blush to tinge the cheeks of his excellency the ambassador of China. "I know it," said he, "I know it! the religion of the Lord of Heaven is holy. I know it; I read its books of doctrine. The man who would adhere faithfully to all it teaches would be an irreproachable man." He beckoned to Samdadchiemba to arise; then turning to us: "It is now night," said he;" "you must be fatigued; it is time to take your evening meal. Go; I shall call for you to-morrow if I require you."

The Chinese ambassor was quite right; it was very late, and the many motions we had undergone during the evening were not anywise calculated to be a substitute for supper. When we were leaving the Chinese-Thibetian court, we were accosted by a venerable Lama, who apprised us that the Kalou premier was waiting for us. We traversed the yard lit by red lanterns, and we proceeded towards our right up a dangerous staircase. We ascended by taking the prudent precaution of holding the garment of our conductor. Then, after proceeding over a long terrace, which we crossed by the uncertain light of the stars of the firmament, we were introduced to the regent. The vast and lofty apartment was splendidly lit with butter. The walls, surbase, even the flooring, were all laden with gilding and dazzling colours. The regent was quite along; he made us sit down by him on a rich carpet, and endeavoured to convey to us in words and more expressive gestures, the interest he took in us. We clearly understood that there was no intention of having us die of hunger. Our pantomime was interrupted by the arrival of a personage who, on his entrance, left his shoes at the door: this was the Governor of the Cashmere Mussulmans. After salaaming, pronouncing the formula, 'Salamalek,' he proceeded to lean against a column in the middle of the hall, and which appeared to support the beamed work. The Mussulman governor spoke very well Chinese; the regent had called him to act as interpreter. Immediately on his arrial, a servant placed before us a small table, and supper was served up to us at the expense of the Thibetian government. We shall not at present say anything concerning the cookery of the regent, because, firstly, our remarkable appetite would not allow us to pay sufficient attention to the quality of the viands; in the second place, because on that day our minds were more engaged with politics than cookery. However, we perceived that Samdadchiemba was no longer there, and we inquired what they had done with him. He is along with my servants," replied the regent, "be not uneasy concerning him; he shall want for nothing."

(To be continued.)

THE EAST INDIAN ASSOCIATION.

We notice in the Calcutta Papers the proceedings of a meeting convened for the purpose of taking preliminary steps towards the adoption of a measure which, if carried out fully in the spirit in which its projectors have started it, is certain to cause a most important revolution in the feature of the class of the Indian community for whose benefit it is intended. We refer to the meeting of East Indians, held at the office of Messrs. Saunders and Co, in Calcutta, for the purpose of discussing the propriety of inducing the East Indian community to embark in trade, and to form a joint-stockery for the purpose of assisting those who do so. Few movements have in our opinion, been made by any class of society which is calculated to produce more important results than this meeting.

It cannot be denied that there should be as much energy and industry amongst the East Indians, as any other class in India, and it is very justly remarked by Mr. Hollingberry, one of the principal speakers at this meeting, that now that the blessings of Education are being more generally diffused amongst the native population, the future destinies of this increasing portion of the community must become a matter of serious importance to themselves, seeing that these educated natives are gradually, but surely, supplanting them in those offices formerly held by the East Indians.

It has over and over again occupied the attention of political economists, writing on the future state of India, what position the East Indian is to occupy in society. This question cannot be said to be unimportant; some may assert, that as this section of our Indian population is so very insignificant, when compared to the rest, it can be but of little consequence what becomes of them. But this is not the spirit in which it behoves those who are charged with the government to look at the question. The East Indians are a class that is yearly, hourly increasing both in numbers and importance, and which threatens, in the eyes of thinking men, to become, should nothing be done to ameliorate their condition, either by public interference or private exertions, to divert their increasing energies into some useful and remunerative line, a question of serious import to future Governments in this country. They are placed in a peculiar situation, whether by prejudice or necessity, it is difficult to decide. Entrance into the army is with very few exceptions, shut against them. The bar of India, as at present composed, is practically closed to them; so likewise are the higher grades in the professions of medicine; so also is the church, and then thus remains to them, uncovenanted government employ, employment as clerks in mercantile firms, (seldom as principals) and trade.

It may be asked why should what is called the liberal professions in England, be shut against the East Indian in this country, who after all has nothing but his color against him? The army for instance, what better safety-valve could you have, whereby to let the fiery spirit of the Eurasian escape? With regard to the expediency of raising separate corps of East Indians, and officering them exclusively from that portion of society, much may be said, but our space will not at present admit; but with regard to their admission, indiscriminately, into the ranks of the army, we do not thing that the instances where the rule for their non-admission (the Court of Directors had at one time very stringent regulations on the subject, amounting to an utter prohibition of the admission of country borns) has been broken through, its infringement has been attended with results encouraging an extension on any very enlarged scale of the practice, not from any misbehaviour on the part of those so admitted, but from the fact that the high caste native of which our native army is chiefly composed, despises and looks down upon what he considers the offspring of his disgraced and degraded country women, there is never that attachment to them on the part of the sepoys such as you will often see displayed towards their European officer. The sepoy is bound to him merely by the demands of discipline, not by the ties of affection or respect for his officer's superior abilities.

Then again the Bar, how few East Indian parents could afford to give their children a legal education in England, such as is required for admission to practice as a Barrister in our Courts; on account of the expenses and difficulties attending such an education? The same may be said of the profession of medicine, and of the Church. Such being the case, we come to the remaining outslet for the industry and talent of the East Indian, trade. The benefits to be derived from this new field of enterprise have been so admirably laid before their brethren, by the different speakers at the above-mentioned meeting, the arguments that might be used, and the objections that might be raised, against the plan, have been so fairly met, and so decisively answered, that nothing really remains but to recommend to all those interested in the matter, to be up and doing. The highest praise is due to Messrs. DeSouza and Hollingberry, for their philanthophic endeavours to ameliorate the condition of their fellow-countrymen, nay to do more, to enable individuals of their class to raise themselves to the highest eminence in social life —for what character is there more eminent than that of a British Merchant? Lahore Chronicle May 17.

CHINA.

Passing on from the subjects of trade and politics, M. Lavollée dwells with some pride on French Missions and French Missionaries in China, in which respect he says, France has long had the honor of figuring in the first rank of Christian nations. We must take leave of his interesting article with the following extract from the remarks and statements by which he illustrates his position:—

"The different sects of the Protestant communion equally possess preachers who have undertaken the conversion of the Chinese. These Missionaries, or rather these agents, never leave the ports legally open to the foreigner. They arrive with their families; they are secure of receiving a high salary; they exercise the profession of Medicine, or they enter into business, and preaching is for them merely an incident of their comfortable and peaceful existence. No doubt, in gratuitously curing diseases they inspire in the Chinese population, a high idea of European science, they serve humanity; but where is the merit, what is the glory of these functions without danger? Compare the methodist pastor sent out from London by a society of shareholders, and bringing out a cargo of Bibles, compare him with the young priest who scarcely disembarked on the Chinese territory, departs full of ardour and of faith, for the most remote provinces, where, after the dangers of a long voyage, greater dangers still and privations of every description and at every moment attached to the apostolate, await him. Going out at night, hiding himself in the day, exposed incessantly to the suspicions of an ignorant population or of a fanatic Mandarin, the French missionary has no other recompense than the satisfaction of having done his duty, no other hope but that of martyrdom. Such, if the expression may be allowed, are the products, that we introduce into China; they merit assuredly on our part a protection at least equal to that which grants England accords to a chest of opium or a bale of cotton."—Revue des Deux Mondes.

THE EMIGRATION GROUP SOCIETIES.

Many of our readers will be interested to know that Captain Chisholm proposes to sail from Plymouth for the Australian Colonies, by the ship King William, on the 15th of this month. His object is to attend to the interests in that quarter of the admirable Emigration Group Societies, of which our readers, from time to time, have received details. Mrs. Chisholm, meanwhile, remains for some time in England, busy with their formation and development. As in such matters, so profoundly important as they are to the cause of civilisation and the well being and happiness of thousands, each repetition catches the eye of some one or other for the first time, we make no apology for repeating, that Mrs. Chisholm's "Emigration Group Societies" signify an institution based on the wise and excellent principle of enabling people to emigrate, not packed pell-mell in herds, like so many cattle, according to the stupid and barbarous usage hitherto in use, but in such a manner as either to go out in families, or with families, sorted, adjusted, arranged, so that the members of each set know each other, or come from the same part of the country, or are likely to be useful to each other. To obviate the great misery of emigration—that of separation from relatives—she has arranged a system of weekly subscription, by which parties, for instance, in England or Ireland may be enabled to join their relations in Australia, by the help of a small loan from the Family Colonisation Loan Society, to eke out a sum they may have gradually raised by weekly payments, according to their ability, suppose two shillings and upwards, in which way also their friends in Australia might assist them. Hundreds of families are thus being settled—are rescued, by a kind of beneficent Providence, from the wretched serfdom and misery of English peasant-life, and placed where there is hope for them, and more than a hope, an absolute certainty of an honest and decent maintenance. Mrs. Chisholm's plan is, in the highest degree, prudent and merciful It helps none who will not help themselves. It does not give people anything, except, indeed, what no money can purchase, the kind and judicious counsel of one of the most right-minded persons in England; the means of making what little money they have really useful and efficient, and a certain amount of loan to get them over to Australia and be repaid by them when settled in that country. We cannot, at this moment, write a long article on the subject; but we wish most earnestly to keep it before the attention of all the humbler classes of our readers, who may think the Australian Colonies the proper field for them, but who don't know how to set about emigrating, or who have relatives there, and do not know how to communicate with them. We exhort all such to write (post-paid, remember) to Mrs. Chisholm, 3, Charlton Crescent, Islington, London, and to take our word for it, they will not repent taking advice from that lady, an honour to her country, and to the whole English-speaking Catholic race.—Tablet.

FLOWERS OF HEAVEN.

Connection between Religion and Morality.

GENTLENESS.

St. Francis seeing a solitary lamb amid a flock of goats, said to his companion; "See how gentle is this poor little lamb among these goats. Our Saviour was thus gentle and humble among the pharisees."

The most perfect model of gentleness that ever appeared on earth was, indeed, Jesus the Saviour of the world. Long time before his birth, the prophets had said of him: "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd: he shall gather together the lambs with his arm, and shall take them up in his bosom: and he himself shall carry them that are with young."*

And after the death of Our Lord, this distinctive trait of his character was so profoundly impressed on the heart of his apostles, that St. Paul, in a letter addressed to the Corinthians, employs this remarkable expression: "I adjure you by the mildness and modesty of Christ."† While conversing with men, Jesus never let any harshness, pride, or sourness, appear in his conduct. He was approachable by all; his manners were dignified but simple; his language gentle, and his conduct humble and benificent. "Learn of me," said he to his disciples, "for I am a meek and humble of heart."‡

If the Son of God is the most perfect model of gentleness, the apostle assures us, that the Holy Spirit inspires it; and in the Old, as well as in the New Law, this virtue is presented to us as something divine. The Bible exhibits it under beautiful figures. "Well ordered words," says Solomon, "are as a honeycomb; sweet to the soul and health to the bones."§

Because gentleness ordinarily manifests itself on trivial occasions, and like the rain that distills silently from the cloud quietly represses the passions, some have concluded, that it is a vulgar virtue,—a species of moral feebleness, which can be easily dispensed with, if the duties which charity imposes on us, on great occasions, be complied with. This is a dangerous error. Great occasions rarely present themselves in the lives of individuals; perhaps not at all,—for this depends on fortune, or, to speak more Christain-like, on the dispensations of Providence. More than one shepherd, who might have sung and reigned like David, has tended sheep his whole life long; and more than one rustic Massillon may have died sacristan of a village-church. The unpublished annals of the human species contain an immense numbers of destinies which, for want of opportunities, were nipped in the bud. A long series of years may pass over our heads, without offering us the least chance of displaying heroism magnanimity; but we may exercise gentleness as often as we deem proper; and it is strange forgetfulness of our interests, to neglect a virtue which produces tranquillity of soul, and exercises so beneficial an influence over our temporal concerns.

Gentleness is, indeed, the best auxiliary which a man, who disdains intrigue, can employ to attain any object. This virtue lulls jealousy, gradually penetrates the soul, interests the heart, produces conviction when every other argument fails, and disarms pride and violence even before they are on their guard against it. On the contrary, harshness strengthens opposition, so as to render it invincible and makes enemies of those who before thought not seriously of opposing us.

The world not only esteems gentleness, but generally accords it protection and sympathy. The merit of the gentle man shines without dazzling any one; his defects are commiserated; and no one rejoices exultingly at his misfortunes. Harshness is far from being so well treated; when exhibited by a superior to an inferior, it excites silent hate, which secretly increases, and, like the tempest, only awaits a favourable opportunity for bursting forth: now occasions always present themselves to those who can wait for them.

(To be continued.)

* Isaias xl. 11. † 2 Cor. x. 1.
‡ Math. xi. 29. § Prov. xvi. 24.

HISTORY OF THE LIFE WRITINGS, AND DOCTRINES OF MARTIN LUTHER

BY J. M. V. AUBIN.

CHAPTER XVII.

ALEANDRO.—1520.

The election of Charles V. was a fortunate circumstance for the Church in Germany. Had he, like Duke Frederick of Saxony, embraced the reformation party, catholicism would have been banished from that country. Luther saw at once what influence the sword of this monarch would have in his struggle against Rome, and as soon as the imperial crown was placed on the brow of Charles, he artfully tried the effects of flattery on his youthful ear. He represented Rome to him as the enemy of Germany and of its liberties, and its power as a yoke too heavy to be borne by a man of honour. "Let not the pope," said he, "seize on the sword which you bear so well." The emperor was deaf to the voice of the monk. A few years had scarcely passed since his elevation to the imperial throne, which he owed, in a great measure, to the influence of Rome, and he already showed what might be expected of him. Visions of glory passed across his eye. Mounted on a fiery steed, he paraded before the German nobility the ponderous armour of Charles the Bold. At the name of Francis I., whose valour was so famous, "his eye," says one historian "would brighten, and seemed to cast forth flame." He appreciated the character of Leo X. He loved that imposing train of guards, archers, courtiers, and artists, by which the pope was surrounded; as also the liberal gifts he bestowed on painters, sculptors, and poets; and the prodigies of art, which were making Rome the queen of cities. He himself had his mind full of great projects, the accomplishment of which was to immortalize his reign. He desired glory; but, like his rival, the king of France, it was for the glory of arms that he thirsted. He came to the empire at the very moment that the reformer was making Saxony resound with his disputes. This clamour annoyed him, because it distracted him, and because Germany must be tranquil before he could accomplish his designs. Erasmus saw immediately that Charles V. was not the man for Luther; and the reformer, seeing his schemes frustrated, avenged himself, as was his custom, by calumniating the emperor, whom he now represented as the slave of monachism.*

To secure the zeal of Charles, Leo had sent as Nuncio to the imperial court, one of the most able politicians of the age, who was, at the same time, a most distinguished cultivator of literature and science, Jerome Aleandro.

Aleandro was of a noble family. At thirteen years of age, he had been placed under the tuition of Benedetto Brungnoli, and afterwards under that of Petronello of Rimini both celebrated humanists. Paul Amaltee was then teaching at Pordenona, and attracted great crowds to his lectures: he was the Erasmus of Italy. He explained antiquity with ineffable grace of language, and excited a lively enthusiasm for it. Aleandro went to hear him; but the disciple was taken with such a love of study, that he began to languish and pine away, and, for a while, was obliged to abandon the school of his preceptor. He was advised to revisit the banks of the Brenta, and to inhale, once more his native air. On the day after his arrival at Motta, he mingled among the auditory of Domenico Piorio, who then taught polite literature. When the lecture was over, Aleandro was overheard laughing at the professor, who soon came forward to defend himself, and, in the excess of his indignation, concluded by challenging his fellow countryman to a trial of their literary merits. The offer was joyfully accepted, and the day appointed. Professors of law and of divinity, doctors and disciples, came from Venice, Ferrara, Padua, and Polesina. There was a feeling of joy and anxiety which can scarcely be expressed: the election of a Roman emperor could not have caused more excitement in the public mind. The Brenta was covered with gondolas, wherein were some Venetian professors, who had been invited to preside over the combat; they might be distinguished by their flowing beard, their wrinkled forehead, and scarlet robes. Motta could not accommodate all the visiters: many were obliged to bivouac in the fields. On the appointed day, Piorio ascended the pulpit, and spoke for a long time without interruption. He explained some difficult passages of the ancient authors. Aleandro's turn now came; he spoke for two hours. With one accord, these old citizens of Latium; these visiters of Rome and Athens; these familiar friends of Horace and Anacreon, rose and exclaimed, "Success to Aleandro." Aleandro took the place of the ancient professor who knew antiquity only by name, but had never imbibed its spirit. On the news of this triumph, Venice despatched a courier to Aleandro, and invited him to her walls; and Alexander VI. took him, subsequently, from Venice, and sent him as Nuncio to Hungary. A fit of sickness restored the young ambassador to the Muses, whom he had only quitted at the bidding of the pontiff. He was now scarcely twenty-four years old. It was the epoch of the revival of letters. Aldus Manutius had lately printed that beautiful edition of Homer's Iliad, which, after three centuries, is regarded as a masterpiece of typography and correctness. It was to Aleandro that the learned printer dedicated his work. "I dedicate this work to you," says he, in his preface, "who, although scarcely twenty-four years, speak the Greek and Latin with such purity; to you for whom the Hebrew has no secrets; to you who apply yourself with such ardour to the study of the Chaldean and Arabic; and who will soon possess the faculties of five men, for it is long that, like Ennius, you enjoy those of three; to you who speak Greek with such facility, and Hebrew with such ease, that you might be thought to be born and educated in the heart of Athens, or amid the tents of Israel."

(To be continued.)

* Tu enim nondum quartum et vigesimum annum agens, et humaniorum studiorum utriusque linguæ doctissimus, etc. Roscoe, Life and Pontificate of Leo X.

THE BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 23.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JUNE 7, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, June 7, 1851.

ASYLUM FOR THE POOR TO BE ATTACHED TO THE CONVENT AND FEMALE ORPHANAGE, INTALLY.

Most of our Readers are aware, that on the first Sunday of each month, considerably more than one hundred destitute Families receive from the Vestry of the Catholic Cathedral a certain Stipend, proportioned to their wants and to the means at the disposal of the Wardens. There is no doubt, that in the mode at present adopted by the Wardens for dispensing these Alms, every precaution which prudence in order to them, conduci mproveme ieved. Inquiry, ermit, is made by the Vestry, into er, claims, and condition of each or relief, and due regard is ttention paid by the Petitioner ic worship on days of obligation, and to the irtuous education of the applicants' children.
At Easter time, it is moreover required that each Pauper should produce a testimonial of his or her, as the case may be, having complied with the precept which enjoins each of the faithful to receive at that Holy season the Paschal communion.

It is beyond the power of the Vestry to do, under the present system, more than we have described, towards the faithful discharge of the important trust confided to them. In the report drawn up by the Cathedral Wardens at the close of the past year, 1850, these Gentlemen, impressed with the conviction, that in order to render the charitable Fund in their hands as productive as they thought it might be made to the general good of the poor of our community, strongly recommended, that some plan should be adopted, by which the Paupers relieved by them might be brought to reside together in one locality, in order that those interested in their welfare, might be thus enabled to visit them, and take more active interest than is now practicable in their amelioration. Such an arrangement it is evident, would gi ired by t exed in repulsive and disgusting. On account of their great poverty, many of the poor persons now in question, are often compelled, against their will, to remain in immediate local contact with profligates and abandoned characters of both sexes. In this way, their moral welfare is seriously injured, and that of their poor children for the most part totally blasted.

Whilst this melancholy state of things continues, nothing effectual can be done for the real and permanent improvement of the condition of the numerous class under consideration.

There can be, no doubt, moreover that in these circumstances, the relief dispensed by the Vestry is often expended injudiciously and without obtaining for the poorer that amount of benefit, which might be secured by a due regard to Economy. Until the present arrangement be changed, and the poor to be relieved brought under the immediate friendly supervision of such guardians, as may be both disposed and qualified to promote among them habits of order and industry, even the disadvantage we have just touched upon cannot be corrected.

Were the destitute class we treat of collected together in one locality and placed under such supervision as we contemplate, a supply of sound wholesome provisions might be bought for them at first cost, and stored up and dispensed out to them weekly or daily in lieu of their monthly allowance, or at least of a part of that allowance, and their health and comfort thus greatly benefited. By the interposition of the same kindly surveillance, it would be easy to effect in a little time, a considerable improvement in the slovenly, uncleanly and sometimes indecent habits, which are ordinarily attendant upon extreme poverty.

With the view of securing all these moral and temporal blessings for the poor dependent on the alms at the disposal of the Cathedral Vestry, the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, in accordance with the recommendation of the Wardens, has resolved upon erecting a series of Cottages around the borders of the extensive and beautiful compound of the Orphanage at Entally, and [illegible] have the pleasure of laying before our Readers to-day a sketch of the two first of that series, which are being now just completed, and will be ready in a few days, to be inhabited. [illegible] of these Cottages contains accommodation for two persons viz a bed-room, [illegible] room, a Cook room and a water [illegible] the two Cottages are connected [illegible] with another, that they may [illegible] of four or five persons, should circumstances must be necessary. It is intended to attach to each of them a small vegetable and flower garden for the use of the Inmates. It is moreover proposed to encourage such [illegible] trial pursuits among the same as their age and circumstances may permit. No restraint whatever will be exercised over the Inmates, except such as is obviously indispensable for enforcing the recognised dictates of morality and decency. They are to have full liberty to visit their friends, and a lodge at the entrance will be set apart for them, to receive such of their friends as may wish to call upon them. The religious ladies in care of the Infally Institutions assisted by the Clergymen who officiate there, will attend as well to their religious and educational as to their temporal wants. The immediate proximity of the Chapel and Orphanage Schools to the locality of the cottages will render this duty easy, whilst the same circumstance will enable the poor persons concerned as well as their children to profit without inconvenience, of the great advantages which will be thus happily brought to their doors.

The cost of the two Cottages now being completed will be about Rs. 500. It is expected, that to complete the series of these structures, the benevolent of all classes will lend their co-operation, as the enterprise in question is one certain to prove highly beneficial, morally and temporally, to a large number of our fellow-creatures. If the members of each family in Calcutta, possessed of the means to do so, were to unite together their respective contributions for the erection of one Cottage, to be called permanently after their family name, the undertaking would very soon be accomplished, and thus, at a very small expense, a lasting and most honorable family monument handed down to succeeding generations.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

We have been requested to bring to the notice especially of the Catholic Community, that owing to the recent unexpected deaths of several Fathers of families, a large number of Widows and Orphans are left in a state of total destitution. Within the last four days, several applications have been made in consequence by these poor Creatures for themselves and their children, for admission to the Widow Asylum and Orphanage. The number sheltered in these Institutions is already so great, that, unless enabled to do so by the increased charitable co-operation of the Community, no addition can be made to it, for want of means to meet the further outlay, which would be thus entailed upon the above-mentioned establishments. And yet to refuse to comply with the prayer of the petitioners, is to expose to almost certain danger the virtue of the adult Female portion of them and to consign their children to Schools, where, in a short time they will lose every vestige of Catholic Faith and Catholic morality, and from which in a short time they will be sent back into Society, to be its pest and scourge. It is earnestly hoped, that the simple mention of these distressing circumstances, will suffice to excite among the Faithful a spirit of united generous co-operation in behalf of the Widows and Orphans, in favor of whom, this appeal to the Community is now put forth.

JOURNAL OF A TOUR IN *

By Thos. W. Allies, M. A.*—F. A. S.—Late Rector of Launton, and now a Convert to the Catholic Faith.

Grand Distinctive Characteristics of the True Church.

(Continued from our last.)

Here, then, is one spiritual empire, stretching over all the continents of the earth, entering into so many various nations utterly different in manners, language, origin and temper. This empire, though outnumbered in some few of these nations by other Christian Communions, yet has no one other set over against it, equally wide spread, united, and claiming like it universality. And its functions, though necessarily exercised in this world, sometimes in friendship with, sometimes in opposition to, the civil power, have to do exclusively with man's relations to the unseen world. So that it is strictly in this aspect a "kingdom of heaven" on earth, whose several members hold together by their common union with one chief.

2. But further, this hierarchy, thus numerous, thus widely spread, and thus united, are in possession of a vast body of doctrine, which they maintain to have descended to them from our Lord through His Apostles. This body of doctrine is uniform, coherent, systematic, forming a whole which comprehends all the relations of man to God from the formation of the first man to the general judgment of the world. These bishops, and the priests under them, are not in the habit of disputing what this body of doctrine is for, as to all that concerns the Christian life, it has long ago been clearly defined and established. In the long course of eighteen hundred years disputes about it have indeed arisen; they have then been terminated by common consent; individuals who took a different view about them from the whole body have been obliged to leave it, and the truth has only come out the more sharply defined from these contests. Moreover, as this doctrine claims to be revealed, and as all revelation must be partial, as a light shining amid darkness, penetrating it indeed on all sides, but leaving indefinite spaces beyond unilluminated, there are a multitude of questions more or less touching on this doctrine, yet not comprehended in it, or decided by it. Only enough is, by the consent of all members of this hierarchy, decided, as to leave the Christian in no doubt as to any point concerning his salvation, or as to any practical means of obtaining it. There is no split in this doctrine, dividing its professors into separate camps: no internal opposition of principles reproduced in external divisions. It is one logical whole. If fresh doubts as to any point not yet decided be raised by the ever-active intellect of man, then the hierarchy, either collectively or by their adherence to the voice of its chief, declares and decides the point moved. This body of doctrine, thus possessed and taught by this hierarchy, is termed the Faith, and it is necessary for every simple member of the Communion to hold and believe it. It is clear that no such body of doctrine could exist without a power coexisting at all times to declare what does or does not belong to it: for were it simply written in a book, interminable disputes would arise as to the meaning of the book. Just as the English law, the work of ages, exists in a great number of volumes, but requires no less for its practical daily working the decision of a supreme judicial authority. The sovereign declares in his courts of justice what is the law: the Church declares in her court what is the Faith. This in civil matters, is government; in spiritual, it is infallibility: without it, in the state there would be no one authority, in the Church no one Belief: this would be dissolved in anarchy, and that distracted by heresy.

3. But thirdly, this great spiritual empire, with an hierarchy thus widely extended yet thus closely united, and a code of belief at once so large and so definite, erects its tribunal for the heart and conscience of every one belonging to it. In virtue of certain words spoken by its divine Founder to His Apostles, it intervenes as a living power between man and his God, exercises the most special authority of its Head, and retains or remits sins in His name. It does not recoil before the pride, the self-will, the independence of human nature, but grasps it in its inmost recesses, and compels it to hear on earth the voice of the Judge of the quick and the dead. The authority it claims is so vast, so fearful, so incalculably important to those who live under it, so beyond the natural powers of man to exercise, that it is manifestly either divine or diabolical. For hundreds of years it has formed the subject of numberless reproaches directed against this empire by those who belong not to it: yet it subsists still; there is no sign of its being surrendered or modified. It subsists under all forms of civil government, absolute or constitutional monarchies, or wild democracies, whose very symbol is the entire independence of the human will. And what is remarkable, the most devoted and saintly men who have lived under this spiritual empire, and whose lives were a continued sacrifice of their own leisure, toil, sufferings, and will to God, have been most zealous to uphold, and most skilful to exercise, this tribunal over the consciences of men. It has been now for many generations the chosen taunt of the unbeliever, and the constant practice of the saint.

* This was written whilst Mr. Allies was yet a Protestant.

4. But further, this empire dares to offer up the dearest affections of the natural man to the more uninterrupted service of God. It requires of all those whom it employs in the office of teaching a surrender of the liberty to engage in those ties which the Gospel itself seeks, not to proscribe, but to sanctify. Thus the Communion, which honours marriage as a sacrament, requires of all members of its hierarchy, down to the subdeacon inclusively, to abstain from it. It regards them as the militia of the Church; and "no man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life." Multitudes there are besides, both of men and women, who accept not only this condition, but voluntarily embrace the vows of poverty and obedience in addition. To all these this spiritual empire promises one only compensation, great indeed, but received by faith alone; that, in proportion as they surrender all delight arising from the creature, and bring their will into subjection to another, the larger shall be their inheritance in the Creator; the more absolute the union of their will with His. And on this super-human life, founded in self-renunciation, and supported by Divine love, all great works in the Roman Communion depend. Not only is it the condition of the whole hierarchy, of all who have the Church's commission publicly to teach her belief, but the task of education, from the highest to the lowest classes, and the manifold labours of charity for the sick and poor, are all committed to those who give this proof of the sincerity of their vocation.

5. Lastly, in this spiritual empire there are a great number of institutions or congregations of men specially intended for its wider extension among yet heathen nations. To the conditions above enumerated they must add a yet more special aptitude for the most difficult and laborious work; a yet more complete surrender of human praise, reward, comfort, or support. Sisters of charity are seen to cross over the ocean to the extremity of the world, that they may work in combination with missionaries, whose task it is to live among savages, and to make them first men, in order that they may hereafter be Christians; both alike without endowment, in simple dependence on Providence, trusting to the labour of their hands for maintenance, putting their lives in the power of the faithless and fickle savage, and showing him, by their own homelessness, that they but live and labour for him. Nor has the blood of martyrs wholly ceased to flow. Seventy persons in China, Tonking, and Cochin China, have in the last fifty years borne witness with their lives to the faith of Christ—some of them Frenchmen and Spaniards, but some likewise priests and catechists taken out of one of the naturally feeblest races of the East, whom the grace of God nerved to endure torments unsurpassed for their severity in the earliest persecutions of the Church.

Whatever be the imperfections of human agents, is there not enough in all this to make us behold the working of a Divine and supernatural power? Should we not each, in our several spheres, labour and pray for reconciliation and unity—the adjustment of differences—the mutual understanding of Christendom? One alone can do this—let it be our first and last request to Him.

"O thou, who doest all things whereby to bring again our race to Thee, that it may be partaker of Thy divine nature and eternal glory;
who hast borne witness to the truth of Thy Gospel by many and various wonders, in the ever-memorable converse of Thy Saints, in their supernatural endurance of torments, in the overwhelming conversion of all lands to the obedience of faith, without might, or persuasion, or compulsion;—
end the schisms of the Churches, quench the haughty cries of the nations,
restore the wanderers,
knit them to Thy Holy Catholic Apostolic Church, and receive us all into Thy kingdom, acknowledging us as Sons of Light;
and Thy peace and love vouchsafe to us, O Lord our God."

(To be continued.)

CONVERSION.

During the present week an English Protestant Lady of a most respectable family was received into the Catholic communion, by the Rev. Mr. Kennedy, Rector of St. John's College.

POETRY.

A SOUL'S AMOROUS ADDRESS TO HER BELOVED LORD

(For the Bengal Catholic Herald)

1

To thee my God, my dearest friend,
Do all my best affections tend;
In thee alone I ever find,
Repose of heart, and peace of mind.

2

Let others seek whate'er they please,
In honors pleasures wealth or ease;
For me one object do I prize,
'Tis Jesus gentle, mild and meek.

3

Oh! would that I had never strayed,
From the kind source of Jesus laid;
To catch ere this my truant heart,
From earthly love so loath to part.

4

A soul that's made for God alone,
Should with contempt behold a throne,
A holy pride should make her bend,
To God alone her only end.

5

Oh! may my Jesus never find,
His bird again so weak and blind,
As to yield to another love,
Save that which comes from heav'n above.

6

And now my Jesus that I'm free,
To hear of think of none but thee,
Let me one fair or dare implore
'Tis to possess thee ever more!

M. S.

—oo—

THE MORNING SANCTUS—(THE MATIN HOUR)

SCENE, A CONVENT.

(For the Bengal Catholic Herald.)

Ave Maria! 'Tis the hour to pray,
Now as the stars are fading fast away;
Now, by advancing dawn when closely pressed,
Night plunges in the forests of the West;
Yielding alternate empire to the light:
Now as the veiled eye dimly on the sight,
And paler streaks give promise of the day,
Ave Maria!—'Tis the hour to pray.

Ora pro nobis!—As our prayers ascend,
Along the east what changeful glories blend,
At length the morning breaks, and now, behold!
She turns the night-clouds into burning gold,
And clothes in all her gorgeous attire
The world with unconsuming fire,
While thrown in bold relief upon the sky
Each bough, each leaf, stands unveiled to the eye.
Now up, and gird up for the toils of day:
Ora pro nobis!—Help us on our way.

A CATHOLIC.

Selections.

PUBLIC RECONCILING OF CONVERTS AT LEEDS.

Within the last few days considerable excitement has existed in Leeds in consequence of its becoming known that five Clergymen of St. Saviour's and two of the Clergy connected with other places of worship, as well as twelve or fourteen laymen, had become converts to the Catholic Church, and intended making a public profession of that Faith on Thursday evening, the 3rd inst.

St. Anne's Catholic Church, Park-row, was that evening the scene of imposing religious services, for the reception of converts into the bosom of the Catholic Church, when Protestantism was formally renounced as false and heretical by no less than seven persons, but these were only a portion of the proselytes who had been received that day. These services, as may naturally be expected, excited considerable interest in the borough, and on Thursday evening, when the ceremonies were brought to a close, with great pomp and splendour, and the Rev. Dr. Newman delivered an address to the converts the church of St. Anne was densely crowded in every part; in fact, there were hundreds unable to find even standing room within the very spacious area of the sacred edifice.

Before, however, proceeding to detail the ceremonies observed on Thursday evening, it will be well to state the names of the Clergymen of Leeds who have thus embraced the Faith of the Catholic Church. They are—The Rev. Richard Ward, formerly Vicar of St. Saviour's Leeds; the Rev Thomas Minster, late Vicar of St. Saviour's the Rev J. C. L. Crawley, late Curate of St. Saviour's; the Rev. S Rooke, late Curate of St. Saviour's; the Rev. Mr. Coombes, late Curate of St. Saviour's; the Rev. W. H. Lewthwaite, Incumbent of Clifford, near Tadcaster; and the Rev. Mr. Neville, Leeds, manager of the Orphanage at St. Saviour's.

Messrs. Ward and Crawley made their professions at Oscott, on Friday, March 17th; Messrs. Minster and Rooke were privately received at Anne's on Thursday morning last; Messrs. Coombes and Lewthwaite made their profession publicly on Thursday night, and Mr. Nevile was received privately, but we cannot say whether it was on Wednesday or Thursday. In addition to the Clergy, there have been twelve or fourteen lay persons, male, and female, seceding from the Protestant Church; some of them moving in a respectable sphere, while others were of the more humble class. We have below, in our report of Thursday night's proceedings, described some of them.

Nearly the whole of the proselytes have been connected with the church of St. Saviour's; indeed, of the Clergy lately belonging to that place of worship, only one (the Rev. Mr. Beckett) now remains in the Church of England. The Bishop of Ripon, acting upon representations made to him, had instituted inquiries, which ended in the dismissal of three of the Curates of St. Saviour's, and the resignation of his cure by Mr. Minster. These steps of the Diocesan have, we believe, given great offence to Dr. Pusey, through whom the funds come for erecting and endowing St. Saviour's Church, and who, with the Rev. C. Marriott, Fellow and Dean of Oriel College, Oxford, has the presentation of the church. The Rev. Richard Wood was also associated with them as Patron, but his conversion to Catholicity, of course, has caused him to relinquish that trust. The Rev. Doctor arrived in Leeds on Friday, and at once proceeded to stir in the matter—with what result does not yet appear.

With these explanations, we proceed to describe the proceedings of Thursday evening.

The services on Thursday evening commenced shortly before eight o'clock, and were conducted by the Rev. R. Browne, Incumbent of St. Anne's, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Cavanagh and the Rev. Mr. Levy, of St. Anne's, the Rev. Mr. Geary and the Rev. Mr. O'Donnell, of St. Patrick's; the Rev. Mr. Clifford, of Clifford, near Tadcaster; and the Rev. Mr. Darnell, of London. The Clergy, Sacristan, and others engaged in that portion of the duties of the Church, having taken their places within the altar rails.

The Rev. R. Browne addressed the congregation, and explained the nature of the ceremoney about to take place. In the language of the Church it was called the form of reconciling converted persons to the Church, and it consisted principally in a profession of the faith of the Church of Christ. Previously to this, prayers were to be offered up to Almighty God significative of the disposition with which persons ought to undertake the performance of such an act. In the first place, a hymn to the Holy Ghost, for light and grace; then the psalm "Miserere," expressive of the contrition of the penitent; next, the profession of the Faith, and afterwards the "Te Deum" in gratitude to Almighty God for His having granted those graces, and given joy to His Church here on earth, by bringing others into her fold; and also, to give Him thanks for the testimony that is given by an act of this kind to the Faith as it is in Jesus Christ, and as it was handed down by the Apostles. "If there are those here," said the Reverend gentleman, "not yet of the fold of Jesus Christ as it is in the Catholic Church, a ceremony such as the present is calculated to excite the deepest consideration in their souls; and by worthily assisting at it they may yet obtain for themselves grace one day to become actors in a similar ceremony—a grace for which the Catholic Church is ever praying for the whole world—an object which the Catholic Church can never cease attempting to arrive at; for it is the end for which the Church is established here on earth."

Prior to the delivery of the address, the Rev. Mr. Lewthwaite and the Rev. Mr. Coombes, together with an almoner, and a chorister from St. Saviour's, and also the matron, assistant-matron, and servant at the Orphanage attached to that took their places upon the steps leading to the altar, where they knelt during the greater part of the ceremony, apparently deeply engaged in mental devotion, when not taking an active part in the service. The hymn and psalm named by the Rev. Mr. Browne having been chanted by the Priests and choir, the seven converts stood in front of the altar, and made the confession of faith as it is in the Catholic Church—viz., the creed of Pope Pius IV., including the Nicene Creed.

The other ceremonies were then proceeded with, and absolution was pronounced from all Ecclesiastical censure. After which

The Very Rev J. H. Newman, Superior of the Oratorians, ascended the pulpit and delivered an address, principally, but not exclusively, to those who had been received into the Catholic Church that day. Addressing the assembly as "Dear friends and Catholic brethren," he said he had no time, as they knew, for putting into order any thoughts which might be in his mind; nor, indeed, was it necessary, nor would they wish it. What they wished rather who with him had been principals in the ministry in so great a work as that in which they had been employed was that he should speak out of the fulness of his heart, and there leave the matter. Because, what was it that they who had been brought into the Catholic Church that day had received? They had received light for darkness, light for twilight, peace for warfare. There was not a change so great as that which took place from the state of doubt and confusion, and misery in which the soul was external to the Catholic Church, to the peace which is found when it came into it. They knew it was said that there is a silence which can be heard, which can be felt. Any one who had been at sea, and who had for days and nights heard the billows beating at the side of the vessel and then came into port, know what a strange stillness it was when the continual noise of the billows had ceased. When a bell stopped, there was a kind of fulness of silence which was most grateful from the contrast. So it was in comparing the tumult and irritation of mind which they who had been long seeking for peace with the joy experienced when they had found it. It was the rich reward of their long anxieties. They (the Catholics) would suppose, indeed they knew it was so, that those who were out of the Catholic Church unfortunately very frequently were not out by their own fault, that was to say, they felt they had not peace, and they had the grace of God given them, though they were out of the Church, to bring them into it; and it was that state which occasioned the distress and misery in their minds. Those who knew nothing, those who felt nothing—they had no anxiety. Those who did not care whether they were right or wrong, those who thought they were right, those who had a dead conscience—they had no anxiety; but it was when a ray of light came, it was when a wounded conscience stung them, it was when they had a misgiving that they were not where they should be—it was then that the triumph began. They had a feeling of duty, and wished to do that duty but did not know where it lay. Sometimes they thought it lay this way, sometimes that that way; and then the voice of friends came and over persuaded them, and they were driven back; so that one way or another they were in a most miserable condition. It was partly, certainly, their own fault. It was the fault of all of them, doubtless, who had been external to the Catholic Church, that they did not enter it sooner, because if they had a fuller determination to follow God's will doubtless [illegible] would have found it sooner. But Al[illegible] God knew what they were made of. He mercifully led them on by first one grace and then another, till they were brought nearer and nearer to that haven where they should be. But though they might be getting nearer they did not know where they stood. Others might see they were getting nearer, but to themselves they seemed to be drifted about, tossed up and down by the waves, and there seemed no hope. It often happened that when persons were near the shore they were amongst billows more alarming and more dangerous, because Satan blew the billows more fiercely in order to drown those who were near the shore; and they knew that frequently in cases of ship-wreck when those who fell into the water were endeavouring to reach the land, something happened to carry them off. So it was in like manner that poor souls who were making towards that land where they [illegible] to be—not indeed from their own fault, it happened so to distress their hearts—[illegible] be seen to be going on gradually and gradually towards the shore, and it might be [illegible] phesied—humbly, but still prophesied—that they would be landed safe, and alas! when they were about to land, suddenly they drifted off, they perished, and it was not known what became of them. It was only known that they were not landed on the beach of the Catholic Church. But they (the Catholics present) had all cause for rejoicing that to those to whom God's mercy had been shown that day it had not so happened. They had put themselves into God's hands, and God had brought them into that haven which they sought. And now, on this day, they thanked God, as they well might, that He had in His grace received them safe. He had brought them within the folds of His Church, He had encompassed them with His everlasting armour, had shielded them from the enemy; and he trusted they had now got a gift which they would never lose; that they were now in a state from which they would never fall, and through God's mercy, having long sought, having at last found, they would go on from strength to strength, grace to grace, doing more and more in His service, and whatever might be their trials that still they would persevere to the end and die in the Faith, and so be brought, through the blood and merits of Jesus Christ, to the land of glory in eternity. What a day was this, that this should take place in it! Why they could say this was a day when they should not expect triumphs of this kind. Look at the world. What did they see? They saw the evil spirit stirred up from the four winds. They saw he was blowing from the four quarters of heaven upon this land, to make the waves of the people rise against the Catholic Church. They might say, "This is not the time for the Catholic Church to triumph." But it was the time. Man's necessity was God's opportunity. The darker the day was, the brighter God's light came. Did they not know it was the property of the truth of God to advance against wind and tide in the most rapid way? It advanced against all the billows, because it was divine—it was supernatural. Vast was the property of the truth of God; and therefore just at this season, when men were most furious against them, when they told all manner of lies and falsehoods against them—because Christ was with them when men were so formed against them, it was the very time for them to expect triumphs. The world could not conquer: it was impossible. No; they would see, as time went on, that all those things which now looked so black and unpromising would turn to the glory and the the salvation of the Catholic Church. If men were called to do that which he did not think they meant to do—persecute the Catholics, he thought it would not hurt them. Did they not know, in the three first centuries of Christianity, that the martyrs went through so much for Christianity that it had been said the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the Church? So was it now. Supposing men were mad enough to go and inflict chains and imprisonment upon them, it would only increase the spread of truth. Of course it was unpleasant to live in the continual anxiety which all this tumult and opposition created. Catholics did not like to be taken from their usual occupations. Catholics did not like to be taken from their usual religious ceremonies. Bishops did not like to be taken from their flocks. The Catholics wished for peace. They wished for peace for the good of the world, and for the good of their flocks internally; but would this state of warfare diminish the Church? No. It would increase it. Not a day passed but souls were received into the heart of the Catholic Church. Sometimes they might be high, sometimes they might be low; but the work could not be stopped. They recollected what Gamaliel said in the days of the apostles. He said if the work was of man it would come to naught, but if it was of God it would go on, and they must take care they did not fight against it. So was it now. Here they were in the 19th century after Christ came into the world, and yet what was said by Gamaliel 1800 years ago was fulfilled now. If this work was of man, it would fall to naught. How was it that this work had gone on for 1800 years, and now seemed more strong and flourishing for all the opposition which had existed against it? How was it that the Protestants were in such perplexity! Why they had seen the Holy Father the Pope driven from Rome, and obliged to take refuge elsewhere; they had seen him persecuted by his own people, and had said, "Here is a poor creature—he can do nothing." They (the Catholics) took them at their word. It was true the Pope was not strong in this world; but if he was not strong in this world, and yet was strong, he (Dr. Newman) suspected his strength must come not from this but from some other world, and he suspected it was from the throne of God. The words of Gamaliel were fulfilled. If the work was of man, it would come to naught. It had not come to naught, and therefore it was not of man, but of God. I look upon you (said Dr. Newman, addressing himself to the converts) to be specimens of this great miracle which is going on continually, this miracle of the conversion of souls in spite of the opposition of the world. Every soul that is converted to God is converted by a miracle: it is a supernatural work which no power of man can do. It is a work of grace. He then observed that it could not be worldly inducements which brought men into the Catholic Church, since they gained no riches, no honours, no praise from mouths of men; but, on the contrary, they were reviled and called names. They gained nothing of this world. It was nothing, then, but a supernatural might which brought them on: it was nothing but the grace of God, seeing those things which the world could not see, and having a desire after those things which the world could not desire, that brought them on. That was the great distinction between the Catholic Church and every other body. Every other body depended upon the world. Take away its worldly supports, and it goes. There was no Protestant that would not grant, when he came to think, that the Church of England, for instance, would go to pieces directly the temporal support was taken away. It was impossible it could stand. They (the Protestants) knew that well. All those that were the most sagacious knew it well. He recollected perfectly well, several years ago, a person in authority in the Church of England gave out a charge. What did he say? "The state is a very bad mistress, but we must put ourselves under its protection, and surrender ourselves to it, because we cannot get a better. It was once thought," he said, "reason and intellect would help the Protestants against the Catholics; but we find it is not so. We find the cleverest men become Catholics. It was said that learning, talent, and genius would leave the Catholics; but it was not so. Light learning, talent, genius, all go towards the Catholic Church. Well, then, nothing is left to us. Let us cling to the state, because we cannot do anything better. Our only hope is in a worldly hope; our only hope is in the arm of flesh, because we can find nothing better." He (Dr. Newman) was not, of course, giving the very words he said, but he was not at all exaggerating the sentiment. It was an honest and true sentiment, though it was very plain to come from a member of the Church of England. It was certain, if the protection of the state were taken from the Church of England it would crumble to pieces. Nothing would be left. It had no unity, no stability, no solidity, no existence but in the power of the state. How different was the Catholic Church. The state attempted all it could against it, but it could not destroy it. Here was the state doing all it could against the Catholic Church, and yet the Catholic Church was growing in influence in the country. In spite of their having done so much for the Church of England, and so much against the Catholic Church, still, when this poor old man whom they professed to despise, living 2,000 miles off, put out a bit of paper naming certain Bishops of England, the Church of England could not bear the shadow of his hand going over the country. He wrote a few words, the shadow of his hand went over the country, and the whole country was in commotion. The true Vicar of Christ, 2,000 miles distant, put into confusion this great country. Could there be a better triumph for all of them, to show their power, that was the power of Christ, than this fact? Their inveterate enemies and the inhabitants of this country (part were not their enemies) could not bear the very whisper of the Vicar of Christ in relation to this country; and in spite of all the greatness of the Church of England, they saw it was merely worldly, while the Catholic Church, not standing upon worldly power, rose up by an unseen power, a power which every arm of flesh feared. The State Church feared it, because it knew that it was of earth, and that the Church of God came from heaven. It was to him an affecting thing that there he happened to be on that occasion speaking to them, because whom was it they had received into the Catholic Church that day? Why, it was the first of a portion of a special congregation of the Church of England, of a district or parish of the Church of England, which was created in remarkable circumstances—to him especially so. They knew he was not always a Catholic. It was some years ago the grace of God made him a Catholic, and on the very day of his conversion what was taking place in this town? Why, the very day when he was being led, as he trusted and believed, by the grace of God to embrace the Faith of the Church of Christ—that was the very time the Church of St. Saviour was opened. It was opened, if he recollected rightly, in a long devotional service which lasted many days, and when that was taking place here, he was being received into the Catholic Church 150 miles off. Therefore, it was to him a circumstance of special interest just at this moment, now he was thrown back to the period of his own conversion, to see in the event of this day a sort of reward of what God led him to do then, that he had been the instrument in part of doing what had been done now. How or when it was that those favoured souls who had that day been made members of the Catholic Church were led by the grace of God towards the Catholic Church, he knew not; but, as regarded himself, he felt as a kind of witness that they should wish him to come to receive them, because there was this remarkable connection between St. Saviour's Church being opened and his own conversion. Then it was that that was begun which now had its [illegible] and they saw in this another illustration of the want of stability of everything in the Church of England. There had been a Church, he meant St. Saviour's, opened with how much of pious feeling—with how many sincere aspirations, with how many ready offerings to Almighty God! What sums of money had been expended upon that Church, and that really for promoting and building up the Catholic Church! It had been the work of persons who in their hearts believed, in doing what they did, they were making an offering, not to the work of man, but to the Catholic Church. They were mistaken in thinking so, but they brought their offerings. They did not act with a half liberality, but bringing treasure by handfuls, gave it for the erection of a Church which they hoped would be a Catholic Church, but they mistook the Church of England for it. They adorned it, enriched it, and what had become of all those hopes which began six years ago? Why, had they not vanished into empty air? They saw that the Church which they built had turned out to be nothing at all; and, after a trial of six years, there was that remarkable truth which came to him six years ago, that the Church of England was a mere shade, that it had no substance. Here was this trial which they saw had come to naught. There were piety, devotion, sincerity, earnestness—persons who would devote themselves earnestly to God; but, alas! they built up the mere creation of this world which would not last. It was coming to naught, and what had been the case here would be the case all over in the Church of England but for the power of the state. It was the power of the state which alone kept anything in its place in the Church of England. Nor so with the Catholic Church. Merely sitting still, going about its own work silently, it had attracted educated members of the Church of England to it. It was a burning and a shining light, and it preached to the people directly by its example. After some further observations, Dr. Newman begged the prayers of the Catholics present for those who had been received into the Church on that and some days previously. He begged their prayers that the work now begun might go on spreading and increasing daily, till all those were brought into the fold of Christ that ought to belong to it—that all those to whom God had given grace might have the veil taken from their eyes. He asked their prayers, also—for prayer was omnipotent—that all those who had anything to do with the erection of St. Saviour's Church might be brought to the light of truth. They could not undo what they had done. St. Saviour's Church, so called, was given up to the Protestants, and there was an end of it. They had given it over to the state. They could not undo their own work; but it would be a great thing for all of them, while they felt that they could not undo much that they had done, that at least they could save their own souls, and show their earnestness by retracing their steps as far as they could. He begged them to pray that every one of the earnest persons who preached sermons at the opening of St. Saviour's Church might be brought into the fold of Christ; that all those who had hung upon their words might be brought fully to the truth; that those who, to some extent, had been nursing fathers to the Catholic Church, though they knew it not, might be brought in; and that every one who had been instrumental in the spread of Catholic doctrines in England, though they knew it not, might be brought into the Catholic Church. Finally, Dr. Newman asked his Catholic hearers to pray for himself, that he might be enabled to do his share in the work which had begun.

After Dr. Newman had left the pulpit, the ceremonies resumed and concluded about half-past nine o'clock.—Tablet, 12th April.

SCOTLAND.

THE SCOTTISH ROMAN CATHOLICS—THE RIGHT REV. BISHOP GILLIS.

The following letter has been written by Bishop Gillis to the Earl of Arundel and Surrey:—

TO THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF ARUNDEL AND SURREY.

My dear Lord—As I find that your lordship will lead the opposition against Lord John Russell's "Ecclesiastical Titles' Assumption Bill," will you allow me, in the name and on behalf of the Vicars-Apostolic in Scotland, to draw your attention to a view of the measure, in as far as it is intended to affect us, which has not yet been brought before the public, and which, if we are to be justly dealt with, is certainly entitled to due consideration, while, framed as the bill has been, it points, I think, to the only honest ground on which the Bishops of the Episcopal Church in Scotland can be excepted from its provisions.

If I have apprehended them rightly, the origin, object, and nature of the bill may be fairly gathered from the following data.

According to Lord John Russell, in his letter to the Bishop of Durham, the reason why the restoration of the Catholic Hierarchy in England imperatively called for the interference of parliament was, that 'the said measure was an insult to the country, because in itself an assumption of power inconsistent with the Queen's supremacy.

In the Queen's speech her Majesty was made to take the same view of the obnoxious measure, and to say, "I have assured them (my subjects) of my resolution to maintain the rights of my crown, and the independence of the nation, against all encroachment, from whatever quarter it may proceed."

In describing the object, and so far the nature of the bill, Lord John Russell said, on the 7th February, "What I propose is, in the first place, to prevent the assumption of any title taken not only from any diocese now existing, but from any territory, or any place, within any part of the United Kingdom. I think, in this respect, we prevent that which I consider an insult to the crown of this country, an interference with the rights of the Established Church of this country, and an attack upon the independence of the nation."

Following up Lord John Russell on the same evening, Mr. Roebuck said, "If he had gathered its purpose rightly, from the noble lord's description, the bill to be introduced meant that Bishops of the Roman Catholic Faith should not call themselves Bishops of any place in the three kingdoms, or in any part of her Majesty's dominions."

Upon which Lord John Russell immediately interposed to define the precise limits within which the proposed act of parliament was to have force, and exempted from its enactment all the colonies, saying, "No, only in the three kingdoms."

The nature of the offence calling for the bill was again described by the Attorney-General on the 10th of February, as consisting of "the introduction of a Bull by which certain persons were entitled by the Pope of Rome to assume to themselves certain Ecclesiastical titles, as being Archbishops and Bishops of certain territorial Sees, defined within certain limits throughout England and Wales."

From the above, I draw the inferences which follow:—

1. The exclusive nature of the offence which Lord John Russell's bill is intended to meet is, that it is an act done by a foreign power in defiance of the spiritual supremacy of the Queen, an interference with the rights of the Established Church of England, and hence an act insulting to the independence of the nation.

2. The ground, therefore, on which Lord John Russell rests his claim to be heard in bringing in his bill is, that as Prime Minister of England he is bound to uphold the spiritual prerogatives of his Sovereign, the rights of the Church of which those spiritual prerogatives constitute that Sovereign the Supreme Head, as well as to vindicate any insult offered to the independence of the nation.

3. Hence the colonies of Great Britain are excepted from the provisions of the bill, because there the nature and existence of the offence, as described, are impossibilities, there being no colony in Great Britain in which the spiritual supremacy of the Sovereign is acknowledged as it is in England, or of which the Church of England is by law the Established Church.

Consequently, the Pope, in establishing Archbishops and Bishops, with territorial jurisdiction, in any of these portions of "her Majesty's dominions," does not, according to Lord John Russell, offend against the Queen's supremacy, or interfere with the rights of the Established Church of which the Queen is the Supreme Head, or in any way attack the independence of the nation. Nay, in some of said colonies, her Majesty's Government not only acknowledges the validity and lawfulness of such acts as done by the Pope, but even endows the Bishops.

4. The exception made by Lord John Russell from the provisions of the bill, in favour of the colonies, is tantamount to the admission that where no offence, such as he describes, is possible, as in the colonies, there can be no just grounds on which to rest the introduction of a bill such as his lordship meditates against the Catholics of the three kingdoms.

5. These premises being granted—and it seems difficult to deny their truth—the question naturally suggests itself—"What justifiable grounds can there be for including within the provisions of this bill the Catholics of Scotland?"

1. There is in Scotland no body of Christians of any kind or description acknowledging the spiritual supremacy of the Queen. There is none which does not emphatically protest against it.

The established Presbyterianism of Scotland rejects that supremacy.

Every branch of Presbyterian Dissent, the Free Church included, rejects it.

The Episcopalians reject it.

The Catholics reject it.

The Unitarians and the Society of Friends of course reject it. In a word, the whole nation rejects it.

2. The law of the land protests against the spiritual supremacy of the Sovereign. It was abrogated in Scotland when Episcopacy was abolished in 1689—when "the King had chimney-money granted him instead of his supremacy."* The abolition of said royal spiritual supremacy was confirmed in 1707, by the articles of Union, where the rights and privileges of the respective Churches of England and Scotland were made fundamental conditions of the union of the two kingdoms.

3. As remarked by Mr. Keogh, in the course of the debate on the 12th February, "her Majesty at her coronation swore to respect these statutes." That is to say, in the absence of any other evidence to the fact, we have her Majesty's own solemn oath to bear witness to the non-existence of her Majesty's spiritual supremacy in Scotland.

How, therefore, can that be offended against in Scotland which does not there exist?

* Guthrie's History of Scotland."

How can the Catholics of Scotland be included in a bill of pains and penalties resting its sole claim to justice on a presupposed offence against the spiritual supremacy of the Queen, without the movers of such a bill becoming chargeable with an attempt to re-establish in Scotland, virtually at least, the spiritual prerogatives of the Sovereign against which the whole nation protests—prerogatives abolished and annulled by law—prerogatives foresworn by the Sovereign herself—without being open to the charge of proposing a violation of her Majesty's coronation oath.

If the Catholics of England, in petitioning for, and obtaining from the Pope the restoration of their Hierarchy, have interfered with the rights of the Established Church of England, that cannot surely be a just reason to file a bill of penalties against the Catholics of Scotland, who are in the utter impossibility of interfering with the rights of a Church of which the existence in their country utterly ignored, even by its own royal spiritual head. Had the Catholics of Scotland actually petitioned for and obtained from the Pope a restoration of their Hierarchy on this side of the Tweed, still they would have been clearly guiltless of any misdemeanour against the spiritual supremacy of the Sovereign or the rights of the Established Church of England, and it would have been impossible, with any regard to consistency, to have legislated against them, as Lord J. Russell now proposes to do against all Catholics of the United Kingdom, on the exclusive ground that the prerogatives of the Sovereign have been offended against, the rights of the Church of England interfered with, and an attack been made on the independence of the nation.

How undeniably unjust, then, is not this same bill of penalties against the Catholics of Scotland at the present moment, when, on the very showing of Lord John Russell, they are altogether innocent on the one hand of any offence whatever, having neither obtained any Hierarchy, nor even petitioned for one; while on the other, should the proposed bill pass into a law, they, the same innocent Catholics of Scotland, must eventually prove the only real sufferers from it, as, from the fact of the Hierarchy being already, both, in Ireland and England, un fait accompli, its provisions in both countries will be little more than a dead letter, just as the prohibitory clauses of the Emancipation Act have proved since 1829, from precisely the same reason.

Can it be denied, then, that if this bill be carried, whatever the Pope may have done against the independence of the nation in England, Lord John Russell will have been guilty of a most unprovoked attack against the independence of the nation in Scotland? Since, however much religious prejudice may tend in the meantime to blind people to the true nature of the act, it is not the less indisputable, that the proposed restrictive measure cannot be made law in Scotland, without a virtual assertion of the royal supremacy in Scotland, and a corresponding practical violation of her Majesty's coronation oath.

It may, to be sure, be expedient, in Lord John

Russell's opinion, to prohibit the assumption of any Ecclesiastical titles in respect of any places within the United Kingdom, and hence even in Scotland. But the very preamble of the bill shows that in as far as Scotland is concerned, this cannot be justified on the grounds on which alone his lordship has deemed fit to base his general measure. A bill to this effect, to have the semblance of justice, in as far as Scotland is concerned, must be made to rest on the merits of those "permanently and inviolably settled arrangements of the Act of Union of Scotland, by which the Protestant Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and the doctrine, discipline, and government thereof, became for ever the exclusively established religion of Scotland."

Is Lord John Russell prepared to take his stand upon this latter ground? Then, his restrictions must not fall on the Catholics of Scotland only, but on the synods, presbyteries, ecclesiastical titles, and territorial jurisdiction of the Free Church, not in Scotland, but of Scotland; on those of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, of the United Presbyterian Synod Church, of the Synod of United Original Seceders, of the Congregational Union Churches of Scotland, as well as of the Scottish Episcopal Church—none of which are the Established Church of the country, yet all of which assume, without molestation, either "the territorial titles" in use in the Established Church of the land, or the still more offensive titles of diocesan Bishops.

It may be all very well for Lord J. Russell to say, in his letter to the Bishop of Durham, that "it is impossible to confound the recent measures of the Pope with the divisions of Scotland into dioceses by the Episcopal Church, or the arrangement of districts in England by the Wesleyan Conference." But granting, for the sake of argument, that the comparison as stated by his lordship between the newly-appointed Catholic Bishops in England and the Episcopal Bishops in Scotland is not a just one, it is impossible to deny, that as between Catholics in Scotland and Episcopalians in Scotland, the parity of position with reference to the Law-Established Church of Scotland, or with regard to the spiritual supremacy of the Queen in England, or England's Established Church, is perfect; nor is it in the least modified by the circumstance, that Catholics would be made Bishops by the Pope, while Episcopalians elect one another to the Episcopal charge; for Lord John Russell's bill is exclusively called an "Ecclesiastical Titles Assumption Bill," to prevent the assuming of Episcopal titles, whether under colour of authority from the See of Rome or otherwise.

If, therefore, there is to be legislation on the subject in question that is to include Scotland in its provisions, it must clearly be based on different grounds from those hitherto avowed exclusively by the Premier; or any such legislation must in reality be an attack on the independence of the nation in Scotland, as "permanently and inviolably" secured by the Act of Union, and as sworn to by the Sovereign in her coronation oath. Again, unless such legislation be made to have force against all dissenting religious bodies in the eyes of the law, Episcopalians and Free Church included, it can prove nothing short of unjust, because partial legislation—an unprovoked act of religious persecution against the unoffending Catholics of Scotland.

"It is held," says the Attorney-General, in his speech of the 19th of February, "to be a safe maxim in politics, that you ought not to introduce or attempt to introduce, a remedy more extensive than is sufficient to meet the evil itself which is complained of; and if you introduce and pass a measure which shall effectually prevent those persons from holding those Sees, and from being Archbishops and Bishops of those pretended dioceses in England, the real object will be attained which is wished to be attained; and you ought not to legislate beyond the occasion, or seek to legislate against possible evils which have not at present arisen. I believe the bill will, in fact, effectually prevent the evil that has been complained of. That that is the object of bill there can be no question, and that it has been framed to meet that evil is within my own knowledge."

In addition to the manifest injustice of Lord John Russell's bill, as intended to affect the Catholics of Scotland, we have here the unwilling acknowledgment of one of the very framers of the bill itself, the Attorney-General, to the fact that its introduction in regard of these same Catholics of Scotland would be a departure from sound policy, and a perpetration of what ought not to be done; and, strange to say, this admission is made, and emphatically urged upon the attention of the House of Commons, by the only law officer of the crown whose name is given as one of the makers of the bill, and at the very moment that he is pressing its adoption on the members of the legislature.

This is no doubt so far explainable on the part of Sir John Romilly, from his anxiety to give a good reason for not going so far in the way of restrictive measures as some of his political opponents would fain have forced him to do; but, on that very account, his words are only the more forcible, in as far as they are condemnatory of that portion of his bill which is intended to apply to Scotland. "It is held," says he, "to be a safe maxim in politics, that you ought not to introduce, or attempt to introduce, a remedy more extensive than is sufficient to meet the evil itself which is complained of; and if you introduce and pass a measure which shall effectually prevent persons from holding those Sees, and from being Archbishops and Bishops of those pretended dioceses in England, the real object will be attained which is wished to be attained." How so? Because, as stated in a previous sentence by the same learned speaker, the sole offence sought to be reached by the provisions of the bill had been committed in England by the Pope and the new Hierarchy. He proceeds:—

"I will call the attention of the house to what the offence was that this bill is intended to meet. In the course of last year, the offence consisted of the introduction of a Bull, by which 56 persons were entitled by the Pope of Rome to assume to themselves certain Ecclesiastical titles, as being the Archbishops and Bishops of certain territorial Sees, defined within certain limits throughout England and Wales. The consequences of this offence will have to be regarded by the house; but the consequences are derived solely from the circumstance that those titles are to be assumed of certain territorial and pretended Sees and dioceses of this country"—viz., England and Wales.

Nothing can be more clear. You ought not to "introduce, or attempt to introduce, a remedy more extensive than is sufficient to meet the evil itself which is complained of." Now, the evil complained of was the offence given in the course of last year. The nature of that offence was "the introduction of a Bull by which certain persons were entitled by the Pope of Rome to assume to themselves certain Ecclesiastical titles, as being Archbishops and Bishops of certain territorial Sees, defined within certain limits throughout England and Wales." The consequences of this offence are to be regarded by the house, but these consequences are derived solely from the circumstance of an unauthorised assumption of Ecclesiastical titles and jurisdiction in England and Wales. The remedy proposed for the evil complained of is the bill—a remedy prepared "within the knowledge" of the Attorney-General for no other purpose than to meet the evil, such being the real object wished to be attained, and sufficient for the purpose in view. "I believe this bill will in fact, effectually prevent the evil that has been complained of."

Now, what have the Catholics of Scotland had to do with the evil or offence complained of, as having been perpetrated in the course of last year exclusively within the boundaries of England and Wales? Nothing: they have committed no evil: they are guiltless of all offence. What, therefore, ought the remedy, or the bill, to have to do with the Catholics of Scotland? If its enactments are to be enforced beyond the Tweed, may it not be said with truth, in the words of the Attorney-General, that the remedy is in this case more extensive than the evil complained of? What, then, is the value of his solemn admonition, "You ought not to legislate beyond the occasion," while he, a law officer of the crown, and a member of the government, nay, the very framer of the bill, claims the privilege of acting in direct contradiction to the injunctions he so gravely lays down to others? Yet, so scrupulously precise are those same injunctions, that were any one to say—"the Catholics of Scotland have not yet obtained the restoration of their Hierarchy, nor have they even asked for it; but they may ask for it, and obtain it, and it is expedient to prevent them doing so;" Sir John Romilly would be ready with his reply—"You ought not to seek to legislate against possible evils which have not at present arisen."

The worst, then, that can be laid to the charge of the Catholics of Scotland being, that although at present confessedly innocent, they may, at some future period, like most of their neighbours, perpetrate some "possible evils which have not at present arisen," the said Catholics, from the very showing of the Attorney-General now acting against them, ought unquestionably to be excepted from the provisions of a measure of which the real and exclusive object is declared to be to meet an evil and an offence of which they are avowedly blameless.

In conclusion, I humbly submit that from the above premises one of two inferences ought necessarily to be drawn. Either the Catholics of Scotland ought not to be included in the provisions of a bill destined solely to meet an exigency which has arisen in England and Wales—and this would be but bare justice; or if they are to be legislated against notwithstanding their innocence, they are entitled to ask that it shall be upon such grounds as are not derogatory to the rights assured to their country by the articles of Union, or inconsistent with the sacredness of her Majesty's coronation oath, in as far as it repudiates all claim to any spiritual supremacy in Scotland; in other words, the Catholics of Scotland have a right insist that, instead of calling for restrictive measures against them, on the plea of an offence offered to the crown, which they have not only not committed, but which, from the circumstances of the case, it is impossible for them to commit, her Majesty's government will take its stand on what its duties may be towards the Established "Protestant Presbyterian Church of Scotland," defined in the preamble of the present bill, and deal alike with all Dissenters as existing in Scotland in the eyes of the law, whether Catholics, Episcopalians, Free Churchmen, or other unestablished Presbyterian Christians.

I need scarcely observe that this latter line of action is not here suggested as indicative of any wish on our part to see others implicated in the unjust measure that threatens ourselves, but simply to call attention to the fact, that the only ground on which we Catholics of Scotland can be fairly legislated against in the matter in question is one which no possible ministry would for a moment presume to occupy.—I have the honour to be, my dear lord, yours very respectfully and truly in Jesus Christ,

✠ James Gillis,

In the name and on behalf of the Catholic Bishops, Vicars-Apostolic in Scotland.

Edinburgh, Feb. 24.

[Tablet.]

MISSIONS OF THIBET.

Extracts from a Letter of Rev. Dr. Huc Apostolic Missioner in China, to the Rev. Dr. Etienne, Superior General of Saint Lazarus, at Paris.

SOJOURN AT LASSA.

(Continued from our last.)

During and after the repast, many questions were put concerning France and the countries we had travelled over. The regent then directed our attention to admire the pictures decorating his apartment, and inquired from us whether we are able to paint such good ones.

not know how to paint," was our answer. "Study and preaching the doctrine of Jehovah are our sole occupation." "Oh! do not say you do not know how to paint; I know that your countrymen are very clever in that art." "Yes, those who profess the art; but the members of religion are not in the habit of attending to it." Although you are not specially addicted to this art, still you are not utterly ignorant of it..... No doubt you know how to sketch geographical maps?" "We do not know how." "What have you not sketched during your journeys? have you made no map?" "Never." "Oh! impossible." .....The regent persisting on this subject, set us upon thinking, and we expressed to him our astonishment at all these inquiries. "I see," said he, "that you are most upright men; I shall therefore speak to you candidly. You are aware the Chinese are suspicious; since you have resided a long time in China, you must know them as well as I. These are persuaded that you are travelling over foreign countries in order to sketch maps and explore all countries. If you paint, if you make maps of geography, you may own it to me without apprehension; reckon upon my protection." .... The regent evidently was in dread of an invasion; he fancied we were commissioned to prepare the way for some formidable army, going to bear down upon Thibet. We endeavoured to dissipate his apprehensions and to assure him of the highly pacific dispositions of the French government. We admitted to him, however, that there were a great many paintings and geographical maps among our luggage; that we had even a map of Thibet. At these words, the regent's figure immediately shrunk back.....But we hastened to assure him that all our pictures and maps were printed impressions, and that we were not the authors of them. We here took occasion to speak to the regent and the Cashmerian governor of the geographical knowledge of Europeans; they were highly astonished when we told them that our children of from ten to twelve years had an exact and complete idea of all the kingdoms of the earth.

The conversation was prolonged until very late in the night. At length the regent rose and inquired if we stood in need of rest. "We are only waiting," said we, "for the Kalon's permission to repair to our dwelling." "Your dwelling! But I have issued instructions to prepare for you a room in my palace; you will sleep here to-night: to-morrow you shall return to your house." ... We sought to be excused, and thanked the regent for his kind attention; but we soon perceived that we were no longer free to refuse what we were simple enough to have taken for an act of politeness; we were, in fact, prisoners. We made rather a cool salute to the regent, and followed an individual who, after directing us through several rooms, galleries, and devious ways, introduced us into a sort of cabinet, which we might fairly style a prison, since we could not have it to go elsewhere.

They had prepared two couches for us that were unquestionably better than our own; however, we regretted our poor bedding, upon which we had so long enjoyed free and independent slumbers in the desert. Lamas and servants of the regent thronged in crowds to visit us. Those who had gone to sleep arose, and this vast palace, hitherto so silent and calm, resounded with the clattering of doors and hurried steps of the inquisitive over all the galleries; they grouped about us and examined us with intolerable eagerness. Neither sympathy nor ill-will were disclosed in their looks, but mere curiosity. We were to all these surrounding throng nothing more than a sort of zoological phenomenon. Ah! how painful it is to be thus exposed as a spectacle to an indifferent multitude.

When we considered these importunate visiters had lookled and chuckled sufficiently at us, and that they should be satisfied, we gave them notice that we were going to bed, and that it would be extremely agreeable to us if they would be good enough to withdraw. All bowed to us: some even put out their tongues to us, but no one withdrew. It was evident that they wished to know our mode of going to rest. This desire did not appear very legitimate to us, however, we thought we might endure it to a certain point. We therefore knelt down, made the sign of the cross, and recited aloud our evening prayers. As soon as we begun the chuckling ceased, and they maintained a religious silence. When prayer was over, we again invited the assistants to leave us by ourselves, and in order to enforce a little our words, we blew out immediately the light of our room. The public being suddenly plunged in profound darkness, began to laugh and retired on tiptoe; we closed our prison door and went to bed.

As soon as we were stretched upon the beds of the Kalou premier, we felt far more inclined for chat than for sleep. We experienced a certain degree of pleasure in recapitulating the adventures of the day. The pretended traders who wished to purchase our saddles, our appearance before the regent, the interrogatory that Ki-Chan had subjected us to, our supper at the expence of the public treasury, our long conversation with the regent, all seemed to us like a vision. Our entire day seemed like a long nightmare. Even our journey, our arrival at Lassa all seemed to us incredible. We asked could it be really the case that we, Missioners and Frenchmen, were within the territories of the Tale-Lama—in the capital of Thibet—sleeping in the very palace of the regent! All these and present transactions clashed in our minds; especially the future seemed to us enveloped in dark thick clouds. How will this all end? said we: will they say to us, "You are free; go where you like?" Will they keep us cooped up in this prison, or are they going to strangle us? ..... These reflections were well calculated to chill our hearts and make us nervous; but what a good thing is confidence in God in the midst of trials! What a happy thing to be able to rely on Providence, when one is alone abandoned, and destitute of all succour! Oh said we to each other, let us be resigned to all and reckon upon the protection of the good God; not a hair shall fall from our head without his permission.

(To be continued.)

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 24.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JUNE 14, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, June 14, 1851.

MACAO.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE CONDUCT OF CAPT. KEPPEL'S ILLEGAL RESCUE OF THE MAN-SUMNER FROM PRISON AT MACAO.

The English Journals received by the late Mail report, that Lord Palmerston has made the AMENDE HONORABLE to the Portuguese Government, in reparation for the insult offered to it by Capt. Keppel's forcible rescue from the prison at Macao of a strolling, insolent, ill-mannered functionary of some self-called Evengelical Society, who on occasion of a procession of the Blessed Sacrament there, perversely refused, either to withdraw from the place by which the procession had to pass, or to exhibit even such a mark of external respect, as English and Lutheran Protestants exhibit at communion to the sacramental elements of bread and wine, or as the well bred of every persuasion are accustomed to exhibit in the presence of personages of superior station, or upon entering a public court of justice or a place of worship of any denomination. The result of this ill-bred obstinacy was as might be expected, that Sumner for his outrage against the public feeling of the people, and the respect due to the local authorities, as well as the established religion at Macao, was sent to prison. Acting, doubtless, under the influence of some imprudent and not improbably fanatical advisers, Captain Keppel demanded the liberation of Sumner from the Portuguese Government of the place, and finding his application ineffectual, he proceeded to violence, and with the aid of his Crew broke open the prison and rescued the prisoner.

It was impossible that the Home Authorities either in England or Portugal could remain indifferent or unconcerned, on being informed of this extraordinary proceeding. The report of all that had taken place was accordingly laid before the British Foreign Secretary, and nothing whatever appearing, that could justify or extenuate the improper conduct of Capt. Keppel and his Crew, Lord Palmerston apologised for it, and as some atonement, made what must be deemed a suitable compensation to the families of those of the Portuguese subjects, who sustained injury or loss, by occasion of the violence resorted to by Captain Keppel and his subordinates. The widow of the Portuguese Soldier who was killed in the assault upon the prison has been awarded a pension of twenty pounds per annum for life, three others who suffered on the same occasion are to receive five hundred dollars each, and the Jailor's daughter, on the like score, the sum of fifty pounds.

But whilst we find no fault with the extent of the reparation, which has been justly made to the Portuguese Government, we think, that justice required, that the individuals, whose misconduct has rendered this reparation necessary, should not be allowed by the British Government to escape the reproof they so well deserve. In particular, we are of opinion, that, Sumner, who was the primary and most inexcusable party, should be taught by the British local authorities under whose jurisdiction he resides, that a character like his is unfit to be entrusted with any office in a colony, in which the greatest moderation and prudence are required on the part of every British subject, in order not to offend against the National or Religious feelings of the various classes, of which the community is there composed.

We have perceived with great regret, that some of the English Journals have profitted of the untoward occurrence we have spoken of, for the double purpose of pouring forth abuse against the Catholic Religion and of holding up Sumner as a hero of Protestantism. Had Sumner's presence at the Procession been compulsory, or if, when accidentally present at it, no opportunity of retiring was left to him, the occasion might have offered some pretence for an advocate's panegyric of his Protestant Orthodoxy. But we know from a respectable Person, who was a spectator of the whole affair, that neither of these pleas can be offered in Sumner's favor, and that it was impossible to put any other construction on his conduct, than that he, after full previous deliberation, resolved upon obtruding himself at the Procession, in such a way as to evince openly his contempt for the Religious Rite then celebrated, for the feelings of the assembled public and for the Authorities of Macao, Civil, Military, and Ecclesiastical. For our parts, we declare sincerely, that if one of our brethren in religion were to outrage peace, and order, in a similar way on occasion of the celebration of a religious solemnity by any class of Christians, we would willingly abandon him as inexcusable and as deserving of exemplary punishment. We understand that Sumner is some sort of catechist or subordinate teacher of what is called Evangelical religion. If he be and if he knows and appreciates, as he ought, the first elements of Christianity, he will often reproach himself, for having by his perverse obstinacy occasioned one fellow creature, whilst engaged in his lawful avocation, to be sent unprepared without a moment's notice to his dreadful account in eternity, and three others to languish in sufferings, brought on by the ads they received in the discharge of their duty, perhaps for life, on a bed of sickness, their lives a burden both to themselves and their poor families.

Our readers may remember the case of the young man Sumner, who, for refusing to take off his hat while a procession of the Host was passing in the streets of Macao, was put in prison by the Portuguese authorities there, and forcibly rescued by the Hon'ble Captain Keppel of the Meander;—but as the Bombay Gazette gives us the latest intelligence on the subject, we will let him tell the tale, as he does in the following sentences, the first a regular cul de sac, a long passage leading to nothing:—

"The London United Service Gazette mentions that a Mr. Sumner, a teacher connected with the schools at Hongkong, and who our readers may remember was severely and roughly handled by the Macao authorities in the year 1849, for not paying observance, or falling down on his knees, or even taking off his hat to a popish ceremony of "elevating the host" he being a sound Protestant, and for which alleged insult to Popish observances, he was seized and carried off to prison, Hearing that H. M 's Ship Meander, Captain the Honorable Keppie was lying in the Macao river, he applied to that gallant officer for assistance, who readily came to his rescue, he being a British subject, and demanded his release from the Macao Authorities; but his request not being complied with he landed a party of seamen and marines, and emancipated Mr. Sumner, the consequence was, one Portuguese soldier was killed, three wounded, and the gaoler's daughter very much frightend."

As our contemporary mentions, the Portuguese Government subsequently took up the matter very warmly, and after a long correspondence Lord Palmerston acknowledged the wrong done by the British officer. Britain can afford to be just to a state like Portugal even at the sacrifice of what some would foolishly regard as a portion of her dignity. Our Government has granted a pension of £20 a year to the widow of the soldier who was killed, a douceur of 500 dollars each to the three soldiers who were wounded, and £50 to the jailor's daughter.—Hurkaru, June 7.

—ooo—

DISTRICT CHARITABLE SOCIETY.

We beg to call the attention of our readers to an extract, which we have copied from the Hurkaru, on the District Charitable Society. The subject is one in which the Catholic Community of Calcutta is deeply interested. The greater part of the Bequest Funds in the hands of that Society, has been left by deceased Catholics. Justice therefore demands, that these Funds be administered by a Committee so constituted, as to afford to the Catholic Community satisfactory proof, that the Poor of their persuasion are impartially dealt with, and that these receive, regard being had to their numbers and poverty, a due proportion of the alms distributed by the District Charitable Society. At present, this, certainly, is not the case. The constitution of the Society, as it now stands, is the very reverse of satisfactory to the Catholic Community, and, we have reason to know, that a general impression exists, that it would endanger, if it would not prove fatal to the claim however just of any petitioner, if it became known to the Relieving Committee, that the applicant was a Catholic. It may be, that this impression is partially erroneous, but it can be, by no means, a matter of surprise, that in the existing state of the District Society, such an impression should be prevalent. The only way to correct it effectually, and to induce those of our Community, who can afford to contribute to the Society, to take an interest in its welfare, is to organise a Committee, of which a fair proportion will consist of such Catholics as the poor among their Brethren will have full confidence in. We subjoin the Hurkaru's article on the subject :—

A RETIRED MEMBER—of the District Charitable Society—writes us a long letter in defence, we suppose, of that institution against the gentle onset which we lately made upon what appeared to us some of its weak points. We cannot, however, compliment our correspondent or congratulate the Society on the success with which he has wielded his pen in its cause. He has indeed rather confirmed us in the belief that there is room for reform. He tells us, that the objects of the founder, Bishop Turner, were "to rid the inhabitants of Calcutta from pestering petitioners," and "to ensure relief to persons really deserving it." These objects, he says, have been in a great measure realised, yet he subsequently admits that "petitions are again become as plentiful as blackberries," and that the accumulation of cash in the hands of the Central Committee, in connection with the fact that begging petitions have again increased in Calcutta, "are apt to create an impression on the public mind, that cases of distress are not readily relieved or that what is given is dealt out with a niggardly hand." Does the RETIRED MEMBER see nothing in such a state of affairs to justify an investigation as to the causes thereof? Yes, he says that the reason why Calcutta "again swarms with petitions and beggars, while we have amongst us a Society expressly instituted to put down such a nuisance, ought to be made a matter of enquiry and public discussion." So think we, and therefore we have called attention to the subject.

Our correspondent does not think the organization of the Society, "could be more perfect than it is," and he seems to regard it as a strong point in this organization, that the parochial divisions or church districts are taken as its basis, and that each district committee is presided over by "the minister of the parish church." Yet after this he can say that it is a Church institution only in appearance. Why? Because Presbyterian, Romish and Dissenting ministers may join their brethren of the Church of England in the charitable work. Yes! in a committee sitting in the church vestry, presided over by the church minister, and formed in a great measure of members of the church! Who can wonder that ministers not of the church and people not of the church hold aloof?

The fact is, in short and not to mince matters, that the District Charitable Society is too much of a sectarian institution, too much of a close-borough; and the first step towards reform will be to make it a really public institution. Its prosperity and efficiency must be sought less in the countenance of "certain dignitaries of the church and state" ex-officio members of the Central Committee, than in the hearty co-operation of men of all creeds and classes united for a great public object. It must be commended to the sympathies of the charitable of all grades and denominations, and must be kept before the eyes of the community as the active, intelligent, and impartial almoner of all who have anything to spare for the poor and suffering. Give it a more popular constitution and a more public organization and other necessary reforms will follow as a matter of course.—Hurkaru, June 6.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

LECTURE ON MECHANICS. BY THE REV. MR. STEPHENSON.

On the morning of the 3rd instant, the Lecturer having as usual devoted some time to the examination of his pupils, proceeded to explain the influence which bodies in general are said to have upon the earth; since, he observed, we came to the conclusion, that the attraction of gravitation was common to all bodies, might we not, be asked, naturally enquire whether the earth itself was attracted by falling bodies and whether it would in consequence advance towards them in mutual approach. Our answer of course should be in the affirmative, since in just theory this attraction must take place, but however all calculation of that advance was far beyond the reach even of human conception, for when we calculate the vast difference that exists, between the quantity of matter in this earth and in any of the smaller bodies connected with it, when we know as we do from what has been already stated, that attraction acts in proportion to the quantity of matter, we must conclude, that the advance which the earth makes must be indefinitely small.

The proportion of matter in homogenous bodies and of the same shape is found to be as the cubes of their homologous dimensions. Now the diameter of the earth is supposed to be about 8000 miles and supposing the diameter of some other like body to be 6 feet we have the ratio of the cube of 8000 to the cube of 6 feet which will leave indeed but a very small proportion of matter, then again when we consider the very trifling distance from which bodies can be allowed to descend to the earth, we need not be surprised at the difficulty of calculation with regard to the advance which the earth makes. With these and some other observations on this subject the Lecturer terminated the first part of his discourse and next proceeded to calculate the force of attraction in the rise and fall of bodies. In treating of the first, it should be remembered, that the attraction of gravitation always acted from the centre of the earth and not from the surface and hence arose the great difficulty in observing the difference of the force of gravity in the short distances through which bodies usually descend; but were it possible to ascend to an equal distance above the surface of the earth, as the surface is from the centre, we might then attain a practical illustration of it. The distance of the surface from the centre of the earth is calculated to be about 4000 miles, now if we were to ascend that same distance above the surface, we would find the attraction reduced to half of what it was at the surface and this in accordance with the general rule that the attraction of gravitation decreases as the squares of the distance increase.

This rule holds true with regard to almost every force which proceeds from a centre, and it might be illustrated by many interesting calculations which the Lecturer was pleased to introduce for the gratification and instruction of his pupils; amongst these we noticed his allusion to the difference of attraction at the poles and at the equator, which arose from the fact of the earth, being somewhat flattened at the poles and of course bodies at these places being nearer to the centre of the earth by seventeen miles were found to weigh heavier, being drawn with greater force: with regard to the descent of bodies, it was proved by accurate experiment, that they always fell in the first second of time sixteen feet and then descended with an accelerating force according to the odd numbers 1, 3, 5, 7, 9. Thus a body having fallen 16 feet in the first second, will fall three times that in the second and so on; here the Lecturer entered into a lengthened explanation, which he concluded by introducing that compendious rule which served to abbreviate all tedious calculations. "That the spaces described by falling bodies increased as the squares of the times increased."

Before concluding his discourse, the Lecturer bade the pupils remember, that the velocities of falling bodies did not increase in the same proportion, as the spaces described. In calculating the velocities, we should multiply the velocity which the body had acquired at the end of the first second by the time taken in the descent, suppose then, that a body was falling for 5 seconds, we must multiply 32 or the velocity acquired by 5 the number of seconds, and the product will be the entire velocity acquired; the Lecturer concluded by announcing that the consideration of the Centre of Gravity would be the subject for the next day's instruction.

—ooo—

NOTICE TO THE CATHOLICS RESIDING AT BOW-BAZAR AND THE CIRCULAR ROAD.

In order to afford to the Catholics of the above-named districts a convenient opportunity of gaining the Indulgence of the Jubilee during the week which begins on Trinity Sunday the 15th inst., and ends on Sunday the 22nd inst., the following arrangements have been adopted by His Grace the Archbishop, viz. That at St. Xavier's Chapel Bow-Bazar, Mass shall be celebrated at 6¼ A. M., on the mornings of Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday in the next week, and that on the same occasion an instruction on the Jubilee be given and the prayers for the obtaining of it publicly recited.

2dly. That at the Chapel of St. John, Circular Road, Mass shall be also celebrated on the Wednesday, Friday and Saturday of the same week, at the same hour and that there be given on each of the aforesaid days an Instruction and the prescribed prayers for the Jubilee recited at 6½ P. M.

Such of the Faithful of these districts as may through age or infirmity be unable to attend for Confession at the Cathedral, will, on sending their names to the Clergy of the Cathedral, be attended to by them, at the Chapel of their own district. For the convenience of the rest of the faithful of these districts, the Confessors will be ready to attend to them at the usual hours at the Cathedral and also from 11 A. M., to 2 P. M.

N. B.—For such of the Faithful as desire to gain the Indulgence of the Jubilee in the next week, Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday will be fast days of obligation. In cases of sickness or other necessity, the Confessors can commute the fast into some other pious obligation or work.

—ooo—

AKYAB.

Collection for the B. C. Orphanages.

Mrs. Howard.

More than once we have had the pleasure to notice for the edification of our Community the persevering charitable exertions made by Mrs. Howard, in behalf of our Orphanages. The same gratifying duty devolves again upon us. We publish to-day the list of the Benefactors at Akyab, who have so kindly countenanced and so generously aided Mrs. Howard's efforts in favor of the Orphans, and we profit of this occasion to return to them in the name of our Brethren, our grateful and respectful thanks. Mrs. Howard affords an admirable illustration of the great services, which may be rendered to Religion and charity by a good Christian, however humble his or her position in life may be. Attached to the household of Mr. and Mrs. Brown at Akyab, Mrs. Howard by her virtuous conduct has won the esteem and confidence both of her respected Master and Mistress, and through them of the other respected Contributors to our Orphanages. We trust that the excellent lesson which Mrs. Howard's example affords will not be lost upon the many other Catholic domestics, who are placed in circumstances similar to her's, in various parts of the Bengal Presidency.

—000—

PENTECOST SUNDAY, CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL.

On last Sunday, the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic, after a suitable instruction, administered Confirmation to fifty-two Candidates. About one hundred and thirty persons approached the Holy Communion.

—000—

CONVERSION.

A young man, an Armenian, hitherto attached to the Schism of a portion of his Country-men, has under the instruction of Rev. Father Emanuel embraced the Catholic Communion.

—000—

CALCUTTA CATHOLIC SCHOOLS.

At the meeting of the General Committee on the 1st inst, the report for the month of May last, exhibited the total number of Pupils in attendance at the Catholic Schools of Calcutta, as amounting to six hundred and forty-two (642) of this number one hundred and fifty (150) are educated and supported in the Orphanages.

—000—

CHURCH OF THE SACRED HEART DURRUMTOLLAH.

The Archbishop will administer Confirmation in the Durrumtollah Catholic Church on Sunday the 15th instant, at 7¼ o'clock, A. M.

RIGHT REV. BISHOP BORGHI.

We sincerely regret to state, that accounts lately received, announce that the excellent Bishop of Cortona, late Vicar Apostolic of Agra, was so dangerously ill, that it was judged necessary to administer the last Sacraments to His Lordship.

—000—

CEYLON CATHOLIC STATISTICS.

The Bombay Gazette states, that in Ceylon, there are two Catholic Bishops and a Co-adjutor Bishop, thirty-two Priests and 150,000 Lay Catholics. The Schismatics are so few, as not to deserve notice on the score of numbers.

—000—

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

In the British Territory of the Cape, there are already two Catholic Bishops, Vicars Apostolic. We rejoice to learn, that the progress of Catholicity there, has caused the Holy See to add another to their number.

—000—

MISS MARTINEAU AN AVOWED ATHEIST.

One of the Calcutta Journals states, that Miss Martineau the celebrated authoress has lately publicly avowed herself an Atheist. A few months ago, Miss Martineau took Mesmerism, Animal Magnetism and Clairvoyance under her special patronage. The exercise of the true Protestant principle of the right of private judgment has at length conducted her, as it has many others also to the dreadful abyss of Atheism.

—000—

TRAM RAIL WAY—BOMBAY.

The Hurkaru states, that on the Tram Railway just completed at Bombay, a pair of Bullocks can draw with ease four tons: at this rate they could draw daily eight tons over the whole line. As the cost of carriage of 12 maunds by a common native cart is four annas, a pair of Bullocks could now earn on the Tram-way, Rupees 4, annas 8, per diem.

POETRY.

—000—

VIGILS.

(Communicated by a Friend to the Bengal Catholic Herald.)

Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning: And ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord, when he will return from the wedding:

Blessed are those servants, whom the lord, when he cometh, shall find watching;

And if he shall come in the second watch, or come in the third watch, and find them so, blessed are those servants. Luke xii., 35, 36, 27.

It is the fall of eve!
And the long tapers, now, we light
And watch: for we believe
Our lord may come at night.
An hour—and it is seven,
And fast away the evening rolls:
O, it is dark in heaven,
But light within our souls.
Veni Creator Spiritus!

Hark! the old bell strikes eight!
And still we watch with heart and ear,
For as the hour grows late,
The day star may be near.
Jubilate Deo!

Hark! it is knelling nine!
But faithful eyes grow never dim;
And still our tapers shine,
And still ascends our hymn.
Cum Angelis!

The watchman crieth ten!
My soul, be watching for the Light,
For when he comes again,
'Tis as the thief at night.
Nisi Dominus!

By the old bell—eleven!
Now trim thy lamp and ready stand;
The world to sleep is given,
But Jesus is at hand.
De profundis!

At midnight—is a cry!
It is the bridegroom draweth near Come quickly, Lord, for I
Have long'd thy voice to hear!
Kyrie Eleison!

Could ye not watch one hour?
Be ready; or the bridal train
And bridegroom, with his dower,
May sweep along in vain.
Miserere mei!

By the old steeple—two?
And now I know the day is near!
Watch—for his word is true,
And Jesus may appear!
Dies Iræ!

Three—by the drowsy chime!
And joy is nearer than at first,
O, let us watch the time
When the first light shall burst!
Sursum corda!

Four—and streak of day!
At the cock-crowing he may come;
And still to all I say,
Watch—and with awe be dumb.
Fili David!

Five!—and the tapers now
In rosy morning dimly burn!
Stand, and be girded thou,
Thy Lord will yet return!
Veni Jesu!

Hark! 'tis the matin call!
Oh, when our lord shall come again
At prime or even-fall,
Blest are the wakeful men!
Nunc dimittis.

NOTE.—The Latin sentences are the first words of hymns or psalms supposed to be chanted at the different hours.

—000—

WHIT-SUNDAY.

AN ODE BY THOS. MANUEL OF PATNA.

(For the Bengal Catholic Herald.)

All, all is joy;—no cry, no wails,
The echo of the valley's stir;—
Luxuriant nature smiling hails,
The coming of the Comforter.

II.

In joy the cypress waves its height,
And bend the Palms, exults the fir;
Fair natur's face is beaming bright,
At the coming of the Comforter.

III.

Poor sinners! tho' your Saviour's gone,—
From following him who can deter!
Rejoice!—for you 're not left alone—
He comes,—he comes the Comforter!

IV.

He comes, the Author of all joy,
Of every grace the Theatre;
Sin's wretched building to destroy,
Descends from Heav'n the Comforter.

V.

He comes all vices to remove,
Assassins of all Joys that were;
Urg'd by a high, transcendant love,
He comes from Heav'n the Comforter.

VI.

Rejoice my soul! rejoicing bend!
This joy to every joy prefer;—
God is thy Lord, and Christ's thy Friend
The Holy-Ghost—thy Comforter!

THOS. P. MANUEL.

Patna, 1851.

Selections.

THE RECENT CONVERSIONS.

We have this week to record conversions which indeed witness to the power with which the Catholic Church is now making head in England. The circumstance that St. Saviour's Church, Leeds, was Dr. Pusey's pet institution, the very place selected by him as a standing point from which to "Catholicise" the Anglican Establishment, to serve as a continual specimen to wavers of what really could be done in the Church of England—that of this Church the entire body of the Clergy, excepting one, and the very flower of the laity, have publicly been reconciled to the Catholic Church, is indeed a sign that yet greater events must be at hand. Many of our readers may recal the symptoms which showed even from the first how hopeless was the attempt. Mr. Newman, in the autumn of 1845, had just became a Catholic. Dr. Pusey, Mr. Isaac Williams, Mr. Dodsworth, and others, determined to hold on, St. Saviour's was chosen as the chief parochial seat of Puseyism. It was built at vast expense, defrayed by some good but mistaken person, who, we trust, either has been, or will be, rewarded for his zeal by the grace of conversion. From the very first it was manifest how foreign and how suspected was the element thrown in. In the most trifling things principles were detected by the unerring instinct of an heretical Church. It will be remembered that the very inscription over the church—"Ye who pass by this church, pray" for the sinner who built it—" was actually objected to on the ground that the sinner might die, and then it would be asking a prayer for his soul. Communion-plate of the most gorgeous kind was contributed, and objected to, as inconsistent with the simple worship of the Reformed Church. The objectors were perfectly correct in their perception of the principle involved; but it has taken years for the excellent men who threw themselves into the system to find out that to work the English Establishment on Catholic ideas, is merely pouring new wine into old bottles. They felt themselves in a completely false position, in which the very noblest and holiest principles of their religious existence came at every turn into collision with the essential laws of the very institution to which they had imagined them to belong. They were acting on principles of Catholicity, whilst the Establishment was a thoroughly Protestant institution, hostile to the counsels of perfection. The address of the Protestant Prelates, elsewhere recorded, has doubtless given the finishing stroke to the doubts of a multitude of minds. It has been the cumulus of a great number of events; the Hierarchy, as a solemn decision of the Holy See on the Church affairs of England; the break-up of St. Barnabas; the Gorham affair, &c., &c.; through and over all which has been breathing, like some strong, continuous, and irresistible power, the silent might of the prayers of, we may say, of the whole Catholic world. Ireland, Spain, Germany, France, Italy—all the holy and humble souls in all those countries have been praying for England, and we now perceive that Almighty God has heard those prayers. The Church lifts up her eyes, and beholds souls flocking to her awful and loving bosom, like doves to their windows. First one and then another, till we almost lose count, and, in the midst of the rage of our enemies, joy and exultation pervades the tents of Israel.

Whilst congratulating the Catholic Church on the general conversions, we must not omit to mention in particular the great importance of one of them. The name of Manning has always stood next after that illustrious triumvirate, one of whom, the greatest, has long since brought all the treasures of his learning to the service of our Holy Mother. In some respects we even say that Mr. Manning has commanded a yet greater influence than Dr. Pusey or Mr. Keble. Whilst Dr. Pusey has been the idolised guide of a small party of very sincere and blindly devoted followers, whom he has influenced by the charm of a particular sort of spirituality, purely subjective, hostile to reasoning, deeply tinged by individual heresy, Mr. Manning has really attempted to work the English Establishment on Catholic principles in a high and important official position. We see in what he did all that a great Ecclesiastical functionary in that Establishment could do. His singular capacity for business and knowledge of the world, gave him advantages which no other chief of the Tractarian movement enjoyed for carrying out Catholic principles so far as they could be carried out in the Established Church. None of the three other leaders approached him for possessing, at once the complete confidence of the Catholicising party, and the high respect of the opposite faction. If any man, therefore, could have restored unity and rebuild that house of sand, he could have done it. "Si Pergama dextrâ." But even Manning, with all his great position (as Archdeacon of Chichester), his important connexions (as brother-in-law to the Bishop of Oxford), his prudence, his eloqnence, his remarkable aptitude for and acquaintance with affairs, his forbearance, his patience, and his holiness, has at last felt that he could do nothing; that the Church of England is Protestant, and Protestant it will remain; that it is not the Church of Augustine and Anselm, but of Cranmer and Burnet; that if men wish to be Catholics, they must have recourse to the Chair of Peter—to the Roman unity. There alone shines forth all the fulness of truth. But whilst we thus congratulate our readers on this important accession of one of the leading minds of the Anglican Establishment, we shall hardly have done our duty as journalists or as Catholics if we did not say something on the great, the heroic sacrifices this man has made for the sake of Catholic truth. He has given up all that is most dear to that lofty ambition which forms the peculiar temptation of minds of the noblest mould. A position exactly suited to his talents, of widely extended influence, and a splendid future; the favour of great men, and the almost certainty (had he preferred it to his conscience) of ultimately carrying out his views as Bishop; the devoted adherence of troops of friends; an abode as fair as any of those we see scattered over England, and occupied by her Ministers, fortunate in this world's goods; an abode amid calm streams and green woody hills, with that ancient village church, in its present state almost the creation of his genius and cultivated taste—all this, and far more, Mr. Manning has given up with a great heart, generous and liberal to Almighty God, who has been so liberal of graces to him, counting all as nothing, so he may fight for the Holy Catholic Church, now that he has seen her star in the distance. He has not, like others,' pointed out the way to Bethlehem, and then refused to go thither himself. Let Catholics give praise to Almighty God, who has given such grace to the children of the stranger; let those who have ever been of the household of Faith value their Faith the more, and take shame to themselves that they have valued it so little, when they see others, not born to that liberty, purchase it at a price so great. And let us all go forward in that holy crusade of prayer, once ridiculed but now triumphant and before long England will, indeed, with all her people, be restored to Catholic unity, and be a chief instrument in accomplishing the great purposes of Providence in the long history and mighty conflicts of future ages of the Church.—Tablet, April 12.

THE PETER'S ANNA COLLECTION.

R. P. D. JOANNI FENNELLY,

Epo. Castorien. Vic. Apo. Madras. Madraspatanum

ILLME ET RME DNE.

Ut primum litteras Amplitudinis Tuæ die 13 Decembris elapsi anni datas una cum cambialibus litteris, pro summa quadraginta quinque librarum sterlingarum seu 1125 fran. gallic. accepimus, eas Bmo Patri ac Dno Nostro Pio PP. IX exhibendas curavimus. Paterno autem singularique cordis affectu sanctitas sua benigne excepit filialis hujusmodi devotionis et obsequii pignus istius civitatis ac finitimorum oppidorum fidelium quæ pergrati sui animi significationes per Amplitudinem Tuam testari jussit, iisdemque peramanter Apostolicam benedictionem tribuit.

Non sine maxima vero cordis commotione perlegit Sanctus Dnus, quæ ab Aptne Tua in hac præsentis anni collectione evenisse narrantur inter Christianos in silvis dispersos, præsertim de rudi quodam et indocto inter illos, qui peculiari sane simplicitate et amore de Smi Patris valetudine ac statu nuncia exquirens munere quadraginta octo rupiarum collectas auxit.

Lubentissime porro sanctitas sua votis Christiani memorati annuens certiorem eum, si fieri possit, facias vellet, Sacrosanctum pro eo Missae Sacrificium Die 28 Januarii obtulisse, cæterisque amantissimis filiis istis fausta quæque ac cœlestia dona a D. O. M. postulasse.

Hisce demum addenda habemus Pontificiæ, qua Sanctus Dnus te peramanter prosequitur, dilectionis testimonia, ac propensæ nostræ voluntatis, cuixe supremum Largitorem rogantes ut Amplitudinem Tuam quitissime servet ac sospitet.

Romæ ex Aedibus S. Cognis de Propa. Fide Die 11 Februari 1851.

Amplitudinis Tuæ. Uti Frater studiosissimus.

T. PH. CARD. FRANSONI PRAEF.
AL. BARNABO a Secretis.

TO THE RIGHT REV. JOHN FENNELLY.

Bishop of Castoria and Vicar Apostolic of Madras, Madras.

MOST ILLUSTRIOUS AND RIGHT REV. LORD.

As soon as we received your Lordship's letter dated the 13th December of last year along with the bill of exchange for the sum of 45£ sterling or 1125 French Franks; we lost no time in forwarding it to our Most Holy Father and Lord, Pope Pius, the 9th. But his Holiness with a paternal and singular affection of heart graciously received the pledge of such filial devotion and respect of the faithful of that city and neighbouring towns, to whom he has ordered the expression of his grateful heart to be conveyed through your Lordship; and he has lovingly imparted to them his Apostolic Benediction.

But his Holiness has read, not without the greatest emotion of heart, what was related by your Lordship concerning the collection of last year amongst the Christians scattered through the jungle, especially of a certain rude and illiterate man amongst them, who with peculiar simplicity and affection inquired after the health and condition of our Most Holy Father, and increased the collection by a present of 48 Rupees.

His Holiness has complied most willingly with the request of that christian, and wishes you to inform him, if you can, that His Holiness offered up the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass for him on the 28th of January, and has begged of Almighty God for the rest of his most loving children all prosperity and heavenly gifts.

To this we have to add the assurance of Pontifical love which His Holiness affectionately entertains for you, and our own good will, earnestly beseeching the supreme bestower of all good gifts, to preserve and prosper your Lordship for a very long time.

Rome from the Halls of the Sacred Congregation De Propaganda Fide, 11th day of February 1851.

Your Lordship's most affectionate Brother.

J. PH. CARD FRANSONI PRAEF.
A. BARNABO, Secy.

[Madras Catholic Expositor, May 1851.]

PIUS THE NINTH.

The leading English journals are rabid to an extent beyond the ordinary, because Pius the Ninth has divested himself of a portion of the power he before possessed, and transferred it to the keeping of English (not Anglican) Roman Catholic Bishops. It is not to be expected that the gentlemen who in fits leaders for the city journals, should be very profoundly versed in the unfashionable dicta of writers upon canonical or international law; neither are we much surprised that the Bishop of London should gladly seize upon any Godsend in the light of a new subject that might divest the public attention from himself—catechised and badgered as the poor man has been for the last year by angry churchwardens and grumbling dissenters. In the evangelical position of the Anglican clergy the matter is a lucky chance. It will supply ample materials during the next six months for the rabid outpourings of the "Roaring Mog" fraternity—the M'Neiles and Stowells will, in their indignation, be the cause of bringing fresh converts to Rome.

But what will be the upshot of all this stupid and unmeaning bigotry? Why a few Catholic Churches may be sacked—nine or ten priests, and a bishop or two, murdered. But in what manner will these excesses, should they occur, solve the question or serve the cause of protestantism? The act of the Pope in erecting Catholic Bishoprics in England, is an act purely spiritual. It is an act which affects those only who are Roman Catholics. It is a conveyance which the wants and wishes of the English Catholics made it expedient for the Pope to grant. So far from being an assumption of power, it is an actual renunciation of a portion of the power he already possessed over the Vicars Apostolic. Before the present change, the English Vicars were directly under the jurisdiction of the Pope; he could "motu proprio" at his will and pleasure recall their faculties. They are now legally constituted Catholic Bishops, with ordinary jurisdiction and vested with canonical rights. A similar change will take place in reference to the subordinate clergy—so that if these writers weighed the matter for a moment, the only charge they could bring against the Pope is that he has abandoned a portion of his absolute spiritual power—and put the machinery of English Catholic Church Government on a footing more in accordance with the wants of Catholics, and of the spirit of the constitution of England. One would really imagine, from the foam and fury of the press, that in appointing an Archbishop, with the title of an English city, the Pope had seized upon the tower, blocked up the Thames, and meditated an attack upon their reverences of all the English Cathedrals. But alas it is no such thing. Not a farthing of revenue, not a single pluralist, will be affected by the move. The Pope has done in England what his predecessors have been doing throughout christendom, from the time of Constantine and Justinian down to the present day. The latter Emperor, when he wished to have his native town Achridus erected into an Archbishopric, was so Romish as to apply to Pope Vigilius. Lord John Russell prefers the Bishop of home manufacture, and sends the pure Anglo-Saxon article to compete with the Roman, to all parts of the world—to New Zealand as well as to Jerusalem. No person dreams of opposing or offering a hindrance to these gentlemen. "George Gibraltar" officiates in Rome, and "Solomon Jerusalem" not having a flock to minister to, sits solitary in the holy city. The Scotch Episcopalians have their Bishops of Brechin, Glasgow, &c., their Deans of Moray, and the Established Church of Scotland does not feel itself aggrieved. In Ireland, the Catholic Church has maintained its hierarchy in despite of all the power of England, yet notwithstanding this, we find that in Sees where there are actual Popish Bishops, their neighbours of the Establishment have contrived to live, and in fifteen or twenty years to amass such a trifling sum as one hundred and twenty thousand pounds. This ought to be a consoling fact for John Bull. In America, as well as in our own Colonies, the Pope has been in the habit of exercising his right to erect Bishoprics, and institute Roman Catholic Bishops, and not only has our government not reclaimed, but Lord Grey has ordered the colonial authorities to acknowledge their jurisdiction over their clergy and people, and to call them by those titles usually given to Bishops by all persons of good breeding in European society. In America, cities vie with each other for the honour and the American government never dreams of overhauling the Pope for his "schismatical conduct." This piece of wisdom belongs, by special privilege, to the Hooks and the Palmers of the Anglican Establishment. The Anglo-Saxon nation overflowing with wealth, possessed as she is of immense power, ought never forget that she owes her civilization, her christianity as well as her hierarchy, as it stands, to a Pope, a predecessor of the present head of the Catholic Church. What has she to gain by quarrelling with the Pope? Joseph the II. of Austria, or Napoleon, if summoned from their graves, could read her a lesson on this subject. As long as Sir Robert Peel lived there was little fear of such an event. But while Lord Palmerston wields her destinies the nation cannot be too cautious. In one short week and England may be involved in a continental war. A quarrel with the Pope in such an event would be exactly what England's bitterest enemies would wish to see her involved in.—Cape Colonist.

CREED OF THE UNIVERSALISTS.

In an excursion I made on the Old colony rail-road. I had the fortune to meet a young, very amiable, and I have no doubt, very sincere Universalist clergyman. He was on his return to his father's house from a preaching tour in Western New York. He described this singular sect as very prosperous and increasing; it numbers twelve hundred churches, seven hundred ministers, and sixty thousand communicants in the States. It is particularly strong in Massachusetts; and as he assured me, many of the Unitarian churches are believed to be tending towards them.

This Universalist body possesses a very large measure of toleration; but he informed me that no exact statement of their doctrines is to be met with in books. They are not digested as yet; they are only in fact beginning now to philosophize their opinions. They have among them men of almost all other sects; all agreeing to make their special doctrines non-essential, and to unite on the ground that all go to heaven together. My informant made morality a condition to the attainment of future happiness, by the belief that each man goes to heaven with the dispositions and relishes he has about him when he leaves the world, and thus is in a more or less fit state for the enjoyment of heaven, occupies a higher or lower position of happiness, according to the life he has led on earth, and takes a longer or shorter time to progress towards the perfect enjoyment of the heavenly life. Thus there are different orders in heaven, different degrees of happiness; and a man's behaviour here may be said in a sense to determine his condition in heaven through all eternity. One can see how upon a foundation of this sort an argument for moral living may be based, and how men may be nominally kept together by it where the charity is so large as to permit them to call by the name of brethren all who hold to their single characteristic opinion.

My accidental acquaintance was of the largest charity. He was well educated and had studied theology three years at Cambridge the best theological school in New England, according to his view; he thought different forms of belief were suited to different men, to different classes, and to different periods: he saw good and found good men among all sects. With this perception of good I perfectly coincided; but when he took the Mormons for his case, and, except polygamy, did not think there was much that was absolutely reprehensible in them, I could not coincide with him. It would have been useless to enter into controversy, but I could not help asking, in connection with his notion of different forms of belief being adapted to different times and classes of people, if he did not hold that there was really any such thing as religious truth at all—if everything was non-essential. But the question elicited nothing.

We diverged into a conversation upon the Mormons and their practice of polygamy. I do not know how far the people on the Salt Lake, now asking for admission into the Union, really practise generally or hold polygamy to be legal. It will be difficult, I should think, in a new country like that, for many of them to obtain more than one wife; but supposing it to be declared legal among the people of the territory of Utah, and they apply next year, after having adopted a State constitution, for admission to the Union, the curious question arises, will Congress admit into the Union a State which practises and legalizes polygamy? I subsequently talked this matter over with other friends in Boston and elsewhere; and there appears little doubt that Congress must admit the State, without any reference to the character of the State laws. The State must profess Republican principles, and that is nearly all the Congress can demand. Every State makes its own laws of divorce, and the whole article of marriage is a matter of State regulation. If the Legislature of Kentucky declared polygamy lawful it would become a domestic institution, as slavery now is. Their Senators and Representatives would bring their harems to Washington with impunity; and if one of the wives eloped to Boston, the husband could reclaim her without doubt as he now does his slave, all the laws of New England against bigamy notwithstanding. An accident of this sort would create as much excitement among the females of the non-polygamous States as the arrest of fugitive Coloured men is now doing among the non-slaveholding States.—Spectator, April 5.

CATHOLIC DEFENCE ASSOCIATION.

A numerous and respectable meeting of the promoters of this association was held on Monday evening, at No. 10, Essex-bridge.

At eight o'clock the chair was taken by the Rev. Dr. Cahill.

The Rev. Chairman said that since their last meeting he had received a letter from one of the most eloquent and patriotic of the Irish members of parliament, expressing his sincere pleasure at finding an association originated for the purpose of defending the Catholic Church against the attacks of its bitter and unrelenting enemies. The letter declared the distinguished writer's anxiety to join their body, and the happiness he would feel in being permitted to attend on whatever day might be selected for its public inauguration. (Hear, hear.) The writer thought that there was wanted the means of a proper expression of Catholic public opinion in Ireland, and therefore it was that he anticipated so much pleasure in being present at so essential a demonstration of Catholic opinion. (Hear, hear.) He (Dr. Cahill) had replied to the excellent writer of the letter, informing him that he was labouring under a mistake in supposing their society to be a political one—that it was simply a religious defensive body, and that they would be most happy to have his co-operation in their projected movement. (Hear, hear.) He (Dr. Cahill) hoped that at this time his fellow-countrymen would lay aside their animosities which had so long, unhappily, divided them, and that the faithful band of Irish representatives who now, more than perhaps at any other period, had been so devoted to their country, would be found ready to aid them. (Hear, hear.)

The Secretary having read the minutes of the last meeting.

Mr. E. W. O'Mahony said it was utterly impossible that they could any longer remain in a supine state while their enemies were assuming the formidable attitude evinced by their conduct of late. (Hear, hear.) He had been struck by reading that day an announcement of the formation, in London, of an Anti-Papal League, to be composed of the leading men of the Houses of Lords and Commons that could be collected for the purpose, of the Bishops and Clergy of the Protestant Church, with those of the separated sects, for although separated amongst themselves on religious matters, they were still united on one point—that of entertaining an inveterate hatred of Catholicity. (Hear hear.) The paper in which he read the paragraph stated that when the principles and regulations of the league were published, they would strike terror to "Popery," for they were more than defensive—they were aggressive. From that spot, however, he told the writer of the statement that the Catholics of Ireland hurled defiance at these Anti-Catholic League men, from the Prime Minister down to the lowest persecuting scavenger to be found. (Loud cheers.) In conclusion, Mr. O'Mahony stated that he had taken the oath of allegiance to her Majesty in the full conviction that to her he bound himself, as he was prepared to do, to defend his sovereign to the utmost. Her Majesty was, in return, bound to preserve to him the free and unrestricted exercise of his religious opinions and duties. (Hear, hear.) That was the compact which had been mutually entered into by the taking of that oath, and, as a lawyer, he knew that where one party to a compact violated it, the other was released from the obligations imposed by it. After some further observations, the learned gentleman concluded amid loud cheering.

The Very Rev. Dr. Spratt, who, on rising, was greeted in the warmest manner, briefly expressed the sincere gratification he experienced at witnessing the many respectable and devoted Catholics assembled together in order to devise the best means in which they could defend their holy religion. That gratification was much enhanced by seeing the eloquent and indefatigable Dr. Cahill presiding over their praiseworthy proceedings. (Hear, hear.) At the request of several gentlemen present, Dr. Cahill consented to prepare, by Easter Thursday, an address to the Catholics of the empire, calling on them to unite with the association in the furtherance of their great objects. The Rev. gentleman was warmly applauded.

After the transaction of some routine business, the association adjourned to Easter Tuesday night, by which time arrangements are to be made to secure a large and effective demonstration.—Freeman.

MEATH-STREET SCHOOLS—REV. DR. CAHILL.

On Sunday last Dr. Cahill preached the annual charity sermon at Meath-street, to a most crowded congregation. Towards the conclusion of the sermon the Reverend preacher alluded to the charity nearly as follows:—"I regret that on the present occasion we have not the advantage of the presence of your distinguished Parish Priest; and I am certain I but speak the universal feeling of this parish when I say that the ardent and affectionate prayers of every one before me are addressed to the throne of God for the speedy recovery of Doctor Laphen. He was my companion in College; and from that hour to this day I have had the happiness of maintaining, without interruption, the matured friendship of this valued companion. No one ever came within the sphere of his acquaintance who did not love him. He was no less distinguished in College by the universal admiration than he has been in Dublin by the public regard. The zeal, and the talents, and the piety, which distinguished his missionary labours, and render him an ornament to the Church, make it doubly imperative on us here this day to implore Heaven to restore him to perfect health, and to strengthen him still farther by grace for the discharge of the lofty duties of his sacred and responsible office. The first sermon I delivered in Dublin was in this church; and although the 'Liberties' where I now stand were wretched enough in that day, they exceed in point of present destitution, any idea that could be then framed of the decay of this part of the city. How little the foreign nations that will visit 'the world's fair' in London can imagine that the greatness and the wealth of the first city of Great Britain could have such a counterpart in the poverty and the miseries of the first city in Ireland; and little can they think that the inhabitants of London can have such fellow-subjects as the people of the Dublin Liberties—and little could they believe that the laws which feed one city into distressing corpulency could starve another city into almost an invisible skeleton. Oh! what a contrast in the trade and the circumstances of these twin cities, united by the ties of common country, and the laws of an imperial union; but any one anxious to read the commentary on the sisterhood of England and Ireland, has only to compare the Crystal Palace with the unroofed Liberties—one the mart of the world; the other the seat of disease, poverty, and death—one the fashionable resort of all nations; the other the putrid spot from which all save the naked, broken-hearted poor, fly in terror—one the storehouse of all works of English art; the other the plundered ruins of Irish industry—one the favourite spot of England's care; the other the hated desert of English devastation. The sanguinary passage of an English army has never made such desolation in any country as the legislation of the Union has produced in this wretched waste! Oh! if one of the tottering houses of this district, one of the idle, rotting looms of the naked silk-weaver, with the skeleton family of the starving tradesman, could be placed within the Crystal Palace amongst the Exhibition of all Nations, it would speak to the foreigners of the world, in a language more eloquent than words, the injustice of England to Irish commerce, and the terms of the contract by which she has fulfilled her engagement towards this ill-fated country. And, as if to annihilate every remnant of the national character, Lord John Russell would not only unroof your houses, and strip you naked, and starve you into an existence nearer to death than to real life, but he wishes also to reach the soul, and to rob you of the only consolation you possess in this world in the free exercise of your ancient faith."

Nothing could exceed the deep sensation produced on the vast congregation by the eloquence of the Reverend preacher's appeal.

Of the result no more need be said that the sum realised for the charity on the moment has exceeded even the most sanguine hopes of the benevolent protectors of these noble schools.—Freeman.

THE BISHOPS' ADDRESS TO THE CLERGY.

(From the Examiner, April 12)

Four-and-twenty Prelates all of a row, tuning their instruments to concord, is undoubtedly a pretty sight, but is it not what the French would designate as an anachronism? Ten years ago, or even five years ago, when one of the four-and-twenty, the Bishop of London, was giving sanction and encouragement to Puseyism this episcopal counsel might have been seasonable and suitable but, since then the unchecked schism has obtained such head and hold, that to it the language of mild expostulation is something worse than idle, implying, as it necessrily does, that the heads of the Church find themselves in the last extremity, with no resource but entreaty.

Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis,
Tempus eget.

The pith of the Bishops' address is the following recommendation:—

We would beseech all who, whether by excess or defect, have broken in upon the uniformity and contributed to relax the authority of our ritual observances, to consider the importance of unity and order, and by common consent to avoid whatever might tend to violate them. In recommending this course as the best under present circumstances we do not shut our eyes to the evil of even the appearance of any discrepancy existing between the written law and the practice of the Church. But there are many cases where the law may be variously interpreted; and we believe that we are best carrying out her own principles in urging you to have recourse, in all such cases, to the advice of her chief pastors.

So Mr. Gorham, having doubts respecting the interpretation of a law, is to repair to the Bishop of Exeter for direction; and a Puseyite parson in the see of Norwich is to apply for advice to the orthodox bishop of that diocese. Quot homines tot sententiæ; and amongst these twenty-four Bishops there are as many differences as minds. The Bishops of Norwich is at one end of the gamut, the Bishop of Oxford is a note in all at the other. Every shade of diversity is to be found in the four-and-twenty preachers of union and conformity. When, then, they condemn irregularities, and recommend uniformity, they remind us of the crabmother's lesson to her daughter, in Lafontaine, and of the young lady's natural reply:

'Comme tuvas, bon Dieu! ne peux-tu marcher droit'?
'Et comme vous allez vous-même? dit la fille:
'Puis-je autrement marcher que ne fait ma famille;
'Tout-on que j'aille droit quand on y va tortu'?

Before the four-and-twenty Bishops require uniformity of the clergy they are bound to agree amongst themselves. They have no right to say "Go to your Bishop for the standard of observance," till the Bishops have settled amongst themselves what the standard is to be. Is it reasonable to expect an evangelical parish clergyman to conform to the doctrine and practice of a Tractarian Bishop, or a Puseyite to defer to a Calvinistic Prelate, while each sees, perhaps, in the next diocese, right and left, the opposite tenets ascendant? Mr. Gorham might be in peace and orthodoxy in Norwich, and Mr. Bennet might have intoned, gesticulated, and preached the Popery of Oxford undisturbed in the see of Exeter. A see may be to-day under a rigid Calvinists, and to-morrow it may pass under the government of a Puseyite divine, and the clergy, which have conformed to the one extreme are to conform to the other, and this is to be "the harmony of action, which, under God's blessing, is to go far towards restoring the peace of the Church."

If the advice of the Bishops were followed, the clergy of every diocese would only faithfully represent the diversity of doctrine and views which prevails amongst the Bishops. There would be more uniformity in such a case than there is agreement between Exeter and Norwich, London and St. David's, Oxford and York. There would, in fact, be a different Church of England in every diocese, some more, some less strongly marked with the shade of High Church and Low Church, Evangelism and Romanism. Selden said that the principles of equity varied as much as the length of the Chancellors' feet. The standard of uniformity in the Church of England and Wales varies with the views of twenty-eight Bishops, no two of whom have ever yet been found, on a controverted point of doctrine or discipline, in exact agreement.

And while the Bishops were penning this weak address of entreaty, seven clergymen of Leeds, followers of Doctor Pusey, were going over to Rome! And does any one believe that the admonitions of the Bishops will have the slightest effect in arresting this apostasy? The Tractarians, it is to be observed, are in earnest, much more in earnest than their monitors; most of them have passed from the extreme of Low Church Evangelism to Tractarianism, and have the stubborn faith acquired in such transitions, vires acquirit eundo; and it is to the last degree childish to suppose that these zealots, all whose tenets pamper presumption, will be influenced by exhortations to bow to authority quand même. The obedient did not require the lesson of obedience, and the disobedient will despise it and persevere.

MISSIONS OF THIBET.

Extracts from a Letter of Rev. Dr. Huc Apostolic Missioner in China, to the Rev. Dr. Etienne, Superior General of Saint Lazarus, at Paris.

SOJOURN AT LASSA.

(Continued from our last.)

We slept on these thoughts; our slumbers were light and often broken. As soon as the first dawn of day appeared, the doors of the cell opened quietly, and we saw the governor of the Katchis enter: he came and sat down by our sides, between both couches, and inquired from us in a benevolent and affectionate tone if we had passed a good night: he then offered us a small basket of cakes, made by his family, and dried fruit from Ladak. This mark of attention affected us deeply: it was like meeting a sincere and devoted friend.

The governor of the Katchis was thirty years of age. His noble and dignified figure was likewise indicative of goodness and frankness highly capable of attracting our confidence. His looks, words, manners, all seemed to convey to us the lively interest he took in us. He had come to make us aware of what would take place during the day regarding us. "During the morning," said he to us, "the Thibetian executive will repair to your residence, seal up all your effects, and then convey them to the tribunal, where they will be examined in your presence by the regent and Chinese ambassador. If you have not autograph geographical maps in your trunks, you may be at your ease, you will be left in peace; if, on the contrary, you have such, you would do well to inform me before hand, because we might, in that case, find means of extricating you I am in close connexion with the regent" (we could, indeed, perceive that easily the night before during supper); "he himself commissioned me to come and confide this matter to you. .....He then added, lowering his tone, that all these annoyances sprang from the Chinese, against the will of the Thibetian government. We replied to the governor of the Katchis that we had no autograph geographical map; we detailed all the things in our two trunks. "As they are to be inspected to day, you will judge yourself whether we are people deserving of credit when we advance anything." The mussulman's figure shrunk: "Your words," said he to us, "completely satisfy me; among the objects you have spoken to me of, there is nothing that can compromise you. Geographical maps are greatly dreaded in this country. The greatest fear of them exists since a certain Englishman, named Moorcroft, introduced himself to Lassa, where he contrived to pass for a Cashmerian. After sojourning there for twelve years, he went away; but he was assassinated on the way to Ladak. Among his effects there was found a numerous collection of geographical maps and sketches which he made during his sojourn at Lassa. This event has rendered the Chinese authorities very suspicious on this subject. Since you do not frame geographical maps, all is well; I shall go and report to the regent what you have stated to me.

(To be continued.)

JOURNAL OF A TOUR IN FRANCE.

By Thos. W. Allies, M. A.*—p. 350, late Rector of Launton and now a Convert to the Catholic Faith.

Grand Distinctive Characteristics of the True Church.

INTRODUCTION.

Of the vast number of English men and English women who have travelled on the Continent in late years, comparatively few, I imagine, have deemed it worth their while to give much thought and attention to the action of the Church in the countries they have visited. Doubtless all have entered the material fabrics of Roman Catholic worship, but generally it has been to treat them as public monuments, rather than as "the house of prayer for all nations." But how many of those travellers who enjoy leisure and independence have made it their study to understand those manifold institutions for the education of the clergy or the laity, for the consolation of the suffering, for the instruction of the poor and outcast, or for the advancement of the interior life, by which the Church christianises the world, and lays hold of the heart of humanity? I am not now expressing an opinion whether the whole Roman system be true or false, pure or corrupt; I am looking at it simply as a fact. And in this view, perhaps, there is no object on the face of the earth so worthy of contemplation by the thoughtful mind as the Roman Church. As an English Church-man, I do not think it truthful, honest, christian, or safe, to shut my eyes to such a fact existing in the world. It seems to me that one ought to endeavour to understand it. Those who strive to rekindle ancient animosities, those who take not the trouble to understand doctrines as taught by their professors, but wilfully misconceive and mistate them, those even who rest contented in a state of separation, do they not sin against Him, who in the days of His humiliation prayed to His Father, "that they all may be one, as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in Us; that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me." Do they in the least realise the fact that the Church of England considers the Church of Rome to be quite as truly a part of the Church Catholic as she is herself?

* * * * * * * *

The only merit of the following journal, if it have any, is the attempt to see things as they are in the Roman Catholic system; to put off all preconceived prejudices, not condemning that which is contrary to what one is accustomed to meet, but endeavouring to understand the principle on which it rests. It is nearly restricted to France, but perhaps that country is for more than one reason the most interesting part of the Roman Catholic communion at present. There the divorce, which all the governments of Christendom are now enacting on the Church, has been accomplished with the most harshness, contumely, and tyranny. The ample estates surrendered by the French clergy, in noble reliance on the generosity of their country, have been taken possession of by the state, which, admitting that the vast majority of its people are Catholic at least in profession, has recompensed this surrender by a grant to the clergy, yearly repeated, not a dotation once for all, and that in amount so unspeakably mean and inadequate, that every Frenchman of honor and feeling must blush for his country as he thinks upon it. The immense majority of curés throughout France receive from the state a stipend of 32*l.* a year, in larger populations this is extended to 40*l.* in the largest of all to 60*l.* Moreover, in France the state has done or is doing, what in England it will also do if it can; it sets up in every parish a schoomaster without a creed, to teach children all kinds of useful knowledge, from which only a definite creed is excluded, and to be an antagonist to the clergyman in his proper sphere. Thus the existing generation of Frenchmen has been brought up since the tide of infidelity swept over their land; in too many cases they are not only infidels in present practice, but even their childish thoughts and associations were not Christian. The full harvest of the terrible convulsion of 1789 is being repeated—alas, it is far from being yet gathered in! Infidelity not only stalks openly through the land, but bears open sway in it. There is nothing on which all those with whom I spoke were more agreed than that "le respect humain" was against the Church and against religion. What a fact is this alone whereby to estimate the state of a country. If "hypocrisy be the homage which vice pays to virtue," where stands that country whose public opinion requires no hypocrisy in the open profession of unbelief? For these and other reasons, then I conceive that the Church of God is best seen in France working by her own intrinsic powers, not only unaided by the world, but most cruelly afflicted by it, and so externally oppressed and degraded, that nothing but the irrepressible life of the Gospel could penetrate and leaven society under such conditions. God grant that such a state of things be not preparing in England—and if it be, God grant likewise that the Church, in the day of her need, may have servants and handmaidens, priests, teachers, and sisters of charity, as disinterested, laborious, patient, and zealous, as He has raised up for her in France. This further may be said, that, if France as a nation be ever brought afresh under the yoke of her Saviour, no condition of human society need be despaired of; nor the capacity of the Church of Christ to overcome any amount of obstacles doubted.

* This was written whilst Mr. Allies was yet a Protestant.

Of course the institutions mentioned in this journal are but samples of a multitude. None will feel more than the writer its great incompleteness. Still this is a field of observation which has been little worked; so that the mere partial breaking of its surface may produce fruit.

It may be as well to put together here the five congregations in France mentioned in different places of the journal, which are engaged in missionary work. They are "la Congregation des Prêtres de la Mission," or, "les Pères Lazaristes," Rue de Sèvres, 95.; the "Séminaire des Missions Etrangères," Rue du Bac, 120.; the "Congrégation des Sacrés Cœurs" (Séminaire de Picpus), Rue Picpus, 9.; the Jesuits, and the Maristes. The "Congrégation du Saint Esprit," for forming priests for the colonies, Rue des Postes, 26. I did not visit. These, with the "Congrégation de la Miséricorde," form all the French missionary establishments. I think no one can give even a transient look at the course of life pursued by the St. Sulpiciens for the education of the clergy, without admiration of the astonishing care of the interior life taken by them, and the pains they are at to ascertain the due vocation for so special a work.

The chief establishments of the Church for education are the grands séminaires in each diocese, for preparation for holy orders; and the petits séminaires, both under the direction of the bishops, the latter receiving boys for all sorts of professions. In these two classes of establishments alone, as a general rule, is strict attention paid to the religious training of the pupils. The royal colleges, which extend all over France, have been by all described to me as in the most corrupt moral condition, and as suffering their professors to instil systematic infidelity into their pupils. Of course the vast majority of the youth of the country is educated in these colleges. The result is seen in their lives. For the female sex, the chief congregations devoted to education are "Les Dames du Sacré Cœur," in Paris, Rue de Varennes; "Les Dames de Notre Dame" (couvent des Oiseaux, Rue de Sévres); "Les Dames de la Visitation." Each has a great number of houses through France and elsewhere. For the poorer classes, "Les Fréres de la Doctrine Chrétienne," and the various sisters of charity, are of incalculable benefit; they are very numerous, and widely spread. Their disinterested and loving labours would be the greatest of blessings to our parish priests, engaged in conflict with a hard practical heathenism on the one side, and on the other, with various forms of dissent, the essence of which may be said to consist in a complete negation of the Church's office in the scheme of redemption, and, generally, of all objective belief beyond the sacrifice of our Lord for the sins of men, and the operation of the Holy Spirit.

It will be seen throughout, that I do not consider non-appreciation of the good in the Roman Catholic faith and practice a necessary ingredient of the English Churchman's character. I am quite convinced that the reunion of the English Church with the Church of Rome would be an incalculable blessing to the whole Church of God, and to the whole human race. Whoever made the separation, we need not despair of such a reunion; the right accomplishment of which good persons, on both sides, may earnestly hope and pray for.

(To be continued.)

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one F[illegible] one Baptism.'

No. 25] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JUNE 21, 1851. [VOL. XX

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, June 21, 1851.

UNJUST CONDUCT OF THE PROTESTANT PRESS TOWARDS CATHOLICS AND CATHOLICITY.

CREED OF THE UNIVERSALISTS.

In our preceding issue, we gave insertion to an article copied from the Spectator, a London Protestant Journal, on the 'Creed of the Universalists.' The first thing that struck us upon the perusal of the article we refer to, was the singularly calm and courteous manner, in which both the Correspondant of the Spectator, as well as its Editor, discoursed upon the extraordinary Religious System of the Universalists. Assuredly, we said to ourselves, if a sect, such as the Universalists, whose Members are at full liberty to reject at their own pleasure any one or more doctrines of Christianity, whether appertaining to Faith or Morality, be treated with such indulgence, an equal measure of liberality must be dealt out to Catholics, whose Creed proclaims, as necessary for Salvation, both all the mysteries involved in the belief of Man's Redemption by an Incarnate God, and all the moral precepts enjoined by the Saviour on his followers.

But however just this inference might be in theory, daily experience shows but too clearly, that, in effect, the result is practically the very reverse. Of the numerous English Protestant Journals which the Press pours forth every day, there is hardly one, if even one, in which, whilst Error and Infidelity of every species, however dangerous to the Christian Code of Faith or morals, are treated of in a kindly and palliating tone, the doctrine and discipline of the Catholic Church, the conduct of her Clergy, Religious, and the pious among her Laity, as well as the character of her most Holy and Beneficent Institutions are unceasingly misrepresented, traduced and vilified by writers, who are recklessly ignorant of the subjects they handle, or, as there is often too much reason to think, are so carried away by an envenomed spirit of hostility against Catholicity, as not to scruple to gratify their hatred of it, even at the expense of the known truth.

If so unworthy a course of conduct, as we have described, were adopted only by uneducated or notoriously worthless characters, the malignity of the poison would carry with it its own antidote. But when truth and justice and charity are thus habitually violated, by men otherwise commendable and respectable in Society, the injury done to Catholics and their Religion is rendered grievous and almost irreparable.

And yet we grieve to state it, it is by Journalists, in many respects of estimable reputation, that the injuries we complain of are ordinarily inflicted. In the private relations of life, many of these writers are amiable and benevolent characters, and they not rarely number among their most valued personal Friends, edifying Members of the Catholic Communion.

Whence then does the perverse inconsistency of their public and private character originate? Alas! from the very same principle, to which we have to trace the opposition, that is so often found between the avowed belief and the practical conduct of certain Catholics. An undue [illegible] to human respect, to worldly interests, and the influence of certain social or political connections. "Video meliora, proboque, deteriora sequor." The unhappy man, we speak of, are not unfrequently the creatures of circumstances; they are often as Penmen employed for their own support and that of their Families, to obey the chord which is pulled by an unseen powerful Agent, whose principles and policy, they, if free to do so, would openly reject and execrate.

We regret to add, that the remarks we have here advanced, are applicable not only to the Press in England, but also in India, and very particularly to that portion of it, which is in Calcutta. It is only necessary for a contemptible apostate Mongrel Penny-a-liner, who is of himself unable to speak or write two sentences of plain English, or one sentence of common sense, to furnish, in the discharge of his dirty vocation, to the Newspaper he may pander for, a meudacious burlesque narrative of a Catholic Sermon or Solemnity, and his report is sure to appear next day in all its lying deformity in the Columns of that Journal.

Oh! but of course the respectable Editor, or assuredly, at least, the Proprietor will on being appealed to, interpose at once, and order a contradiction of the false report to be forthwith published and a suitable apology tendered to the injured party. No such thing. We know that the experiment has been tried with respect to one Calcutta Journal, and that it was only when the case complained of, was forgotten or had lost all public interest, that a sort of stingy and very inadequate unsatisfactory reparation was reluctantly offered.

A few weeks since, the leading Calcutta Journals, we believe without any exception, copied from some of the English Newspapers a pathetic account of a Nun, who was represented to have, after many previous disappointments, at length effected her escape from the Convent at Northampton, and after having encountered various Romantic incidents, found at length a friendly shelter and Asylum in the house of a Dissenting Minister.

The instant in which this fabrication was published in a Northampton Newspaper, prompt measures were at once taken by the Catholic Chaplain of the Convent, both to establish the utter falsehood of the narrative in every single particular, and to discover the author of so base and atrocious a libel. For these purposes, the Priest tendered to a Magistrate of Northampton an Affidavit, in which he offered to contradict on oath every statement and insinuation contained in the libel. On the grounds, that he was forbidden by law, to receive such an Affidavit, the Magistrate declined to swear the Clergyman as to the truth of his statement. The Priest then waited on the Conductor of the Paper in which the Libel was published, and this Gentleman at once expressed his regret for having given insertion to it, promised to publish the Priest's solemn and well sustained contradiction of each particular assertion, but refused to give up the Author of the Libel; days however passed away and yet the Editor's promise remained unfulfilled, and to the Clergyman's repeated applications, nothing more than a polite answer was returned, renewing the Editor's assurance that the contradiction would at a convenient time appear in his Journal. The gross and unfounded fabrication we treat of, appeared, as we have premised, in the leading Journals of Calcutta, and yet, though the Steamer which arrived here on the 2nd or 3rd Instant brought out the express public contradiction of every iota contained in it, not one of the Papers which gave ready insertion to the falsehood here, had the honor or honesty, to compensate for the pain they took in disseminating the calumny, by publishing in their Columns its contradiction.

Indeed the only thing that, as it seems to us, ought to occasion surprise to any sensible person, Protestant, or Catholic is, that any contradiction of so obvious a calumny should be deemed necessary, on account we suppose of the present diseased state of mind of a portion of the Protestant Public. There is not we believe a single Monastic or Conventual Institution in the United Kingdom, which is not constantly, indeed we might almost say, daily visited not only by respectable Lay Catholics, but also by Protestants of the same rank in Society, very much because all these Institutions have invariably attached to them educational establishments either for the rich or the poor, or Orphanages, or Asylums for Servants, or for the Deaf and Dumb, or Hospitals, or Alms-Houses for distributing general relief to the distressed. In all these cases, the Benevolent Protestants and Catholics of each Vicinity, in which one or other of these invaluable Institutions exists, are found always to unite together in lending their patronage and co-operation towards promoting its welfare, and as a necessary consequence, they are thus brought into frequent contact with the Members of each Community, and become familiarly acquainted with its arrangements. In short, once that they are known as persons who take an interest in the Schools or Institutions administered by the Community, they are regarded without religious distinction as personal friends by every Member of it, and in return for their exertions for the public good, the friendship of the Community ordinarily extends to and embraces the whole range of their respective families.

We can add with sincere pleasure, that all that we here affirm to be of ordinary occurrence at home, is illustrated to a gratifying extent in the Religious Institutions, which have been established amongst us, and we feel confident, that in proportion as the worth of these Institutions becomes better known, it will be appreciated by none more fully, than by the higher and more enlightened portion of the Protestant Community. On account of the length to which this article has extended itself, we shall reserve for another occasion, the remarks we had intended to offer on the Creed of the Universalists.

Just as we were about to conclude these remarks, we received the Hurkaru of the 17th instant, from which we copy another painful and disgraceful instance of the utter disregard of a large portion of the Protestant Press to the dictates of justice, charity or truth, when there is an opportunity of reviling Catholic Institutions. In this instance at least, the slanderers are likely to receive the just punishment of their guilt:—

[Copied from the Hurkaru.]

THE NUNNERY AT CLAPHAM.

(From the Home News, May 7.)

THE QUEEN v. SCOTT.

Mr. Serjeant Shee (with whom was Mr. John Scott) said, he was instructed to move for a rule to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against Mr. David Scott, the printer and publisher of the Morning Advertiser newspaper, for certain libels published in that paper on the 12th and 20th of March last. He made this application upon the affidavits of certain residents at Clapham, some 20 ladies, who since 1843 had been members of a religious institution and establishment called the Convent of Notre Dame, in Bedford-lane, Clapham: of two clergymen, who stated themselves to be the sole spiritual directors and advisers of the said community; and of two medical gentlemen who were surgeons at Clapham, who stated themselves to be the usual medical attendants of the said community, and of certain scholars who were resident there, receiving an education from the members of the community. He read first the affidavits of the Rev. R. Simpson, of 1, Nelson-terrace, Clapham-common, and John Coldicutt Dell, of 6, Hammon-terrace, Mauge-street, Clapham, who stated that there had been for the last 18 months in Bedford-lane, Clapham-road, a certain religious institute, community, and establishment consisting of females, and within the meaning of the statute of 10th George IV. chap. 7, and which community was called by the name of the Convent of Notre Dame. They stated that the Morning Advertiser of the 12th of March contained the following libel:—

"A New paper of Nuns.

"We understand there is very great, and it is to be hoped unusual, excitement has just taken place in the convent on the south side of the Thames, in the vicinity of a well-known common. To the surprise and consternation of the sisterhood a novelty suddenly appeared among them the other day in the shape of a 'sister' of infantile age, or, more properly speaking, of no age at all. What added to the interest of the circumstance was the fact of the 'novice' not having entered the convent either by the door, the window, or the chimney. It ought to be mentioned that the usual process of taking the veil was dispensed with on this occasion. The nun made her appearance without ceremony of any kind, and amidst sounds made by herself which ill accorded with the silence of the place. For further particulars we must refer to the medical gentleman, who, instead of the priest, assisted in the introduction of the interesting stranger into the convent and into the world at the same time. It is difficult to say whether the surprise or the scandal be the greater, at the institution of this new order of the sisterhood."

And the deponents stated, that in the Morning Advertiser of the 20th of March there appeared another libel of and concerning the said institute and establishment, professing to be the report of a speech delivered by Mr. Edward Turner at a public meeting of the Protestant inhabitants of the borough of Southwark, held at a certain house called the Bridge-house Hotel, to petition Parliament for a——fectual bill of protection against the designs of Popery:—

"The speaker, after referring to the mischievous results of the 'conventual' (thereby meaning conventual) system, as exhibited in the case of a young lady of the Beverly family, of large property, who has been shut up in a nunnery by the Earl and Countess of Shrewsbury, adverted to the demoralising nature of these institutions. He had heard, on good authority, the case of a childbirth in a nunnery at Clapham. At first the report was declared to be utterly devoid of truth, but it was now said that it was a stranger who had been attended by a medical man, and not one of the inmates."

The deponents stated their belief that the libels were published of and concerning the establishment in Bedford-lane, and were intended to insinuate and assert that a member of the religious community had given birth to a bastard child, and that immoralities had been and were practised within the precincts of the said establishment, and that the libels were false and unfounded in fact. He then had the affidavit of Clarissa Noel, who stated herself to be the sister superior of the said religious establishment, and she gave an account of the establishment of this convent from September, 1845, and she gave the names of all the members of the community at the time of her making the affidavit, and of all persons who at any time had been members of the said community, and she most positively denied that there was any truth or foundation for the insinuations contained in such libels. He had then the affidavits of the 19 ladies who were now resident in the convent, and they also expressly denied that there was any ground for the imputations. He had also the affidavits of Josephine Lagresse, sister superior of the convent of Notre Dame at Blackburn; of Iphigenie de Paris, sister superior of the convent at Liverpool. These ladies had been inmates of the convent at Clapham, and their affidavits were to the same effect as those already referred to. Then there were the affidavits of the Rev. Frederick Held and the Rev. Louis de Buggenom, who were the sole spiritual advisers of the establishment, to the same effect. He had then the affidavits of John Parrott, surgeon, and Edward Taylor, surgeon apothecary, and they stated that had been surgeons attending the establishment, and they believed the imputation to be false and unfounded. Mr. Justice Coleridge said the learned serjeant was entitled to his rule, but nothing was said with regard to the scholars as to their ages; he would suggest whether it might not make the affidavits more complete. Mr. Serjeant Shee said that should be done. Rule granted.

A similar rule for libel was granted against the Morning Herald.

DISTRICT CHARITABLE SOCIETY.

The People's Friend referring in an Editorial to the remarks contained in our last issue, inadvertantly, no doubt, ascribes to us an accusation against the District Charitable Society much stronger, than that which we preferred. Our charge, which we repeat, is, that the present composition of that Society does not and cannot impart confidence to the poor of the Catholic community, and in proof, we added, that there exists a general and, in the present state of things, a very natural impression among the Catholic Poor, that the success of an application made for relief, would be endangered if not destroyed, were it to transpire, that the applicant was a Catholic. Without enquiring whether this impression be just or unjust, we repeat it, the Catholics of Calcutta have an undoubted right to be satisfied, that the Charitable Bequests of their fellow-religionists, which constitute by far the greater part of the Legacy Funds of the District Society should be administered by a body so constituted, as to leave no reasonable cause to doubt of the strict impartiality of the Distributors.

We claim for every other portion of the Community, without Religious distinction, the same measure of justice, which we demand for our Fellow-Catholics, and we think that the shortest and most effectual mode to effect a remodelling of the District Society would be that each Class of the Community, which feels aggrieved by the present arrangement and constitution of the District Society, should present a distinct Petition to Government on the subject, and call for its interposition to remedy the evils so justly complained of. It seems to us most especially, that each Class of the Calcutta Community, by any Member of which a Bequest of any moment now administered by the District Charitable Society was made for the benefit of the poor amongst us, has strong grounds to solicit the interference of Government in favor of the impartial dispensation of that Bequest, in such a way, as will evince a due regard to the Poor of that Religion, to which the Testator belonged.

It is undoubtedly in the power of Government to control instantaneously and effectually the District Society, and insist on its reconstruction on such principles as will prove satisfactory to every reasonable person of every Creed. Nothing short of this will or ought to satisfy those, who are concerned in this important subject. If the present administrators be really impartial towards the poor of all Creeds in the exercise of their trust, they cannot reasonably object to have their Society reconstructed in such a way, as will afford honorable testimony to their administration. If, on the other hand, things, as they now are, unfortunately present an unfavorable aspect, it is the duty of every good man to unite in labouring to effect an immediate reformation of them.

TRINITY SUNDAY, CHURCH OF THE SACRED HEART, DURUMTOLLAH.

On Sunday last, the 15th instant, the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic administered the Sacrament of Confirmation to seventeen persons, at the Church of the Sacred Heart: one of the Adults who received Confirmation, was a recent Convert from English Protestantism.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

On Sunday next the 22nd instant, the Archbishop will administer Confirmation at 8 o'clock, A. M. at St. Thomas' Church.

—ooo—

INTALLY CONVENT BOARDING SCHOOL, AND FEMALE ORPHANAGE.

On the Feast of Corpus Christi the 19th instant, the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, gave Confirmation to seven Pupils of the above mentioned Institutions, in the Convent Chapel at Intally.

—ooo—

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE MUSEUM.

The Rector of St. John's College begs to return grateful thanks to Francisco Pereira Esq., for his valuable donation to the College Museum of "Thomson's Metallic History of England" and of "Thomson's Grand National Medals," also to Mr. Asphar Jun., for a Collection of Shells, and to Miss Augier for an interesting Collection of Insects; H. Joakim Esq., is also gratefully thanked for his contribution of Insects.

CORRESPONDENCE.

—ooo—

To the Editor of the B. C. Herald.

SIR,—Having just received from America a copy of an English Translation of the celebrated Letters of the illustrious Convert, the Count LE MAISTRE, on the Spanish Inquisition, I beg to send you for publication an extract from them, regarding the atrocious persecution carried on for three centuries against the British and especially the Irish Catholics by Protestant England.

It is some consolation to the descendents of the sufferers to find, that in every region of the new and old world, their ancestors are held up to the admiration of Christendom, whilst infamy and execration loud and deep are the just retribution, awarded by outraged humanity to the unhallowed memory of their barbarous Persecutors.

I remain Sir,
Your's &c.
AN IRISH CATHOLIC.

Calcutta, June 20, 1851.

"Infidel Hume, the pensioned libeller of Catholicity, and who sacrificed truth, wherever the religion of Christ was concerned, on the idolatrous altar of the golden calf, upbraids England for practising her inquisitorial cruelty upon the Catholics, whose only crime was their allegiance to the constitution, and to the church which Jesus God established upon earth! He acknowledges that "the whole tyranny of the Inquisition, though without its order, was introduced into the kingdom."

In the reign of the ferocious Elizabeth, "whoever in any way reconciled any one to the Church of Rome, or was himself reconciled, was declared guilty of high treason!!!"

Any person, over sixteen years of age, who refused, for more than a month, to frequent the Protestant service, was put in prison. If he continued obstinate, he was for ever banished from the kingdom; and if, unfortunately, he had returned to see his family, or relieve his family, or relieve his parents, he was executed as a traitor!

CAMPIAN, renowned for science, eloquence, and purity of morals, was martyred in her infernal reign, merely as a missioner, and a comforter of his brethren! Accused by a gang of profligates of having entered into a plot against the queen, he was racked to such a degree of inhumanity, that the jailer, who was an eye-witness to the scene, observed, "This poor man will be soon stretched a half foot longer." Three of his judges, horrified at this brutal injustice, retired, and refused to participate in his judiciary murder.

WALPOLE was likewise condemned and executed! The queen offered him pardon on the scaffold, if he would acknowledge her spiritual supremacy! He of course refused, and was sacrificed.

Who, that is acquainted with history, is ignorant of the horrible cruelties committed in her reign against the CATHOLICS of IRELAND? Who has not heard of the cruelties of Lord, or rather monster, Fitz William? Elizabeth was well acquainted with all this. At the present day, a manuscript letter can be seen in the archives of Trinity College, Dublin, wherein an office named LEE describes these damning cruelties. "They are such," says he, "that we should rather expect to find them in the history of a Turkish province, than in that of an English province." "And yet," adds the learned Camden, "Elizabeth did not believe that the greatest part of those unfortunate priests, thus butchered by the tribunals, were guilty of any crime against the country." Amiable woman! In a word, a digest of the laws (if the term can be thus profaned), which were passed against Catholics, and especially against CATHOLIC IRELAND, would form a code of oppression unexampled in the annals of the universe, for robbery, atrocity, perfidy, slaughter, blasphemy, and crime.

BACON, in what he called his Natural History, speaks with perhaps more than becoming gravity of a certain magic ointment: among other ingredients of the singular compound, he mentions the fat of a bear and of a bear, killed during the venereal orgasm; and, moreover, the exudation which is collected from the skull of an unburied human body. He states that it might be hard to procure the two former; but, as to the last mentioned, he dispassionately observes, "It could be certainly found in great abundance, in Ireland, upon the human carcasses which are thrown in heaps into the—sewers!!!"—M. Le Comte Joseph Le Maistre's Letters of the Spanish Inquisition, pp. 116 to 125. Boston 1843.

Note.—"All Popish archbishops, bishops, vicars-general, deans, Jesuits, monks, friars, and all other regular Popish clergy, and all Papists exercising any ecclesiastical jurisdiction, shall depart this kingdom before the 1st of May, 1698. And if any of them shall be, at any time after the said day, within this kingdom, they shall be imprisoned, and remain there without bail till they be transported beyond the seas, out of the king's dominions, wherever the king, his heirs, or successors, or chief governors of this kingdom, shall think fit; and if any so transported shall return again into this kingdom, then to be guilty of high treason, and to suffer accordingly!!!" (1)

(1) Robin's Abridgment of the Irish Statutes, p. 451.

"If any Popish priest, or reputed Popish priest, or any person pretending to be a Popish priest, or any deprived clergyman, or any layman pretending to be a clergyman of the Church of Ireland, as by law established, shall after the 25th day of April, 1746, celebrate any marriage between two Protestants, or reputed Protestants, and a Papist, such Popish priest, &c., shall be guilty of felony, and shall suffer death as a felon, without benefit of clergy or of the statute!!!" (5)

"No Papist, after the 20th of January, 1698, shall be capable to have, or keep in his possession, or the possession of any other, to his use, or at his disposition, any horse, gelding, or mare, of the value of 5l. or more; and if any person of the Protestant religion shall make discovery thereof, upon oath, to any two justices of the peace, or to the chief magistrate of any city or town corporate, they may, within their respective limits, by warrant under their hands and seals, authorise such person, in the day time only, to search for and seize all such horses; and, in case of resistance to break open any door, and bring such horse or horses before them; and such discoverer, (being of the Protestant religion) paying, or making tender, before such justices, mayor, &c., of the sum of 5l. 5s. to the owner or possessor of such horse, after such payment, or tender and refusal, the property of such horse or horses shall be vested in the person making such discovery and tender, as if the same had been bought and sold in market overt!!!" (6)

(5) Idem, p. 388. (6) Idem, p. 450.

"The lieutenants, &c., or the major part of them, may cause to be raised upon the Popish inhabitants, and upon every person who shall refuse to take the oath of abjuration, (which oath any justice of the peace may administer,) double the sum they should have paid by virtue of this act, in case they had been Protestants!!!" (2)

"Leases of the premises to be made to Protestants only, at the full improved rent, without any fine. Leases to, or in trust for Papists, or assigned to them, to be void and the lessor, assignor, and lessee, or assignee, accepting or accepting such lands, to forfeit treble the yearly value!!!" (4)

(2) Idem, p. 407. (4) Idem, p. 386.

"If any Papist shall publicly teach school, or instruct youth in learning in any private house, or shall be entertained to instruct youth, as usher or assistant to any Protestant schoolmaster, he shall be deemed a Popish regular clergyman, and prosecuted as such, and shall incur such penalties and forfeitures as any Popish regular convict is liable unto."(3) What an infernal law in this Pandemonium code What heretical tongue can have the impiety to declare the Roman Catholic religion perpetuates ignorance! Blasphemous assertion! Has not the impiety, Reformation legalized impiety and murder, rapine, bodily and mental slavery, and all the abominations of her partner—Antichrist?

"Any person that shall, from the 1st of May, knowingly conceal or entertain any such archbishop, bishops, &c., hereby required to depart out of this kingdom, or that after the said day, shall come into this kingdom, shall, for the first offence, forfeit twenty pounds; for the second, double that sum; and if he offend the third time, shall forfeit all his lands and tenements of freehold, or inheritance during his life; and also his goods and chattels!!!" (4)

(4) Robins, p. 452.

"The eldest son, conforming, immediately acquires, in the life-time of his father, the permanent part, what out law calls the reversion and inheritance of the estate; and he discharges it by retrospect, and annuls every sort of voluntary settlement made by the father ever so long before his conversion! This he may sell or dispose of immediately, and alienate it from the family forever!!!" (5)

(5) Burke, v. p. 187.

They (the Penal Laws) cannot be excused upon any principle of justice or necessity.—Edinb. Review, Oct. No. 9, p. 166,

I think I can hardly overrate the malignity of the principles of the Protestant ascendency, as they affect Ireland. No country, I believe, since the world began, suffered so much on account of religion.—Burke, vol. v. pp. 232, 233.

—000—

VOLTAIRE AN APOLOGIST FOR RELIGION.

(Continued from p. 301.

Another benefit of religion, is that it has destroyed those Superstitions which degenerate into fanaticism.

I flatter myself, that if the greatest enemies of the Christian religion heard us in our temples where the love of virtue assembles us, and were witnesses of our sweet and innocent simplicity, they would cease to reproach us with absurd fanaticism.*

It was religion that inspired at different periods, both Henry Bishop of Evreux, and Cardinal Coislins Bishop of Orleans, at different times, with the same zeal in defending the Protestants against their persecutors.

If religion be accused of having occasioned those sanguinary quarrels of which it was made the pretext, and of those intestine wars which for more than forty years covered the whole of France with the slain, then it must be admitted, that it was a fearful abuse of religion which armed the perpetrators of the Massacres of St. Bartholomew. Let us admit that Catherine de Medicés and those who counselled those Massacres, had not more religion than he who would desire to diminish the horror of them.

Who would presume to defend so detestable a cause? Yes—this fanaticism armed one half of France against the other half; Yes—it transformed into assassins those Frenchmen so gentle and so polite, who gaily occupied themselves with comedies and pamphlets. We must repeat it a hundred times; we must proclaim it every year on the twenty-fourth of August, in order that our posterity may never be tempted to renew the crimes of our detestable ancestors.

Voltaire does not mention it, but we know that those crimes were renewed on the second of September, and under very different circumstances during the reign of impiety. In that century, Massacres were committed in cold blood. The fanatic and barbarous people were left the choice of their victims: the brother could assassinate his brother and the son could plunge the knife into the breast of his father. In our days it was the judges who became assassins, and the revolutionary tribunals commanded the ammunition of Nantes and of Lyons.

* Vol. 44, p. 180.

In large cities they kept the scaffold daily teeming with the most pure blood.

This is what we must repeat a hundred times, this is what we must cry aloud every year, in order that our posterity may never be tempted to applaud the maxims of impiety.

It is not possible to ascertain the exact number of those who perished on saint Bartholomew's day. Our author exagerates, another diminishes, no one gives the right number. But it is certain that the revolutionary Massacres lasted for several years, and it is impossible to calculate the number of victims.

(To be continued.)

POETRY.

—ooo—

THE CHURCH.

(Communicated by a Friend to the Bengal Catholic Herald.)

The Church—the Church! a hymn for thee,
Whose glory dwells in ev'ry zone,
Old Time the king must bend his knee,
Before thine everlasting throne.

A thousand years have flown away,
Nine hundred more are rolling by,
But thou dost never feel decay,
Immortal offspring of the sky.

Thy fold is Truth's embattled home,
The Angels guard thee round about,
Thy base the earth—thy wondrous dome,
By God's own hand spread nobly out.

And millions in thy shadows rest,
And tribes and nations there unite,
Like rivers in the ocean's breast,
Swelling, yet lost within its might.

Stand on the threshold, let thine eye
Along the vast perspective run,
Where memory lifts her torch on high,
And history blazes like a sun.

Behold! what myriads throng the space,
What countless hosts from ev'ry clime;
Where'er you turn, the eye can trace,
The hoary evidence of time.

From Afric's shore a mighty band,
Before the sacred shrine have met,
Others from Asia's farthest land,
And Isles amid the ocean set;

From Europe's soil with science crown'd,
They meet in one Communion blest,
And from the earth's remotest bound,
Where the last sunbeam sinks to rest.

The martyrs radient from the flames,
The virgins in immortal youth,
The mitred prelates with whose names
Are joined the victories of Truth.

They come, they come from ev'ry age,
The poor—the rich—the bond—the free,
The peasant, anchorite and sage,
They come, oh God! to worship Thee.

There shines the diadem of Kings,
The scholar there his wreath has brought,
The artist too, devoutly brings
His bright realities of thought;

And science with her starry crown,
And Eloquence whose words inflame,
Before thine altars bending down,
The glory of our Church proclaim.

Hail, hail to Thee, triumphant home,
Wherein the mystic dove is found,
Thy hallowed shrines where'er we roam,
Thy children's best affections bound.

Oh! may the nations soon return,
Which wander'd from thy peaceful fold,
And faith, so long extinguished, burn
At altars where it shone of old.

Selections.

—ooo—

THE PAPAL AGGRESSION—AUDI ALTEREM PARTEM.

To the Editor of the Morning Chronicle.

Sir,—In your paper of the 2nd instant, there appeared a letter signed A Layman headed "Papal Aggression, Mr. Drummond in Calcutta." What your opinion of Mr. Drummond's recent bare-faced and impudent attack on Catholicity may be, I know not, but it appears to be generally admitted at home, that he is partially deranged, and if so, the unfortunate man is, or ought to be, more an object of pity than of anger. On the contrary, should this charitable conclusion be incorrect, and the arch defamer, be of sound intellect, he stands convicted on the testimony of millions, as an infamous liar, and a foul-mouthed slanderer, and whether it was your intention, that your readers would enrol the "Calcutta Drummond" alias the Layman in the mad or the scoundrel, classes, will probably for ever remain a mystery unless you kindly condescend to enlighten them on the subject.

* * * * *

I now turn to your Correspondent the Layman. I took a few extracts from his letter with a view towards replying to them, as soon as I found myself in better health, as I was indisposed at the time. What a tissue of falsehood; foul, abominable falsehood; the bare transcribing of which, even for the laudable purpose of refutation, is enough to sadden the heart and make the hand tremulous,—"Catholics, Priests and Layman, taught that to kill a Protestant would not be a sin!!—That it would be doing God a service!"—I am tempted to cry out in the language of the great bard of Avon,—

"Are there no stones in Heaven,
But such as serve for thunder!!"

This doctrine, the LAYMAN says, "is taught in standard Roman Catholic books." I dare him to the proof,—for the life of him he could not, even if he travelled over the whole habitable globe in search of it, produce such a book. The first book put into the hands of a Catholic child is the Catechism and I will let it speak for itself:—

Q.—How does a person sin against his neighbour?

A.—By injuring him or by not assisting him when able, in his corporal or spiritual necessities.

Q.—Who is your neighbour?

A.—All mankind, even those who injure us, and differ from us in religion.

Here is the doctrine, the unchangeable doctrine of the Catholic Church all over the world, and as a Catholic I would not believe an angel from Heaven if he preached an opposite doctrine. Oh! that Protestants would discard prejudice, and study these beautiful doctrines. The great truths of Catholicity, one jot, one title of which, neither Pope, nor Bishop, nor Priest, nor all the Bishops and Priests in the world can alter. The LAYMAN says, Popery persecuted "the saints of God," meaning the Albigenses, Waldenses, Lollards, &c.,—what a blasphemy to couple the name of the Almighty with such scoundrels.

"Oh shame, where is thy blush!"

Saints of God forsooth,—say rather murdering, cut throats, socialists, such as no Protestant State in the world would tolerate at the present time.—Hear the great Protestant historian Mosheim on the subject—"Certain writers (says Mosheim) who have accustomed themselves to hold a high idea of the sanctity of all those who in the middle ages separated themselves from the Church of Rome, suspect the Inquisitors of having attributed falsely impious doctrines to the Albigenses, but this suspicion is entirely groundless; their shocking violation of decency was a consequence of their pernicious system; they looked upon decency and modesty as marks of inward corruption, and certain enthusiasts amongst them maintained, that the believers could not sin let their conduct be ever so horrible or atrocious." The LAYMAN (but we duly suspect any body would take him for a clergyman?) next crosses over to France, and finds out that the Priests and their religion, darkness and superstition, have caused all the miseries of that unfortunate country—not a word about Penal Laws, Rack-rents, Cow Acre, tithes or middle-men, the Priests have done it all, what a wiseacre we have got in this Lay teacher. I think I saw him the other day with a bundle of tracts under his arm, and what Christian I would (if I had it) "lay my Dukedom to a Beggar's moiety," I could have picked out one of recent importation on the "awful doings of Popery in Ireland."—"Yes man," says Giles, "they must be converted, or they will all surely starve. Popery is such a wishey washey thing, they say, that nobody can get fat on it"—"Indeed" says Hodge, "I was minded they were all converted fourteen hundred years agone, by one St. Patrick."—"True, true," says Giles, "but then he was a Papist sent over by the Haythen Pope of Rome.—Hum, hum," says Hodge, "that's the way is it?"—I could excuse, and pity, and even love such men as Giles and Hodge, whose ignorance might be called involuntary—but for the more refined ruffian, the educated liar—the Drummonds of England and India I could find nothing better than the lash,—conversion of the Irish—this brings to my mind a Fancy Fair meeting held in the Town Hall, a few months ago, for the above ostensible purpose. I would have given a gentle hint about it at the time, and shewn the real drift of the matter, but I was hors de combat and had to console myself in reflecting on the vagaries of the civilized baboos. I trust, however, that the Calcutta Town Hall will never again be desecrated by such tomfoolery,—meantime with profound respect I humbly beg to suggest to the highly respectable old ladies, and the charming little misses, who worked their white fingers brown and their brown fingers white, making all the little fancy garters, and night caps, pen-wipers, and rose-buds, how they can profitably employ their time, in making the aforesaid little etceteras, until the sweet month of May next year, or before it, to have them ready for the next Grand Exhibition of Industry. There are, I well know, amongst the said ladies, many tender and kind of heart, but unfortunately misled by the prejudices of early education. Now I am persuaded it will be granted that, in nothing ought the educated woman feel a greater interest, than in the moral culture of the more humble members of her own sex. I look upon it as the Alpha if not the Omega of her responsibilities to Society—and as the Irish peasant girl, in the opinion of the civilized world, for virtue and modesty, it will readily be admitted, that it is better to let them go on in their homely way, in virtue and holiness, than to convert them into * * * * * "Look now upon this picture and on this:" The last Home News states, there are 54 thousand children in the work-houses of England and Wales, and that about one-third of them are illegitimate! Here my benevolent ladies and sweet little misses is work for you,—you know the household of faith, hear their first claims on your charity, work! work! work! yes blister your fingers to aid in the conversion of these depraved creatures of your own sex and religion,—what will you convert them to?—they are already, what your mis-guided zeal was trying to make the Irish woman. Where amongst your legion of sects you will find a secure pen for those stray ones of the fold, I know not; try the experiment at all events and may He that suffered for all, grant a blessing to your exertions but take my advice and let the Irish alone.

I must now, for the last time, turn my attention to the LAYMAN's letter. He says all the Catholics are sunk in damnable idolatry; how charitable! I take it that by damnable he very properly means, in the way of, or marked out for, eternal damnation, and is it so? 150 millions of Catholics, Popes and Bishops, Priests and Laymen, holy matrons and virgins consecrated to heaven, sisters of charity, and all damned to hell for all eternity, together with the thousands of millions, who have gone before them to the world of spirits—and for what?—for faithfully adhering to the religion of Gregory and Augustin, of the Great Alfred, and the illustrious More. A religion which after ages of persecution, is, at the present day, as active and as vigorous, as ever. The LAYMAN says, "Had Dr. Wiseman been allowed to proceed in his plan of establishing a hierarchy, the battering ram of Rome would lay England's Protestantism prostrate." Here we have the old cry of "the church in danger." Who ever heard a Catholic singing out about his church being in danger, for he feels assured that neither earth nor hell can ever prevail against it. Not so with Protestantism; like all other human institutions, it is liable to extinction. One of the greatest of our living historians, Macaulay, a staunch Protestant, in his review of Ranke's History of the Popes speaks as follows:—"The antiquity and power of the Roman hierarchy, and the away it now holds over 150 millions of people, diffused through all quarters of the globe, is one of the most extraordinary facts of the Christian era,—whether the combined efforts of Protestantism to overthrow it, during the next three centuries, will be more successful than during the three since the reformation, time only can shew." Speaking of the Catholic Church Macaulay says, "She saw the commencement of all the Governments, and of all the ecclesiastical establishments, that now exist in the world, and we feel no assurance that she is not destined to see the end of them all. She was great and respected before the Saxon had set foot on Britain,—before the Frank had passed the Rhine,—when Grecian eloquence still flourished at Antioch,—when idols were still worshipped in the temple at Mecca, and she may still exist in undiminished vigour, when some traveller from New England, shall in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London bridge, to sketch the ruin of St. Paul's!!" This is startling language, and coming from such a quarter too, it ought, at least, to induce Protestants to reflect soberly and seriously without bias or prejudice, whether they really belong to the true Church of Christ or not. Protestant clergymen, men of acknowledged piety and of unblemished character, all of them men who have received a first rate education, and many amongst them men of great abilities, are to be seen, almost daily, resigning their livings in the Church of England, and joining a Church, in which they are looked upon as no more than mere Laymen. 'Tis here a few, who are unmarried, may perhaps like Dr. Newman and others, in due time be ordained and admitted to the Priesthood; but, then the number is comparatively small, and let it be borne in mind, that, many if not all, of these men have been taught from their infancy, to look upon the Church of Rome, as the climax of evil, the worst of abominations. What has wrought this great, this wonderful change in their sentiments? The tenderest ties are severed and broken, perhaps for ever—wealth, station, and the whole train of earthly comforts are freely given up, for poverty, lowlines and privation; assuredly it is not too great a stretch of thought, to say, "The finger of God is here!" The Catholic Directory shews the following Clergymen of the Church of England to have joined the Catholic Church during the past year;—Revd. A. J. Hanmer, St. John's College, Cambridge, Revd. M. Johnston Revd. Alfred Dayman, Revd. Thos. Scraton, Revd. Francis Balston, Revd. J. H. Wynne, B.C.L., Fellow of all Soul's College, Oxford, Revd. J. L. Patterson, Revd G. Case, Revd. E. Ballard, Revd. C. B. Garside, Revd. M. Bodley, Revd. C. W. Cavendish, Revd. W. Maskell Revd. Eyre Stewart Bathurst, Revd. T. W. Allies, Revd. Henry Wilberforce, Revd. F. W. Trehow Revd. W. H. Anderton, Revd. W. C. Maclaurin, Revd. M. Todd, Revd. Mr. Henn, Revd., R. Butler, Revd. Mr. Rogers, Revd. Mr. Scott, Revd. Dr. Forbes, Revd. Mr. Preston, Revd. Dr. Huntington, Revd. Mr. Ferret. Amongst the Lay Converts, I find the Countess of Arundale and Surrey, Lord and Lady Fielding, Lord and Lady Camoden, Hon'ble Captain [illegible] Hon. George Bowye, Esq, D. C. L, [illegible]shell, Esq.—Bastard, Esq, W. [illegible]. M. P., Hon'ble Mr. Cavendish, Mr. G. Dillard, of Walthamstow, Essex, &c. &c.

Having now afforded a little useful information to our Calcutta Drummond, I bid him good bye, with an earnest hope, that, before his next appearance in print, he will reflect seriously upon the following divine command,—

"Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour."

Trusting that I have not encroached too much on your time and patience,

I remain, Mr. Editor.

Your very obedient servant,

DUBLIN CITY.

Calcutta, May 7, 1851.

Morning Chronicle, June 12.

THE CONVENT OF MERCY NOTTINGHAM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TABLET.

SIR,—My attention having been directed to the paragraphs which appeared in the Sunday Times newspaper of the 9th March instant, headed "Attempted escape of a Nun from a Convent at Nottingham," I declare that the statements contained in the said paper, as to the alleged escape of a Nun from the said convent, and other statements, hereinafter enumerated, are utterly untrue and unfounded; in fact, that no Sister of Mercy or Nun, residing in the said convent, has either escaped, or attempted to escape, from the said convent, either in the month of February last, or at any other time; nor has any Nun ever "been sent away" from the said convent "to a convent out of England," or to any other convent; that I am now, and have, since its opening, been the guardian of the said convent; that the Sisters of Mercy do continually leave the said convent to attend the sick poor. Hence the statement contained in the said newspaper, that "none are suffered to go beyond the walls of the enclosed garden," is utterly untrue. And whereas it is stated in the said newspaper, that a Nun had "not only once but thrice endeavoured to escape;" that "at one attempt she had nearly reached nearly the village of Beetson, three miles from Nottingham;" that her progress was arrested by a countryman, and she was taken back by him to the convent; that, "at another time a milkman saw the Sister of Mercy leave the convent," and, on his "giving information," she was "forcibly taken back," I declare that the facts contained in the said statements are totally untrue and unfounded: and I declare that after strict enquiry, I am not able to find any milkman who, as alleged, has seen a Nun escape or attempting to escape: nor am I able to find any milkman or others who, as reported, "have been frightened into forgetfulness;" that I have applied to Mr. Robert G. Gilbert, the person reporting the above matter to the [redacted] newspaper, to know on what authority is and the other statements in the said [redacted] made, and he has not informed me.

And I declare that the statement contained the said newspaper as to "the tolling of convent bell during all hours of the night," it is said, "these women have to rise from beds to perform their devotional duties," totally untrue; that, except on Christmas Eve, the convent bell is not rung during the night; and all who live within the hearing of the convent bell have an opportunity of knowing that the said bell is not rung later than nine o'clock in the evening, nor earlier than six o'clock in the morning. And I declare that the detailed account given in the said newspaper as to the clothing, diet, and manner of life of the Sisters of Mercy and Nuns in the said convent, is untrue and erroneous. And I declare that the report or statement contained in the said newspaper, that "those Nuns who become dissatisfied with their condition are removed to foreign nunneries, and other Nuns from France brought to fill their places in the English convents," is utterly untrue and unfounded—that no Nun has ever been removed from the said convent to any foreign nunnery, nor has any Nun been brought from France to the said convent—that the Superioress of the said convent, although her name is Italian, is not an Italian, as stated in the said newspaper, but an English woman, and that she is not styled by the novices and Nuns "the Rev. Lady Sister of Mercy;" and I declare that the statement contained in the said newspaper—that "recently two young ladies (sisters), named Hall, teachers of music living in Park-row, and a Miss Clutterbuck, of Nottingham have been induced to enter the Nottingham nunnery," is totally untrue—that no person of the name of Hall, and no other persons living in Park-row, and no person of the name of Clutterbuck, have entered the said convent.

And, finally, that the paragraph in the said newspaper, headed, "Departure of Two Nuns," is calculated to induce the belief that two Nuns had left the convent at Nottingham; whereas the fact is, that two of the Sisters did, on the 3rd March, go by themselves by railway from Nottingham to Leamington on business connected with a school there which they had under their care; and that the said two Nuns returned to the said convent on the following Saturday.

I was desirous of making the statements contained in this letter on oath, or solemn declaration before a magistrate; but, on applying to do so, I was informed that the magistrates had no power to take such oath or declaration. I, therefore send this statement, as the only other mode of contradicting the report.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

FRANCIS CHEADLE.

Presbytery of St. Barnabas, Nottingham, March 24, 1851.

Dear Sir—I send you the enclosed letter, with the request that you will have the goodness to insert it in the Tablet of next Saturday. I have confined myself to a mere contradiction of the principal false statements contained in the paragraphs to which I have alluded in that letter. As to the alleged "Attempted Escape of a Nun" from the Nottingham Convent I may observe, for the satisfaction of your readers in general, and of the more immediate friends of the said convent, that not only has no Nun escaped or attempted to escape, but that we are utterly unacquainted with any circumstance whatever that could have furnished even a pretext for such a report.

I have hitherto deferred sending any contradiction myself, because I had received written promises, in each of the last two weeks, from the Nottingham reporter of the Sunday Times, that would himself correct all erroneous statements. In one of his notes to me he uses these words:—"All inaccuracies shall be corrected; and believe me, I will be more careful of taking reports from such as those who are secretly plotting mischief, yet have not the moral courage publicly to admit what they have so insidiously promulgated." These promises have not yet been fulfilled, and I have therefore sent my own contradiction to the report.

The paragraph headed "Attempted Escape of a Nun" was copied into the Nottingham Review; but the Editor of the Review added the following most satisfactory contradiction:—"All this fine tale turns out to be moonshine. We have investigated the matter, and find that there is not the least foundation for the story. It is altogether a libellous and mischievous fabrication." May I also request that you will insert this letter, as well as the enclosed communication.—I am, Sir, yours truly, &c.,

FRANCIS CHEADLE

Presbytery of St. Barnabas, Nottingham. March 25th. 1851

THE NUNNERIES VISITATION BILL —PETITION OF THE HON. C. LANGDALE.

TO THE HONOURABLE THE HOUSE OF COMMONS IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

The humble Petition of the undersigned Charles Langdale, of Broughton, in the East Riding of the County of York.

Sheweth—That your petitioner has two daughters, inmates of religious houses, one of whom entered such religious community at the age of twenty-seven; and after a probation or novices-ship of about two years, at the end of that period became a professed member of such community. The other entered at the age of twenty-one, and, after a similar probation of nearly three years, made her religious profession for a period of five years, which having now nearly expired, she is about to renew for life.

That your petitioner has heard with the surprise and indignation that must pervade the breast of every Englishman, that the domiciles wherein these his children have dedicated themselves in a special manner to the service of Almighty God, according to the dictates of their conscience and their religion, are proposed to be violated by a bill now before your honourable house.

That the recognised security of every Englishman's house is proposed to be invaded in the case of those whose sex and defenceless position ought especially to have protected them in every manly and honourable mind from outrage and insult.

That the forcible entry, without a shadow of pretence, as proposed by the bill, by strangers in blood, in religious belief, and even in personal acquaintance, amongst ladies, many of whom are as highly and nobly born as the daughters of the noblest of the realm, cannot but be felt as at indecent outrage upon their honour, a violation of every privilege of their domestic life, and an unprovoked insult to the religion which they profess.

That the existence of religious communities of ladies professing the Roman Catholic Religion was especially provided for by the Act of Catholic Emancipation.

That under the sanction and encouragement afforded by that act, many communities of ladies dedicated to religion, have established themselves in this country, and become proprietors of houses and landed property.

That the provisions of the proposed act would operate as a bill of expatriation against many of such communities, who would, as under the penal laws other days, fly from the persecution of such an invasion of their peaceful retirement to countries where, without molestation, they could pursue the devoted course of their religious rule of life.

That as the greater number of the daughters of the English Roman Catholic gentry receive their education in such religious communities, they also would, as was formerly the case, again pass the earlier years of their life at a distance from their native country, equally to the detriment of their parents and friends, and to the inhospitable country which would thus drive them from their homes.

In the last place, that as your petitioner believes the magistracy of England to be generally imbued with the high spirit of gentlemen, such never could be induced to accept the odious duty of inquisitor imposed by the proposed bill, this enactment would be left to the few—if even such there be—whose religious rancour would overcome all the finer feelings of manhood, and whose bitter antipathies would seek to make these helpless victims feel all the penal powers conferred by this persecuting bill.

That as the children of your petitioner, as well as many others, members of religious communities, nearly and dearly related to your petitioner by blood would be subject to these enumerated grievances, your petitioner implores your honourable house not to pass a bill so insulting to the most inoffensive and interesting portion of the professors of the Roman Catholic Faith in this kingdom.

And your petitioner will ever pray, &c.

CHARLES LANGDALE.

Tablet.]

THE CHURCH AND STATE.

(From the Englishman.)

One of the evils of the connection between Church and State, is that it makes otherwise sensible men often ridiculous, and sometimes worse. An ecclesiastical official feels that politically he is out of place, and that he should sometimes do and say something to keep him before the eye of the powers above him, and that something is often unseemly and not unfrequently ridiculous. We have an instance of the ridiculous at least, in the Christian Intelligencer for the present month, in an address presented by the Bishop of Calcutta to the Governor of Bengal to be presented to the Governor-General to be sent to the Queen. It appears that the Bishop inflicts upon the Deputy-Governor or Governor in Council annually this sort of thing, and compels his clergy to dance attendance at the Government House to hear and present these addresses. If the communications of four years be as [illegible] to the present, they must have been [illegible] by applying both to the clergy and the officials here, and to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen. The present document is a singular medley, but the secret of sending it [illegible] us. The Bishop wants the Queen to appoint a Chief pastor. (Bishop we suppose,) for Punjab. Of course, the Punjabees never can be happy, till they have a Bishop not they, how is it possible? Men never value a thing [illegible] pay for it.

The Bishop tells the Queen that when the influx of visitors to the Great Exhibition see the Koh-i-noor shining away there, they will be led to think of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Pearl of great price? We should think this would be about the last thing they would think of in connection with this celebrated jewel. They are far more likely to think of the fierce and bloody wars by which the Punjab was conquered, than of the Prince of Peace.—Englishman, June 11.

The Members of the State Church, are disputing, if not over the body, at least over the doctrines of the late Professor Street. Religious disputants give even the dead no rest, and this instance is no exception to the general rule. The organ of the High Church party put forth a memoir of Mr. Street, in which his dying expressions were recorded. Some of his sayings in his last moments appeared to the Evangelical party to savour more of Evangelical sentiments than the Professor had been supposed to entertain. On this the periodical of the Evangelical party comments in a manner which has called forth the strictures of our correspondent Riparius. The Intelligencer, the organ of the Evangelicals, says it is pleasant to find the learned Professor casting himself a last, even as the illiterate rustic or the little child "on Christ and Christ alone." We hear then not a word of creature confidences, no mingling of man's work with Christ, no interfering of any thing, save the "One Mediator between the sinking soul and its God." The Intelligencer further says, that he hears that the friends of Mr. Street lit up candles at the head and foot of the coffin, and that they placed a large cross on the coffin. This he utterly disapproves as contrary to the creeds of the Church. This the friends of Mr. Street resent. They see nothing in his dying expressions inconsistent with his life's creed, nor in the practices condemned by the Intelligencer do they see anything inconsistent with the formularies of the Church generally, or with the practice of Oxford in particular. Both parties stick to it that they are right in their interpretation of the ceremonies and doctrines of the Church. It is not for us to interfere, but if we may be permitted to give our humble and dispassionate opinion—we should say that both are right, and both are wrong. So long as the rubric and the articles are at variance, and so long as men may put their own interpretation upon both, we apprehend there will always be within the bosom of the one Church men claiming to be good Church men, who differ as widely as Wilberforce father and son, and as Harry of Exeter and Mr. Goler. Baptismal and non-baptismal regeneration will and must always find a shelter under the ample wings of the Church. Puseyism and Evangelism will always find a shade there under which to rest. So if Mr. Street was what he has generally been considered to be, the leader of the Puseyites in India, he could find an excuse for his views and practices, and could see his Diocesan—so widely differing from him—in open and triumphant defiance. The Evangelicals too find in their reading of the formularies and doctrines of the Church, a shield for their sentiments and practices, and hence the struggle within the borders of the one communion. It is an unseemly sight—

> To see children of one family
> Fall out, and chide and fight,—

but it is the natural fruit of a system, which, on the grounds of expediency, seeks to homologate within itself men of all creeds and practices, and to hold up as the perfection of fellowship one of the most heterogeneous compounds of religious belief and practice, which, under the name of the one Apostolic Church, has ever been presented to the judgment, or for the approbation of men.

This dispute on a small scale is illustrative of the present state generally of the Church. She is ill at rest; between Puseyite and Evangelical she is torn asunder, and even the word of her Head the Queen, or the dictum of the Prime Minister cannot unite the contending factions, and we apprehend the dispute will not be settled even should the contending Bishops do to each other what it is reported the Bishop did to Mr. Street, give each other the Kiss of Peace, and bestow on each other their Apostolical Benediction.—Ibid.

AMONG the mass of trash which the No-popery agitation has caused to issue from the London press, we have already noticed one good pamphlet, that by Walter Savage Landor, and we have accidentally met with another, entitled Cautions for the Times, which according to the title-page, is to be the first of a series, and if the others resemble that before us, we shall be glad to receive them. The writer points out that all the conversions which have excited so much alarm have been made without the aid of Cardinals or titled Bishops, and that in the present state of society, a secret thief is more to be dreaded than an open robberr. Nobody he says can be converted against his will. The Pope cannot make you a Roman Catholic by a bull, why then call in civil penalties in aid of truth. By so doing, he argues, you confirm the reproach which has been cast upon you (i. e the Anglican Church,) that yours is a Parliamentary religion, which cannot subsist without the support of the State. He asks whether any penal law whatever for stopping the progress of opinion will not bring discredit and damage on the Christian religion in general, and the Church of England in particular, and points out that there is no limit to such legislation, because whatever argument can be adduced in favor of interference will justify further interference till we arrive at actual persecution, penal law, &c. To those who attend public meetings, he says, "when any orator addresses you in eloquent harangues against Romanism and against Papal aggression, merely for the sake of what is called expressing his sentiments, you will do well to stop him short by asking well, what do you wish us to do. What steps do you advise to be taken. If you have nothing definite to propose, and merely want to tell us that you disapprove of the Church of Rome, and are very angry and much frightened, we are ready to take all that for granted. We do not wish to listen to a long speech, merely to say that England expects every man to do his duty." If every orator at the recent public meetings had been thus compelled to cut it short, it would have saved a great deal of angry feeling and delusion upon this subject. It is to be hoped that the excitement roused by the Papal Bull will have subsided before the general election, otherwise the contests will turn upon a point which affords no criterion of the merits of the candidates.—Ibid.

PROTESTANISM COMPARED WITH CATHOLICITY.

NATURE AND NAME OF PROTESTANTISM.

Protestantism, when viewed in a mass, appears only a shapeless collection of innumerable sects, all opposed to each other, and agreeing only in one point, viz.: in protesting against the authority of the Church. We only find among them particular and exclusive names, commonly taken from the names of their founders; in vain have they made a thousand efforts to give themselves a general name expressive of a positive idea; they are still called after the manner of philosophical sects, Lutherans, Calvinists, Zuinglians, Anglicans, Socinians, Arminians, Anabaptists. All these names of which I would furnish an endless host, only serve to show the narrowness of the circle in which these sects are enclosed; and it is only necessary to pronounce them, to show that they contain nothing universal, nothing great.

Every body who knows anything of the Christian Religion must be convinced by this fact alone, that these sects are not truly Christian. But what occurred when Protestantism attempted to take a general name is singularly remarkable. If you examine its history, you will see that all the names which it attempted to give itself failed, if they contained any positive idea, or any mark of Christianity; but that it adopted a name taken by chance at the Diet of Spires; a name which carries with it is own condemnation; because it is repugnant to the origin, to the spirit, to the maxims, to the entire history of the Christian Religion; a name which does not express that unity—that union which is inseparably connected with the Christian name; a name which is peculiarly becoming to it, which all the world gives to it by acclamation, which is truly its own, viz.: Protestantism. (3.) Within the vast limits marked out by this name, there is room for every error and for every sect. You may deny with the Lutherans the liberty of man, or renew with the Arminians the errors of Pelagius. You may admit with some that real presence, which you are free to reject with the Calvinists and Zuinglicans: you may join with the Socinians in denying the divinity of Jesus Christ; you may attach yourself to Episcopalians, to Puritans, or if you please, to the extravagancies of the Quakers; it is of no consequence, for you always remain a Protestant, for you protest against the authority of the Church; your field is so extensive, that you can hardly escape from it, however great may be your wanderings; it contains all the vast extent that we behold on coming forth from the gates of the Holy City. (4.)

Note.—1. The history of the Variations is one of those works which exhaust their subject, and which does not admit of reply or addition. If this immortal Chief d'œuvre be read with attention, the cause of Protestantism is for ever decided: there is no middle way between Catholicism and incredulity. Gibbon read it in his youth, and he became a Catholic, abandoning the Protestant religion in which he had been brought up. When, at a later period, he left the Catholic Church, he did not become a Protestant, but an unbeliever. My readers will, perhaps, like to learn from the mouth of this famous writer, what he thought of the work of Bossuet, and the effect which was produced on him by its perusal. These are his words: "In the History of the Variations, an attack equally vigorous and well directed," says he, "Bossuet shews, by a happy mixture of reading and narration, the errors, mistakes, uncertainties and contradictions of our first reformers, whose variations as he learnedly maintains, bear the marks of error; while the uninterrupted unity of the Catholic Church is a sign and testimony of infallible truth. I read approved, and believe."—(Gibbon's Memoirs.)

Note—2. It has been wished to represent Luther to us as a man of lofty ideas, of noble and generous feelings, and as a defender of the rights of the humane race. Yet, he himself, has left us in his writings the most striking testimony of the violence of his character, of his disgusting rudeness, and his savage intolerance. Henry the VIII. King of England, undertook to refute the book of Luther, called De Captivitate Babylonica; and behold the latter, irritated by such boldness, writes to the King, and calls him sacrilegious, mad, senseless, the grossest of all pigs and of all asses. It is evident, that Luther paid but little regard to loyalty; he did the same with respect to literary merit. Erasmus, who was, perhaps, the most learned man of his age, or who at least surpassed all others in the variety of his knowledge, in the refinement and acuteness of his mind, was no better treated by the furious innovator, in spite of all the indulgence for which the latter was indebted to him. As soon as Luther saw that Erasmus did not think proper to be enrolled in the new sect, he attacked him with so much violence, that the latter complained of it, saying, "that in his old age, he was compelled to contend against a savage beast, a savage wild boar. Luther did not confine himself to mere words; he proceeded to acts. It was at his instigation that Carlostad was exiled from the States of the Duke of Saxony, and was reduced to such misery, that he was compelled to carry wood, and of other similar things, to gain his livelihood. In his many disputes with the Zuinglians, Luther did not belie his character; he called them damned fools, blasphemers. As he lavished such epithets on his dissenting companions, we cannot be astonished that he called the Doctors of Louvain, beasts, pigs, Pagans, Epicureans, Atheists; and that he makes use of other expressions which decency will not allow us to write; and that launching forth against the Pope, he says, "He is a mad wolf, against whom every one ought to take up arms, without waiting even for the order of the magistrates; in this matter there can be no room left for repentance, except for not having been able to bury the sword in his breast;" adding, that all those who followed the Pope ought to be pursued like bandit-Chiefs, were they Kings emperors." Such was the spirit of tolerance which animate Luther—and let it not be imagined that this tolerance was confined to him; it extended to all the party of the innovators, and its effects were cruelly felt. We have an unexceptional witness of this truth in Melancthon, the beloved Disciple of Luther, and one of the most distinguished men that Protestantism has had. "I find myself under such oppression," wrote Melancthon to his friend Camerarius, "that I seem to be in the cave of the Cyclops; it is almost impossible for me to explain to you my troubles; and every moment I feel myself tempted to take flight." There are, he says, "in another letter," ignorant men, who know neither piety nor discipline; behold what they are who command, and you will understand that I am like Deniel in the lions den!! How, then, can it be mentioned that such an enterprise was guided by a generous idea, and that it was really attempted to free the human mind? The intolerance of Calvin, sufficiently shewn by the single fact mentioned in the text, is manifested in his works at every page, by the manner in which he treats his adversaries. Wicked men, rogues, drunkards, fools, madmen, furies, beasts, bulls, pigs, asses, dogs and vile slaves of Satan. Such are the polite terms which abound in the writings of the famous reformer. And how many wretched things of the same kind could I not relate, if I did not fear to disgust my readers.

Note.—5. The Diet of Spires had made a decree concerning the change of religion and worship; fourteen towns of the Empire refused to submit to it, and presented a protest; hence men now began to call themselves Protestants. As this name is a condemnation of the separated churches, they have several times attempted to assume others, but always in vain; the names which they took were false and false names do not last. What was their meaning when they called themselves Evangelicals? That they adhered to the Gospel alone? In that case, they ought to call themselves Biblicals: for it was not to the Gospel that they professed to adhere, but to the Bible. They are also some times called Reformers; and many people have been accustomed to call Protestantism, Reformation; but it is enough to pronounce this word now, to feel how inapt it is: religious revolution would be much more appropriate.

Note.—4 Count de Maistre, in his work Du Pape, has developed this question of names in an inimitable manner. Among his numerous observations there is one very just one; it is that the Catholic Church alone has positive and proper name, which she gives to herself, and which is given to her by all the world. The separated Churches have invented many, but without the power of appropriating them. "Each one was free to take what name he pleased," says M. de Maistre; "Louis, in person, might be able to write upon her door, Hotel d'Artemise. The great point is, to compel, others to give us a particular name, which is not so easy as to take it of our own authority." Moreover, it must not be imagined that the Count de Maistre was the inventor of this argument; a long time before him, St. Jerome and St, Augustin had used it. "If you hear," says St. Jerome, "that they are called Marcionites, Valentineans, Montanists, know that they are not the Church of Christ, but the synagogue of Anti-Christ."—(Hieron. lib. Adversus Luciferianos.) "I am retained in the Church," says St Augustine, "by her very name of Catholic; for it was not without a cause that she alone, amid so many heresies, obtained that name. All the heretics desire to be called Catholics; yet, if a stranger asks them, which is the Church of the Catholics, none of them venture to point out their church or their house (St. Augustine.) What St. Augustine observed of his time is again realized with respect to the Protestants. I appeal to the testimony of those who visit the countries where different communions exist. An illustrious Spaniards of the 17th century, who had lived a long time in Germany, tells us "that all wish to be called Catholic and Apostolical; but notwithstanding this pretension, they are called Lutherans, or Calvinists."—(Caramuel.) I have dwelt in the towns of heretics, continues the some writes, "and I have even seen with my eyes, and heard with my ears a thing on which the heterodox should reflect; it is, that with the exception of the Protestant preacher, and a few others, who desire to know more of the thing than is really necessary, all the crowd of heretics gave the name of Catholic to the Romans." Such is the force of truth. The ideologists know well that their phenomina have deep causes, and that their arguments are something more than subtilities. BALMEZ.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 26.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JUNE 28, 1851. [VOL. XX.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC

Calcutta: Saturday, June 28, 1851.

THE CASE OF THE BRAHMIN CONVERT AT MADRAS AND HIS NON-CONVERT WIFE, DOMMAUL.

JUDGE BURTON UPON EXCOMMUNICATION.

There is much wisdom contained in the maxim "Ne Sutor ultra Crepidam." And Functionaries raised in Society far above the condition of the humble Mechanic, for whose guidance the Poet spoke, might often profit of the lesson, which it contains. This reflection was forced upon us, by the perusal of the remarks made by the Hon. Judge Burton of the Supreme [illegible] in delivering Judgment in a recent case, in which a Brahmin Convert to Protestantism sought to recover his wife, a Hindoo, from her Pa she having left him on account of his version, and taken up her abode wit Father and Mother.

With respect to the learned Judge's decision in the case referred to, we, take it for granted, that it was in accordance with those principles of civil or municipal law, [illegible]y which it was his [illegible]ty to regulate his judgment. But we are not quite so assured, as to its conformity to the doctrine laid down by St. Paul, w of an analogous subject, sa "But if the Unbeliever depart, let him depart. For a Brother or Sister is not under servitude in such Cases." 1 Cor. VII. We make this observation because we poor Catholics are disposed to suspect that persons, who are eternally harping on the one chord of the Bible, the whole Bible and nothing but the Bible, would sought for any authority, by condescending to shun the comparability of their doctrine on a question of great moment in religion with that of the Supreme Standard which they profess to follow. But passing over this point for the present, we hasten to call the attention of our Readers to the following sentiments delivered on the same occasion by Judge Burton on the doctrine and discipline of [illegible]

"excommunication was a tremendous [illegible] power, and [illegible]hood, bears [illegible] too much resemblance to that of the Hindoos, and its working was most grievous [illegible] poor mind. [illegible] said [illegible] the despotismum."

"As for excommunication, the opinion of the nation had long [illegible] to scorn and made it obsolete, hundreds of years ago, but the 53rd Geo. 3rd extinguished even the form and name of it, and the like has been lately done in this country, by the Act XXI of 1850."

Coming from [illegible] one and educated Member of the Eng [illegible] Protestant Church, this language did, we confess, astonish us.

For, the learned Judge, it deserves to be remarked, does not merely speak of the abuses, which may have sometimes happened by occasion of the undue exercise of the power of excommunication, but of the power itself, of the very law itself, which he designates as a tyrannous law, imposed by a tyrannous Priesthood, and laughed to scorn HUNDREDS OF YEARS AGO by the opinion of the Nation, that is, of course the Judge means, by the English Protestant Nation.

What! we said to ourselves, on reading over these words a second or a third [illegible] dreaming, have we passed over [illegible] lusion, and is all the knowled[illegible] derived, as well from, perso[illegible] tion, as from books, current and deceptive? We then passed over in mind some of the sad realities, which in our early life, took place in our Native Country, when the terrors of Excommunication were resorted to, by the Protestant Clergy of the Established Church in Ireland, for the recovery of tithes, when an Archdeacon, with a Bible in one hand and a Pistol in the other, demanded of a Widowed Mother, to promise on oath over the Corpse of her murdered Son that She would pay those tithes for the refusal of which her Son perished before her eyes. From the rehearsal of our early recollections we turned our thoughts to one of those Books, the study of which had in our youth engaged some portion of our attention, viz. Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, but remembering that Judge Burton assured his hearers, that HUNDREDS OF YEARS AGO, the opinion of the English Nation had laughed excommunication to scorn and made it obsolete, we were perplexed to know how it was, that Blackstone's Commentaries continued up to the present time to be [illegible] Book in College [illegible] engaged in the [illegible] accordingly o[illegible] rionary to see how many centuries had elapsed since the [illegible] accordance with [illegible] we found, that only the compar[illegible] years had passed away, since that event occurred. We now began to feel [illegible] and we referred with confidence to that grave and learned Judge's Author, on the question of Excommunication. We subjoin verbatim his words, copied from the 3d vol. of his Commentaries. Chapter 7. Title "Private Wrongs." "Excommunication is described to be twofold &c. &c.:—

"The less and the greater excommunication. The less is an ecclesiastical censure, excluding the party from the participation of the sacraments: the greater proceeds farther, and excludes him not only from these, but also from the company of all christians. But, if the judge of any spiritual court excommunicates a man for a cause of which he hath not the legal cognizance, the party may have an action against him at common law, and he is also liable to be indicted at the suit of the king. (w)

Heavy as the penalty of excommunication is, considered in a serious light, there are, notwithstanding, many obstinate or profligate men, who would despise the brutum fulmen of mere ecclesiastical censures, especially when pronounced by a petty surrogate in the country, for railing or contumelious words, for non-payment of fees, arrears, or for other trivial causes. The common law therefore compassionately steps in to their aid, and kindly lends a supporting hand to an otherwise tottering authority. Imitating herein the policy of our British ancestors, among whom, according to Caesar (x) whoever were interdicted by the Druids from their sacrifices, "in numero impiorum ac sceleratorum habentur: abstiis omnes discedunt, aditum eorum sermonemque defugiunt, ne quid ex contagione incommodi accipiant: neque iis petentibus jus redditur, neque bonus ullus communicatur." And so with us by the common law an excommunicated person is disabled to do any act, that is required to be done by one that is probus et legalis homo. He cannot serve upon juries, cannot be a witness in any court, and, which is the worst of all, cannot bring an action, either real or personal, to recover lands or money due to him. (y) Nor is this the whole: for if, within forty days after the sentence has been published in the church, the offender does not submit and abide by the sentence of the spiritual court, the bishop may certify such contempt to the king in chancery. Upon which there issues out a writ to the sheriff of the county, called, from the bishop's certificate, a significavit; or from its effect a writ de excommunicato capiendo: and [illegible] thereupon take the offender, and [illegible] him in the county gaol, till he is reconciled to the church, and such reconciliation certified by the bishop: upon which another writ, de excommunicato liberando, issues out of the [illegible] and release him. (z) This process is founded on the charter of separation [illegible] of William the conqueror. "Si aliquis per superbiam elatus ad justitiam [illegible] venire noluerit, vocetur semel, secundo, tertio; quod si nec sic ad emendationem [illegible] excommunicetur; et, si opus fuerit, ad [illegible] fortitudo et justitia Regis sive [illegible] adhibeatur." And in case of subtraction of tithes, a more summary and expeditious assistance is given by the statutes of 27 Hen. VIII. C. 20 and 32 Hen. VIII. C. 7. which enact, that upon complaint of any contempt or misbehaviour to the ecclesiastical judge by the defendant in any suit for tithes, any privy counseller or any two justices of the peace (or in case of disobedience to a definitive sentence, any two justices of the peace) may commit the party to prison without bail or mainprize, till he enters

(w) 2 Inst. 623.
(x) De bello Gall. 16.
(y) Lit. § 201.
(z) F. N. B. 62.

into a recognizance with sufficient sureties to give due obedience to the process and sentence of the court. These timely aids, which the common and statute law have lent to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, may serve to refute that groundless notion which some are too apt to entertain, that the courts of Westminster-hall are at open variance with those at doctors' commons. It is true that they are sometimes obliged to use a parental authority, in correcting the excesses of these inferior courts, and keeping their legal bounds; but, on the other afford them a parental the insolence of contu rescuing their jurisdiction f which for want of sufficient would otherwise be sure to attend stone's Commentaries on the Laws p p. 101 to 103.

From Blacktone's Commentaries we p to the Book of Common Prayer, which an Act of Parliament assures written under the guidance of t Ghost. But happily, calling to m notwithstanding the Divine guaranteed by Act of Parlia of Common Prayer, as well as the had undergone several important and sub stantial changes, we took the precaution to have recourse to a very recent Edition of that Manual-one printed by Royal Authority and bearing conspicuously on its Title Page, no doubt, as a badge and token of its ortho doxy, the Lion and the Unicorn, the the exalted Personage, who is at once the Sovereign of Great Britain and the Supreme Head of the English Pr Church. We then o ne solemnity, and came at l lebrated 39 Articles, agreed upon, as the prefixed introductory declaration is by the Archbishops and Bis vocation of the year 1562, "for the of Diversities of opinions, and for th tablishing of Consent to gion." Calling to mind, perusal of this sentence, and admirable success of spoken of, in effecting a result site to that designed by th naturally had some misgivi truth of the Parliamentary the Book of Common Prayer was drawn up under the guidance of the Holy Ghost. However, for the moment we put our thoughts on this matter in abeyance, and read on until we reached the 33d Article, to which this heading is prefixed:

ARTICLE.

"XXXIII. Of excommunicate Persons, how they are to be avoided.

"That person which by open denunciation of the Church is rightly cut off from the unity of the Church, and excommunicated, ought to be taken of the whole multitude of the faithful, as an Heathen and Publican, until he be openly reconciled by penance, and received into the Church by a Judge that hath authority thereunto."

From the Articles, we passed to the Order for the Burial of the Dead, to which we premised the annexed Rubric:—

It is to be noted, that the Office ensuing is not used for any that die unbaptized, or excommunicate, or have laid violent hands upon ment here in order to nation, an educat- d Church, who the common Prayer hose testimonies before ination, as Judge engaged, it occur- s to Burnet's Ex- s, a Standard class the English Protes- had some key by that perplexed in this hope, For we found, the doctrine and but that he ling the scrip- the one and the other. After this, we of the approved hitism, a solution to ave already describ- fred to us, that as taken a more than the concerns of the that are now formed distinct from the orthodoxy on the it might have been ectors anxious to of excommunication ost important The first book we in our new enquiry he Free Church of lcutta A. D. 1847: t Treatise, we came How do you explain a person as record- Cor. II. 6. 7.

ANSWER.

"It simply amounts to this, that the guilty individual was to be publicly excommunicated."

So then we said to ourselves, St. Paul must have been "one of the tyrannous priesthood, that introduced the oppressive law of excommunication, which ages ago has been laughed to scorn and made impotent by the sense of Protestant England."

Being now satisfied, that even in this so recent outbreak of Protestantism, the language of Judge Burton upon Excommunication could find no support, we resolved to close our remarks for the present on the subject.

The reader will perceive that in our strictures we have resorted solely to Protestant authorities. It was [illegible] sword, that David slew [illegible] Philistines.

We desire, before we [illegible] word of respectful adv[illegible] and we trust, that the [illegible] adversary, certainly not [illegible] condescend to prof[illegible] classical recollectio[illegible] mind the words, [illegible] ceri." The experi[illegible] have acquired du[illegible] ought to have [illegible] that, discourteous [illegible] or discipline of [illegible] official or after-dinn[illegible] casion sever[illegible] Judge indi[illegible] by the bes[illegible] ment, whose [illegible] holds far more [illegible] representative c[illegible] Bench, and addre[illegible] posed of every cl[illegible]

The Duty he owe[illegible] to every class of the [illegible] eign, the respect he [illegible] as the constituted A[illegible] administration of ju[illegible] jects of every d[illegible] owes to his own[illegible] Gentleman and a[illegible] is under, as [illegible] Community, [illegible] ing among a[illegible] ations all imp[illegible] not utter[illegible] ful, or dis[illegible] sions of any [illegible] he is appointed to di[illegible]

The Nobles of ancient Rome [illegible] fully the statues of [illegible] who had rendered [illegible] their virtues, by their [illegible] tism, in order that by [illegible] might excite their children to emul[illegible] example of their progenitors. Judge [illegible] not destitute of such an incentive to the dignified conduct, which becomes his station. For many years his Uncle presided as one of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, in Ireland. He discharged that high office in times of great difficulty, when political animosities were rife among the people and even among the leading Members of Government. These animosities were often grievously embittered by the admixture of Religious prejudices. Yet in the midst of all these dan[illegible] Burton, an Englishman and a [illegible] believe, a Tory in politics, [illegible] with a prudence and mo[illegible], which justly obtained for him [illegible] his long and honorable Career, [illegible] sank into the grave, the confidence [illegible] alike of Catholics and Protes[illegible]

We cannot express a better wish for [illegible] representative at Madras, than [illegible] close of, we hope, an equally, long [illegible] course, he may retire from the [illegible] accompanied by similar senti[illegible] respect and regret to those, which [illegible] Uncle to the Tomb.

—ooo—

DISTRICT CHARITABLE SOCIETY.

The Morning Chronicle in one of its Num[illegible] on some day this week, we do [illegible] the particular date, accuses [illegible] charge of Partiality in the [illegible] against the District Cha[illegible] did not do so.—If the [illegible] had read as he ought [illegible] he presumed to act the [illegible] attentively, either the re[illegible] own late or even in [illegible] would, at once, have [illegible] no grounds for such [illegible]

[illegible] tained from prefer[illegible] against the Dis[illegible] we by no means feel [illegible] affirm, that we believe [illegible] groundless. No man ought [illegible] tion against others, [illegible] ory proof, that the [illegible] ed. But, neither is [illegible] if there exist many [illegible] reasonable cause [illegible] to pronounce abso[illegible] lutely, in favor of the innocence of the accused party. He may, and ought, in these circumstances, suspend his judgment, until such evidence be adduced, as will enable a conscientious person to come to a right conclusion on the subject.

Now, with all due respect, to the administrators of the District Charitable Society, we say, that the poor Catholics of Calcutta,

* The Catholic Population of the city of Madras is about 40,000 in number, whilst that of the Madras Presidency is upwards of half a Million of persons.

knowing as they do, that the greater portion of the Bequest Funds, which, in some way or other, have come into the power of the District Society, were left by Catholics and, doubtless, were designed, to a great measure, for the relief of their Fellow Catholics, who, the Bequeathers well knew, constituted the most numerous and destitute part of the Christian population of this city, we say again, that the poor Catholics are not to blame, if they entertain a general impression, that they do not get a fair proportion of relief from a Board of Trustees, which, however otherwise respectable, contains individuals of more than ordinary zeal, for what the cant of the day calls the spread of the Gospel, but which often means practically, neither more nor less than the proselytising by means of money dispensed as alms, Adult Catholics, and the consequent consignment of their children to some or other of the Sectarian Schools, with which Calcutta abounds, where the first lesson taught them will be to sneer at all the holy exercises and salutary restraints of Catholicity, and where, if they can be only got to hate sufficiently the Catholic religion, they will have full liberty to join the Baptists, or the Independents, the Methodists or the Quakers, the Mormons, or the Plymouth Brethren, the sect which the well known and once zealous Anglican Protestant, Mrs. Wilson not long since attached herself, having of course, previously by her private judgment discovered the errors of the Anglican Protestant Church. All we ask for in this matter, is that others should do by us, what they would, reasonably require, that we, if placed in their circumstances, should do by them. Now can any man assert, that a Community of poor Protestants would or ought to be content, if large Charity Funds left by their fellow Religionists chiefly for their relief were administered exclusively by Catholic Trustees for their conversion from heresy, and influenced by their Religious feelings, to exercise the trust in such a way as would be conducive to the advancement of Catholicity. We confidently say that no class of Protestants would or ought to be content with such an arrangement, neither ought the Catholic Trustees in such a case, if they respected their own character for justice and impartiality as they ought to do, be content, until they had associated with them such a competent number of Protestant Trustees, as ought to satisfy the reasonable apprehensions of the Protestant Paupers, as to the rectitude of the manner in which the trust was administered.

CONVERTS TO ROME.

(From the Morning Herald, April 15.)

It is evident that much caution is requisite in repeating the various reports of "Secessions to Rome" which are daily flying about. Within the course of the past week rumour has busied with the name of a noble duke, formerly an active partisan of the late Sir Robert Peel, and also with that of one of the representatives of a county in the west of England. We shall not repeat these rumours, because we know of no solid foundation for either of these reports. The case is different, however, with those persons, whose perversion has already been proclaimed in the public journals. The British public ought to be well informed, inasmuch as they are in close and constant communication with their priests and [illegible] persons to whom proselytism is made by apostate [illegible] Protestants. The Romish journals of the last few days have published the following names as converts to the Church:

"The following are the names of the reverend gentlemen of Leeds, whose conversions have been already announced:—Rev. M. Ward, Rev. T. Minster, Rev. J. C. L. Crawley, Rev. — Rooke, Rev. M. Coombes, Rev. W. M. Leatherwaite, Rev. M. Neville. Mesdames Ward, Crawley, Minster, Rooke, Coombes, Leatherwaite, and Neville, independent of other persons of the congregation, amounting, it is said, to about twenty, were also received into the Church.

"Last Sunday, Archdeacon Manning the brother-in-law of the Right Hon. Sir James R. Hope, Q. C., were received into the bosom of the Holy Catholic Church, at the church of the Immaculate Conception, Farm-street.

"The Rev. J. Henry Jerrard LL. D., Professor of Mathematics and Examiner in Mathematics and Physics in the University of London, formerly Fellow and Tutor of Caius College, Cambridge, was received into the Church on Tuesday, at St. Ian Spanish Place.

"At Rome, on 11th January, Miss Harriet Bridgman, of Staffordshire, was received into the Catholic Church.

"Mrs. Charles Turner, wife of the Rev. Charles Turner, late of Bardwell Park, Middlesex, was received into the Church, by the Fathers of the Oratory, on the 14th February. Mrs. Turner is a grand-daughter of the late Bryan Abbs, Esq., of Cleadon House, county of Durham.

"During the last month three clergymen of the Established Church have been received; their names are—Rev. Mr. Harper, of the Proprietary Chapel, Pimlico, London, received by Dr. Whitty; Rev. Henry Bedford, Curate of Christ Church, Hoxton, received by his Eminence Cardinal Wiseman; Rev. A. R. Johnstone, received by his former tutor, Rev. J. B. Morris, of Prior Park College, near Bath,

"We understand that five members of Dr. Pusey's conventual establishment in the Regents Park, which is patronized by the Bishop of London, have been received into the Church of Christ; and that several other conversions are likely to be hastened by Dr. Pusey's disingenuousness, especially in his long and laboured reply to Mr. Dodsworth and Mr. Maskell.

"On Wednesday week, Miss Scott, late Abbess of the Perth Protestant Convent, was also received into the Church.

"On Ash Wednesday, the Rev. T. L. Coghlan, late curate of St. John's Chapel, Torquay, Mrs. Dashwood and her two daughters, were received into the bosom of the Catholic Church, by the Rev. M. Power, of Tor Abbey; and on the following Monday Mr. Dashwood was also received into the Church, at the [illegible] Rev. J. Fanning.

"Rev. Edmond Coffin, late curate to Mr. W. H. Wilberforce, formerly of East[illegible]ingh, Kent, was received into the Catholic Church on Monday, 10th, at the Church of the Redemptorists, St. Trond, Belgium; his brother, the Rev. Robert Coffin, was received into the Church about the same time as the celebrated Mr. Newman.

"Mrs. Thwaites, wife of—Thwaites, Esq., of Blackburn, has also been received into the Church.

"Lady Elizabeth Charlotte Pest, niece to Sir Walter Scott, has been received into the Catholic Church, with her five children and two servants.

"There are three of the clergy of [illegible] who are either already received, or are ready to make their profession of faith."

Some of our readers may be surprised when we aver, that we are not alarmed by any or all of these secessions. Our chief anxiety is not caused by those who leave us, but by those who remain. When any man has wholly imbibed the spirit of the Romish system, and talks, as the Bennets and Dodsworths used to talk a year ago, of "the Catholics system,"—"the sacramental system," and the like, he can render the Church of England no greater service than to leave her;—he can do her no greater injury than to remain in her pale. Let us illustrate what we mean by briefly describing a fact which has very recently occurred.* In one of the principal villages to the north of London some benevolent ladies have long maintained a school for the children of the poor, managed and supported by themselves. They had selected a mistress, who came to them with the recommendations of two of the Chelsea clergy, and who professed to belong to the Church of England. A short time back, in consequence of some unpleasant rumours, a close inquiry was set on foot;—when, after some time professing adherence to the Church of England—the mistress was at last brought to admit that she had visited the Romish priest once, twice, perhaps more than six times—had confessed—in short, after long fencing, the plain avowal came out, that she had joined the Church of Rome in June last!

"And have you, since then, and while you continued mistress of this Church of England school, confessed to the priest?"—"Yes, to two priests." "And have they, knowing these circumstances, given you absolution?"—"Yes."—"Then I must tell you, that if you were to call in the first stranger that went by, and let him know that, while occupying this post, you have confessed and been absolved by your priests, he—any indifferent person—would declare that those priests were nothing better than a couple of rogues!"

Our readers will see that this circumstance has a direct bearing on Dr. Pusey's case. If a priest could sanction this schoolmistress in remaining in a Protestant school, Dr. Wiseman may sanction Dr. Pusey and twenty others in doing the same thing in a higher position. And this is the real peril—this is what we most dread. Of course, the ladies above alluded to would have judged it altogether suicidal to have retained such a mistress. But what is it, in the University of Oxford, when she retains in a high and responsible post a man who has visibly and directly sent to Rome more than fifty recruits [illegible] at five or six years?

 Our readers will please refer to our remarks, on this part of the article of the Morning Herald, published in our issue of to-day.

—ooo—

CONVERSIONS TO THE CATHOLIC FAITH.

We copy from the London Morning Herald, of April 15, an interesting account of the recent Conversion to the Catholic Faith of several learned and distinguished persons, whose names have not until the present been recorded in our Columns. To this narrative, the Editor annexes some very harsh and, as it seems to us, very unjust and uncharitable observations. This indeed, in the present state of English Protestant feeling, ought not to appear surprising to us. For it would be strange, passing strange, if the bad example given by the unworthy language and conduct of the Premier and the Chancellor were not imitated by many of their inferiors in Society, and even by persons, whose Protestantism is solely made up of a species of animal and blind hatred to Catholicity.

The article copied by us from the Morning Herald, animadverts severely on a certain School Mistress, a late Convert to the Catholic Church, who, it states, concealed her Conversion from the Directors of the Protestant School with the care of which, she had been charged, for the purpose of retaining her situation. The Ladies Patronesses, on being informed of the Conversion of their School Mistress, interrogated her on the subject. The Mistress acknowledged the fact, and added, that since her Conversion, she had gone to confession to two Priests, and that with their knowledge of her circumstances, and approval, she continued to retain the care of the School. With that impertinence and precipitancy, by which bigotry is ordinarily characterised, these Ladies Patronesses on hearing this statement of the Mistress, exclaimed —"that, any indifferent person, would declare, that those Priests were nothing better than a couple of Rogues."

Our readers, will, we hope, excuse us, if we detain them, whilst we offer a few remarks on that part of the article, to which allusion has been just made, and, first, we have to notice, that it is ordinarily a very distinctive mark of calumny, to prefer an accusation in so a vague and indefinite a manner, as may suit the purposes of the calumniator, and secure him against the danger of detection and punishment. Now this note of falsehood stands forth conspicuously in the accusation contained in the Editorial of the Morning Chronicle. "The occurrence, forsooth, is stated to have taken place in one of the principal villages to the north of London; a studious silence is observed not only as to the particular locality of the occurrence, but also upon the names of the two Priests, who are held up in such Lady-like language, "as no better than a couple of Rogues." Assuredly, if the occurrence were such as to justify a number of Ladies in openly designating two Priests as no better than Rogues, the case, with all its particular circumstances, might and ought to have been brought before the Public. It is evident, from the conduct and language of the so-called Ladies, that, on their part, there was no lack of effrontery or of envenomed bigotry towards the Convert and her Pastors, and hence, there are strong grounds to presume, that the Complainants deemed it far more prudent to send their accusation before the world in the vague indefinite mode in which it is published, rather than expose themselves to the consequences which might arise from such a full, and circumstantial detail of the place and parties, as would have enabled the persons accused to answer the charges preferred against them, or if necessary, prosecute their accusers for libel. One result, at any rate, of some moment, may be deduced from the principles laid down by the Morning Herald, when writing on the subject under consideration. If Protestants who boast of their liberality and enlightenment cannot endure, that their children should be educated by a Catholic Teacher, who carefully conceals even from the Pupils, his or her religious principles, they surely cannot consistently complain against Catholics as bigoted or illiberal, because these object to confide the education of their children to Protestants, who are not only avowedly such, but are for the most part openly hostile and discourteous in their language, and conduct towards every thing connected with Catholic doctrine or discipline.

We profit of this occasion to make mention of a somewhat similar occurrence to that related by the Morning Herald, the scene of which was the City of Palaces. A few years since, a respectable Catholic Mistress applied for a situation as Teacher in a certain Protestant Public School in Calcutta. The Testimonials of the Applicant were so respectable, that the Board of Governors (all Protestants) immediately engaged her without any enquiry as to the religion, which she professed. For a period of about seven years, this Lady continued in the Institution, affording the utmost satisfaction to all concerned in its welfare. Towards the close of that period, some trifling accidental circumstance caused it to become known to the Board, that she was a Catholic; of course the intelligence occasioned both surprise and confusion in their Councils. They became sadly perplexed as to the course they were now to adopt. On the one hand it was admitted, that the Mistress had for the long term of seven years given entire satisfaction to them, and not a single instance was attempted to be alleged, of her having obtruded her Religion, its doctrines or its practices in any way on her Pupils. On the other hand, they were at a loss to know, how they could safely and consistently with the recognised exclusive Protestantism of the Institution retain a Catholic Mistress. A sort of compromise was in the end resorted to. They consoled the Mistress with a few soft words of commendation, talked of their sense of duty, gave her as a Premium for her acknowledged ability and excellent conduct the sum of Rs. 150, and dismissed her from the Establishment.

—ooo—

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

On last Sunday the 22nd instant. The Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, administered the Sacrament of Confirmation to Eighty-Eight Candidates at St. Thomas' Church. On the same morning 160 persons received the Holy Eucharist. During the preceding week, nearly the same number communicated in St. Thomas' Church, to the great edification of the Faithful, who usually assist there at Mass on week days.

—ooo—

CHURCH OF THE SACRED HEART, DHURRUMTOLLAH.

The Feast of this Church was celebrated on last Sunday; a Grand High Mass was sung by the Vicar, Rev. Mr. MASCARENHAS, assisted by a full Choir. The Archbishop preached to a numerous and respectable Congregation. After the Sermon, Madam DE SOUZA, the Patroness and Founder of the Church, with her wonted courtesy and liberality, presented his Grace with a donation of Five Hundred Rupees, which the Archbishop immediately applied towards defraying the costs incurred for the erection of a New Dormitory and Offices for the Orphans of the Male Orphanage, attached to the Catholic Cathedral.

OBITUARY.

It is with great regret, that we announce the death of the Rev. William Grogan, in the 28th year of his age at the Cathedral House, on Sunday evening the 22nd inst. A Solemn Mass of Requiem for his eternal repose will be celebrated at the Cathedral by the Archbishop, on Monday next the 30th inst. at 6½ A. M. The Office for the Dead will be recited on the previous (Sunday) evening at 6 o'clock.

Requiescat in Pace. Amen.

—ooo—

FURTHER THOUGHTS ON THE ROMEWARD MOVEMENT.

(For the Bengal Catholic Herald.)

I.

Oh England! land of saints! where is the crown,
Which blest Augustine put upon thy head?
Where is the faith of Edward? is it grown
Antique—art thou degenerate grown,—or dead.
Land of Britania! art thou willing led
A captive to perdition?—where oh where?
Thy martyrs call thee from their lowly bed:—

Rise! Albion! rise! thy father's Faith declare,—
And for the Faith that's true, all persecutions dare!

II.

I grieve, fair Albion! for thy state I grieve!—
Oh! disobedient child! thy mother kind,
Urg'd by affection, wishes to relieve,
Thy disobedient,—nay thy orphan'd mind;—
Whence this indifference?—lurkest thou behind?—
Art thou asham'd to fly to her embrace?—
The murmuring streamlets, and the sighing wind,
All bid thee run,—move with a speedy pace,
To meet her who is e'er the fountain of all grace!—

III.

Oh Rome! may Heav'n thy righteous motive view,
And crown thy labours all, with full success;
May every blessing from thy toils accrue,
May faith shine in refulgence, and the dross
Of heresy all go in rage;—access
Give to true Faith;—and speedy may it reach
Its acme,—its meridian height,—depress
Heretic pow'r whilst all—and ever preach,
The doctrine which you taught,—the doctrine which you teach.

IV.

Albion! nor let the petrifying glance,
Medusa's head-like, of high lords appal thee, to retire from truth—approach!—advance!—
nd bravely conquer, or more bravely fall!
hy benefactress, mother, and thy all a prisoner;—be thou to thy God now reconcil'd, ind to thy mother;—go obey her call,— er call so sweet, so gentle, and so mild,
Rus milder far to thee, for thou art still her child!

V.

Thy bark is on a stormy, billowy wave,
The anchor of thy hope is lost, is drown'd,
The wind, and sail are impotent to save,
Thy drowning boat oh! Britain!—and around
No hope is left, no—not a Pilot found,
But one who'll save thee, but thou hear'st him not,
Oh! whence this blindness? not a step, nor sound,
That breathes the breath of hope to thee;—and ought
Not fear needs to thy hope—that comes unsought.

THOS. P. MANUEL.

Patna, June.

Elections.

—ooo—

"DUBLIN CITY" TO "DUBLIN'S SON."

To the Editor of the Morning Chronicle.

DEAR SIR,—To your kind care I transmit the Epistle hereunto annexed, requesting the favor of your placing its contents, through the medium of your columns, in the hands of my long lost, but now happily restored brother, DUBLIN'S SON!! and at the same time I have a duty to perform towards yourself Mr. Editor, namely, to express my unfeigned regret, for having in my former letter, which appeared in your issue of the 10th or 11th instant, accused you through mistake, of partiality in your official capacity, and it afforded me pleasure, on finding out the error which I inadvertently fell into, to see you had expunged the passage in question.

Your's, dear Sir,
With all good wishes,

DUBLIN CITY.

P. S.—My last letter, was likewise through mistake, dated 7th May, instead of 7th June.

MY DEAR BROTHER PADDY.—So we have found you at last, or is it yourself that's in it at all? well if it is.—how you have turned up after all! wonderful!! But how in the name of Oromwell did you turn over from your fine ould Religion that your ninety-nine generations belonged to, since hundreds of years before the days of that walloped the Danes black and blue, oh murthur! murthur!! To think that a man, that calls himself, my brother, should belong to the religion of such dirty spalpeens, as Luther and Calvin, and that arrant rogue, Knox, that some ould Doctor in England, Johnson I think they called him, Christened as the Ruffian of the Reformation; and so this is the company you have got into at last? Now if you are truly my brother, and that, like myself, you have come over the salt seas from "fair Dublin's town," you must have heard the story about Farrell's Black Goat, and how Neddy Farrell served him; and in like manner, I fear, I will have to serve you out, that is provided you are my brother at all, of which I am rather doubtful.—Well, Neddy Farrell every body knows, lived in Cook Street, and made wooden outside coats, and a fine shop he had—for at that time it was not the fashion to scrough three or four decent corpses, mother naked, into the same grave, Lord save us!! no, no, every body could taunt himself to a coffin of his own—well, as I was going to say, poor Farrell happened to lose his Buck Goat, and Aggy fellow he was, with a beautiful long beard, like the China man's tail, over Sara Smith's shop door, in Sackville Street, and for two whole days there was neither sale nor dilivery of the Goat when lo and behold! who should come into Farrell's shop one fine morning but the Beadle of Christ's Church dragging the Goat after him with a piece of a rope—sure you must recollect the old Beadle, and what a big red nose he had!! "Good morning to you, Mr. Farrell, says the Beadle"—"Good morning to you kindly, says Neddy." "I brought you home your Goat by order of Doctor Magee," says the Beadle, "who could me to shew you the damage he has done to the crimson cloth of the Pulpit, and how he eat nearly a whole Common Prayer that left Greirson and Keene's shop only a few days before." "The Devil take him," says Neddy, if he can digest that, he has got a stomach like the big boiler in Jemmah's Distillery." "True for you," says the Beadle, but the Doctor could me to tell you, that less than 40 shillings won't make good the loss and that he expects you will pay the money to save further dispute. "Confusion to me if I do," says Neddy, take him away with you and give my compliments to Dr. Magee and tell him that the aforesaid thief of a Goat, is the first living being belonging to the Farrels, that ever went to the Protestant Church, and that he shall never sleep another night in my premises—so, there he is, take the beast for the damage." The sexton, hummed and hawed and wanted to leave the Goat behind him, but Neddy stoutly insisted on his taking him away, and from that day to this, the Farrells never heard anything of poor long beard; he must have turned Protestant, after swallowing the Common Prayer; and now like yourself, Dear Brother Paddy, wishes all the evil in the world to the venerated clergy of your native land, poor ould Ireland, but what can be expected from you, when you call myself, that you have not seen for such a number of years, a usurper, and goodness knows how much besides, although we can trace our descent up to the time

Bryan Borough!

"When Malcolm wore the collar of gold,
Which he won from the proud invader."

Little I thought, when I wrote that letter to the decent Editor of the Chronicle in reply to the Calcutta Drummond's dirty attack upon my country, and creed, that a man calling himself my Brother and claiming of course, to be a son of Old Dublin City, was going to help that arrant defamer to his dirty work. "Ah ma conscience, as that Scotch fellow says in the play, but it's yourself that has the brass in your face; you join in the cry in that Catholics, both Priests and Laymen are taught that, to kill a Protestant, would not be a sin, and you say in your letter published in the Morning Chronicle of the 16th instant, that you have levelled Dublin City to the ground, with a blow from a little [illegible] of letters, published a few years ago in Dublin, entitled "A Word to Romanists and [illegible] Catholics." The proof required is all [illegible] Gave you say, and consequently my [illegible] man, that he could not find in all the world a Standard Catholic Book, in which such doctrine is inculcated—has been sufficiently disposed of. Then comes your extracts [illegible] wonderful little Book, I suppose published in Calcutta some years ago!!! how definite, how specific you are! a little Book of letters a [illegible] little Book, doubtless, something like "Cock Robin" or the History of the house, that Jack Built!!! not a whit more authentic, at all events. I suppose you have heard all about Pastor Fairy Mass, and the pious Device of the Pope's Bull!! Yes, anything will pass current with Sectarians of a certain stamp, as long as it is well larded with calumnies against Popery—you quote an extract from a "Dr. Geddes" as follows.—

"Infinitely more Christian blood has been shed by the Papal Empire and its agents for not complying with the idolatry of its worship than ever was shed by Rome Heathen."

Here I suspect we have the pious device system revived, and you wish your Dr. Geddes, who was Chaplain to some English Factory at Lisbon, and who was imprisoned by the Portuguese Authorities for his obtrusiveness to be taken for an eminent Catholic Divine of that name, whose testimony might be supposed to be conclusive in such matters and to shew up the latter as one honest enough to give evidence against a system, which he ought, instead of pulling down, to prop up, with all devotedness, in fact that his opinions were Protestanized, before he left the world,—you turn next to the Council of Toledo and after another extract, we have the question—"What says Calcutta Dublin City to this pious decree of the Council of Toledo, infallible as all Romish Councils are?" Here is my answer. All Romish Councils are not infallible, and such is not, and consequently never was, the Doctrine of the Catholic Church, which is as follows: An oecumenical or general Council, of the Universal Church, duly constituted with the Pope at its head, is an infallible authority in matters of faith, and its [illegible] to be received, as such, by the whole Catholic world.

2ndly.—No General Council ever assembled at Toledo !! ergo, the said Council never promulgated the doctrine, that it was lawful to kill Protestants. National or Provincial Councils, of which I believe there were four altogether held at Toledo, under the most Authoritative, could not claim more than local jurisdiction and obedience, and the context of the quotation, now so triumphantly levelled at my poor head, shows the famous Toledo Council to be a mere Coun-and Ridley for treason and rebellion against their lawful Sovereign, but will with all right-minded men deplore that even one amongst the number should have suffered such dreadful torments for a conscientious adherence to Protestantism. Having in my former letter fully disposed of the alleged cruelty against the Albigenses, it is not necessary to refer to it again. The Massacre of Paris, bloody and brutal as I grant it to have been, was a political measure, far more so, in my opinion, than a religious one; yet view it in any shape, it bears the odious stamp of cold-blooded cruelty about it, and I thank Heaven, that the Catholics of France, as a body, had just as little to do with it, as the great mass of English Protestants had to do with the Riots of the Gordon Mob—Bartholemew was the work of the hired assassin's arm, aided doubtless by other reckless and bad Catholics, whose dissolute and scandalous lives have afflicted and wounded their Holy Mother the Church; I deny the assertion, that a general thanksgiving for this atrocious deed was ever given at Rome with the sanction of the Church. Again, regarding the statement about "the poor innocent creatures who were slaughtered by Dragoons merely for having the Prince of Orange for their sovereign and Protestantism for their Religion;" I admit that the Dutch rebelled against their lawful sovereign and elected the Prince of Orange in [illegible]stead.

petty [illegible] appear to have assembled at Toledo. I will not, however, argue about the number, but will admit for argument sake, that the following extract is correct:—

"We the Holy Council promulgate this sentence or decree pleasing to God, that whoever succeed to the Kingdom (let me draw your attention to the Italics) shall not mount the throne till he has sworn among other oaths to permit no man to live in his Kingdom who is not a Catholic."

Now in the name of common sense what has this State decree, this political edict regarding the succession to the Spanish throne, to do with the foul assertion that Catholic Priests and Laymen, are taught that to kill a Protestant is no sin, meaning of course that it is all right to murder him in cold blood!!!

> For altho' in the midst of war,
> We may slay men,
> I hold it not right
> To do a deliberate murder.

and he, be he who he may, that charges us such, is a—villain, worse than the assassin—

> He who steals my purse steals trash;
> 'Twas mine 'tis his,
> And has been slave to thousands.
> But he, who filches from me, my good name,
> Robs me of that, which not enriches him,
> And makes me poor indeed!—

Next comes an allusion to Queen Mary and the fires of Smithfield, and the 285 persons that [illegible]ed during her reign. I shall not dispute many out of the 285 suffered like Cranmer Protestants—this out-Herods Herod!! Why man—for I never intend to own you for a brother again—if 200,000 Protestants were sent at one fell swoop from off the face of Ireland, "at one fell swoop!!" there would not have been a mother's son of the breed, left in the land to learn to bless himself! The allusions as to what Perionius avers, and Baldeirus asserts and Vergerius witnesseth, simply comes to this, that some thousands of Protestants belonging to some stamp or other, were cut up by Catholics. I grant that such has been the case, and in my former letter I have clearly [illegible] protestant authority too, the [illegible] to which the religious and [illegible] of these disturbers of public order [illegible] lead. And now having touched points mooted by Dublin's Son, I [illegible] coming to a conclusion. I have [illegible] throughout this too elaborate correspondence, that recrimination is not argument, I have shown up the atrocities of your Reformation in so foul a light, as to honest Protestant to be ashamed of [illegible]. While writing this letter, I have had at the Chronicle of yesterday, the 18th [illegible]—for not being a subscriber I do not see [illegible]arly—and I find that our Calcutta Drummond has come out again, with a fresh batch of Popish horrors cut and dry; they are one and all so foul and foolish, as to render them unworthy of a detailed reply. I will notwithstanding D. V. in my next letter, deal with them in such manner, as I consider the nature of the case may require, and will at the same time leave a margin wide enough, to shew the beauties of Protestantism for the edification of the rising generation of young Bengalees, for whose regeneration in the troubled and muddy waters of Protestantism, yourself, and my friend the "Layman," alias "Calcutta Drummond," is doubtless so very anxious,—yes!

Come Simon Magus, Judas, Calvin come,
All you old Heretics I summon
That like to Salamanders roam,
In fire eternal, rise and come!
Leave your Vulcanian Grottos, and,
Bask your broiled limbs on cooler land,
New bodies take in Bengala region,
By Braminical transmigration,
What Heresies you ever knew,
Bring in, and broach 'em here anew.

DUBLIN CITY.

Calcutta, 19th June, 1851.
[Morning Chronicle.]

THE PASTOR PHILPOTTS AND THE TWENTY-FOUR PRELATES.

Consult your bishop; be informed by your bishop; be advised by your bishop; be guided by your bishop;—such were the sum and substances of the recent address to the clergy bearing the signature of twenty-four prelates, and bearing also the peculiar marks of the bad grammar of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Well, we have now to assume that 800 clergymen of the diocese of Exeter act upon this recommendation, and yield up their understandings implicitly to the instruction of their bishop, and let us see what lessons will be [illegible] into the minds of these [illegible] according to the special exhortation of that twenty-four prelates, headed by the Archbishop of Canterbury. First, what are they to think of their Primate?

Their Bishop tells them, in a letter, which he calls Pastoral (though the style smacks much more of the bark and bite of the shepherd's dog than of the meek spirit of the shepherd's), that he can no longer hold communion with his metropolitan, who has become a fautor of heretical doctrines, and forfeited his right to Catholic communion. He charges the Primate with having renounced the divine Authority of his office, and with having flung the commission of Christ under the footstool of an earthly throne. He accuses him of a surrender that 'can only be regarded as the voluntary betrayal of a high and most sacred trust.' And he winds up this criminiation with one of those pious aspirations in which it is the wont of Dr. Philpotts to convey his most bitter imputations, accompanied with a prayer that the less uncharity may be repeated:

'Traditor potestatis, quam Sancti Magni Martiris Spiritu sub sua acceperat.' May it be a solemn [illegible] May the remembrance of it be accompanied with those penitentious feelings, which, if it be remembered as it ought, it cannot fail to carry with it! May it end, with God's blessing, in securing both the Archbishop, and the Church in which he fills the highest place, from all danger of his again forgetting the responsibilities of his sacred office!'

The Bishop soon afterwards finds, in the Primate's treatment of a certain sermon which he deemed objectionable, ground for impeachment:

That sermon I have myself read, and I can truly say, that I have rarely read one which puts forth plain apostolic teaching in a more sober or guarded tone. That it should have been received by the Archbishop as it was received, fills the mind with strange forebodings—with anticipations of coming trials which may God, who only can, avert! For indeed, this is no matter of every-day experience—no casual display of indiscretion, such as will sometimes occur in the administrations of spiritual power by one who, whatever be his endowments, is yet liable to error, like ourselves. No! it too plainly manifests the bent, or rather the fixed purpose of his soul. It points the course on which his onward march is resolutely set; it tells us what we have to dread—what to guard against—in a sincere and earnest mind, wielding, with principles like his, the vast power of the Primate of all England, the second spiritual Chief of Christendom altertus orbis Papa. That power is no longer a matter of speculation—it is a power in eager, intrepid, irresponsible action. Irresponsible! said I? That is a light word. It is a transcendent power, riding over every Bishop, and controlling the judgment of every bishop within his province. There is not one amongst us who, if he refuse to institute (as I shall, nevertheless, continue to refuse) any clergyman who shall teach as Mr. Gorham teaches, and as his Grace proclaims, that he has a right to teach—there is not one of us who will not find his [illegible] by the judgment of our Archbishop. [illegible] there is in his dealing with doctrine which he does not adopt of his own, he prescribes a cautious reserve respecting truths which yet he professes to hold. His disciplina arcani, it seems, intends the clergy henceforth to bring prominently before their people the 'dangerous' truth of the spiritual efficacy of Baptism; and texts of St. Paul which implicate it are henceforth placed in the index expurgatorius of modern hierarchy.

Our readers have of course not failed to remark that Dr. Philpotts places the Primate of England second to the Pope, assigning the first place in spiritual authority to Rome. But this is not the only sign of the cloven foot; through- [illegible] the Bishop's Tractarian affections are appa- [illegible] He thus defends the conversion of [illegible]hes into theatres, with the properties of showy decorations, spectacle, and music:

'Where the congregation consists mainly of the poorest orders, there we commonly observe a great love of a tasteful and even elaborate service. The ornaments of the Church, the painted glass—the painted and, it may be, gilded walls—the Table of the Lord, elevated above the rest, and decked with sober yet costly furniture—the pealing organ—the chanted Psalms—the surpliced choristers—the solemnity of the whole ritual—gladdens, while it exercises, their minds; they recognise in it their own high privilege as Christians, and rejoice to find themselves equal participants with their richest neighbours, in the homage thus paid to the common Lord and Father of all. In truth, when we consider the little which the poor man has to delight his heart, and to touch his imagination, in his own [illegible] home, we ought to rejoice that he can find enjoyment in the House of Prayer, his Father's House.

And the "enjoyment" which the poor man is to find in the house of prayer is to be akin to the pleasures which his eyes and ears derive from the representations of a theatre. He is to go to church to delight his heart and move his imagination with painting and gilding, costly furniture, ornaments, &c., while he listens to the deep lessons against the pomps and vanities of the wicked world, and the riches which are the root of all evil, and which the holy are exhorted to fly.

Dr. Philpotts, however, discerns a danger of much imminency, and denounces it as far more pernicious than Romanism itself, in which, forsooth he recognises, together with some taint of error, the embodiment of 'Faith itself;' and this danger is—but let the Bishop speak it in his own words:

It is necessary that you note well the spirit of the times, and guard your precious deposit with especial vigilance on that side from which the danger is most imminent—in other words, in this our generation, from Ultra-Protestantism—a system which, in its full-grown strength, (God grant, whatever be present appearances, that it attain not to that strength among ourselves!) is far more pernicious than Romanism itself; for Romanism, while it corrupts and mars the truth by accretions of error, more or less destructive, according to the varying conditions of the hearts on which they fall, does yet retain the whole body of Faith itself, which the other (accompanied though it often be by much of piety) mains and truncates, at the bidding of man's wisdom, squarring the Revelation of God to its own presumptuous measure of what is reasonable, good, and edifying.

And he thus bitterly condemns the spirit manifested by the country generally against the Papal encroachments, counting it, at the same time the Primate's warnings against Romanism:

Such a protest, issuing from the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury in a formal address to his clergy, and through them to the clergy, and unhappily, the laity of all England, could not fail to be made an instrument to swell an ignorant and fanatical cry against Catholic truth itself. Accordingly, it has been one of the stock materials of agitation at public meetings in the late crisis—a crisis, for which I scruple not to say, that for bigotry, credulity, and injustice, it has had no parallel since the two famous Popish Plots of Charles II's reign.

Bishop Philpotts' picture of the state of the Church is as follows, and certainly it is not flattering. He however, be it ever remembered, has had an active and considerable part in bringing about the distractions he describes:

The country agitated from one extremity to another by religious differences—all confidence in the rulers of the Church shaken—individual clergymen and laymen flying from the communion of such a Church, by reason of the paralysis under which it seems to them to be dragging on a worthless and lifeless existence;—a widely extended suspicion that many more—some it may be of our very best, most learned, most attached brethren—will soon follow, above all, I proposed that we should submit to her Majesty, that the only reasonable hope of staying the progress of the contagion is, that she will be graciously pleased, in accordance with the practice of the best and wisest of her predecessors, and with the dictates of constitutional law, to call together the authorities of the Church, and the remedies for the present distractions.

Now what are the clergy so summoned to do? The twenty-four Prelates have exhorted them to be guided implicitly by their [illegible] defer to his judgment in all [illegible] difficulty; and in obedience to his [illegible] we have seen to what opinions [illegible] they must conform, and that they [illegible] in all cases to the advice of their chief pastor, as pitch not to be touched without defilement, and unworthy the communion of a faithful brother. Here we have a practical test of the wisdom of the 'Address to the Clergy' which we lately ventured to question. The only chance for the peace of the diocese of Exeter and the armour of the Church, is that the clergy will be too wise to follow the advice of the twenty-four Bishops, and that they will treat the persuasions of their Bishop with no more respect than they deserve.

As we noticed a few of Bishop Philpotts criminations (and more than a few we could not cite, for to quote all would be to reprint the letter in extenso), it is but fair to mention that he does not spare himself, and confesses to culpable excesses of courtesy and delicacy! In the Gorham case he did not object to the presence of judges on the bench who were not Churchmen, nor to Churchmen in the highest ecclesiastical position, who had in the view of Dr. Philpotts, heretical leanings:—

The consequence has been most disastrous. Would that it affected me only! I should then be free from that self-reproach which I cannot altogether succeed in attempting to silence, that I rashly sacrificed the highest and most sacred interests of Catholic faith to feelings too much akin to courtesy and delicacy to individuals.

But for this heinous breach of trust Bishop Philpotts does not seem to regard himself as unworthy of communion with his episcopal brethren—the measure he deals out to his metropolitan for an offence not of greater magnitude—so intolerant is the holy man of the faults of others, so benignantly indulgent to his own.—Examiner, May 8.

LADY A[illegible]NDEL'S DEFENCE OF NUNNERIES.

To the Editor of the Times.

Sir,—Unbecoming as it would have been on my part to have made the slightest attempt to stem the torrent of abuse which has been so unjustly showered on all that is dearest and most sacred to us Catholics, I cannot allow the day to arrive on which Mr. Lucy's bill against our religious houses will be brought before Parliament, without making at least [illegible] the sake of the dear inmates of [illegible] peace and charity, by calling [illegible] generous members of the House [illegible] for protection and justice.

To Catholic ladies, who, like myself, have sisters and relatives in convents, it is, indeed, humiliating and most painful, that in England, hitherto considered the land of liberty, we should be forced to exert our influence to save those loved ones from the grossest inability, the most unmanly attempts now being made to deprive them of security, which even the meanest women slaves have insured to them. Can it be possible that to the members of the House of Commons, heroic virtue is so hateful that no insult is too great to offer those who dedicate themselves to its constant practice? Is divine charity so distasteful to English Protestants, that ladies by devoting their lives to its various duties should become objects so contemptible that they are to be deprived by law of the liberty granted to the meanest of their sex, even to the most abandoned? Oh, that such a reproach on Englishmen should go forth to the world? Hatred of Catholicity is a poor plea for so cowardly, so wanton, an insult to ladies.

Our countrymen must remember that those much abused convents are places in which nearly all the Catholic ladies have received their education, and though some few may have no relatives among the religious yet the affection these bear their angelic teachers, is the tenderness that persons will ever feel towards those whom from their earliest childhood they have respected and loved for their many virtues, their enduring kindness. Little do Protestants know the feelings of joy and happiness with which a lady returns to visit the convent where she has been educated; these are ever the brightest spots in her life, even be her lot among the happiest of this world.

To Catholics, who know by faith the day will come when these our spotless sisters will be fearfully avenged, and that those who now so cruelly insult and calumniate them will have to exclaim, in the language of Scripture- 'We fools esteemed their life madness, and their end without honour. Behold how they are numbered among the children of God, and their lot is among the saints:' that knowledge urges us the more to raise our warning voices, and call on those who know them not to be ware how they insult them.

But if that consideration has no weight. Oh let me implore those members who have Sisters and daughters to ask themselves, ere they treat will insult our sisters and daughters, what would they feel were we to do the like to them? Would they consider any language too strong for their just indignation and are our feelings one iota less keen because we look on those dear ones as the loved of God?

But not to dwell at greater length on this too painful subject, allow me, who have been entirely educated in a convent, and life in habits of intimacy with numerous members of religious communities, to ask those who credit their calumniators, how is it, if any one of the many charges has the slightest foundation, that those who like me have the most experienced should ever be the first to place their children in these very convents? What could any one desire more than that their daughters should be instructed by ladies of birth and the highest education, who are actuated not by worldly gain, but solely by the love of God and their neighbour? And here let me incidentally remark, that if Protestants would only reflect on these motives, the prejudice regarding the apparent insignificance of the pension, would at once be removed.

The tenderness I feel for my children is, I hope, quite as strong as the warmest hearted mother can know, yet the sacrifice of parting with a daughter for a time I cheerfully make, rather than deprive her of that which I know will cause her to bless the parents who deny themselves a present pleasure to insure the lasting advantage of a convent education.

Should these few remarks lead some of our more generous antagonists to hesitate ere they inflict cruel injuries on those who have never given them a moment's pain, I shall be more than rewarded for what it has cost me to address them in so public a manner.

With many apologies for trespassing so long on your courtesy, I am your obedient servant.

Wardour Castle, May 3.

TERESA ARUNDEL.

—Times, May 6.

FUSION OF SECTS IN THE REVOLUTION OF 1640 AND AFTERWARDS.

If in political ideas, from the school of Divine Right, through the educated Democracy of Milton, down to the wild Republicanism of the Fifth-Monarchy Men, all was confusion, the religious of the numberless secretaries was still less reducible to order. The mere names of the leading sects into which the church had dissolved itself in a few years are suggestive. Only to name a few of them, there were—Anabaptists, Antinomians, Antiscripturists, Antitrintarians, Arians, Arminians, Baptists, Brownists, Calvinists, Enthusiasts, Familists, Fifth-Monarchy Men, Independents, Libertines, Muggletonians, Perfectists, Presbyterians, Puritans, Ranters, Sceptics, Seekers, and Socinians, Peakes and Powell, worthies of the Anabaptists faith, openly preached at Blackfriars a war of conquest and extermination against the Continent of Europe. Their eyes lay more especially on the inheritance of the Dutchman: God, they proclaimed, had given up Holland as a dwelling place for his saints, and a strong-hold from which they might wage war against the great harlot. The Fifth-Monarchy Men protested against every kind of law and government: Christ alone, in their opinion, ought to reign on earth; and in his behalf they were anxious to put down all lawgivers and magistrates. The Levellers were at least as mad as any sect of Communists or Red Republicans of modern date. The national mind was in a paroxysm of morbid activity; and the bolder sort of spirits had cast away every restraint which creeds and councils, laws and experience, impose on men in ordinary times. Institutions which are commonly treated with a grave respect, even by the unbelieving, were made the subject of coarse jokes and indecent mummeries. In the cant of the time, a church was a tabernacle of the Devil, the Lord's supper a two penny ordinary. St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey were both used as stables for horses and as shambles for butchers. Hogs and horses were taken to fonts filled with foul water, and baptized according to the established ritual for the amusement of common soldiers, and the painted women who attended the camp as their paramours. Mares were allowed to foal in cathedrals, and the lowest troopers to convert the most sacred edifices into beer-shops. Even our venerable abbey, the resting place of kings and heroes, was for a time used as a common brothel. The sarcasm of the soldiers was, that as the horses had now begun to attend church the reformation was at length complete. Sober and religious men were equally insane. A sect arose which professed to believe that a woman has no soul, no more than a goose. Another body of grave men believed there is no difference between good and evil. Atheists became numerous; and, as usual, atheism was attended with the lowest and most debasing superstition. In more than one part of the country prostitution was practised as a religious ordinance. One fellow was found with no less than seven wives; another had married his father's wife; a third, after having seduced a wretched woman, gave out that she was about to be delivered of the Messiah. Hundreds of persons set up as prophets; and several men a little madder than the rest, were sent to Oxford gaol for declaring themselves to be God Almighty come down from heaven; but once locked up, their godships did not enable them to open the prison-gates. From Newgate downwards, the prisons were full of these fanatics—fools or knaves, whom nevertheless thousands of their countrymen regarded as holy martyrs suffering from the children of this world the injustice which has ever been the portion of prophets and apostles. A fact that is particularly curious is, that the fanaticism usually commenced in the higher classes—among magistrates, colonels in the army, ministers of the Gospel and gentlemen of estate. It was only by degrees that the madness descended to the lower orders of society. A person of wealth and standing in Warwickshire shut himself and his family up in his house to starve, from a fanciful sense of religious duty; and when the neighbours broke into the house, they found one of the children already dead. On Sunday, a respectable tailor named Evan Price, got up in one of the City churches in the middle of the sermon and declared himself to be Jesus Christ in person. The congregation of course made some stir, and the tailor was taken before the Lord Mayor—a magistrate who, it is to be supposed, in such matters, would be maintained the correctness of his decisions by being able to prove it by showing the marks of the nails in his hands by which he had been fastened to the cross sixteen hundred years before. When acting under any strong excitement, the folly of mankind is illimitable. To verify the text Man shall not live by bread alone, one of the prophets set to do without eating. The text proved to him a dread letter; for he expired just as he was on the point of establishing the prediction. Yet these were not the most revolting incidents of the revolutionary period. A fiend in the guise of woman offered up her child as a sacrifice, in imitation of the Hebrew rites; another crucified her mother. Yet with all this folly, blasphemy, and madness, a deeply religious spirit possessed the nation; and a general toleration for the sects which grew up under the excitement was one of the happiest issues of the Commonwealth.—Dixon's Life of Penn.

SECESSIONS.

The French papers announce the Conversion to the Roman Catholic Church of the Rev. M. Spiramandage, who has made his profession at Marseilles.—Morning Chronicle.

Baron Constantine Thaizer, son of one of the principal bankers at Augsburg, has just embraced the Catholic Faith, and intends it is said to take holy orders.—Cape Colonist.

CATHEDRAL MALE ORPHANAGE.

UNDER THE CARE OF THE CHRISTIAN BROTHERS.

The present Dormitory of the Male Orphanage affording accommodation only to forty four Children, and the number of Inmates being now fifty-four, whilst applications are almost daily made for the admission of other destitute Orphans, it is proposed to erect by Subscription a second Dormitory and Offices, in order both to meet the existing exigencies of the Institution and to enable the Christian Brothers to extend its Benefits still more widely.

SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Archbishop Carew, ...	Rs.	50 0
Mrs. Young, ...		50 0
Mr. P. A. D. Rozario, ...		50 0
Mrs. Dr. W. B. O'Shaughnessy, ...		25 0
Mrs. O'Brien, Chinaringhee, thro' Rev. Mr. Kennedy, ...	Rs.	10 0
Rev. Mr. Kennedy, Rector of St. John's College, ...		10 0
Barrister O'Brien, ...		25 0
Mr. P. Daly, House of Correction, ...		30 0
Mr. J. W. Sayers, Futtypore, ...		10 0
[illegible]connell, ...		10 0
Mr. J. M. Fleury, ...		4 0
Mrs. M. A. Fleury, ...		4 0
A Catholic, thro' Mr. Guzman, ...		100 0
Mr. James DeSouza, ...		50 0
Mr. D'Silva, thro' Rev. Mr. Garriga, ...		2 0
A Catholic, thro' Rev. Mr. Tracy, ...		100 0
Rev. Mr. Tracy, ...		20 0
Mrs. James Beaven, ...		10 0
Mr. P. Jo[illegible]		50 0
Rev. P. [illegible]rmoza, ...		20 0
Miss Teresa Mack, ...		4 0
A Catholic, thro' Rev. Mr. Tracy,		16 0
Mrs. Phillips, ...		8 0
A Widow and Orphan, ...		8 8
A Friend to the Orphans, ...		5 0
Mr. J. Cornelius, ...		10 0

THE

BENGAL

CATHOLIC HERALD

One Body and one Spirit--one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.

VOLUME XXI.

Calcutta:

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHAN PRESS.

1852.

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL.

	Page.
All Soul's Day,	255
An Address to the People on the choice of a Religion,	241
Angelus Bell, intolerable to English irreligion, (The)	209
Appalling consequences of Religious Bigotry,	351
Appeal in behalf of the Catholic Mission at Graham's Town,	299
Assam Mission,	89, 285
Bengal Catholic Orphanages, 20, 22, 62, 256, 285 323	355
Bhaugulpore	143
Bible (The)	129
Bible in Italy (The)	116
Bishop Borgha, (The late)	299
Calcutta Catholic Schools	143
Cape of Good Hope,	311
Case of Metairie and Cardinal Wiseman, (The)
Cathedral Orphanage and Day School,	272
Catholic Mission at Cuttack,	49
——— Mission at Assam,	48
——— Mission at Berhampore,	45
——— Mission in Assam, erection of a Catholic Chapel in Nowagong, 212,	239
——— Mission in Ava and Pegu,	128
——— and Protestant Missions and Missionaries,	114
——— and Protestant Missions in Ceylon, (The.)	31
——— Soldiers at Chinsurah,	284
Catholicity in Ceylon,	173
——— in the Dark Ages, 61, 75, 91,	130
——— its Progress and Prospects,	59
Chittagong Convent,	214
Christmas,	349
——— Collection.	324
Christianity in Ceylon,	33
Circular...	90
Clapham Convent,	4
Commemoration of all Souls,..	240
Continued and incurable spread of dissention in the Anglican Protestant Church, 293, 307,	321
Convent Boarding and Day School for Young Ladies, at Intally,	353
Conversions, 131, 161, 174,	216
Conversion to the Catholic Faith of the Hon. and Rev. Dr. Law, Chancellor of the Diocese of Bath and Wells,	265
Correspondents (To)	203
Creed of the Universalists,—Mormonites &c. 1, 17, 29, 43, 57, 71, 97,	125
Darjeeling,	240
——— Loretto Convent Boarding and Day School,	239
District Charitable Society, 19, 45,	74
Election in Ireland,	4
Englishman, versus the Bengal Catholic Herald, (The)	228
Extraordinay gathering together in London of Heretics and schismatics of every denominations,..	225
Extract on the Sandwich Islands Mission,..	114
Facts and Correspondence relating to the admission into the Catholic Church of Viscount and Viscountess Fielding by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Gillis,..	195
Florence,	85
Friend of India and the Bengal Catholic Herald (The)	170
Friend of India and the Catholic Hierarchy	156
Gratifying Prospects of the Catholic Mission at Bellary	36
Guy Fawkes, the Fifth of Nov. in Calcutta, and the Morning Chronicle,	267
Hon. and Rev. Mr. Osborne's letter on the Irish Poor,	289
Intally Female Orphanage,	272
Introduction of Schools of Industry, for the youth of the East Indian community,	73
Ile de Bourbon, or Reunion Island,	309
Jacobite Relics, 34, 46,	102
Journal of a Tour in France, 159,	173
Jackerstreen, Mr. James F.,	323
Letter from Adelaide,	309
Letter of His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew Abp. (V. A. W. S.) to P. S. D'Rozario, Esq.	215
Lord Russell's Penal Law: or the Preposition of versus the Prepositions in or at: Catholic Statistics,	129
Loretto House, Boarding and Day School, Chowringhee,	352
Lative Homœopathic Hospital and free Dispensary...	311
In the Canonicity of the Second Book of Maccabees,	254
Mantain Fibre Cloth,	215
Mont de Galle,	5
Present state of the Anglican Protestant Church,	237
Propagation of the Faith	21
Prospectus,	324
Protest against the Doctrine, laid down recently by the Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury upon the non-necessity of Episcopal ordination,	273
Protestant Episcopal Church of Scotland....	157
Puseyism and Gorhamism, or High Church versus Low Church 139, 153 167,	181
Rev. Father David (The late)	113
Simla,	171
Sir J. E. Tennent,	15
St. John's Chapel,	240
St. John's College 20, 49, 90, 118, 143, 173, 184, 271, 273, 322,	216 352
St. Thomas' Church,	240, 252
Summary of Religious and other Intelligence received by the late Mail	3
Spain,	4
The Archbishop of Canterbury and Mr. Gawthorn,...	251
The Exodus of the people of Ireland,	335
The Important benefit, which results to the Catholic Community of Bengal from the several Schools and Institutions, now established here for the youth, of that Community,	270
The Morning Chronicle versus the B. C. Herald,	281
The Hurkaru and its slanderous assertions.	59
The King of Naples—The Emperor of Austria—The Prisons at Rome,..	297
Third Quarterly inspection of the Bengal Catholic Male Orphanage, and of the School of Industry; Christian Brothers' School at the Cathedral and Bow-Bazar: Orphan Press, &c. &c...	208
Transfer of the Serampore Church from the Baptist Missionaries to the English Protestant Bishop of Calcutta, (The)	113
Unjust and Illegal Religious Intolerance in the Indian Navy,....	223
Vienna and the Austrians, by Mrs. Trollope,	201
Vizagapatam,	74
Voltaire an Apologist for Religion,.. 37, 117, 158,	243
Whigs, their History and Character,	47

Selections.

	Page.
A Lecture at——College Ireland,..	232
A lecture delivered in St. George's Catholic Cathedral, Southwork, on the evening sunday, June 22nd, By His Eminence Cardinal Wiseman,	217
Address of the Catholic Hierarchy of Canada, to Cardinal Wiseman	136
Agapamone,	25
Allegations concerning the Orleans Family (the)	290
An Australian Tree,	333

Page.

Anglican Protestant Bishop and Parson disputing about Baptism at Calombo, (the) 328
Anglo-Italian Mission... .. 135
Anglican Protestantism, ... 334
Another Crime, Thanks be to God, 80
Another Schism among Protestants, 63
Archbishop Parcell on the Bible,..... 261
Archbishop of Canterbury and the Tractarians, (the) 319
Archbishop Parcell on the Apocalypse, .. 187
Archbishop of Tuam preaching in London, .. 315
Asia, ... 359
A Sunday at the Mormon City, ... 94
Beams in our own eyes (the) 303
Bigotry Rampant.... 133
Budhism and its connection with Government, .. 305
Catholic and Protestant Missions and Missionaries.. 99
Cape Protestant Mission and Missionaries ..54, 100
Catholic Priesthood in India 101, 132
Catholic Worship in Fort William 144
Catholic Orphanage (the) 355
Catholic University (the)—Letter from Portugal, .. 360
Catholicity in the Dark ages 103
Catholicity and Protestantism 93
Causes of Protestantism, ... 79
Ceylon 102
China, ...64, 244
Clergy Mutiny, ... 84
Colonel Curtis' interview with his Holiness, plus, IX. 50
Commissioner of Police and his Brothel, ... 347
Cochin China, execution of a Missionary,.... .. 256
Controversy on the Rule of Faith between Rev. Messrs. Hughes and Brackenside, ... 185
Cost of English Protestant Episcopacy (The) .. 194
Converts to Rome 131
Conversions,..... .... 28, 231, 244, 273
Conversion of another celebrated Clergyman of the established Church to Catholicity 5
Conversion at Aden, ... 243
Delanda est Hibernia, ... 326
Death of the Right Rev. Dr. Borghi, .. 217
Decree, ... 37
Death Franchise, ... 83
Democracy in Practise 104
Dissolving views of Lord John Russel's Political Theology 145
Dr. Newmans' Lecture,.. 133, 151, 165, 180, 190, 205, 215, 259, 300, 317, 342
Ducal Apostate and the Protestant Press, ... 319
Electro-Magnetic Locomotive in the United States .. 97
Erne (The).... 107
Falsehoods of the Proselytising Agents, ... 361
Flowers of Heaven 137
Fortification of the Church, ... 76
Feudalism in Germany,.... 250
Genuine Heroism, the Scapular, ... 311
Germany, ...18, 358
Govindghur 101
Heresy Witnessing to the Church, ... 345
Increase and organization of crime in England (The,) 291
Infidelity in England, .. 220
Insult to the Roman Catholics. 27
Intolerance in the Army, .. 63
Ireland and the American Minister. 332
Ireland, ... 27, 288, 316
Irish land Laws judged by the Irish Census, .. 178
Is there an established Church in India, ... 345
Italian Beggers in the United states, ... 70
Italy..... 257
Journal of a Tour in France, ... 204
Kohl's Scotland, Protestant Missionaries,.. 161
Lectures on the present position of Catholics in England &c 274
Letter of Monsignor Liquet to Sir, Robert Peel, Bart. M. P. 9
Letter of Dublin City. 22
London shop-keepers and the Papal Agression, .. 38
Madras Examiner 14
Malta 27, 305
Madden's (Mr.) Testimony upon Protestant Missions in Turkey, Egypt, Nubia, Palestine 102
Massacre of French Seaman by Caribals, .. 83
Mental condition of Father Newman (The). .. 286
Mission of Eastern Bengal (The),.... 286
Miracles of Modern Travelling, ... 319
Model Liar (The) 356
Most interesting Conversions, ... 325
Mount Melleray—Its Schools—Annual Exhibition.. 327
Movements towards Catholicism in Persia .. 7
Mormonites (The) 11, 51
Mormons and their state 105
Mormons (The).. 136
Naples, ... 358
Native Mission of Eastern Bengal (The), ... 285
New Reformation (The), ... 336
Nova Scotia, ... 371
On the use of Latin langua the liturgy of the Roman Catholic Church 207
Opinions of American Protestant Ministers or Slavey and Fugitive slave Bill, ... 69
Prospects of an Australian Revolts 333
Proposed Controversy with Cardnal Wiseman, .. 174
Protest against the Archbishop of Canterbury, .. 292
Protestant Intolerance at Kurrachee 52
Protestant and Roman Catholic Clergy in India, .. 77
Protestant Mission and Missionaries 162
Punch and the Morning Chronicle, ... 41
Punch Auction of Souls,—Pulpit and Hammer,.... 208
Puseyism 163
Raffle for a Negro, (A) 306
Review,.. ..... 55, 147, 264, 277, 331
Richard Lalor sheil, ... 95
Roman Catholic Chapel and the Government (The) 92, 133
Rome. 5
Scotland 132
Sir W. Burton's Dicision in the Convert Case, .. 13
Switzerland 99
The Archbishop of Canterbury and the High Church party,.... 249
The Archbishop of Canterbury and Mr. Gawthorn,.. 237
The Battle of a name, ... 68
The Case of the Brahmin Convert at Madras, .. 11, 26
The Edinburgh Presbyterian Clergy and the Annuity-Tax, or Calvinistic Tariff, ... 56
The Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, ... 176
The Great exhibition and American slavery, .. 67
The Hon. and Rev. Mr. Spencer, ...66, 78
The Imprisoned of the Revolution—The young Duchesse D. AuGoulcme and her Brother, .. 246
The New Roman Catholic association, ... 29
The Times and the Priests,.. 289
Twelfth Part of the Christian Intelligencer, .. 329
United States, ... 65, 330
Unseemly Church Scene 104
Vegetarian Society (The) 236
Vienna and the Austrians, by Mrs. Trollope,.. .. 248
Walpole's Hopes (Mr.) 83
What will the Bishop Do. ? 343
Which is the Christian here and which the Jew ? . 81
Wilberforce's Lectures (Mr. H. M.) 312
Wolverhamptou Union work house Catholic Orphan Children,.. 138
Wretched state of a portion of the Population of Female in London, ... 304

POETRY.

A Petition from the Letter H. to the Inhabitants of Worcester, Workwickshire, Shropshire, &c. .. 22
A Calvanistic song,.. .. .. ibid
Christmas Hymn,.. 341
Hymn by Edward Kenealy, to the B. V. Mary, ... 256
Jesus, ... 216
Love of Jesus, ... 22
May you die among your Kindred, ... 311
Oh! Fair, Oh Purest! 76
On the Catholicity of the Church. 91
Parody,.. 231
Requiem,.. 5
The Convent Bells, ... 231
The Soul, ... 6
The one Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church, .. 37

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD

EXTRA.

GRATIS.] CALCUTTA:—SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1851.

THE TITLES BILL DEBATES. POSITION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

London, Wednesday Night.

The Ecclesiastical Titles Bill drags its slow length along amidst repeated debates, and with very little progress. The most remarkable division in every way in half Friday night, in which 201 members so voted—and a good many other members without voting, expressed the same opinion—that in making what is the cant of the times is called the Papal aggression, the Holy See had received direct and distinct encouragement from the Whig Government. Two hundred and one members of the House of Commons vote this, and a great many more believe it. Those who do so are the best informed people in the country. They vote it and believe it, after due inquiry, with all the facts brought carefully before them, and when a Goverment singularly unscrupulous prodigiously fertile of lies has done its best to perplex the truth, to disprove the charge, and to clear themselves from the imputation. Two hundred and one members having heard all these Whig falsehoods and lying evasions solemnly pronounce them to be false, and declare that Lord John Russell formally encouraged the Pope to establish a Catholic Hierarchy in England. Nay, some of the two hundred and one, and those not the least distinguished for honor and veracity, maintain that to affirm Lord John Russell's encouragement of the Papal aggression is to affirm a truism, is comparable to affirming the simplest arithmetical proposition. Not merely did Lord John, in their opinion, encourage the Papal aggression, but his having done so is as clear as that "two and two make four."—Tablet.

was addressing the house.
said, over and over again,
of the See of Rome was to the Protestant feeling of Last Friday night 202 mem-s of that house were ready to vote for the ion of the honorable member for Stafford.
form of that motion was, that the not See of Rome had been encouraged by ceedings of the government, and that the truth. (Hear.) He believed it—he ready to prove it—and he would give the down greater evidence then, in 1844 and this subset every-aid before.

I pledge to the country, and the thing is settled as it ought to have been." But in February, 1846, after been gazetted as noble lord said:—

"But I own I do not think that this is a matter of very great importance. It was very agreeable to the feelings of the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops that they should be called by the titles by which they are usually designated. They have received those titles; but that does not imply any legal claim to authority, and I cannot conceive, therefore, that it is necessary for this house to take any proceedings in the matter."

But he found the noble lord's colleagues more impetuous and more anxious that no doubt should remain on the mind of the See of Rome as to what it ought to do. On the 27th of July, 1849, he found that, in the House of Lords, Lord Redesdale put a question to Earl Grey, and that noble lord declining to answer, a colleague sitting beside him thought he was acting injudiciously, and said that if any Cardinal came over to this country, every one would call him "his Eminence." The noble lord who gave that answer was the Earl of Carlisle, and yet, in face of those assertions, the noble lord spoke of the insult of the See of Rome, when, reading those declarations in the houses of parliament, it appointed a Bishop to preside over the spiritual interests of Roman Catholics in this country. (Hear, hear.) It happened that he (Mr. Keogh) was at Rome when all this mischief occurred; but a remarkable fact came to his notice there, and he had no doubt that the noble lord the foreign Secretary was aware of the fact. Cardinal Wiseman was created Archbishop of Westminster, and directly the matter was published it was a subject of great rejoicing in Rome. Now, this country has a diplomatic representative at Rome. We have a consul located there, and over the doors of his mansion were placed the British arms. He (Mr. Keogh) saw the dwelling of the British consulate brilliantly illuminated in honour of the appointment. (Hear, hear.) A British subject, the British consul, the representative of the British government at Rome, illuminated his mansion in honour of the appointment of a Bishop of Westminster. (Hear, hear.) Was the See of Rome, then, to be under the impression that nothing would be so distasteful to the British government as that appointment for which the British consul had illuminated his mansion? (Hear.) The noble lord had made a great deal of the subject of synod in Ireland: he said that all might have gone quietly but for that Synod of Thurles, which interfered with internal affairs. The noble lord said that that Synod had met, and, for the first time for three hundred years, had passed certain resolutions; but he must tell the noble lord that since his famous Durham letter, no man would venture to say that the Catholic people of Ireland ought to send their children to those seminaries. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. Keogh) might turn to those fifth-rate men who made themselves the lecturers out of that house of those whose opinions he entertained, but who, in that house, never uttered a word—("Hear," and a laugh)—and he would ask them where would have been the cause of parliamentary reform if Catholic Emancipation had not been carried? Where would have been the cause of free trade, or where might it be, if the Roman Catholics declared against it? (Hear.) But he was consoled on that part of the subject by reflecting that there was not one distinguished Freetrader who was not against this bill. The distinguished members of the late Sir R. Peel's government were against it; Mr. Cobden, Mr. Gibson, and Mr. Hume were against it—(hear)—and with that support, they whose views he supported could afford to smile at the sneers that were put upon them by the small fry that surrounded him. (Laughter.) He would warn the noble lord, then, before he put this bill upon the table, that by it he might arouse again among the people of Ireland, who were just emerging from the consequences of pestilence and famine, and just reaching perhaps the shore on a frail plank, the fanatical spirit of sectarian animosity, and perhaps involve them again in another twenty years' struggle. If indeed the struggle should come, the result would be, he was convinced, as it had been before, victorious to the people of Ireland, and never would they sheathe the sword until they had deprived those who had oppressed them of the power of oppression. (Cheers.) They won that struggle before, and they would win it again. The noble lord boasted—and, he did not retract all he had done, it was the proudest boast he could make—that he assisted them in recovering and reclaiming religious liberty. If then, by a tyrannical majority in that house, the noble lord struck down their liberties that night, they would go forth from that house, and would never cease until they had re-established them. They would never be intimidated by momentary defeat. They had braved scenes of persecution: the avenging sword of Cromwell was upon them; the insidious treachery of the Stuarts beset them; exactions and confiscations—he used the word openly, plainly, and advisedly—the confiscations in which the ancestors of the noble lord had taken so conspicuous a part, were upon them. But they had triumphed over them, and would triumph again; and they would do so, not forgetting their allegiance to their Sovereign; but, while acknowledging that allegiance, they would con-

THE BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.

No. 1.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1851. [VOL. XXI.

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, July 5, 1851.

CREED OF THE UNIVERSALISTS—MORMONITES &c. &c.

Their respective Creeds and Code of Morality, proved by History to be an inevitable result of the primary principle of the Reformation.

In our issue of the 14th instant, we copied from the London Spectator an extract, in which, a Correspondent of that Journal gives an interesting account of an accidental interview, he had with a Clergyman of the Universalist Sect, whom he describes, as a very benevolent and also as a well educated person. According to the report of that interview, the chief heads of the Universalist System may be reduced to the following propositions:—

1st. No exact statement of their doctrines is to be met with in books, their doctrines not being as yet digested as they, (the Universalists) are only in fact beginning to philosophize their opinions.

2nd. The Universalists profess a very large measure of toleration, admitting among them men of almost all other sects—all agreeing to make their special doctrines non-essential, and to unite on the ground, that all go to Heaven together.

3rd. Morality is a condition to the attainment of future happiness. Each Man goes to Heaven with the dispositions and relishes he has at the moment he leaves this world, and being thus in a more or less fit state for the enjoyment of Heaven, occupies a higher or lower position of happiness, according to the life he has led on earth, and takes a longer or shorter time to progress towards the [illegible] enjoyment of the heavenly Heaven, and as there are different orders in Heaven, and a Man's behaviour may be said in a sense to determine his condition in Heaven for all eternity.

4th. Different forms of belief are suited to different Men, to different Classes, and to different periods—Good Men may be found in all sects, even among the Mormons, for excepting Polygamy, there was not much absolutely reprehensible in the Mormons.

5th. It seems dubious, whether there be absolutely any such thing at all as religious truth, and even if there be, it seems still dubious, whether the belief of it be essential or non-essential.*

Before we proceed to the examination of each of the preceding series of propositions, we deem it useful for our readers, to lay be-

* The 4th and 5th propositions announce the [illegible] the Universalist Clergyman himself and are accepted by Universalists by us, [illegible] as much as the Clergyman evidently regards them as perfectly compatible with the system of the Universalists.

o them an historical account of the origin of the sect now generally known by the name of Universalists:—

"UNIVERSALISTS—Are those that hold out universal salvation to all mankind indiscriminately, and even to the wicked spirits themselves—after undergoing a sharpish kind of purgatory in the other world. Their system certainly would appear [illegible]itable, were it not subversive of sound [illegible]anxious doctrine and christian revelation. But, [illegible]unately, it has been long ago discarded in [illegible]niversal church as equally inconsistent with both, and at a very early period of christianity anathematized as erroneous and heretical. Its votaries fail not to urge in favor of the scheme some specious arguments and ingenious conceits, well calculated to stagger the credulity of the ignorant and the weak in faith; but those that listen to the precepts of Jesus Christ, ordering them to hear the church, and to believe its pastors in the definition of doctrinal truths,—have a safer guide than human reason, even the Spirit of truth itself, to preserve them from pernicious errors.

Of Universalists there are various descriptions; but all agree in the leading, or rather the only fundamental doctrine of the sect, which is the final restoration of all without exception, even the fallen angels, to eternal happiness. The Rellyan Universalists, so called from a Mr. Relly formerly a Calvinistic Methodist preacher, with the Quakers reject baptism, and will have nothing to do with ceremonial ordinances. They maintain, that no works are necessary [illegible]ry [illegible]the good, and relieving the miseries [illegible]ve doc[illegible]. Th[illegible] of their fellow creatures—[illegible]about reg[illegible]d to any particular religious injunction or revelation. Thus the author, after a variety of experiences or supposed convictions of the truth of his first religious creed—by a contradictory inspiration—exchanged the odious extreme of rigorism for the opposite, though more agreeable, extreme of anti-scriptural indulgence and good nature. Happy indeed—thrice happy tidings for old Lucifer and [illegible]sable adherents, were this new Evangelist [illegible]e latter conceits more infallible than his former experiences!"—Rev. John Bell's Religious Dictionary of all Nations, pp. 368, 369.

Reserving for another occasion the de[illegible]velopment of the particular circumstances which were more immediately ancillary, in [illegible]conducting a certain class or the follow[illegible]ers of the so-called Reformation to the ado[illegible]ption of the Universalist System, we shall [illegible] now proceed to the examination of the first [illegible] of the series of Propositions, in which th[illegible]s characteristic tenets of that system are de[illegible]scribed.

According to the First of the Propositions just referred to, an exact statement of the doctrines of the Universalists is not to be met with in books, these doctrines not being digested as yet and their professors in fact being only now about to philosophize their opinions.

We shall presently show, that in adopting this course, the Universalist Class of Protestantism has acted with much more prudence and foresight, than many other sections of their Brethren of the Reformation, of far greater pretensions in numbers and in learning. Had the other Sects of Protestantism acted with the same caution as the Universalists, they would have saved the upholders of their respective various contradictory doctrinal formularies, as well from the reproaches of their Dissenting Brethren, as from the crushing argumentation and the still more painful satire, with which "Bossuet's History of the Variations of Protestantism" abounds. It seems not unlikely, that the Universalists have, in recent times, profited by experience, and learned wisdom from the perplexities and inconsistencies, into which other Protestant Sects were led, by the adoption of articles or creeds, descriptive of their peculiar belief.

candid and more honorable, for the Universalist Protestants, thus openly to avow, that they have [illegible]as written fixed distinctive formulary of [illegible]rsons to[illegible]an rashly to adopt one, as most [illegible]would they testants Churches have done, and [illegible]deprived [illegible]themselves afterwards to the certain power, of being obliged to add to or detract [illegible]rom it, to patch or to piece it, in order to meet each unforeseen emergency which may occur, or what is far worse to be forced to incur the miserable necessity of having recourse to all the subtleties of a wretched special-pleading, and disingenuous sophistry, in order to give to their peculiar system the appearance of unity, and try to turn aside the shafts directed against it by its several opponents.

It is painfully amusing to an educated Catholic, to have to listen to persons belonging to the several sects of Protestants.—Sects each differing in belief from one another, and this too in doctrine of moment, else, wherefore their separation or division—each boasting of the Bible as the sole standard of his belief, and glorying, that he professes the truth as it is in Christ, understanding by this his own individual human interpretation as well of those of Scripture passages, in which he dissents from other Protestants, as of those, places, in the understanding of which, he and they may, for the present, accidentally agree.

We speak thus, because, the most superficial acquaintance with Protestants and their religious history abundantly demonstrates, that their agreement with each other, even on what are called "Fundamentals" is casual and transitory, arising from merely contingent circumstances and not regulated or based upon any principle which can impart to it stability.

We have adverted here to the facility, with which all classes of Protestants, how much-soever differing from one another, boast of the Scriptural origin of their respective tenets, because, we now propose to put in juxta-position with each other, the proposition of the Universalists, which announces, that they have no written fixed formulary of doctrines, (these not being yet digested and their professors beginning only now to philosophize their opinions,) and the several clear and explicit sentences of the New Testament, which openly announce, that a complete and consummate code of Faith and morals was taught by Christ and his Apostles to the first Christians, and that due provision was made by the Divine Founder of that code, that it should be taught in all its first perfection and integrity to the end of time.

Previously to his Ascension, we are informed by St. Matthew, Chap. 28, that our Divine Saviour assembled together his Apostles on a mountain in Galilee, and thus addressed them "all power is given to me in Heaven and in earth. Going therefore teach ye all nations: baptizing them in the name the Father, and of the son, a Ghost. Teaching them to o whatsoever I have commanded you: behold I am with you all days, even to the con summation of the world."

Let us here pause, in order to compare the concise and perspicuous words addressed by the Saviour to the First Pastors of the Christian Church, with those contained in the first proposition in which the Universalist System is described. Does the Saviour send his Apostles to reflect upon, to put in order and digest a yet crude and uninformed theory? Does he intimate to them the expediency of their philosophizing their opinions before they announced the Code of Faith and Morals, which he sent them to teach? No such thing.—Human language does not supply words more subversive of the Universalist theory, than those are, which the Saviour employed on the occasion here referred to. "Go! whither? to all Nations —for what purpose? to teach them—what are they to be taught? all whatsoever I have commanded you. This and no other is to be the Measure and the Standard of your Teaching, in all that appertains both to Faith and Morality—For three years you have daily heard from my own lips the truths, which I descended from Heaven to teach to Mankind, both by own Ministry and by yours also with which I will abide until the end of time, in order to guide it into all truth and secure it against all error—To you it belongs simply, to hand down in its integrity, just as you received it (what is, the sacred deposit of Doctrine to [illegible] and th, who may be fit to teach [illegible] mind always, that you are not [illegible] to digest, to philosophize, [illegible] upon, to add to, or take from aught of what I have commanded you to teach all nations, until time shall be no more. Of the truths I have taught you, not one iota shall pass away—Heaven and Earth shall pass, but my words shall not pass. My Doctrine is not mine, but His that sent me—you are to transmit it to others from me, as I have given it to you from My Heavenly Father—Its origin, its divine—It therefore is unchangeable, and like to Jesus Christ, it is the same, yesterday, to-day, and for Ever.

—ooo—

SUMMARY OF RELIGIOUS AND OTHER INTELLIGENCE, RECEIVED BY THE LATE MAIL.

We have to announce with joy, that the disgraceful and bigoted Bill, authorising the visitation of Convents by men, not unfrequently of profligate habits and without religion, [illegible] jority [illegible]32 votes. [illegible] of Lord Russell [illegible] and vacillating course, [illegible] attempt alike to enemies and [illegible] d it can boast of any sincere friends, a matter on which serious doubts may be justly entertained. In its management of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, it has added to its other blunderings, one which but for the rabid Anti-Catholic feelings, it has excited for its own base purposes, would have proved fatal to all that has taken place, with respect to that measure, and have forced the Russell Cabinet to begin its dirty work de novo. But, profiting of the bad passions that have been aroused by its own agency, the Cabinet has for the present managed some how to patch up its error.

It seems, that the settled rules of the House of Commons, require, that a Bill which treats upon religious matters, and thus affects the interests of any class or religious Society, should be introduced by and confided to a Committee of the whole House.—This rule or usage was overlooked by Lord Russell, and the opponents of the Bill we speak of, very properly profited of the omission, to try and have the measure thrown out. By dint of exertion, the Premier obtained a decision from the Speaker to the effect, that the rule or usage referred to, regarded only such enactments as included the temporalities of the Religious Body, which was to be affected by the projected measures. Now, Lord Russell contended, that as the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill had reference wholly to matters of a [illegible] nature, it was by no means necessary, that the particular rule or usage, in virtue of which his opponents sought to throw out that Bill, should be complied with. By means of this unworthy subtlety, and by the aid of the bigotry of the Anti-Catholic Members, the Premier was saved from the confusion and discomfiture, which the wholesale rejection of his Penal enactment, if thus effected, would have brought upon him and his Colleagues.

Admitting for argument sake, the justness of the principle advanced by the Premier, it becomes at once as evident as the noon-day Sun, that all his out-pourings both in his disgraceful Durham letter and in his speeches in Parliament, on the late Papal Aggression, as it is absurdly called, and on the infraction of Her Majesty's Rights must be deemed, to be mere moonshine and Clap-trap, resorted to for party purposes. For, Lord Russell himself declares, that the remedy he proposes for the evil complained of by him, is one of a wholly spiritual nature, and which is altogether exclusive [illegible] temporal relations or [illegible] then, that the evil, [illegible] remove, must be also one [illegible] spiritual character, one [illegible] whatever to do with Her Maj[illegible] rights or prerogatives, and therefore that all the argumentation hitherto employed by Lord Russell, in justification of his proposed penal enactments, can be regarded only as so much hollow and dishonest sophistry, unworthy of a Statesman and still more unworthy of a Christian.

—ooo—

ELECTIONS IN IRELAND.

We have great pleasure in announcing the unanimous Election of the Right Hon. Morgan O'Ferrall late Governor of Malta, for the County Longford and of Mr. Sergt. Murphy for the City of Cork. Mr. O'Ferrall was spontaneously chosen whilst in office at Malta by his Longford Constituents. The choice is alike honorable to the Electors and to their chosen Representative. We have known Mr. O'Ferrall for many years, and we can bear testimony to his great public and private worth. We may here mention as a remarkable indication of the extraordinary Religious and political change in the state of things in Ireland, that, when about thirty years since, a Catholic Barrister the Uncle of the present Lord Bellew was appointed by a strong Tory Government, on account of the so-called conservative politics of himself and family, Chairman of the County Longford, such was the opposition given to the appointment by the Orange Party of the day, that the Government found it necessary to cancel it, and in lieu thereof, to grant to Mr. Bellew a Pension equivalent to the Salary annexed to the Chairmanship, from which he was removed. It must be peculiarly consoling to those friends of justice and religious freedom who still survive and who witnessed the painful state of things, which we have just described, to behold now a Catholic Gentleman of tried virtue and of ancient lineage, unanimously returned to Parliament, as the representative of a county, which a few years ago, would not tolerate even a conservative Tory Catholic as Chairman at its Quarter Sessions—As to Mr. Sergt. Murphy he is a perfect [illegible]ister of first rate attainments a general favourite in private Society, both Protestant and Catholic and the Son of one of the most benevolent Men of modern [illegible]plexities Protestant and Catholic and the Son of one of the most benevolent Men of modern [illegible]articles liar beg[illegible] A just tribute of praise was pronounced by a Protestant Gentleman, Mr. Bea[illegible]alist [illegible] at the Hustings in favour of the late J. Murphy, Esqr. whose own name is his eulogy, not only [illegible]hey ha[illegible]is Fellow Citizens but with his Fellow [illegible]ary o[illegible]ecclesiastics [illegible]ergt. Murphy is also the Ne[illegible] would the Catholic Bishop of Cork—[illegible]priv[illegible]anished through a long series of years, as well for every virtue that exalts the character of a zealous enlightened Chief Pastor, as for those amiable qualities which endear the Man, who is happily possessed of them to all his Fellow Citizens, without Religious distinction.

—ooo—

CLAPHAM CONVENT.

The late Mail announces that the prosecution of two of the London Journals for a most wanton and unfounded Libel on the above-named Institution has been given up, in consequence of the offending parties having tendered in open Court an ample apology, expressive of their contrition for what had occurred, and of their resolution for the future not to give insertion in their Journals to similar slanderous publications.

—ooo—

SPAIN.

A Concordat very favorable to Religion has been agreed upon between the Crown of Spain and the Holy See.

Intelligence has been received of the arrival at the Havannah in a Spanish Frigate, of the Archbishop lately appointed to the vacant Metropolitan See in Cuba.

By a late decree of Her Most Catholic Majesty, a strict supervision is to be exercised by the local authorities, in order to prevent the introduction and circulation of Books, injurious to good Morals or the Orthodox Faith.

—000—

POINT DE GALLE.

The Rev. Mr. McGirr, who left Calcutta by the late Steamer, states in a letter written by him from Point De Galle, that he was fortunate enough to be joined by the Rev. Dr. McAuliffe of the Madras Catholic Mission and by Mr. Heathcote, a Military Officer of Superior attainments, as fellow-Passengers to Suez. Mr. Heathcote has been recently converted to the Catholic Faith. His Father, we understand, is a Partner in a rich Mercantile Firm in London.

POETRY.

REQUIEM.

(Communicated by a Friend to the B C Herald on occasion of the late Rev Mr. Grogan's Death.)

Hark! thro twilight e ovters stealing,
Last the sounds of music roll
'Tis the solemn requiem pealing,
Breathed for a departed soul!

Distant now the voices blending,
Through the dim aisles floating stray;
Like incense to heav'n ascending;
Bearing soul and sense away!

Now the notes on frailty dwelling
Low and trembling are preferred;
Now in faith and triumph swelling,
High as if their God had heard.

Now again they die, bereaving,
Hope of dreams around it twin'd;
Gone are love's wild visions, leaving,
Tears and nought of earth behind.

—000—

THE SOUL.

What is the thing of highest price
The whole creation round!
That which was lost in Paradise—
That which in Christ was found—
The soul of man—Jehovah's breath,
That keeps two worlds at strife;
Hell moves beneath to work its death,
Heaven stoops to give it life.

God to reclaim it did not spare
His well beloved Son;
Jesus to save it deigned to bear
The sins of all in one;
The Holy Spirit seal'd the plan
And pledged the blood divine,
To pur hase life for guilty man,
That price was paid for mine!

And is th s treasure borne below,
In earthen vessels frail?
Can none its utmost value know,
'Till flesh and spirit fail?
Then let us gather round the cross,
That knowledge to obtain,
Not by the soul's eternal loss,
But everlasting gain.

nt than urch

ctions.

—000—

ROME.

The religious ceremonies of the Holy Week commenced on the 13th with the customary blessing and distribution of palms by the Pope, which took place in St. Peter's Church, instead of the narrow limits of the Sixtine Chapel, as heretofore. The procession of Cardinals, Bishops, state officers, and foreign dignitaries, which accompanied the portable throne of his Holiness up the vast nave of the basilica, was of unwonted length, the whole of the corps diplomatique with General Gemeau and the principal officers of his staff in full uniform, with palm leaves in their hands, following in the train of the Ecclesiastics: and last of all a select band of English Catholics, likewise bearing palms, some of whom were dressed in black, as was Lord Fielding; and others, amongst whom was Lord Campden, in uniform. The two new Cardinals, of course appeared, being now duly installed into the dignities and privileges of their station since the Pope completed the solemnities of their installation by opening their mouths at the conclusion of the Consistory on Thursday last.—Tablet.

CONVERSION OF ANOTHER CLERGYMAN OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH TO CATHOLICITY.

Farewell Sermon of the Reverend Mr. Harper.

We regret that space does not allow us to give the whole sermon, which we copy from the London Catholic Standard, of the Revd. Mr. Harper, who is now on his way to the Eternal City. The Sermon was delivered on his quitting his ministry, finding that conscience would not permit him continuing this last at so great a variance with his individual religious principles. After the Exordium he says:—

"These preliminary cautions have I given with special reference to the immediate object of this sermon. It is not known to very many of you that this is the last time I shall address you from this place. The Bishop of the Diocese was desirous that the present state of things in this chapel should not continue. In part, the rights and ceremonies here, in part a catechising of the children some months back, misreported to his lordship by a brother clergyman, who came from another diocese to see, and it would seem report, upon, the peculiar services about which he had seen so much in the papers, and who came hereupon finding St. Barnaba's closed, induced the Bishop to request me to dispose of the chapel as soon as I could, and to cease to officiate in his diocese. With some [illegible] kindness he did not require an immedi[illegible] anxiety to [illegible]liance with his order. And although he [illegible] recently sent to remind me of his wish that the present state of things should not continue; yet this does not afford sufficient reason for my discontinuing, before I had disposed of the chapel, and with an abruptness which, I fear, has pained some of the congregation. Let me assure them, then, once for all, that it is not without feelings, on which I will not stop to think, that I find myself thus compelled to do what appears like forsaking them. Separation of any ties, how much more, then, of such ties! is not so pleasant a matter as to tempt us. But the truth is, dear brethren, I have been led to entertain grave doubts of my position. Till these doubts are resolved, till this want of confidence is restored, it would be wicked to continue performing duties which were the subject of such doubts. A waiting, a standing still, to see what God would have us to do, surely our plain duty [illegible].

"Under such circumstances, it is obvious that a particular account to you of the correspondence with the Bishop on the matters to which I have referred, and my interviews with him would be quite out of place. In the face of questions so overwhelming, involving nothing less than our eternal salvation, all personal and particular questions must give way.

"It is necessary for me, I [illegible] you plainly, what it is which doubts and that want of confidence has [illegible] me at once to give up officiating [illegible] you.

"I need hardly say then to you, as Christian people, that it is necessary for our salvation that we should be members of the Church of Christ, which is His body; the tabernacle of His Spirit. This you all must acknowledge. The English Church teaches as much each day, when she tells us to believe in one Catholic Church; and when she bids us pray for the good estate of Christ's Catholic Church. To any who do not believe this, what I am going to urge will be of little weight. Their view is different; easier, if possible, of answer; yet not referred to now. I am speaking of true, earnest Churchmen. And such must believe in the necessity of belonging to the Church of Christ. The great question, then, is, "What is Church?" Which of all the bodies who call themselves the Church, is the true one?" This is again a question not easy of answer; but our church gives us an answer. She points to four notes or marks of the Church? that she is one; again that she is Catholic; again that she is Holy; and lastly, that she is Apostolic. Test these communions, then, by such notes. And let us take the note of Unity. What says the Psalmist, prophesying of the Church of Christ in this respect! "Jerusalem is built as a city that is at unity in itself. For thither the tribes go up, even the tribes of the Lord, to testify unto Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord. For there is the seat of judgment." And again in another Psalm, "Behold, how good and joyful a thing it is for brethren, to dwell together in unity... Like as the dew of Hermon, which fell upon the hill of Sion," which is the Church of God "For there the Lord promised his blessing even life for evermore!" And St. Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians speaks of the divers orders in the Church as ordained, "Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." And earlier in this epistle he speaks of Christians as "Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. There is one body and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling: one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism, one God and Father of us all. And in his Epistle to the Romans, the same Apostle implores for that Church, that they may "with one heart and one mouth glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. And our Blessed Lord says, "And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold and one shepherd." Thus then are we taught about the Church in holy Scripture! She is to be at unity in herself: to have one faith, one baptism, to glorify God, not only with the same affection of a loving charity, but with one mouth, i. e., with one form of words, in one speech, that so far the confusion of Babel may be reversed in the Church of God. But, my brethren, have we one faith? Why, each clergyman has a new doctrine and interpretation of his own. What one teaches, another denounces as lies of Apollyon! [illegible] even dissenting bodies have, each one in itself, some unity of faith, and some common confession. And then, are we at unity among ourselves, with high Church and low Church, Tractarians, Evangelicals, Arnoldians, Erastians? Surely, this does not look like the city of peace; surely, we are not likely to come in the unity of the faith, when we are all teaching contradictory things, so that even our forms and ceremonies are different-some making the pulpit everything, some making the altar everything; some having no altar at all; some celebrating the holy Communion every day, some every week, some, again, once a year. How is it possible, then, that with one mouth and one heart we may glorify God? Why, have not members of our common Church come to our services to hear, at them, to call them names, and interrupt, because they really cannot contain their wrath? And our bishops teach differently: some advocate baptismal regeneration; some condemn it as wrong. How differently do they talk on the matter of the Holy Communion! We cannot claim, then, the note of Unity.

Let us examine, then, into the note of Catholicity. The Church is to be Catholic, i. e., in other words, she is to be founded everywhere. In every land, among whites and blacks, among savage and civilised, in cold or heat, in island or continent, desert wild or crowded city, the Church of Christ should be. All nations were to flock unto her: not Jews only, not English only, or English colonies, but French, Spanish, Negro, Indian, Chinese, Russian, Icelander, Asiatic, Jew—all were to own her sway, and obey her gentle yoke. This was a special note. She was to spread everywhere, like a little leaven leavening the whole lump. She was not to be a National Church, but the Catholic Church, embracing all, but owning none of the distinctions of race, having one faith, one discipline, one speech for all. But surely we cannot claim such a note for our Church! It dwells here and in our colonies. It has no home elsewhere. We find her not in France, or Germany, or in Egypt, or in Russia. Neither does she attempt to fix herself in these parts. "She cannot claim, then, the note of Catholicity."

But again, we require the note of Holiness. The Church was not only to be holy in her doctrine and discipline, but in the lives of her saints. These were to be as a light set on a hill, which cannot be hid. Such lives we find in the Apostles, in the early Fathers of the Church, in the Martyrs, ; in such as St. Augustine, St. Basil, St. Ambrose, St. Athanasius, St. Benedict, St. Bernard, St. Thomas of Canterbury, St. Ignatius, St. Francis Xavier, St. Philip Neri, St. Alphonsus, St. Charles Borromeo, St. Francis de Sales: these continually, from age to age, offer to the world the note of holiness. We see in them the perfect life as detailed in Scripture, and seen in the lives of St. John Baptist and the Apostles. We begin to understand: "Be ye perfect, even as your Father in Heaven is perfect;" Be pure, even as Christ [illegible]e;" "Let your conversation be in heaven;" "Pray without ceasing;" If thou wouldst be perfect, sell all that thou hast and give to the poor." We would behold again the wilderness, the camel's hair, the coarse food of the Baptist; we [illegible] the close human imitation of Him who knew not where to lay his head; who was despised and rejected of men, who fasted forty days and nights, overcame Satan, sought the lost sheep, and died for the souls of mankind; and we practically realise that text. "Miracles come not save by prayer and fasting." In reading these and similar lives, we really seem for a time, if it may be said reverently, as though, like Noah, walking with God. Heaven, and the power of the Holy Ghost, seem everywhere around them. But look to the great names in the English Church, we find nothing like this, Infinitely above our own miserable practice and life individually, as their example may be; yet, after all, it is a domestic type of religion—respectable piety; there is nothing of the heroic, the ascetic, the ever visible halo of Divine Charity, the nimbus of Angelic light. No: we must seek for these in vain."

MOVEMENT TOWARDS CATHOLICISM IN PRUSSIA.

It has as yet excited comparatively little attention in this country, that a movement similar to that of Puseyism has lately manifested itself in the Protestant Church of North Germany. This movement, as we gather from the Berlin correspondence of the Daily News, has all that multiplicity of aspect which indicates a change in the public mind. In the first place, must be mentioned the fact that ritual observances, which the Lutherans have always retained to a much greater extent than their brethren of the Anglican Church, are now being "carried out" at Berlin with zeal and an evident wish to assimilate them as much as possible to the offices of the Catholic Church. The correspondent referred to, writing on April 18th (Good Friday), says:—

"There are growing up within the Protestant Church [of Prussia] practices which are the same as those commenced by Dr. Pusey in England. The metropolis of Berlin has witnessed for several weeks past the rise and progress of "Liturgische Andachten," prayer meetings at which the ordinary Church service is performed with all the effect which lofty vaulted churches and massive sacred music can impart. Choristers, clad in scarlet robes, assist at the ceremony, [illegible]ing the service different robes are worn at different [illegible]. These are facts which indisputably exhibit [illegible]ces of [illegible]re to restore at least the pomp and form, if [illegible] the Service of the Roman Catholic Church service. There a large [illegible]y who desire a closer approximation to the spirit of Popery.

Our readers may be glad to see a list of these services which the Prussian imitators of Puseyism held during Holy Week. We find them thus given by the Kreuzzeitung, the organ of that party, as quoted by the Deutsche Volkshalle of April 17th:—

On Wednesday and on Sunday next, at six o'clock in the evening, will again take place in the cathedral liturgical devotions (Liturgische Andachten), with the assistance of the Royal Cathedral Choir, who on Wednesday will open with the same hymns which were sung at the last devotional service; and on the 19th Divine worship will be elevated by the melody of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, J. [illegible] Gallus, Eccard, and other masters of Church music. Throughout Holy Week, the liturgical services will be remarkably copious. A liturgical service will be held on Palm Sunday, at six o'clock in the evening [at the cathedral]. Another at St. James's Church, by the Rev. [illegible]. Bachmann; on Thursday, in St. Mathew's Church, by the Rev. Consistorial Councilor Buchsel; on Good Friday in the Garrison Church at four in the afternoon, by the Rev. Military Chaplain Strauss, and, at six in the evening, in the Bohemian Church, by the Rev. Pastor Knak; on Sunday evening, at six o'clock, by the Rev. Cathedral Preacher Snethlage. These services are stated to be similarly popular beyond Berlin, not only in cities like Potsdam, Eisleben, Merseburg, Dusseldrof, &c., but also in Brandenburg, Tellow, and Buitzenburg—nay, even in villages.

The reader cannot fail to be struck with the general resemblance this sort of thing bears to Puseyism. We shall presently remark upon this resemblance, but must further state that this movement of the Protestant Ministers in Prussia coincides, at least in point of time, with a very determined effort the Prussian Government is now making to uphold the Church-and-State of that country. There are in Prussia only three religions recognised by the State—viz., the State

Church, which is made up of a forced union of the Lutheran and Calvinist parties, and is governed by Bishops created by the Crown; secondly, the Catholics; and, thirdly, the Jews. All these receive pecuniary assistance from the Government. In 1848 religious freedom was proclaimed for all persuasions, an event which increased those tendencies to split from the State Church, which the forced union alluded to had been a great cause in promoting. All sorts of sects were pullulating—"Baptists and Anabaptists, Methodists, Christian Catholics, German Catholics, Free Christians, Primitive Christians, and the like, chiefly in Saxon and Eastern Prussia." Lately the Government have adopted strong measures of repression against those sects.

The Government says the Berlin correspondent of the Daily News.

> Have set in motion the whole of the machinery of the Ecclesiastical and political police in order to put these sects down, and efface them from the country. The brethren of the sects have been declared political offenders, because they hold public meetings, not sanctioned by the law. In Pomerania and East Prussia, in Breslau, numbers have been arrested and sentenced to the payment of fines varying in amount from five to thirty thalers. In East Prussia all the sacred offices of the Church performed by members of these sects have been declared illegal, with a retrospective action. The married have been unmarried, the christened unchristened, the dead not buried, with the usual Christian rites. In point of fact, all persons professing any other Faith but those recognised by the state have been excommunicated. In the Saxon province the police have been strictly ordered to watch, with the greatest care, the proceedings of the dissenting bodies, and the activity of their leaders. Wherever they occupy parish authorities have been instructed immediately to acquaint the police authorities, in order that the necessary repressive measures may at once be put in force.

All this is miserable enough, and exactly a parallel to what the State Church has been in England. The Prussian State Church dissented from Catholicism, and in its turn is dissented from by these multiform sects. Like its sister establishment in England, it not only persecutes those who exercise the same private judgment on which it is itself founded, but it exhibits a tendency to make claims not a whit more absurd than those of Anglicanism, of having a right to the obedience of the citizens who pay for its support. Something of this temper is said to be inhibited in the new Kirchen Ordnung, or book of Church regulations, which, contrary to the spirit of the old Kirchen Ordnung it has superseded, makes the Minister in some degree absolute over the administrative Council of his parish, empowers him to keep a conduct-list of his parishioners, &c. However, unjust and ridiculous as it is for any Protestant establishment to pretend to this authority, the wish on the part of the Prussian Government to claim it, coinciding with a liturgical movement among the Ministers and people, does show a Catholic tendency deserving some attention. This tendency, it appears, is chiefly in that party of the State Church called the Pietists or Evangelicals. The "Low Church," or rather the "High and-dry," as they would be called in England, are the old Lutheran party. At first sight this will strike our readers as odd, since they are accustomed to identify so-called "Evangelical" principles with everything that is hostile to Catholicity. However, any one who studies Dr. Pusey's writings will see an element that approximates him more to that school than to the High-and-dry party. It is as if an "Evangelical" had borrowed the preference for external dignity observable in the latter, and had deepened it by the peculiar fervour of his own principles. Moreover, the circumstance must not be lost sight of, that Dr. Pusey in his earlier years visited Germany, deeply studied the state of religious parties in that country, and imbibed so much of the Pietist doctrines, that on publishing a work on the religious affairs of Germany on his return, he became involved in a violent controversy with the late Professor Rose, one of the chief founders of the since-denominated school of Puseyism, to which Dr. Pusey himself, once more or less an "Evangelical," has given the title.

To return to the Prussian Establishment. The movement alluded to is already producing its fruits. In Mecklenburg-Schwerin, five or six members of the highest distinction in that duchy belonging to the Pietist party, have become converts to Catholicism. Among these, it is stated that one, if not more, belong to the noble family of Bulow. Conversions are mentioned as frequent in other parts of Germany. Great stress is laid by the Daily News and the Examiner on the political crisis at which this movement occurs; and it is urged that the latter is only a part of a much wider scheme of the Catholic interest to turn the scale in Germany, by admitting the Catholic non-German States of Austria into the confederation. It is obvious that to refute this assertion fully would take considerable time, and requires information possessed only by the diplomatists. Suffice it, however, to say, that no unprejudiced observer who turns his attention to the Lutheran religion will be disposed to look to any merely political causes for any such manifestations. No doubt, political causes may stimulate these effects; anything that calls attention to Catholicism would do so, and certain it is that the Catholic religion, thanks to the Apostolic zeal of the Jesuits and the Redemptorists, is making most unexampled progress in Southern Germany. But the Lutheran religion has all along retained elements of Catholicity quite strong enough to set thinking minds at work. The revival of Catholicity on Continental Europe, years before Puseyism was heard of, was signalised by the conversions of several illustrious Germans, such as Schlegel, Stolberg, Novalis, Overberg, and others. It subsided for a time, but probably English Puseyism, on which much interest is felt in Germany, and the very alliance, so much opposed by the Puseyites, between the English and Prussian Establishments in the affair of the Jerusalem Bishopric, has contributed to start a fresh and more important movement. Several Prussian ministers, for example, sent a letter of congratulation to the Protestant Bishop of Exeter on the stand he lately made for the principle of the independence of spiritual powers. There can be no question that the external rites of the Lutheran Church—the candles, crucifix, chasuble, liturgical music, &c., will lead the reflecting mind more or less towards Catholicism. A Protestant political writer of great acuteness frequently calls attention to this fact. In his work on the Rise, Progress, and Prospects of the German Catholic Church" (the contemptible set of Ronge and Czerski, which goes by the name), Mr. Laing (pp. 114 116) makes the following remarks, from which, after deducting his ignorant assertions about "idolatry," a good deal of insight into the question of Lutheranism may be derived:—

It was an original contradiction in Lutheranism which Calvin in part, and John Knox altogether avoided, that it retained the forms of the Church of Rome to a certain extent, while it rejected the principle on which they are founded. The cutting off from the forms or ceremonial which it retained the splendour and weight from external moral means, to which, if they were well-founded and good for anything at all in religious worship, they were in correct reasoning entitled, has been a canker eating away Lutheranism from its birth. If altars, lighted candles, crucifixes, altar pieces, surplices, &c., are retained, the principle of a holiness in things is retained; and the legitimate sequence or deduction from what is retained is image-worship, and all the idolatry and splendour of the Church of Rome. It is the same admitted principle carried out to its legitimate extent.....If the altar, lighted candles, and crucifix, be something more than the work of human hands, something more than a stone cut by John Smith, or a pound of wax candles bought at the grocer's, or a piece of gilt wood made by the carver and gilder of the town, it is impossible to deny that they are entitled to all the bowings and kneelings bestowed upon them.....It is in consequence of this inherent contradiction in Lutheranism, and of its false position, from retaining a ceremonial shorn of all that gives it weight in the stately Church of Rome, a material external splendour, and a spiritual internal meaning, that in every country the Lutheran Church is dead.

It may easily be inferred that if the devotional spirit which exists in the German mind is by circumstances led to take up with enthusiasm the externals they have retained, a movement towards Catholicism must be the result. They cannot very long rest in mere æsthetics, even "elevated by the singing." The Tentonic nations, beginning with England, ere long shall be free from the reproach of unbelief which has now attached to them for three hundred years, and has been thought inherent in their character? It took perhaps four hundred years for the Church thoroughly to subdue Gnosticism, and the heresies of which that system was the parent. Protestantism, in like manner, seems to be running out its course, and the Church, the daughter of Sion, to be rising all glorious as of old.—Tablet.

LETTER OF MONSIGNOR LUQUET TO SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART., M. P.

[We have had the honor to receive, from an illustrious quarter, a copy of the letter of which the following is a translation. The public were, a few years ago, familiar with the name of Mgr. Luquet, in connection with the religious affairs of Switzerland. His Lordship was sent to that country by the Holy See, as Apostolic Nuncio, at the time of the war of the Sonderbund.—Ed. Tab.]:—

Rome, March 27th, 1851.

Sir,—I have just read the speech you delivered on the 14th instant in the English House of Commons, on the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. I have been painfully affected by it on your account especially, who are making your début in the Parliamentary career.

You will allow me to remark, that when a man has the honour to bear a name such as yours, he, more than any other, is bound to respect himself by respecting that which is the most sacred thing on earth—the religious truth professed over the whole universe by 160 millions of Catholics.

Now, you have not done this; you have forgotten yourself to such a degree as to treat that holy Christian truth as "idolatry" and "superstitious mummery." You have forgotten yourself so far as to hold up to ridicule, in the description of an imaginary and impossible picture, one of the greatest names of Christian ages—St. Gregory VII.—whose glory has been so extolled by German Protestantism itself

This forgetfulness has, above all, astonished me as coming from you—you to whom our "mummeries and superstitions" did not appear, a few years ago, so contemptible or so "impure;" for I have a distinct recollection of our conversations at Berne on this great question of the Christian verity. I recollect that, after having, I do not say sounded the depths, but only commenced a discussion on this point, the consciousness of the truth which I laid before you agitated you profoundly, and you uttered to me these words, which I shall never forget: "Let me alone, let me alone; don't talk to me any more about that; you would make me a Catholic." (Laissez-moi, laissez-moi; ne me parlez plus de cela, vous me voudriez Catholique.) found as you express?—or rather, must we be under the painful necessity of reckoning you among those wilfully blind, who force themselves to stifle, by outward violence, those interior feelings of remorse caused by the fear of truth? If it is so, I grieve for you; and I cannot but implore you, for your own sake, to reflect seriously on the inevitable consequence of conduct so disastrous.

Is it possible that at this moment your faith

You, however, uttered one truth, which, indeed, you interpreted wrongly, but which is incontestable. You said that "the Rome of to-day is still the Rome of Gregory VII." I will add that it is also the Rome of Gregory I., to whom England is indebted for the Faith. That great and holy Pope, as you are aware, was moved with compassion for the souls of your forefathers, at the sight of the English slaves exposed for sale in the Roman market. He then made against your country an aggression, the result of which was to liberate the freemen in it from a much harder slavery, the slavery of infidelity.

The aggression of Pius IX., be well assured of it, has the same object. For the freemen of England the single but ardent desire of Pius IX., as of all of us, is, to break in pieces the chains under which, in the name of liberty, Protestantism crushes your souls.

I will add more, and I pray you to remember it; I will add that the aggression of Pius IX., like that of St. Gregory, will have for its certain result the restoration of a great number among you to this interior liberty, which only belongs to the children of God.

In spite of all human legislation, or rather in consequence of the oppression imposed by human legislation, in a province which does not belong to it, you will see, be very sure of that, daily increasing in your country the number of the Faithful devoted to the Roman unity. God grant, for the sake of your soul, that you may be soon among that number!

You also say that "the times of Innocent III. of Leo X., and of Paul III. are passed." I reply that, for the Catholic Clergy, the times of Henry the Eighth are also passed. But the Kingdom of God abides for ever; and Pius IX., like Gregory VII., like Innocent III., like the other Roman Pontiffs, is therein the Vicar of Jesus Christ, Son of the Living God.

And allow me to add, your own experience will soon demonstrate to you, that to England also must be applied what you say in that glorious avowal of yours for noble and ever-faithful Ireland:—"The Roman Catholics have, in matters of religion, an almost proverbial tenacity; that question is a holy ark, an ark which it has never been possible to touch without dangerous consequences."

So much for what our personal relations with you during our common sojourn in Switzerland authorised me to say to you, as to what concerns yourself in particular.

I now come to a matter in which is interested the honour of persons worthy of all respect—of persons whom you have publicly outraged by departing from the truth.

I here speak to you without having concerted with any one whomsoever, and without official character of any kind—without any personal interest whatever moved simply and solely by a regard for justice and truth.

You say that you saw in Switzerland populations driven to civil war "by agents of the Pope." You speak of "the unworthy conduct of the Papal court, which, even after the capitulation of Fribourg, engaged Lucerne to prolong a useless struggle!"

Now, you know, nevertheless, that not one of those assertions has any foundation.

You know that, before the war, Pope Pius IX. wrote to Switzerland a letter, not to engage them to take up arms, but in an altogether contrary sense.

You know that the extreme partizans of the Sonderbund made it a subject of reproach to the Pontiff, whom they accused of a leaning towards the Radicals. You know what diplomatic office it was that stopped the publication of that letter; and that office was not the Nunciature.

You know that during all the preparations for the struggle the personal language and hopes of the Nuncio were all for peace; that the Radicals, it is true, invented the famous benediction of banners by the same Nuncio, and that that fact was a complete falsehood. But I inform you, if you were not aware of it, that the Chief of the Radical Government of Lucerne violently protested by writing, after the war, the falsehood of that invention.

You know that all the active agents of that war took to flight, or were thrown into prison, immediately after the victory. Now, on my arrival in Switzerland, all the personnel of the Nunciature were there. No one, even at the moment of the most furious excitement, ventured to assert facts like those you have proclaimed.

Lastly, you know what a spirit of conciliation and peace characterised the religious mission with which I was charged immediately after the war.

All these things you knew well; and you, bearing the name of Sir Robert Peel, you have been able to forget yourself so far as to speak as you have done in the interest of the most wretched cause! You have had the hardihood thus to inaugurate your entrance into an assembly, before which your illustrious father pronounced words so honourable. You have thus undertaken the defence of a Ministry at its last grasp—of a Ministry that has gained so miserable a fame by the attitude it has taken in the midst of the agitations of Europe.

Ah, Sir Robert, it was not thus that good men of all nations would have indicated to you your path.

I lament over you, and I implore you, in the name of yourself, to pause, to return back; there is yet time.

Receive, with the expression of my sorrow, the assurance of my consideration.

Your most humble and most obedt. servt.

✠ J. F. O. LUQUET,

Bishop of Hésebon, late Delegate Apostolic in Switzerland.

THE MORMONITES.

(From the Englishman July 1.)

We mentioned on Thursday last, that the disciples of Joe Smith, the Mormonite gipsy, have set their foot in Calcutta, and we are informed that one of the elders of the new sect has been delivering his commission at Cooly Bazar. Well! there is no accounting for tastes. There would appear to be nothing too monstrous for some folks to believe—the more extravagant the better. This new light professes to speak with many tongues, but he cannot speak his own. He is commissioned to work miracles; why does he not teach himself grammar and common sense, and then set up as a worker of miracles? There would be some sense in this, but there is little in the nonsensical and incoherent trash which he is reported to have doled out to his audience, consisting of bad grammar and worse sense. He calls the Book of Mormon a superadded revelation. Why the Mahomedans beat Joe Smith all to nothing. The Koran does teach something definite, but we defy the most ingenious to make any thing out of the mystic medley of the Mormonite revelation: it is about the most stupid trash that was ever penned, and bears on the face of it the stamp of fraud. It does not possess the merit of originality, wit, or morals. It is the stupid production of a cunning fool. It is not the Book of Mormon which has gathered together the Mormonites into the wilderness, but the political claptraps and the hope of a community of goods that has been the great charm by which so many have been led away into what the elder calls Mount Ephraim, whether he exhosts his Indian children to flee. We imagine he will find little success in India, unless he can, as he says, do any thing for any body at a moment's notice. This beats the advertising tailors and undertakers. They only undertake to do things on the shortest notice; but this Elder undertakes to works his miracles at a moment's notice. Let him try his hand at the Company's Courts, and the thousand and one evils which abound in this country. Let him take the Banks under his care, or turn India into a second California, and he will not have to exhort his flock to fly to Mount Ephraim; they will find their way fast enough to Simla and Darjeeling, to enjoy the fruits of the labour of man who will do any thing for any body at a moment's notice. The Missionaries had better look about them, or else this new candidate for the conversion of the people will have done all the work before they are aware of it, for who can contend with a man who can speak all tongues but his own, and who is specially appointed to a mission which teaches that Joe Smyth is the last teacher sent from God and the Book of Mormon the completion of Heaven's revelation to man.

We would advise the "Elder" to visit the Lunatic Asylum, that is, if he is sure of being let out again, for it can only be amongst such people that he can hope to succeed. We have no doubt that he will soon follow his countryman, the Professor of Mesmerism, who has quietly gone to dole out his bad English and his tom-fooleries to some community even more gullible than the Calcutta public. America provides us with enterprising merchants and fine vessels; she sends us ice and notions. But she does not stop here, she is not willing to keep all the fun to herself, she sends us at one time a mesmeric buffoon, and at another a religious miracle worker to enliven our dullness, and to carry off our spare cash.

O, America, America, thou land of Stripes and Stars, how canst thou afford to spare to dull impoverished India such stars as Professor Alin and the elder of Joe Smith's Church. Thou hast not as yet sent us any of thy stripes; these in the fulness of thy benevolence thou hast kept back for the Negroes and the colored race, who are enjoying thy paternal care and the blessings of slavery in thy free land, the home of every body but the Slave.

THE CASE OF THE BRAHMIN CONVERT AT MADRAS.

Judge Burton.

(From the Englishman, June 26.)

Sir William Burton wept! The woes of the Hindoo wife drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek, but did not in the slightest degree influence his determination to enforce Act XXI of 1850 under its most odious interpretation. We asserted from the first that the Act would be so handled as to work injustice to the Hindoos, that under the pretence of maintaining the great principle of toleration it would be made an instrument of oppression; and here we see the first fruits of this law, against which the petitions of a whole nation have hitherto been unavailing. Such decisions are only to be met as Virginius met the decree of the Decemvir. The kind[illegible] daughter should have been freed from the touch of [illegible]. Subject to the outcaste after the same fashion—"Hoc [illegible] quo pos[illegible]m modo, filia in libertatem vin[illegible]. But a Hindoo are not Roman fathers, [illegible] Courts are tempted accordingly to try what amount of injuries they will bear without resistance. According to Sir William Burton, Act No. XXI is a two-edged sword, it cuts both ways. The apostate husband preserves all the rights which his late religion gave him over his wife, in addition to which he has new rights unknown to Hindooism. He could not as a Hindoo, compel his wife to renounce caste, as a convert he can compel her to live where she must break through its rules, and become herself an outcaste. It is true that this Judge for the sake of saving appearances, has made an order (which will be found below), that the wife be permitted to partake of food prepared according to the Hindoo ritual, and that she is not to be compelled to do any act contrary to the rules of caste!—as if cohabitation with an outcaste was not itself a sufficient offence against her religion. The order itself is a farce, for what means has Sir W. Burton of enforcing it, and what punishment can he inflict upon the husband for disobedience to it? The hypocrisy of the whole proceeding is displayed in this order. It will be quoted in England to prove the humane attention to the injured woman's feelings shown by the Court, when the Judge might just as well have ordered that she should in future be white, with blue eyes and flaxen hair.

Sir William Burton feeling the excessive hardship of the interpretation which he has put upon the laws, says—"I have no right to say that this man has forfeited his civil rights, yet I must do so, unless

SIR W. BURTON'S DECISION IN THE CONVERT CASE.

(To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru.)

SIR.—The view you have taken of the decision of Sir W. Burton, which compelled a woman to live with a husband who had adopted a new attorney. What no difference of and a human ing, that is tve law; but it is the first time we ever heard the doctrine asserted in a British Court of Justice. Act XXI. of 1850, decrees that no person shall be deprived of his civil rights by reason of his religion, but it does not say that he shall use his own belief to coerce the conscience of another. Till this moment we supposed that Hindoos, whether men or women, were protected against compulsory violations of their religion. The Courts punish severely any one who forces a native of India to transgress the rules of his caste. But here a woman i maintain that a decision that involves a compulsory sacrifice of caste can be consistent with that law. It is opposed to reason and justice because the husband's adoption of Christianity renders cohabitation with him impossible, without that sacrifice, which most assuredly was not contemplated as a possible result of this man and woman's matrimonial engagement. It is most intolerant as forcing the woman to do that which is entirely repugnant to her creed and her feelings, as well as destructive of her caste. As for the Judge's order to prevent such a consequence, it is a manifest mockery and he must know it to be so; for he cannot be ignorant that even if

William Burton to say that the Act has abolished excommunication. It has remitted one of the penalties attached to loss of caste; but it can no more prevent the severance of all family and religious ties than it can restore the dead to life. Hindooism is to strong for that.

According to one report Sir William Burton declares peremptorily, and according to another, conditionally, that if a Christian were to ar of Mussulman, his wife would be compelled to God with him. There is nothing like support may bad case by an absurdity. Th cannot doubt that the ecclesiastical Co of would at III a divorce à mensâ et thoro on the proof of apostacy; but the cunning Judge will probably say that he only meant that there was no civil remedy. However were his doctrine literally true, it would be most consolatory to those husbands who are so delighted with matrimony that they think they cannot have too much of it. The fond husband on ples prohibited by the Hindu law of caste to be taken or touched, does the Judge not know that cohabitation with the man which the decree of the Court sanctions and authorizes, may enforces, is equally pollution according to that law—equally involves loss of caste, and consequent degradation? I venture to say, that a more bigoted, illegal, arbitrary, oppressive and intolerant decision has never, since the days when toleration was repudiated, been pronounced.

The learned Judge threw out that he would have pronounced the same decision, if the convert had become a Mahomedan instead of a Christian. No doubt he thinks he would; but I feel sure he would not, because all his antecedents justify the opposite conclusion. He is a rampant saint who signalizes himself on all occasions where zeal and two. The lady might threaten to leave him would then only have to refer her to the lea Judge's decision in Lutchmee Unal's case

There is one question which we wish to Sir William Burton, arising out of t is decitum. The Mahomedan law allows the husband an unlimited power of divorce. build the Christian wife whom he had deliver over to her renegade husband be bound by law, or could she still claim the advantage of her own, and live with him in spite of the Madressa—

Heaven forbid that I should consider a proper respect for religion a disqualification for the Bench. I am far from entertaining such an opinion; but I do maintain that men who signalize themselves by an excess of enthusiasm for proselytising the people, fanatics, in short, like Sir W. Burton, are most unfit to be allowed to preside over Courts of Justice in this country, where it is so essential that the people should be satisfied that their rights are not sacrificed on the altar of religious prejudice—that our toleration is not a mere empty name—never realized in practice, when a question arises in which a bias in favor of of our own faith may defeat the claims of reason and justice in behalf of those of another.

Do not be deceived by the sentiments expressed by the Madras journals. Madras is par excellence the land of saints. There you have captains in the army discussing knotty points of theology, Judges preaching at Missionary meetings and journalists discoursing learnedly on the sinfulness of using punkahs in churches to mitigate the heat, or having service in the morning to avoid it. In short, there is a complete reign of the saints at Madras. Of course any decision in favor of Missionary views or designs is sure to be hailed in such a society as righteous; and the press with one exception apparently, echoes the sentiment. The Calcutta press should have more respect for native rights and feelings.

Yours,

AN OBSERVER.

[Hurkaru June 28.]

GERMANY.

TOLERATION IN GERMANY.

The following communication (says the Morning Chronicle) will be found interesting, under the circumstances at present existing in this country:—

"One of the first cares of the present King of Prussia, on ascending the throne, was to allay the exasperation of his Roman Catholic subjects, caused by the intolerant policy of his father. To this end he permitted, by an edict in 1841, a free intercourse between the Roman Catholic Bishops in his dominions and the Holy See—that is to say, the correspondence between them was no longer to pass through the bureau of the Prussian government. A like ordinance was passed by the Bavarian government a few months later. [See Phillips's Kirchen-Recht (Canon Law) ss. 148, p. 558-9, part 2, vol. iii. (in German). 1850. Ratisbon. See also Walter's Kirchen-Recht, ss. 47, p. 100. Bonn. 1842.] In these two countries, however, the placet still subsists, though it is contrary to the letter and spirit of the Bavarian concordat of 1818. Yet as their political constitutions have guaranteed the full liberty of the Church, the Roman Catholics in both countries anxiously look forward to the speedy abolition of the placet, as well as of all other restrictions on the freedom of the Church. Since 1848, the Bavarian government has offered no impediment to the holding of national and provincial councils which have been held successively at Worsburg and Freisingen.

"The present King of Prussia has, by an indulgence, allowed a convent of Franciscan Monks to take in novices; and during the last year he has afforded every facility and encouragement to the Jesuits and Redemptorists, in instituting missions for his Roman Catholic subjects. The governments of Baden and Nassau have, in this respect followed his liberal example. But as yet no laws have been passed in these different states for carrying out the principle of Ecclesiastical freedom laid down in the recent constitutions.

"It has been reserved for Austria to lead the way in the full emancipation of the Church. The young Emperor, on mounting the imperial throne, recognised that Ecclesiastical Josephism and political bureaucracy had facilitated the revolution of 1848. He and his able councillors perceived that a Clergy, bound hand and foot, as the Austrian Priesthood had been for the last seventy years, lost the respect and confidence of the people in proportion as they became enslaved to the government, and could not then so effectually promote the cause of religion, nor serve the true interests of the state. The odious placet on all Papal Briefs and Bulls was immediately abolished, and the freest intercourse with the Holy See acceded, not only to Bishops, but to the Clergy and laity. Synods, diocesan and provincial, may now be held, and Ecclesiastical censures inflicted, without let or hindrance from the government; while the direction of Ecclesiastical boundaries has been restored to the Bishops. The management of its property given back to the Church. The right of the latter to found religious orders of both sexes, as well as [illegible] and to exercise a just influence over public education, has been recognised by the Austrian government; and the Concordat regulating these important matters is in preparation. It is curious, that the Piedmontese professedly liberal politicians have been engaged, during the last few years, in striking off, piecemeal, the fetters which bound them to take a calculating view of the liberty of the Church, and the necessity of [illegible] Society, by which alone menaces English and Protestant liberty to the camp of those who [illegible] this country."—Tablet.

NOVA SCOTIA.

CHURCH IN HALIFAX.—The pastly lamented [illegible] remarkable for many interesting [illegible] owes in a [illegible] on the Catholic Church. On the [illegible] last, Masses and prayers for the conversion of England were offered up throughout the Diocese of Halifax, according to the request of Bishop Walsh's Pastoral. There was a large concourse, both morning and evening, in the Halifax churches. The Bishop preached at the morning service on the zeal and perseverance of Pope St. Gregory the Great in the first conversion of England. In the evening another sermon was delivered by the Very Rev. Mr. Connolly on the conversion of England, the false alarm that was raised about Papal aggression, and the charitable and liberal feeling exhibited by Catholics to their Protestant fellow-subjects in Great Britain and the colonies. The Jubilee commenced in Halifax on the third Sunday of Lent and ended on Passion Sunday. So great a religious revival has never taken place amongst Catholics of the city as on this occasion. Several hundreds who had been for many years absent from religious duties, received the Sacraments at this time. In a discourse at the end of the Jubilee, the Bishop declared that between seven and eight thousand Communions had been made during the fourteen days of the Jubilee. Some of the neighbouring Clergy assisted those in town at the duties of the confessional, but to the great regret of the people the Vicar-General, who had exposed himself to contagion many times on board the ship Infanta, whilst lying in our harbour with her cargo of sick and dying emigrants, was seized with typhus fever in the midst of the labourers of the Jubilee. He is now happily recovering after having had a narrow escape of his life. The imposing ceremonies of Holy week were conducted with all the usual solemnity at St. Mary's Cathedral. The Tenebræ Office was chanted by the Bishop and Clergy on the evenings of Wednesday, Thursday, and Fridays. At the Pontifical High Mass on Holy Thursday the oils were blessed by the Bishop, who also officiated pontifically at the ceremonies and Mass of Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter Sunday. A Passion sermon was preached on Good Friday morning by the Very Rev. Thomas Walsh, of Windsor, and another in the evening by Very Rev. Mr. Dunphy. [illegible] the shop preached on the evening of [illegible] day, and also at the High Mass, and [illegible] tifical Vespers of Easter Sunday. [illegible] standing the inclemency of the [illegible] tendance at the cathedral in the [illegible] numerous. The foundation of [illegible] of Sacre Cœur, Spring Gad delivered to [illegible] been already completed, the horror. It is [illegible] and towe[illegible] are now fa[illegible] say that the Act [illegible] pletion. The entire [illegible] finished will be very pictu[illegible] to lose of caste [illegible] naments to that part of the [illegible] severance of all [illegible] corder.

[illegible] can restore the[illegible] [illegible]ong for that. [illegible]

MADRAS EXAM[illegible]

[illegible]illiam Burrhot[illegible] ng to another,

We have received the first [illegible] were to [illegible]er o[illegible] Madras paper called the Examiner to [illegible] Go[illegible] tablished for the defence of th[illegible] supportin[illegible] ma[illegible] lics against all who attack [illegible] catho[illegible] [illegible]et of the publication is set forth [illegible]wing [illegible] quotation from a speech delivered by the [illegible]ht Reverend Doctor Fennelly, at a meeting of the Roman Catholics of Madras and the vicinity:—

"Its (the Examiner's) objects are to expose the false and calumnious charges, which are daily being made against our (Catholic) principles and practices—to make known and defend the political rights of the Catholic Community all over India. If their creed has been calumniated, what reasonable man can blame us for exposing the foulness of the calumny? If their civil and religious liberties have been trampled upon, and invaded, is it not clearly our duty to expose the wrong and to shield the injured? The objects of this journal are principally of a negative and defensive character. We do not propose to invade the enemy's territory, but only to guard our own frontiers; we will not blockade strong places, but only man our own ram[illegible]."

[illegible] of course, the conductors disclaim for their journal an exclusively polemical character. While serving as defender of the faith, it is to be in all points a regular secular newspaper, published twice a week at the small charge of one rupee a month or nine rupees a year in advance. For so cheap a paper it is well got up, judging from the sample number. Madras, though it does not yet boast a daily, is very prolific of newspapers.—Hurkaru June, 14.

NOTICE.

To the Donors and Subscribers for the Purchase of the Intally Premises for the B. C. Female Orphanage and Asylum for Poor Widows, &c. &c.

The Subscribers and Donors for the above-named most useful Charity, are respectfully reminded, that the payment of the Second-Half Yearly Instalment for the purchase of the Intally Premises, will be due on the 1st day August next, A. D. 1851.

CATHEDRAL MALE ORPHANAGE.

Under the Care of the Christian Brothers.

The present Dormitory of the Male Orphanage affording accommodation only to forty-four Children, and the number of Inmates being now fifty-four, whilst applications are almost daily made for the admission of other destitute Orphans, it is proposed to erect by Subscription a second Dormitory and Offices, in order both to meet the existing exigencies of the Institution and to enable the Christian Brothers to extend its Benefits still more widely.

Subscriptions.

Archbishop Carew, ...	Rs.	50	0
Mrs. Young, ...		50	0
Mr. P. S. D'Rozario, ...		50	0
Mrs. Dr. W. B. O'Shaughnessy, ...		25	0
Mrs. O'Brien, Chowringhee, thro' Rev. Mr. Kennedy, ...		10	0
Rev. Mr. Kennedy, Rector of St. John's College, ...		10	0
Sergt. N. O'Brien, ...		25	0
Mr. P. Daly, House of Correction, ...		30	0
Mr. T. W. Sayers, Futtypore, ...		10	0
Mr. O'Connell, ...		10	0
Mrs. J. M. Fleury, ...		4	0
" L. C. Fleury, ...		4	0
A Catholic, thro' Mr. Guzman, ...		100	0
Madame De Souza, ...		50	0
Mr. D'Silva, thro' Rev. Mr. Garriga, ...		2	0
A Catholic, thro' Rev. Mr. Tracy, ...		100	0
Rev. Mr. Tracy, ...		20	0
Mr. James Rostan, ...		10	0
Mrs. P. Jones, ...		50	0
Rev. P. P. Formoza, ...		20	0
Miss Teresa Mack, ...		4	0
A Catholic thro' Rev. Mr. Tracy, ...		16	0
Mrs. Phillips, ...		8	0
A Widow and Orphan, ...		8	8
A Friend to the Orphans, ...		5	0
Mr. J. Cornelius, ...		10	0

THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism.'

No. 2.] CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 12, 1851. [VOL. XXI.

THE

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

Calcutta: Saturday, July 12, 1851.

SIR J. E. TENNENT.

We mentioned some time ago, on the authority of a private letter from London, that Sir Emerson Tennent would be a candidate for Belfast at the next election. An extract from a Belfast paper has been handed to us, which we publish below, in which it is stated that his return is almost certain. The only doubt being as to the ex-Secretary's opinions on the Popish question. We suppose, that in Belfast, a candidate is required to be thoroughly orange on that subject, however liberal he may be upon others. Sir J. Emerson Tennent was a very active and useful member for Belfast, and it is not surprising that the inhabitants should be strongly interested in his favour.—Englishman July 5.

From the preceding allusion to the Constituency of Belfast, our readers might be led to suppose, that the Catholic and Liberal Electors of that City are powerless, in comparison with their fellow citizens of illiberal orange politics. We are glad to be able to assure the Friends of justice and good Government in this Country, that the case is not so, but, that on the contrary, the liberal Constituency, if they unite together and act in concert, are quite powerful enough to secure the return of a Member, who will represent and advocate their sentiments in Parliament. In his first outset in life, Sir J. E. Tennent professed adhesion to ultra liberal or radical politics—When, however, greater maturity in years and more experience caused him to take a calmer and less impassioned view of Society, he passed from ultra liberalism to the camp of the late Sir R. Peel, long before, the latter illustrious Statesman had attained a character, even for good or kindly feelings towards his Catholic Fellow-Subjects. It is to his connection with that justly lamented Personage, that Sir E. Tennent opts owes in a great measure the respectable p[illegible]ion he now occupies in the Political W[illegible]

[illegible]in of the[illegible]ace inclined to believe, that if re[illegible]lease[illegible]bers [illegible] Belfast, Mr. Tennent will uphold the [illegible] policy of Lord Aberdeen and the other distinguished representatives of the [illegible]icy, for which in recent times Sir R. Peel's C[illegible]binet was distinguished.

Moreover, the immediate Friends and connections of Sir E. Tennent, all, if we mistake not, belong to the liberal School of Politics, whilst some of his warmest supporters are to be found amongst the Catholic Constituency of Belfast. That Constituency forms at the present time, about one-third or one-half of the whole class of that important and rising commercial City. For the last twenty-five years, the numbers wealth, and influence of the Catholic Constituency of Belfast have wonderfully encreased. In the time of the Predecessor of the late Bishop Crolly, there was not in Belfast any Catholic, raised in life beyond the rank of an humble Mechanic or Tradesman.

In the comparatively brief interval, which has since elapsed, various causes have led, in an extraordinary degree, to the augmentation both in numbers and in wealth, of the Belfast Catholic Community. At the beginning of the interval to which we have just referred, one small and humble edifice served as their only Chapel. To this lowly structure, a spacious and stately Cathedral of exquisite design has succeeded, whilst, according as the wants of rapidly encreasing congregations may require, Chapels, Schools, and Religious Institutions are being constantly established for their accommodation.

This gratifying amelioration of the state of Catholicity in Belfast has been greatly promoted by the Religious dissensions, which within the last few years caused much division and discord among the Presbyterians, as well of that locality, as of the North of Ireland in general. About some twenty years ago, a considerable number of the Religionists we now speak of, both Clergymen and Lay-men, united together in rejecting the Doctrines of the Trinity and Incarnation, and in adopting the Unitarian or Socinian opinions. This event of course could not fail to excite between the seceders and those of their former Brethren, who still adhered to the received belief of the Mysteries in question, much angry controversy. The bitterness of the conflict was aggravated, by the efforts made by the Unitarian party to retain for their new worship, the Churches, of which they had whilst professing Presbyterians got possession. In some instances, at least, the seceders were frustrated in this design, by their adversaries appealing to the Supreme Court [illegible] by whose decision the Unitarians [illegible]d. But though not wholly successful in this respect, the seceders however were at length fortunate enough, to accomplish another triumph, to which it is not unlikely, they attached much more importance. They prevailed on the Government to dispense to them as heretofore their proportionate share of the Regium Donum, and thus they secured for their new Church, not only a handsome temporal endowment from the state, but also the advantage of their religious Community becoming thus recognised by Government.

In a spiritual point of view, however, the Schism under consideration proved seriously injurious to the interests of Calvinism in Ulster. For, in consequence of it, numbers of those, who continued to adhere to the Presbyterian Worship, as taught, previously to the recent separation, became alarmed, at beholding the extreme facility, with which so many both of the Clergy and Laity, rejected as superstitious and false, doctrines, which from their earliest infancy, both they and the Seceders had been taught to reverence, with the most profound homage of the Understanding and the heart. They saw also with pain and grief, the utter powerlessness of the authority of their Church, to check or suppress the daring innovation, which they had witnessed, and they were soon led to perceive, that should any other doctrinal struggle arise, they had nothing in their Church or its Pastors to assure them, that another equally disastrous result to that which had just occurred, would not happen. If so many of their educated and respected Brethren, with whom they had for years together worshipped in the same Temples, could, as it were in an instant, exchange what they had deemed the most fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, for opinions, which had been heretofore held in abhorrence and execration by them, what guarantee could there be, that at some future and, perhaps, not remote time, the comparatively less important doctrines of Christianity which still remained after the rejection of the Trinity and Incarnation, should not be yet more unceremoniously disposed of. The result of these reflections, thus forced reluctantly upon many of those of whom we speak, was, that in several instances, they evinced their admiration of the order and subordination, by which the Catholic Church upheld her unity, even in the midst of poverty, humiliation and persecution, not only without the aid of the state, but even oftentimes, when artifices of every kind were encouraged, if not devised by Government, for the express purpose of tampering with and subverting that glorious character of the true Church of Christ. From admiring the beauty of Catholic Discipline, numerous Presbyterians during the crisis of which we treat, passed over into the one Fold of the one Shepherd. We have heard ourselves from the mouth of the present Bishop some years since, that hardly a week elapsed, in which he did not receive five or six such converts into the Catholic Communion.

Since the period of the outbreak here alluded to, a second not less detrimental to Calvinism took place, on occasion of the rupture between Free Church party and the adherents of what we may call the Established Kirk of Scotland. In Scotland we have heard, that this disruption gave occasion to the conversion of numerous Presbyterians to Catholicity. We have no data which would enable us to state, what were the effects in this way, produced by that event in Ireland. We shall conclude this notice by stating, that about fifteen years since, the Catholic Population of Belfast was estimated at about twenty three thousand. We deem it not an unreasonable conjecture to advance, that it includes at present not less than thirty thousand. We may add, that the recent outbreaks in Presbyterianism have not only positively encreased the Catholic Congregations in point of number, but that they have, moreover, strengthened the cause of religious liberty, and added considerably to the number of those, whose principles induce them to coalesce with Catholics, in every important municipal or political movement.

—000—

CREED OF THE UNIVERSALISTS—MORMONITES &c. &c.

Their respective Creeds and Codes of Morality, proved by History to be an inevitable result of the primary principle of the Reformation.

We promised in our last issue, to lay before our Readers in a succeeding number, a more full account of the origin and history of the religious system of the Universalists. We enter now on the fulfilment of that engagement. One great object we have in view, in our present undertaking is, to point out to those of our Readers, who take a becoming interest in religious enquiry, the powerful, active and undying influence of the primary principle of the Reformation, viz, private judgment, in producing an unceasing multiplication of sects, schisms and dissensions in every denomination of Christians, in which it is acknowledged.

We are aware, that in some denominations of Protestants, various efforts have been resorted to, in order to try and control the exercise of this principle, by the interposition of Ecclesiastical authority. But every such effort has resulted in discomfiture and failure, even when those who resorted to it, had been supported by the strong arm of the state. Indeed—the least reflection suffices to show, that if the principle of Private judgment or interpretation be once admitted, in the genuine and comprehensive sense, in which it was adopted by the first abettors of the Reformation, it must essentially exclude all right or authority on the part of the Church and its Ministers, to require assent, or consent to its doctrinal decisions, unless it so happen, that these should coincide with the judgment, of the individual whose acquiescence is desired. Even in this case, it is to be observed that the individual to whom we are now supposed to make reference must, if he would be consistent, ground his acquiescence on the dictates of his own judgment, and by no means on the deference due by him, to the authority of the Church, to which he professes to belong.

The religious controversy which has given occasion to the origin, in modern times, of the Universalists, originated about the year 1600 with Arminius, a disciple of Beza and Professor of Divinity in the University of Leyden. From a conviction that the doctrine of Calvin upon free will, predestination and grace was contrary to the divine attributes of goodness mercy and justice, he rejected that doctrine, and in opposition to it laid down his own system, which may be reduced to the five following propositions:—

"1st, That God has not fixed the future state of mankind by an absolute unconditional decree; but determined from all eternity, to bestow salvation on those whom he foresaw would persevere to the end in their faith in Jesus Christ, and to inflict punishment on those who should continue in their unbelief, and resist to the end his divine assistance. 2dly, That Jesus Christ, by his death and sufferings, made an atonement for the sins of all mankind in general, and of every individual in particular; that, however, none but those who believe in him can be partakers of this divine benefit. 3dly, That mankind are not totally depraved, and that depravity does not come upon them by virtue of Adam's being their public head, but that mortality and natural evil only are the direct consequences of his sin to posterity. 4thly, That there is no such thing as irresistable grace in the conversion of sinners. And, 5thly, That those who are united to Christ by faith, may fall from their faith, and forfeit finally their state of grace.—Evan's Sketch of the denomination of the Christian World, pp. 91

which th ngularly in every other controversy, which dicacy of the he peace of any of the Church-opted, in substa
ed, the exercise of the
that the Me
the sect, whose repose was society, w
d wholly unavailing for the in of the oncord. Appeals were therefession.
bers in chiefly by the upholders of the ce on &c. of Calvin, soliciting the interposi-ngers
tion of the civil power for the suppression of the do
ines, which the followers of Armi-nius advoc
ed.

In compliance with these appeals the Synod of Dort was convened in the year 1618. This Synod was attended by Divines, who represented all the Calvinistic Churches of Europe, France only excepted, and also by deputies from the established Protestant Church of England, who were sent thither by the express orders of the British Sovereign, James the 1st, doubtless in his capacity of Supreme Head of the Church recognised by law in that country. With respect to the French Calvinists, it may be added, that although, they were not represented at Dort, the doctrines, nevertheless, adopted by that Synod, were formally received by them, in the Synod held at Charenton in the year 1633.

The aid of the civil power having been invoked and unhappily obtained by the Calvinistic party, their opponents, as might be anticipated were subjected to a severe and sanguinary persecution. One of them, named Barneveldt* was beheaded, another, the learned and pacific Grotius was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, whilst many others sought and found safety in Catholic France.

We have already described the tenets of Arminius, by whom and by whose adherents the Calvinists were designated, from their narrow principles respecting those, who are to be saved, "Particularists," a name which of itself implied, that Arminius and his followers aspired to the opposite and more comprehensive appellation of Universalists. As we have taken the Epitome of Arminius' Creed from the English Writer, the Rev. J. Evans, A. M. a Protestant [illegible] a summary of the doctrine of his adversaries [illegible] the English Protestant Bishop Tomline:

The Articles of the Synod of Dort, Heylin introduces in this manner:—"Because particular men may sometimes be mistaken in a public doctrine, and that the judgement of such men being collected by the hands of their enemies, may be unfaithfully related; we will next look on the conclusions of the Synod of Dort, which is to be conceived to have delivered the genuine sense of all the parties, as being a representative of all the Calvinian Churches of Europe (except those of France) some few Divines of England being added to them. Of the calling and proceedings of this Synod we shall have occasion to speak further in the following Chapter. At this time I shall only lay down the results thereof in the five controverted points (as I find them abbreviated by Dan. Tilenus) according to the heads before mentioned in summing up the doctrine of the Council of Trent."

ARTICLE THE FIRST.

Of Divine Predestination,

That God, by an absolute decree, hath elected to salvation a very small number of men, without any regard to their faith or obedience whatsoever; and secluded from saving grace all the rest of mankind, and appointed them, by the same decree, to eternal damnation, without any regard to their infidelity or impenitency."

ARTICLE THE SECOND.

Of the Merit and Effect of Christ's Death.

That Jesus Christ hath not suffered death for any other, but for those elect only; having neither had any intent nor commandment of his Father, to make satisfaction for the sins of the whole world.

ARTICLE THE THIRD.

Of Man's Will in the State of Nature.

That by Adam's Fall his posterity lost their free-will, being put to an unavoidable necessity to do, or not to do, whatsoever they do, or do not, whether it be good or evil; being thereunto predestinated by the eternal and effectual secret decree of God.

ARTICLE THE FOURTH.

Of the Manner of Conversion.

That God, to save his elect from the corrupt mass, doth beget faith in them by a power equal to that whereby he created the world, and raised up the dead; insomuch, that such, unto whom he gives that grace, cannot reject it, and the rest, being reprobate, cannot accept it.

ARTICLE THE FIFTH.

Of the Certainty of Perseverance.

That such as have once received that grace by faith, can never fall from it finally or totally, notwithstanding the most enormous sins they can commit.

"This is the shortest, and withal the most favourable, summary, which I have hitherto met with, of the conclusions of this Synod: that which was drawn by the Remonstrants in their Antidotum, being much more large, and comprehending many things by way of inference, which are not positively expressed in the words thereof."

Such is Calvinism; and it is in its nature so inconsistent with the attributes of God so contrary to the express declarations of Scripture, and so repugnant to the feelings of the human

---

* Barneveldt, John of Olden, Advocate-General of the Dutch states, acquired the esteem of [illegible] embassies. He can foreign powers in his negotiations and liberty of his native be numbered among the founders of the [illegible] Elizabeth country. Henry the fourth and Queen [illegible] this Churches, judges of merit, made great account of [illegible] man. Barneveldt having wished to restrain [illegible] fessing Pres Maurice of Orange, set up the Arminian [illegible] some inst the Gomarists, the partisans of this [illegible] avenge himself, assembled a Synod [illegible] ere frustrated of deputies from all the Calvinistic Churches, excepting France in 1618 and 1619. [illegible] demned the Arminians with as much [illegible] had not been of the same Communion, [illegible] by 26 Commissaries, was executed in the [illegible] pretext of having given up his country [illegible] Monarchy; he, who had laboured with so [illegible] deliver his country from that power. [illegible] Walachus was sent to him to prepare him for death at a time when he was writing to his wife. When he saw the minister enter, he told him that he was old and had been for some time sufficiently prepared to die; therefore he might spare himself all unnecessary troubles. The minister insisted, sit down then said Barneveldt to him, until I have finished my letter, when it was finished, he asked Walachus who he was, conversed with him upon some religious subjects, and did not cease to protest his innocence. Upon some representations of the minister; he said when I had authority, I governed according to the maxims of the time, then existing; now I am condemned to die in accordance with the maxims of the present day. His two sons, Béné and William, having formed the design of avenging the death of their father entered into a conspiracy, which was discovered, William fled: Béné was taken and condemned to death. His illustrious Mother asked his pardon of Prince Maurice, who answered her in the following terms; it appears to me strange that you should do for your son what you have refused to do for your husband. The Lady, the worthy Spouse of Barneveldt, replied with indignation: I have not asked pardon for — husband, because he was innocent; but I ask it for my son, because he is guilty.

mind, that it seems only necessary to state the system simply and fully in all its parts and consequences, to ensure its rejection by every unprejudiced person. The modern advocates of this system are indeed so aware of its forbidding aspect, that they never bring it into open view by a plain statement of the doctrines which they really support; and rarely venture to quote from the writings, or appeal to the authority, of their Master; they shrink from the Articles of the Calvinistic Creed, and virtually allowing them to be indefensible, are driven to the necessity of asserting, that their system of Calvinism is not to be judged of by the doctrines of Calvin himself; that they profess a sort of moderate Calvinism; Calvinism reduced and qualified; purged of its most offensive tenets, and retaining only those which are less revolting to reason and common sense, and less derogatory to the perfections of the Deity. But Calvinism, however modified and explained, while its characteristic principles are preserved, will always be found liable to the most serious objections (s); and if those principles, by which it is distinguished as a sect of Christianity, be taken away, it is no longer Calvinism. Calvinism, in reality, will not bear defalcation, or admit of partial adoption. It has at least the merit of being so far consistent with itself. Its peculiar doctrines, considered as a system, are so connected and dependent upon each other, that if you embrace one, you must embrace all; and if the falsehood of one part of the system be proved, the whole falls to the ground.—Tomline's Refutation of Calvinism pp. 566 to 570.

(To be continued.

(s) Helvin says, that it is related by Heistibachius, that the Landgrave of Turing being by his friends admonished of his vicious conversation and dangerous condition, he made them this answer viz. Si prædestinatus sum, nulla peccata poterunt mihi regnumcœlorum auferre: si præscitus, nulla opera mihi illud valebunt conferre; that is to say, If I be elected, no sins can possibly bereave me of the kingdom of heaven; if reprobated, no good deeds can advance me to it. "An objection, says Heylin, not more old than common, but such, I must confess, to which I never found a satisfactory answer from the pen of Supralapsarian or Sublapsarian, within the small compasss of my reading."

CORRESPONDENCE.

-000-

DISTRICT CHARITABLE SOCIETY.

To the Editor of the B. C. Herald.

Sir,—The complaints of the Catholic Community of Calcutta against the District Charitable Society are of long-standing. So far back as the January of the year 1842, I remember to have read in the Bengal Catholic Herald the accompanying letter, which, I have reason to think, was written by a person well informed on the subject. If the statement, which he advances be true, and I see not only no reason to doubt it, but on the contrary much, that in my opinion, renders it probable, it seems to me, that there are quite sufficient grounds to enable the Catholics of Calcutta, to have recourse to the Supreme Court, and obtain by the interposition of its authority, such an exposé of the mode, in which Mrs. English's Bequest Fund is disposed of, as will show, whether the condition prescribed by the Testatrix, to be attended to in the distribution of it, be or be not faithfully complied with by its present administrators.

One circumstance may be here noticed as deserving attention, because it both furnishes at least apparent cause for suspicion of foul play, and also suggests the necessity of a judicial investigation into the management of the District Charitable Society. It is a fact, the truth of which cannot be questioned, that up to the years 1842 or 1843, the Fund now spoken of, was always styled, both in the Books of the Society and in the public Journals of Calcutta, "Mrs. English's Catholic Charity Fund or Bequest.

It is also an equally certain fact, that about the year 1842 or 1843, this title or style of appellation was changed into that of "Mrs. English's Charity Fund"—the word Catholic having been of "purpose prepense" omitted. This remarkable change was effected at a meeting of the District Charitable Society, at which the present Protestant Bishop of Calcutta presided.

To the resolution, of course unanimous, by which this change was effected, another, singularly in keeping with the good taste and delicacy of the Meeting, was also cordially adopted, in substance, to the following effect viz, that the Members of the District Charitable Society, whilst unanimous in their approbation of the change just noticed, yielded to no [illegible] others in sentiments of Religious liberality [illegible] &c., towards all classes of the [illegible] year. It happened unfortunately for the right understanding of this so self-laudatory a resolution, that just about the period of its adoption, the names of numerous Pauper Catholics were effaced from the Books of the Society, and the poor destitutes sent to seek for Relief wheresoever else they might hope to find it.

I remain Sir, yours &c.

A. Catholic.

Calcutta, July 8, 1851.

THE DISTRICT CHARITABLE SOCIETY.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

Sir,—As neither the Old Church Committee of the District Charitable Society nor their discreet champion of the Courier has notwithstanding your appeal, come forward to state the particulars of Mrs. English's charity now in the possession of the Society, I shall lay before your readers the facts of the case and leave them to judge whether the late conduct of the Committee be justifiable.

The late Mrs. English a Catholic lady, left a large sum of money for the Catholic poor, the interest of which she directed to be distributed among them. After the death of her Executrix, the late Miss Thornhill, also a Catholic, the money—"vested capital of Company's Rupees Fifty-nine thousand and five hundred" fell into the hands of the Executor, Mr. G. A Bushby, who according to the last report of the District Charitable Society, requested that body "to undertake the distribution and to make its income available to applicants of the Roman Catholic persuasion only."

by did[illegible]ill not stop here to enquire, why Mr. Bush- the Ca[illegible]not make over this sum to the Superior of mittee, [illegible]olic Mission or to the Catholic Com- have been [illegible], whom the money would assuredly exclusively, [illegible]stributed among the Catholic poor distribution to why he preferred entrusting the Charitable Socie[illegible]he Members of the District tants, but thus mu[illegible]composed entirely of Protes- large portion of the [illegible]h I may safely assert that a vested bequest is app[illegible]interest of Mrs English's taints, contrary to the[illegible]lied to the relief of Protestress. Will the Courie[illegible] injunction of the benefac- deny this? [illegible]or his Committee friends [Bengal Catholic Herald, [illegible] P.

Jan. 1, 1842.]

—ooo—

CATHOLIC MALE [illegible]RPHANAGE.

In compliance with th[illegible] request of His Grace the Archbishop, we [illegible] paid our periodical visit to the Catholic M[illegible]le Orphanage, on Sunday last the 6th inst[illegible]nt. We had the honor of His Grace's com[illegible]any on [illegible] occasion,—We were indeed v[illegible]y much [illegible]ified with the appearance of every [illegible]thing [illegible]ame under our notice, and we [illegible]eng[illegible]ly pleased with the healthy and [illegible]ein of the children; a circumsta[illegible] mistakeably indicates the ki[illegible]ffice, which attention paid to them by Bro[illegible]nd care and at- his excellent Colleagues. [illegible]ther Francis, and seeing his Grace flocked to h[illegible]The Children on to [illegible]common parent. His [illegible]m as they would to [illegible] his blessing, and spo[illegible] Grace imparted m[illegible]kindness—We then [illegible]ke to them with D[illegible]tory, which as usual [illegible]roceeded to the clean, and properly venti[illegible]is kept perfectly ment which is raised ab[illegible]lated—The apart- will soon be complete[illegible]rove the Dormitory form an excellent add[illegible]l, and will certainly affording sufficient [illegible]ition to the building, Orphans who are no[illegible]oom for a number of School-room, in c[illegible]w obliged to sleep in the tory being quite [illegible]consequence of the Dormi- [illegible]full—From the Dormitory we stepped into the apartment occupied by the Christian Brothers, and were much delighted to hear, two young lads practising to sing at Mass under the Tuition of Father Formosa, who presided at the Piano. It may not be out of place to add, that Father Formosa has undertaken to instruct a few orphans in the Piano; and devotes much of his time to this his labor of love.—There are at present about sixty Orphans in the Male and nearly ninety in the Female Orphanage,—the number of pupils attending all the Schools established by his Grace, exceeds six hundred and thirty seven; one hundred and fifty of these are Orphans and mainly depend for their food and clothing on the Institutions to which they belong.

C. R. Lackersteen.
P. S. D'Rozario.
Chas. D'Cruz.

July 10th 1851.

—ooo—

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

Lecture on Mechanics, by the Rev. Mr. Stephenson.

In accordance with the announcement made at the close of the preceding instruction, the Lecturer on the morning of the 1st of July, at the usual hour treated at some length, on the centre of gravity. As the course of instruction had been interrupted during some days, he deemed it useful on this morning, to recapitulate the subject matter of the preceding Lecture, at the same time taking occasion to impress more deeply on the minds of the Pupils, those principles of calculation which he had already explained to them. He defined the centre of gravity to be that point in any body, which if supported would leave the body at rest. A remarkable property in this centre of gravity was, that it always sought to assume the lowest possible position, which the circumstances of the body would admit of, and consequently on the support which this point received, depended in a great measure the support of the entire body. Hence, in the ordinary actions of men in mechanical matters much attention and regard was had to this principle, although perhaps by many the reason was not known. In speaking of the centre of gravity, it was necessary to understand, what was meant by the line of direction, a form of expression which would be of frequent occurrence in speaking on this subject.

To comprehend what is meant by the line of direction, we need but suppose a line drawn from the centre of gravity perpendicular to the horizon. This line is so styled, because it

